I.

DOWN THE VARDAR.

It was something of a physical relief to emerge on the Turkish side of the frontier, and exchange the squat, flat-faced Servian for the long-limbed, big - featured Turk. Sharp nosed, bold eyed, bushy browed, a little heavy in the mouth and cheek, slouching a little in his walk, a little slow in movement, but always powerful in build and masterful in bearing—he is the stuff which either heroes or devils might be made of. But he is primarily and beyond all mistaking a man.

The rambling little frontier station is called Zibeftehe, or rather it is so transliterated for convenience of pronunciation, and one wonders respectfully how inconvenient it may have been before. Leave Zibeftche and at once you are in the East. Immediately there is the dash of colour: the fez in all shades of red, from joyous scarlet to sad plum-colour, runs through everything like a thread of red embroidery. This is the one note of uniformity. Otherwise the Turk, or his subject, draws no rein upon the fancy in the matter of colours. He clothes himself spontaneously in rainbows, and groups himself without affectation into spectroscopes. A blue shirt or a magenta jersey, a buff open waistcoat or a green fur-lined cloak, or a black or a white sheepskin, a sash of scarlet touched with gold and green, either six inches wide or a generous two feet swathing all the body—you see them all in any knot of half a dozen. You will see breeches that recall the Western groom, bags that recall a bicycle skirt, violet skin-tights or the white kilt and high, white, braided gaiters of the Albanian. If a man fancies the gold embroidery on his socks, he wears them outside his trousers; if he does not, they will do inside; if he has no socks at all, why, he does not pretend to have any, and gets on just as well.

All this and more you may see as you joggle not too hurriedly down the valley of the Vardar. The sight is not without its serious import, for are we not in Macedonia? For all the curious stranger knows, each costume stands for one of the jarring races whose feuds and clashing ambitions have made Macedonia the infernal machine of Europe. The gaiters of the Albanian and the knee-boots of the Servian, the dark-blue kilt of the Wallach and the shoddy reach-me-downs of the Greek, the sheepskin cap of the Bulgar and the fez of the Turk—from head to foot these people express in their very garments the elements of the problem of Macedonia. “Macedonia for the Macedonians,” cried Mr Gladstone in the generosity of his un instructed ardour; but which are the Macedonians? There are at least six kinds of Macedonians. Each insists that it is the true and only heir, and must enter into the whole inheritance; and that is the beginning and end, and the perpetual imminent peril of the Macedonian question. Because of this the factious claimants establish consulates and endow bishoprics and provoke outrages. Because of this each is ready to rush into war at any moment, to swallow up the whole cake before anybody else can have a bite at it. Many have been the proposed medicines for Macedonia; but one that will cure all discontents there never has been yet. And until six into one goes one there never will be.

In this kaleidoscope of nationalities and national dresses appeared the uniform of the Turkish soldier with a steadily increasing insistence. Soldiers there were, of course, from the first—at the frontier and at the little guard-houses along the line. At first they were few. Here and there a reservist, his Martini slung over his shoulder and his belt of cartridges round his waist, smoked stolidly by the side of the line or at a wayside station. But they were less stolid than usual. When a few were gathered together they seemed more alert than is the Turkish wont; they joked and were not above a little horseplay. Their behaviour in the train was that of all other soldiers in trains. They laughed and shouted; they did not sit still for a minute on end; whenever the train stopped a minute—and first and last it stopped a good many—they got out, and devoted great energy to doing things of no importance. At every station there were the same loitering, chibook-puffing Martinis and cartridge belts; the same unusual animation, yet animation always without excitement. No screams of "Zeto Hellas!" or "Zeto ho polemos!" or "A Berlin!" But at one station, where some forty men embarked, they gave one cheer. Their cheer was neither enthusiastic nor joyous. It was deep and hoarse and grim, like the growl of a beast that scents blood. It was the sort of cheer that you wake up at night to remember.

The uniform of these soldiers was peculiar, but not extensive. Uniform, indeed, is the unhappiest possible word for it, for there was nothing uniform about it except the fez, and even over that one gallant fellow wore a crimson shawl muffling his face and tied under his chin, as if he were an old lady with toothache. Still almost all the reservists had one military garment—usually a coat. Shabby it may have been, and usually was, but still it was a coat, generally blue or black, and not without a trace here and there of red or blue facings. But to infer from the disorder of their apparel that the Turks are unfitted for heavy campaigning was even now absurd. The first hour in Turkey was enough to teach that lesson to any man with eyes in his head. To talk about an army in rags and barefooted, as was being busily done in English newspapers, was merely twaddle. What if they were in rags? The Turkish peasant lives in rags; and the shrill wind from the mountains does not move him to a single shiver. His uniform coat may be old, but it is one more garment than usual, and therefore all to the good. As for his feet, certainly he has no boots. But then he never has boots; he doesn't want boots, and they would make him profoundly uncomfortable if he were made to wear them. Only soldiers in garrison in towns ever wear boots in this country. There were waiting at the front for each of these men a couple of pairs of sandals or canvas slippers. A gentleman who was in the Crimea told me that with these the Turks would march on for ever when our men were falling out by the dozen, because their boots galled them. The sandal is good enough for the Turk to plough his land and herd his sheep in; it would presumably be good enough for him to fight the Greeks in.

As we crept further down the Vardar, nearer to Salonica, the sea, and the front, we took on board no more soldiers. Those we had were only small detachments, often only twos or threes—men from the remote mountain valleys, it appeared, who had received the call to arms late and were late in getting to the railway. The main force of the third Army Corps, which stands for the fighting strength of Macedonia, had poured itself long ago down to Salonica, to pass thence slowly to the frontier mountains. So as we still crept south the country became silent and somnolent. The valley became at many points a gorge with just room for the train to cling to the foot of a cliff as it wound through the deepening shadows. Villages and stations were few and distant. A poor country—though as the light fell the valley opened out again, and fields of wheat and opium poppies spread themselves out dimly on either hand. By now the train was very silent: the soldiers, like good Turks, began to go to sleep as soon as it began to grow dark. And I for one was fast asleep when there rose up the sound of riot about my ears, and a score of yelling dishevelled porters were fighting for my bags. I got a dusky impression of a fair gravelled platform planted with laburnums. I mechanically produced my passport, which a polite gentleman in a fez seemed to be asking for, and fondly I hoped I had seen the last of the thing. I had a vision of being driven rapidly between high-walled courtyards and clinging desperately to one side of the landau to save myself from being dropped out of the other. Then I was in the first hotel in Salonica, so they told me, with a large, dingy hall and a naked-looking cocoanut-matted dining-room, with an orchestra in the café and a mob of bellowing carriage-drivers in the street fit to wake the dead. But they didn't wake me.

II.

A CITY OF JEWS.

THE two men in the bare dining-room of the first hotel in Salonica were talking bad Spanish. It was curious; but were we not in the Levant, where you may expect to hear bad anything under heaven? It became more curious when I went into the bazaar, and heard two ancient Jews—quite unmistakable grey-bearded, eagle-nosed, shiny-eyed, gaberdined Jews—also talking bad Spanish. There must be a large Spanish colony in Salonica, I told myself. Then I went to the telegraph office. Here was another Jew handing in a telegram; nothing strange in that. But he, too, was talking bad Spanish, and—wonder of wonders!—the staid Turk at the receipt of telegrams was answering him in bad Spanish too. What on earth did it all mean? Could I possibly have taken the wrong train somewhere, and got to Spain instead of Macedonia?

On inquiry I found that this was Salonica after all. But Salonica is principally populated by Spanish Jews, and Spanish is its staple tongue. The Jews have been there some four hundred years—since the days of Ferdinand and Isabella. Persecuted out of Spain, they came to Salonica, and the Turk, as always, received them with toleration. And there they have been ever since, preserving the rites and speaking the language of their fathers. In a way it is a purer, because an older, Spanish than that of Spain to-day. The Spaniards have worn the Latin filius down to hijo by now; the Jews are still at fijo with a j sound nearer that of France than that of Spain. On the rock of Jewish tenacity the storms of time and cataclysm have beaten in vain. They talk as they talked when they left Spain; they dress much as they dressed; they keep themselves to themselves, and are proud to call themselves Spaniards. The less educated are convinced that they are the only Spaniards in the world. Even those who know Spanish ports well would never dream of trying to talk as the Spaniards do. To them “Español” means Jew, and so it does to the rest of Salonica. Out of the 120,000 people of the city it is computed that over one half are Jews; Greeks are perhaps 25,000, and Turks a trifle less. There can hardly be another city of this size in the world where the majority of the population are Jews; there are more Jews here than in Jerusalem. Salonica is the greatest, and surely the most romantic, ghetto in the world.

But the irony of it, in this principal city of Macedonia! Here is the province which all covet, wherein all are feverishly struggling to create or to simulate a preponderance of their own nationality. Here is the city which Greeks, Bulgars, Servians, and Wallachs claim, which Turkey refuses to yield, which Austria and Russia will fight for to the death. And the majority of its inhabitants are Jewish, and its reigning speech is old Spanish! Macedonia for the Macedonians? Cry rather Jewry for the Jews.

This is all strange, but there is yet stranger to come. Salonica has also a large colony of Mussulman Jews. We have heard from time to time of a solitary Jew converted to Christianity, but who ever heard before of a Jew turned Turk? Here there is a whole tribe of them. Originally they were followers of a false Messiah, who arose many generations ago. The Jews rejected him, whereupon he embraced Islam with all his disciples. The Turks received the converts and despised them; the faithful Jews spat them out of their mouths. Neither Turk nor Jew would marry them or give to them in marriage. So there they have been ever since—clinging with all the steadfast obstinacy of their old race to their new faith, marrying each other in and in till they are said to have bred into themselves weird, superhuman attributes—second-sight and prophecy. As to that I know nothing. But these Jewish Turks are the only Mussulmans—with here and there an Arab or two—who trade in the bazaar; and from their manner of trading you may see that whatever they have gained or lost they are Jews yet.

The Jews of Salonica are not of the black, Polish cast, which to most Englishmen is the type of the race. They came from Spain, and Spain under the Moors grew the flower of all Judaism. Their faces are less fleshy and finer than those of the Eastern breed; their foreheads and temples high; their silky beards often almost blonde, their noses thin and often almost straight. They move with a grave dignity, and though their faces express something of the weary pathos of their history, there is yet something of the patriarch and the philosopher in the look of the best of them.

Except for the fez, the garments of the Salonica Jew can have changed but little since his fathers were driven from beside the Guadalquivir. He wears a long open surtout, black or indigo or bottle-green, with a lining of fur ; inside that, down to the heel, is a kind of dressing-gown, with a sash round the waist. Underneath he condescends to the Gentile trousers ; but it is part of his stubborn Jewish steadfastness that even under the hottest suns of summer he never quits his fur.

His women are the most gorgeous of Salonica. Their gala skirts are a wonder of stiff silk, embroidered with every flower that grows in a queen's garden. Above this it must be owned that they have very little more than an open bodice and an open lace chemise. But on the head elaboration begins again. They must not show their hair ; they conceal it, therefore, under a flat silk cap, rather like that of a German student, only with a yellow ribbon under the chin. The cap is all green and white, blue and yellow, and cunning needlework ; behind it falls a bag for the hair, likewise of green silk, its drooping end embroidered with pearls. It sounds magnificent, but it looks ungraceful, destroying all the contours of the head. It is drawn so tight over the hair that it pulls up the eyebrows till they become almost circles. These women are said to be the most educated and cultivated of Salonica ; some of them are also, in their youth, the most beautiful. But the costume is not one which I should recommend to my grandmother.

There are more than Jews in Salonica ; indeed, what are there not ? All the civilisations of the Levant have left their mark upon it. Here is a building which was once, so they say, the Temple of Venus. Here, chipped and defaced, stand the sculptured relics of what was once a Roman arch, side by side with a crooked hovel, wherein, sitting on the bare ground, a baker is baking his bread in an oven open to the street. Next door is a rather better shop : this one has got a floor, two or three old boxes athwart the open front for a counter, and tin pots and pans festooned about the walls ; behind them the gipsy smith is cross-legged on the floor, hammering at others. Turn down a mountainous little alley—mountainous, for it is so little that nobody wants to repair it, otherwise Salonica is the best-paved town in Turkey, and its main streets, where the shabby little ponies pull shabby little tramcars, are almost up to the standard of the Caledonian Road. The sloping alley is so narrow that the jutting upper rooms of the houses hardly leave a streak of blue between. Then you come out on to the ruin of the Byzantine St Sofia. It is said to be a smaller, but exact, model of the mosque of the same name in Constantinople, though it is hard to judge by the eye. This church became a mosque; the Turks added a slender minaret, a portico, and a large court to it; it looked on all the changing fates of Salonica till the great fire of eight years ago. Then it was burned out; the wall of the court was destroyed, and so it stands to this day. It stands a bare form amid the dust and desolation all round it; charred, crumbling, maimed, blind-eyed, and solitary, surely as piteous a ruin as any in the world. This for Byzantium; for Venice speak the square battlemented walls, which enclose the town on all but the sea side, running back from the quay up the hill on which Salonica stands, to meet in the rambling citadel. Beneath these still solid monuments of the Doges there passes now the befezzed butcher, his bleeding lambs' carcasses slung from hooks on two boards, which he hangs pannierwise on his pony's back. Venetian, too, is the White Tower at the sea-front. It was built of red brick, and was once called the Bloody Tower. When the Sultan, in the tender promise of his earlier days, heard this he forbade the grisly name, and had the tower whitened. The red is wearing through again by now; which thing, say some, is a parable.

For Turkey speak the gleaming minarets, which stand sentinel over every captured mosque. Yet the whole impression of the town is not Turkish, nor Greek, nor even Jewish, but Levantine. There is the Austrian post-office, the French library, the Italian hotel. There is a beer-shop named after each battleship of the Mediterranean squadron. Under the club is a café which bears an inscription of priceless worth. The top part is defaced; beneath it you may decipher the fragment: "British naval sailors; where you will be treated as Englishmen should be; all kinds of drinks; English spoken." One of the leading inhabitants of Salonica is a Jew by race, a papal baron, and a British subject. Could such be found outside the Levant? It is a city of mixtures and mongrels, with the hardly definable influence of the Eastern Mediterranean over all. It is an influence that makes for untidiness—in dress and in ideas and in conscience. The Levantine is not sympathetic to the Briton: he is not distinguished for justice or honesty, temperance or chastity, industry or courage, though I am told he is an early riser. Such as he is, Salonica is his. For the Levantine character overspreads all races; it can almost change the unchanging Jew.

III.

A HOSPITAL'S HOSPITALITY.

EXCEPT at the extreme south-western corner a crescent of fairly high and fairly steep hills cuts off Salonica from the country inland—cuts it off also from the land-breeze in summer, as the British resident will cheerfully remind you. On the first low slopes of these hills, looking down over a quarter of a mile of dusty common, of houses half built and houses half fallen to pieces, stands the very long, white-plastered, green-shuttered, two-storeyed hospital. In front of it is a garden, with shady trees and flower-beds. Pansies and stocks were blossoming there in the last week of March, so forward was the year in that sheltered bay, though all the mountains down the Greek coast were crusted with snow, and we heard—always, of course, from Vienna, Salonica's nearest communication with the world—of terrible weather on the frontier. You walk through the garden over a kind of tessellated pavement, prettily picked out in stones of different colours—red, white, brown. Then you walk up the broad stone steps; opposite you is a clock with an inscription. An inscription in English, moreover, to the effect that it was given by the Admiralty in recognition of the kindness and skill displayed in treating petty officers and seamen for smallpox. This began to throw a new light on the Turk, that he should be equal to curing bluejackets of smallpox.

The Pasha in supreme command was away on a tour of the field-hospitals. There were depot hospitals at Serfidje, Karaveria, Elassona, and Janina, covering the whole frontier line, with nine small field-hospitals. Meantime the second in command received us—a small man in a very brilliant fez, bright-eyed, fair-moustached, smiling, and courteous, but with a rather strained, sad look in his eyes. The Turk, as I have said, is not naturally joyous, and I do not suppose that hard work in a hospital is likely to make a refined and sensitive man any more so.

We went into this gentleman's room. The private room of a pasha—for he, too, was a pasha—I expected to be something brilliantly coloured, something Byronic. But this was just like any other gentleman's private room. The Pasha took a seat at a table, but not till we had sat down in a row of chairs ranged along the wall. As we sat down he salaamed. We salaamed back. The theory of the salaam is that you lift up dust from the ground in your open hands, convey it to your breast, and then cast it upon your head. The practice of it is that you touch the front of your hat or head, as the case may be, with your open hand; if you are a soldier you make a moment's halt at your mouth. The other medical officers similarly ranged themselves on a row of chairs, side by side with us. They salaamed; we salaamed. Cigarettes were handed; we smoked. Then came an orderly with a tray, on which glittered gold and silver. There was a basin of jam, a stand of spoons with a bowl in the middle, a row of cups of water. You take a spoonful of jam—it was strawberry jam, and, so far as I am a judge of strawberry jam, the very best in the world—eat it—alas, for the cigarette!—put the spoon in the central basin, and take a sip of water. Next came coffee. The coffee is served in little round cups without handles. Lest you should burn your fingers, it is held in a little gold and silver stand of the shape of an egg-cup. Herewith also come glasses of water. When you have drunk your coffee—or eaten it, if you like, for it resembles thick soup; and he who has not tasted Turkish coffee does not know what coffee tastes like—you put back the cup and the stand separately on the tray. Which done, the Pasha salaamed; we salaamed; the doctors salaamed; we salaamed, and all started to make the tour of the wards.

The sick sat up in their beds as we passed—dusky faces, mostly topped with white turbans. They appear in this country to be ill with nearly all their clothes on, and their favourite posture is sitting on their heels. Some were hastily gathering themselves into this position as we entered; one carried his obeisance so far as to stand on his bed at attention. On the faces of some, who seemed to be suffering, sat a look of stolid resignation; on those of the others, as keen a curiosity to see what the infidel looked like as the infidel had to see them. Not but what there were infidels here also, for Greek, Jew, or miscellaneous Levantine may be received here in the civil wards, and treated as Greeks, Jews, and Levantines should be—perhaps even a bit better.

I am not an authority on hospitals, and, if I were, nobody wants to hear more of them than can reasonably be helped. But I think almost any Englishman who only knew of the Turkish Empire by hearsay would have been astonished and disabused if he had seen what I saw. The floors, the ceilings, the sheets, and the mattresses were spotlessly clean. The case-sheet hung duly at every bed-head, with due particulars of the disease and the remedies to be applied. The pharmacy appeared provided with every drug of merit, the names written in Turkish and French on each drawer. The smell of iodoform could not have been improved upon in the most enlightened West. The operating-tables were speckless; the germs were being duly baked out of the aprons and operating apparatus in an oven. Across a court were a couple of wards for convalescents; further off, the wing reserved for the isolation of infectious maladies. In the court itself were rows on rows of trestles—a sight of some significance, for the accommodation had been brought up to a thousand beds to receive the casualties of war. So we passed out to where Salonica sweated and shivered under a summer sun and a screaming wind from the frontier mountains. There was not very much but dust in the landscape just then or afterwards, and if a peck of it in March is worth a king's ransom, Salonica was already able to buy up as many kings of Greece as could be put upon the market. At the door we shook hands with our Pasha, thanked him in French, which he spoke with mastery, salaamed, and parted. We parted again in the garden, and again at the gate; on each occasion all salaamed.

Now, this hospital, wherein many operations and cases, hazardous even in the West, have been most successfully undertaken, is entirely the work of Turks. So, at least, I understand, and in Turkey when anything is not the work of Turks—other than massacres—somebody is generally at hand to say so. Of course, one eminent surgeon does not make a civilisation, nor one excellent hospital a benevolent despotism. I dare say that this is the best hospital in the Empire; certainly there could hardly be a better. But if this hospital does not prove much, it does prove that the Turk is not the incapable savage that British fancy delights to paint him. He may not have attained much as yet, yet he is here demonstrated not incapable of attainment. But who knows? Who wants to know? You have heard, no doubt, that there are bad roads in Macedonia, but had you heard that there is a good hospital in Salonica? Of course you had not. It is nobody's interest to tell you, except, perhaps, the Turk's. And, of course, you wouldn't believe a man like him.

IV.

A WEEK OF WAITING.

SALONICA was agreeable enough, especially to a man with a taste for coffee and cigarettes by day, for beer and a café chantant by night. The sun was almost always shining, and there were endless seats to sit in it on. There was the sea to look at in front, and when you got tired of that there was a tree or two to gladden the eyes of the man who knew anybody to show him the way to them. Probably Salonica is the noisiest place in the world—a distinction the more creditable in that all its noise is made, so to speak, by hand: if it ever should be blessed with the machinery of an American city, it ought to be able to make itself distinctly heard in London. But if the last bawling driver takes home his thundering carriage at three in the morning, and the first brings out his at five minutes past, there is compensation even for that. Salonica goes to bed so late and gets up so early—revenging itself abundantly, it must be said, in the middle of the day—that you need never wait for such entertainment as it has to offer. As soon as the girls in the café had left off fiddling, the day's consignment of soldiers had begun to arrive at the railway station. While you listened to the fiddling you could sit and smoke and drink beer; while you looked at the soldiers you could sit and smoke and drink coffee. And there was generally somebody with nothing else to do quite willing to do nothing with you.

But I—could I for a moment forget it?—I had come to Salonica to be a war-correspondent. Now for a war-correspondent two things at least are indispensable—war and the possibility of corresponding about it. And Salonica offered neither. For a town of its importance and degree of civilisation, I doubt if there is any place in the world so utterly out of the world as Salonica. The newspapers in Turkey contain just what the Government wants them to contain; Salonica has but one French sheet weekly, and that devotes itself almost whole-heartedly to la vie Salonicienne. At Constantinople you have at least telegrams posted up in the club; you have nothing of the kind in Salonica. It is almost equidistant from every place where news could come from. You have got as far away from everywhere as you possibly can without coming near somewhere else. Go by rail, and you are getting nearer Vienna; go by sea, and you are getting nearer Athens. Stay in Salonica and you must get your news, forty-eight hours stale, from the 'Neue Freie Presse.' War might be breaking out at any moment — and the last person, the very last person in any considerable town of Europe, to hear of it might easily be the wretched man in Salonica who was expected to describe it.

Then why stay in Salonica? Ellassona was the headquarters of the army; if war broke out they would be sure to hear of it sooner or later at Ellassona. But to go to Ellassona was the one thing it was impossible to do. The Turk has many virtues, and to these I have tried to do justice; but confidence in the casual European is not among them. He has no love for newspaper correspondents. Perhaps even, he has no cause to love them: they have let him in for three years of trouble with their blood-red pictures of Armenian outrages, first painted on the strength of the Prophet knows what Armenian fables. If you go to him, therefore, and say, "I am a newspaper correspondent and I wish to go to the front," he will bow and say, "It is necessary to apply in the proper quarters for permission," and probably put a special spy on you to see what you are up to next. So I applied to the Consul-General, and the Consul-General applied to the Vali, and the Vali applied to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and to what exalted person the Minister of Foreign Affairs applied I hardly like to think. After a few days came the intelligence that there had been some slight informality. The correcter procedure would be that the Consul-General should apply to the British Ambassador at Constantinople, and that he should apply to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and then he would apply to the necessary exalted quarters. And so the house that Jack built was duly rebuilt. It is flattering, no doubt, for a comparatively young man to become a Cabinet question, but it takes time. And here, meanwhile, was the comparatively young man growing rapidly and unprofitably older. He might stay in Salonica, and welcome; but in Salonica he must stay.

For example, it struck me one day that I should like to go to Karaveria. Karaveria is a station on the railway, from Salonica to Monastir, which formed the base of the army at the front. Troops, munitions, and stores were transported thither on the way to Ellassona, and thence did the rest by road. Having risen very early in the morning, I joined a hated rival—the correspondent of another London paper—at the railway station. Briskly we stepped into the booking-office. “Two first return——” A tall officer stepped politely in front of us. “Impossible,” he said. “But we only want to go to Karaveria, and come back this evening. Behold a basket of lunch as a guarantee of good faith.” “Impossible without a special passport.” “But it’s only to Karaveria—not even outside the sandjak of Salonica.” A sandjak, I gathered, is a kind of district council without the council. “No,” said the ever-polite captain. “I am sorry, but I am not allowed to use my discretion. Nobody may take a ticket—nobody at all—without a special permission.” To the amazement of the captain—these curious Europeans to be annoyed at having nothing to do!—we swore audibly.

Never mind, though, we will go to-morrow. We will send the Consul-General’s cavass—a cavass is a kind of mixture of servant and orderly and personal Swiss Guard—to the police; he will get us a paper stating that we are not spies. In the meantime, a stroll and some coffee and cigarettes. Then some cigarettes and coffee, and a little stroll. Then lunch. On the hour of lunch comes back the cavass. The police regrets that it has no power to give such papers ; application must be made to the Vali through the Consul-General for a teskere. A teskere is the document you normally require in order to be allowed to make a journey from one sandjak to another. You must get that. We swore again.

Never mind, though. The Consul-General is inexhaustible in his courtesy ; let us ask him to send for a teskere. It is only a matter of a few hours ; we will go the day after to-morrow. In the meantime a little—shall we say coffee and cigarettes ? Then a little run in the Bay on the two-piastre steamer, with French colours floating over the rail. A couple of hours thus filled in, and then to the Consulate. The teskere ? Refused ? Why, certainly. Karaveria is the principal point of disenfranchisement for the troops going up to the front. For the present the Vali is not empowered to allow newspaper correspondents to visit it. You can go to Monastir if you like, or Uskub, or, indeed, almost anywhere where there is nothing going on. But Karaveria — for the present, no. Perhaps if an application were made to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, through the British Ambassador at Constantinople, and strongly supported in the proper quarters—but no. For the present, no !

And what will the correspondent do then, poor thing? I do not blame the officer at the station, nor the police, nor his Excellency the Vali, nor his Majesty the Sultan. In their own Turkish way they were all perfectly right, and if I had been in their position I should have done exactly the same as they. Karaveria, after all, was the principal point of disentrainment, and we were not going there to enjoy the landscape. The Government did not want people to know about the mobilisation; it was its own mobilisation, and it had a perfect right to keep it to itself. Whether this was altogether wise from its own point of view is another matter. The Turkish Government professed itself desirous of avoiding war, and I do not doubt that its professions were sincere. Certainly it has gained nothing by the war, nor will it, to outweigh the expense and sacrifices it involved. Now it is more than possible that if the Turks had put fewer obstacles in the way of correspondents at this early stage, war would have been averted. Instead, it allowed correspondents in Thessaly, who ought to have had a little common-sense, but apparently had not, to proclaim to Europe and to Greece that the Turkish army was a mob of starving, half-naked, diseased, disorderly ruffians, who could never stand a day before the forces of civilised Greece. It seems incredible now, but it is indisputable, that thousands of Europeans talked glibly of Japan and China, and believed that the Greeks would have a chance against the Turks. The Greeks were glad enough to take this opinion. Of course the Turks said that they were arming. They issued daily statements from Constantinople of the number of troops that had gone up to the front. But as they let nobody go to see them, they only gave the impression that there were rather more troops in the statement than there were at the front.

As a matter of fact the statements from Constantinople were true, and the troops very decently cared for. The mobilisation worked slowly, but it worked. No doubt it could have been improved on in Germany, but it was well in advance of anything Turkey had done before. The thanks for that were due to the new direct railway from Constantinople to Salonica. Had the Sultan kept his fleet in any order this line could have been dispensed with. But the Greek fleet, trumpery as it was, commanded the Archipelago, and neither men nor stores could be sent by sea. So that, but for the Constantinople-Salonica line, the Asiatic reserves could not have been got to the front for weeks and weeks. They would have had to march to Salonica from some point on the main line from Vienna to Constantinople, and they would have had to be fed on the way. In that case, with nobody at the front but the troops from Macedonia, Albania, and Kossovo, even the Greek army might have gained important success.

The direct line, as by comparison it is generally called, runs from a point south of Adrianople to Dedeagatch, and thence to Salonica. The troops joined it from Rodosto on the Marmora, whence runs a branch line towards Adrianople. I am free to admit that until I got to Salonica I did not know that this line existed: it is shown on no English map I have seen, although trains have been running over it regularly once a-week for more than a year. Having been made principally for strategic purposes it is supposed to stand back from the coast, though there are two places where it could be cut without difficulty by a landing force. And if the Greeks had had any decision or enterprise, cut it certainly would have been. If they had known their own minds they would have cut it before the mobilisation had begun, a couple of months before they actually went to war. By breaking the line of mobilisation at Dedeagatch, at Kavalla, or at Salonica, they might have paralysed all the armaments of Turkey for weeks, and entered upon the war with the heaviest conceivable odds in their favour. But they were just as nerveless at sea, where they had all the cards in their hand, as they were on land. The only step they had taken up to March 22nd, when I reached Salonica, was to circulate a false report that they had blown up the great bridge over the Vardar, an hour westward of Salonica, on the railway to Monastir. The news was duly telegraphed over Europe, and it would have excited a vast sensation, as spelling collapse for the Turkish mobilisation, if only anybody had known where and what the Vardar bridge was. On my arrival, I found the Vardar bridge, quite unconcerned, standing where it did, and I began to realise at the very beginning that in these countries a correspondent would do well to believe only what his own eyes saw. Besides setting afloat this most characteristic invention—I wonder what good they thought it would do them?—the Greeks attempted nothing else against the Turkish communications till after the middle of April, when with a small landing-party they tried to break the line near Kavalla. This business they muffed as badly as they muffed everything else.

Let us go back to the railway line. As it was the only thing connected with the war that correspondents were allowed to look at, I spent such hours as I could snatch from coffee and cigarettes in looking at it. It is a single-track line, not too well laid, and at the beginning of the mobilisation blocks were many. Trains stood still on sidings for thirty-six hours at a time. This was especially hard on the horses they were bringing up for the artillery and transport, many of which were so let down by it that they had to be left behind in Salonica to recruit. Nevertheless, so we were told, as many as 12,000 horses had passed through Salonica to the front by the end of March, which was enough to mount every trooper and horse every gun and leave thousands over for transport. There had passed along the line eighty-eight battalions of Redifs from Asia Minor, which, with troops of the line and Redifs from the European provinces, made well over 100 battalions—say, 65,000 to 75,000 infantry—between Salonica and the frontier. Add cavalry and artillery, and you get an army of close on 80,000 men, with not much short of 200 guns. Of course, the difficulty would be to feed everybody. But lamb was in season; contractors at Salonica were sending up biscuit and flour by the ton. The weather was bad up at the frontier, and that was the worst hardship; but the Albanians and Turks would at least rough it as well as the Greeks.

Thus we talked and reckoned up battalions and batteries, but what did it all come to? What had it all to do with Salonica? With the back-country it might have something to do; they had requisitioned all the horses and carts of the peasants for the transport. As I came down I was wondering why they could apparently grow nothing in Macedonia but two-year-olds, yearlings, and mares in foal. The rest were all gone, and the carts with them. The local waggons are not much to look at; the most British farmer's are Lord Mayor's coaches beside them. Wheels jolt and sway, and swing away from the axle and back again; but, after all, they are the only thing that could stand the roads. My first ride along the Sultan's highway was evidence enough of that. The pony scampered over slabs of rock, beds of streams, heaps of rubble, up and down 45° gradients, and round right-angled corners, with one breathless, business-like rush that made me pray for strength to fall off. Certainly roads are not the strong point of Turkey, and the Sultan may well congratulate himself on the construction of the more or less direct railway.

Such as they are, the carts had to creak over them, and the husbandman was left disconsolate. For that matter, the husbandman was not left, if he were a Mussulman; he was taken also. You have to see a sight like the transport of these enormous masses of Redifs to the front before you quite realise what general conscription means in war-time when the reserves are out. The Redifs were splendid fellows, but how many neglected fields and untended sheep did they represent? They might be well trained, but that was because they had left fields and sheep untended now for three successive years. Two years ago they were called out to fight the rebels in Macedonia; last year they were sent over sea to fight the Druses. This year they must turn out again. People talk of the sufferings of the Armenians and the grievances of the Greeks, but what about the Turk? The Greek and Armenian take Government contracts, and grow rich; the Turk takes his rifle and his bandolier, and grows poor.

But what had all that to do with Salonica? Business was dull in a way. Commercial travellers could get no orders for manufactured goods, but there were plenty of orders for the army. So Salonica sunned itself happily by the sea, and enjoyed its three Sundays. For Salonica has come very nearly half-way to the far-off ideal of a week of Sundays. There is Friday for the Mussulman, Saturday for the Jew, Sunday for the Christian. Each religiously rests on his own day, and abstains from his business ; everybody else has to abstain more or less because of him. Three off days a-week is much, but not more than Salonica can do with. It was quite happy. The menace of war was very near in space, but thousands of leagues away in interest. Behind the wide white flanks of Olympus, which we could see looming across the bay from the club window, the great game might at each moment be beginning. Salonica did not know ; Salonica did not care. We were on the rim of war, but we could not look over.

A CORRESPONDENT'S TROUSSEAU.

ONE dragoman, one cavass, two saddle-horses, two pack-horses, saddle and bridle English style, saddle and bridle Turkish style, two pack-saddles, brushes and curry-comb, halters, hobbles, nose-bags, rope, two kit-bags, a chair, a table, a fez, a waterproof sheet, towels, knives, forks, spoons, a few yards of waterproof canvas, a bed, a pillow, a quilt, a cartridge-belt, water-bottle, bucket, quinine, hypermanganate of potassium, frying-pan, teapot, japanned dishes, japanned plates, japanned cups and mugs, two lanterns, a cheap watch, a thousand cigarettes, champagne, whisky, port, sauterne, punsch likor, native hams, native tongues, tea, sugar, cocoa, tinned beef, tinned salmon, tinned herrings, sardines, salt, biscuits, Worcester sauce, cheeses, Eno's fruit salt, corned beef, laundry soap, tinned peas, tinned beans, tinned oysters, tinned jam, tinned sausages, tinned egg-powder, tinned ginger-beer powder, tinned butter, and 180 lb. of oats.

The dashing war-correspondent was equipping himself for the front. It is easy to say you will be a war correspondent. It is rather less easy to get somebody to make you one. It is a shade less easy still, in Turkey at any rate, to get yourself accepted as one. But that was all over now; the Sultan, after due consideration, had satisfied himself of my good faith, and permission was on its way from Constantinople. I had triumphed. And then came the awful question: I am going into the wilderness—what shall I want there?

There surged torrentially into my mind all the things above-named: I could not possibly do without them. Afterwards I thought of about the same number of other things I could not possibly do without; but it was too late then, and I had to do without them. There came a time when I would cheerfully have swapped the ginger-beer powder for a thousand and first cigarette. The stuff was useless without a gallon of boiling water, a teaspoonful of good barm, and a cool place, none of which were to be found in Thessaly; so I had to turn it into insect-powder, for which purpose it was next to useless. But I thought I wanted it, and I thought I wanted all the other things. And there were only three days to get them in. Well, why not get them? You can get anything in three days, except the evacuation of Thessaly, and political trifles of that kind. I can only answer that you had better try it in Salonica.

One dragoman. With great prudence I had engaged a Jew provisionally the first day I arrived, foreseeing a heavy run on the commodity later. He said his name was Moritz, though those who had watched his career from childhood asserted that it was Levi. He treated me as his own for a few days, and I was rapidly acquiring his private method of speaking German. But when the glad news came that I was going up to Ellassona, my Jew failed me. He could not get the necessary teskere, he pointed out. There were difficulties. Turkish procedure was notoriously slow, and he had a brother in Salonica, and he could not bear to leave him. I was glad enough to be rid of the tyrant, but where was I to find another master? The hour of departure was approaching; all the dragomans in Salonica must have been cornered long ago. But with the hour came the man.

A large, grey-suited man of about thirty came into a shop where I was wondering what I could do with egg-powder if I bought it. His projecting, fish-like eye rambled over me. I have seldom seen so large a face, and it shone with mingled sweat and enthusiasm.

"You want dragoman—interpret," he began, in a hurried and husky voice. He really said, "Yuwadramiterpa," but for convenience I quote the more regular form.

"Yes," I said. "What's your name?"

With an air of indescribable pride, he answered, "Charlie."

"What?"

"Charlie," he repeated, with an enormous smile—"Carlo Ardita. I bin go outside English ship Ramillies, Trafalgar. I bin go Gibraltar, Malta, Greekland, Africa, partout. I bin go two years round circus."

"What did you do aboard the ships?"

"Take letters."

"What did you do in the circus?"

"Stop outside."

It was enough. Charlie it was. I bought him on the spot. He afterwards produced testimonials from warrant officers of her Majesty's fleet which were unanimous in describing him as a good fellow. As I have tried to indicate, he had a constitutional inability to pronounce consonants. He was loose-jointed, loose-tongued, speaking all the known European languages with a snuffing accent and impartial inaccuracy; he was loose in his notions of time and compound arithmetic; for aught I knew, he might be loose in his morals too. But from his fascinating, if discursive, talk, I foresaw abundant entertainment in the slacker hours of the campaign, and I was weak enough to purchase him on that ground alone. The shining virtues which emerged later will be dealt with in their proper place.

There was no difficulty about the cavass. For two days a swollen torrent of black-browed, white ballet-skirted Albanians surged round the door of the first hotel in Salonica. All were men of unimpeached integrity, tried ferocity; all lovingly nursed revolvers in the leather mixture of belt and pocket which Albanians wear before them; all spoke fluently in every local language in which no civilised man could possibly examine them; all were content with four and a half Turkish pounds a-month. One recommended himself above the crowd by an air of pensive bloodthirstiness; he gave the impression of having a blood-feud on his mind, which he had let run too long. His age was about fifty, his temperament was morose, and his name was Aslan, which signifies "the lion." The lion's references were satisfactory, and I bought him up. It sounds ridiculous, but Aslan would have died to save my life in case of need. He gave his word to be faithful to death; he said, "Bes a bes," which appears to mean "word of honour," and having said that, it was far more desirable to die than to go back upon it. Only I had to treat him like a gentleman; if I had struck or insulted him he would have shot me like a dog. All the same, I believe Albania is the only place left in Europe where you can get a man to die for you at four pound ten (Turkish) per month.

Item: four horses—and here came the heart-breaking part of it. Buying a horse in England is a weighty and a wary business, but it can generally be done in an afternoon if you make up your mind to it. In Salonica it took three days.

There was no difficulty about the supply. I discovered a white-bearded, turbaned old sinner who kept a khan—a khan being in theory an inn, but in practice a large four-sided stable round a court, with some lofts over it in which the traveller sleeps. The old man produced horses on horses—hard-mouthed, sore-backed, scraggy little twelve-hand brutes, capable of everything except a walk, trot, canter, or gallop. Others also heard that an Ingles of boundless wealth was prepared to buy up all the weeds in Salonica: it was impossible to walk to the street corner without a score of grimy, befezzed, baggy-breeched horse-couplers dragging unwilling ponies behind me. I inspected and tried them at the rate of about two score a-day, and always found them wanting.

At last came the day when the purchase must be made if ever. I bade Charlie give it out that all the horses in Salonica were to be assembled, and went forth to buy. I don't know whether all the horses were there, but I am certain all the loafers were. With a serried host of men and horses and dogs at my heels, I sallied out and entered the nearest khan.

Solemnly the deal began. The first man, an enormous yellow-bearded Jew, wanted ten pounds. I wanted the horse, which I had tried; it was the leanest and meanest-looking I ever saw, but it could go and would go. But did I therefore suggest a price for it? Even innocent I was not so innocent of the East as that: I gave the dealer a look of scorn, and bade him take the beast away. In the same way I went through all the horses in the khan. The prices ranged from twice to four times the normal figure. I pretended not to want any of them, and the owners pretended to take them away. Of course they knew perfectly well I must have the horses, and I knew perfectly well that they had only dodged into the next khan round the corner. So after half an hour or so I followed them into the khan round the corner, and they pretended that they had never seen me before in their lives. I was looking at a miniature of a charger when an elderly Turkish gentleman came cantering down the street.

"Ahmed Effendi, Ahmed Effendi," cried a hundred voices.

Thereon Ahmed Effendi pulled up, dismounted, and offered to sell his horse for eighteen pounds. He took the saddle off, and pointed out that, though indisputably old, this was by far the best horse in Salonica. Its market price being five pounds, I did not buy it; but the sudden stress of competition enabled me to buy the other, worth six pounds, for eleven.

The moment of making the deal was an impressive one. Buyer and seller shook hands: it is not merely customary, but obligatory in law, for a Government official—a little Turk in a fur overcoat—stands by. The price you shake hands on you are compelled to stick to. The official then gives the buyer a certificate of ownership, and the buyer gives the official fourpence. But the real excitement comes when the handshaking begins before the price is quite fixed. Each shaker yells out his figure: "Ten, eleven; eleven, ten;" the bystanders crowd up and take sides, yelling "ten" or "eleven," according to their fancy. Then the official loses patience. He seizes the hands as they swing and pull and grip, in the fervent endeavour to shake out an extra pound. "Eleven," he bellows, in a voice of thunder, and eleven it has to be.

Ahmed Effendi mounted, and rode off without saying good-bye. On the top of that came back the yellow Jew with his horse. Its price was still ten pounds; but when I went to buy a pack-horse he began to think the demand was getting supplied. There was a heavy slump immediately, and I bought that horse for seven pounds and a half. And then, becoming reckless, I went into a third khan and bought the two first sound horses that came. The sellers were a little hurt; it seemed to them something of a slight that I should buy their horses within a quarter of an hour. But the manners of the Ingles are notoriously brusque—and after all, the double price was always a consideration.

The other two or three hundred articles indispensable to a war correspondent I bought in a morning. It was a heavy burden to own so many things—more than I ever had in my life. But they got less and less very rapidly as time went on. Some of them—such as the chair and the hypermanganate of potassium—I satisfied my conscience by buying, and then happily never saw again. The eatable and drinkable things got eaten and drunk, and the rest followed me about in a steadily diminishing trail. From Charlie down to the Worcester sauce, everything got lost at one time or another—especially Charlie. Yet nearly everything turned up again, and I lived in a normal state of luxury, varied only by accidental privation, until the very end of the campaign. But did it ever occur to you that a war correspondent had to be a sort of travelling Gordon hotel, with a smack of portable Whiteley? It had never struck me before, and it rather weighed on my mind. I am not used to hotel-keeping nor to universal providing. And the point I could not get clear on was how I could ever tear myself from my caravan and find time to correspond.

OFF !

THAT was all right. The provisions were packed into boxes; the other things were stuffed into bags; the horses had been new-shod; Charlie had drawn two pounds in advance to buy a suit of velveteens and a pair of top-boots; Aslan had drawn half a pound, after the manner of Albanians, "to buy tobacco for the journey." And I had hired one-third of a special train to Karaveria: it was almost as cheap, with such a caravan, as the ordinary train, and it offered the great and, in war-time, unusual, advantage of being almost certain to get to its destination the day it started.

When I had come to the station before, I had not been allowed three yards inside the booking-office. I was then a putative spy. Now I had been considered and passed by Constantinople, and I was a great man and a friend. The gentlemen who sit at little tables all about the little booking-office—they appear to be a combination of customs - officers and detectives — were now cordial even to salaams. Instead of arguing on the threshold, I now swaggered about the platform and the line and the station-master's office as if I had bought them. There are not many moneyed men in provincial Turkey, and such as there are usually pretend not to be: three men who could put down twenty-four pounds for a special train, with the countenance of the Sultan thrown in, are not a sight seen every day, and are to be respected accordingly. To mark their sense of this they even brought the train up punctually. A host of porters sprang up from nowhere and hurled in the baggage. The horses were on board already. In the military horse-box, under their noses, Aslan squatted on the floor; he smiled affably as I passed him, and patted his revolver. I got in with my co-proprietors, two other English correspondents. The full official strength of the Salonica - Monastir railway stood farewelling on the platform, and through the falling night we rumbled away to Karaveria.

We rumbled until we began to get sleepy—and then suddenly the train stopped with a rattle and a jerk, and somebody opened the door. We had arrived—but what next? I had got a letter in my pocket with a few lines of Turkish quiggles on it which I believed to be a direction to somebody it would be good to know. But outside the station it was inky dark, and where was somebody to be found? As a preliminary step we took an interpreter and groped our way out. A fire appeared about twenty yards off, throwing a fitful patch of light on a little shed and some soldiers. We made for it through the blackness, falling into a ditch by the way. There were two or three officers there. They made us welcome through the interpreter. We sat down in the flickering light round a table. A man issued from the hut with coffee; we drew out cigarettes, and another man brought a little cinder in a pair of tongs to light them with. We commenced, through the interpreter, a flickering conversation; but the Turks mainly confined themselves to looking steadily at us, and the conversation flickered out. We sat. More coffee and cigarettes were produced. But by now it began to occur to the mind that we were not making progress. We were getting no nearer the influential somebody, no nearer the night's lodging, no nearer the morrow's early start. I produced my letter: they looked at it for a little while without emotion, said a few words among themselves, and then handed it back. This was beginning to be stupid.

What were we waiting for? "He comes immediately," said the interpreter placidly. "Who comes immediately?" "A person." "What person?" "I do not know." Of course it would have been the grossest bad manners to suggest that the person should hurry himself a little. So we sat on and smoked and looked at the Turks, and the Turks looked at us.

At last a person came. An officer of about twenty-five, whose black silver-braided astrachan cap showed him to be of the cavalry. His air was authoritative; he accepted cigarettes with an air that suggested he had temporarily lent them to the owner, and was but taking back his own. Again I produced my letter; he looked at it and put it in his pocket. He sat down at the head of the table and opened a somewhat desultory conversation in French. He informed us that his name was Saad-ed-Din Bey, lieutenant of cavalry: I had taken him for a lieutenant-colonel at the least. He asked if we had not come from Salonica. We could not possibly have come from anywhere else; but when we answered "Yes," he assumed the look of a man of penetration. He volunteered the information that the Turkish headquarters were at Ellassona, and that Edhem Pasha was in supreme command. So he prattled on for about half an hour. At last we could stand it no longer, even from him, and suggested that we had to start very early next morning. "Oui, monsieur," he said, and rose to go. Somebody came up with a lantern, somebody else followed with half-a-dozen horses, and we started for the town. We appeared to be going over a ploughed field, though it afterwards came out that it was a road. Kicking into stones, stumbling over clods, bursting through thorns, plunging into ditches, jostling against horses, we slowly made our way through the night. We beguiled the way by asking Saad-ed-Din Bey questions about the Turkish army. He replied always with "Oui" or "Non," but always readily and courteously. A very affable, intelligent fellow, this Saad-ed-Din. And when he presently hinted that he would like us to suggest him to the Kaimakam as our escort to Ellassona, we felt we had fallen on our feet indeed. If only the Kaimakam could spare him!

By now we were in the billowy streets of Karaveria. High courtyard walls, masses of pitch-black shadow, gurgling runnels—you could say no more about the place than that it seemed a very long way to the Kaimakam's. But presently our lieutenant stopped at a door in a dead wall, opened it, and plunged in. We plunged in after him. The lantern fell blotchily on heaps of stable-litter and dim horses half-awakened. Thence we tramped up an open wooden stair, very steep, along the wooden balcony of a courtyard, along a passage, and then into a bare-floored, bare-walled room with a divan. Here a lamp was burning, and here we sat down to await the Kaimakam. He appeared immediately—a short man, blonde for a Turk—in an unbuttoned uniform jacket and slippers. Cigarettes accompanied him, and coffee followed. As he was my first Kaimakam, I strove to make a good impression upon him, but his demeanour, I thought, was a little reserved. However, he said Saad-ed-Din Bey should lead our escort, and that was the main point gained. Therewith he turned us over again to that saluting officer, and we went forth to find the khan.

More dead walls and shadows and gurgling streams, and presently we were standing in the mud before the khan. It took a good deal of kicking and rifle-butt to get the door open, for by now it must have been nearly eleven. The room we were to sleep in had a very clean divan and a very clean floor, but there the resources of the establishment left off. There was nothing to eat, and nothing to drink, and nothing to sleep on. There was no trace of the men or the horses or the baggage, which had been left to make their way from the station. We wanted to get up at four next morning; but it was plainly madness, not yet knowing our men, to go to sleep without seeing what had become of the rest of the caravan. It would seem hopeless in England; in Turkey, as I came to know—how well!—before I had done with it, it was the normal course of events. In moments like this the native plan is to sit down and wait: the native will wait days on end, if need be, quite unmoved. So we waited.

Presently, as I was expecting day to dawn each moment, the street was suddenly filled with men and horses. Charlie appeared at last! "Got all the things, Charlie?" "No, sir," came the cheerful reply. "What the——" But Charlie hastened to explain that Karaveria only ran to one cart, and it was quite impossible that it should bring more than half at a time. So he had brought half, and had left one man on the other half—waiting. Now, when these things had been unladen, he would go back and fetch the others. There was no help for it. I perceived that being a war-correspondent was not exactly the concentrated excitement I had pictured it. We sat down to wait more.

The other half arrived: it was then about half-past twelve, though I would have sworn it was six in the morning. All the things were at last stacked on a platform outside the door. The bags had to be opened to get out beds; the boxes had to be opened to get out food. Sleepily Charlie laid out the beds on the floor; sleepily we rummaged in the nearest box for a tin of salmon and a tin of biscuits. Charlie—the first budding of great qualities which came into full bloom later—produced, apparently from nowhere, a bottle of wine. All this time Saad-ed-Din Bey had been holding a kind of levée on our behalf outside the door. All the Turkish officers in Karaveria must have come in to be introduced; being introduced they showed no desire for profitless tittle-tattle, but merely sat smoking outside the room and looked in at us. When we got at food and drink we asked our Saad-ed-Din to do us the honour of joining us. But he declined politely; he had eaten already, and as for drink — Of course, how could we have been so tactless as to suggest it? A fellow of a great deal of delicacy and principle, this Saad-ed-Din; certainly we were in luck. But it was past one by now; sleep was now or never. I inserted myself into my sleeping-bag and slept.

The next thing I knew was that somebody was moving in the street, and that it was certainly getting light. The next was that Saad-ed-Din Bey was sitting vaguely outside waiting for us: O admirable Saad-ed-Din! It was already past four, and we had to get up, wash, if possible, breakfast, pack the goods into the boxes, pack the beds into the bags, and saddle and load up the horses. I got up, had a tentative wash in a stable-bucket, and a tentative eat at a tin of sardines; Charlie did the rest. The beds took up all the floor, and as he heaved them up beneath my feet, and pursued me from corner to corner, it was with little enthusiasm that I reflected that this sort of thing might happen every morning for months. But the packing upstairs was as nothing to the loading-up below. There were two of my men and three each of my companions'; all had had urgent instructions to hurry up. When I went down into the court the thirteen horses of the party were standing morosely about the yard, and the eight men were holding eight of them. Some of the horses were saddled and bridled; most were not. I only knew one word suitable to the occasion—Haide, which is in general use among all the Balkan races, and may be translated "Hurry up." I went from one man to another, and haide'd each personally, with suitable oaths in English, of which I thought he might grasp the general tenor. Each man appeared to express his own personal anxiety to haide, but to deplore the slackness of each of the others. Each man on being haide'd hastily left the horse he was holding, and went and held another. Time was hurrying on; the sun would be up in a few minutes, and we were no nearer starting than we were last night. Saad-ed-Din Bey was looking on, and I thought I detected a look of amused contempt for the dilatory Occidental. The Kaimakam had come round to see us off, and I blushed that he should discover the Englishman stuck in this quagmire of helplessness. I recollected gloomily that it was the 1st of April.

Charlie found the way out. He came up to me as I was furtively trying to recover the esteem of the Kaimakam, hauling with him the ugliest and dirtiest man I ever saw. "M' S'evens," he began, with a voice half humble, half peremptory; this was his name for me.

"Well? Why the deuce don't you hurry up and start?"

"Yes, sir. Look 'ere. Other gentlemen got three servants; you got only two. Aslan 'e no good with the 'orse. You take this man for the 'orse."

"Who is he? Where does he come from?"

“Come from ’ere. Georghi — good man for the ’orse.”

As I say, Georghi was the ugliest and dirtiest creature I ever set eyes on. He might have been thirty; he might have been sixty; he was past mark of mouth. He had rugged black hair and eyebrows and moustache, an enormous nose and deep-shining eyes, a greasy white cap, and a costume which left no impression on the eye but general squalor. He was a Greek, and he looked it: subject-race was written on him all over. But I liked his enterprise in offering to project himself into space—he didn’t know where and he didn’t know for how long—at five minutes’ notice, and for four pounds a-month. I bought Georghi as groom, and a very good bargain he turned out. And then it struck me that his newly hired enthusiasm might be turned to good account. I showed him which was my baggage and which were my pack-horses and said “Haide.” To my delight, he worked. He got the boxes and the bags across the horses—they had got their wooden saddles on: they live in them—and had slung the ponderous things on with ropes in no time. And then he pushed them through the hotel door into the street and was ready to start. Hurrah! And when the other men saw this they worked also.

They had hung back, not through idleness, but through etiquette. It is the proper thing in these parts of the world to wait before working. Not that you have any expectation that somebody else will come and do the work for you, but just for the sake of waiting. The Western mind can see no particular profit in wasting the hours between four and seven, and thereby finishing the day's march at eleven at night instead of eight. To the Eastern mind this is the only course a self-respecting man could take.

However, it was all ready at last—two hours looking at it and ten minutes doing it. The baggage was blocking the street in front of the khan; a dense crowd of Karaverians was blocking the baggage beyond. We said good-bye to the Kaimakam and settled into the saddle with joy. Past the vine-wreathed houses we emerged into a square by a mosque: in long lines across it were drawn up three companies of infantry, and as we passed they presented arms. It was beginning. At last I was off to the mountains, off probably to war. The air was eager; the fruit-trees were just stealing into blossom, and the road led upwards.

VII.

ON THE ROAD.

SOUTH-WESTWARD from Karaveria the road runs over an enormous pass. It is not 5000 feet high, but it must be some five-and-twenty miles across from level to level, and it took a good five hours to ride. This was the main route for infantry and supplies to the front: the guns and heavy waggons all went at this time to Sorovitch—I should say nearly fifty miles further west along the Monastir railway—whence a good carriage road led through Kozani and Serfidje to Ellassona. The track we were on was not supposed to be a driving road, although by the end of the campaign it had been patched up till it was quite practicable alike for light carriages and strong-built native carts. On the stretch between Karaveria and Serfidje, which we reckoned to cover in eight or ten hours, there were said to be three battalions on their way to the front. I saw nothing of them; but as we scrambled up the loose stones into the mist, we met two or three files of ponies slipping down. They wore their pack-saddles empty, and were plainly going back for more. Half-way up we overtook a train of buffalo-carts resting on the road. Just a floor, mounted on a pair of solid wooden discs for wheels, guarded by two or three upright sticks and a cross-piece for sides—they must be still the model of the first cart man ever made. The buffaloes suit them—sleepy, heavy beasts, with necks pressed to the yoke, and noses almost on the ground, with wide horns and loose, grey, formless skins—oxen with an odd suggestion of elephants. Four or five boxes of cartridges, with a little green meat for the beasts, lay on the floor of each cart, like a very small bit of cheese on a very large slice of bread. But cartridges are heavy for their size, and the buffaloes were resting after the custom of the country.

Up and up we went, now leaving the main road, the ponies scrambling undauntedly up slopes that looked like walls and kicking down reckless torrents of stones. We went on for hours and hours, it seemed; but it was the first day, and nobody was going to admit that his horse had had enough of it. By this time we were quite muffled in a clammy cloud: the man riding in front looked like a ghost. But as we struggled to the top of the ascent it cleared enough to give us a prospect of an endless tangle of mountains. Shooting sheer up from the level we could see below peak topping peak, and white summits glistening in the sun. This was my first and last sight of the snows of Macedonia whose melting, we had been told on the best authority in England, was to be followed by such momentous events in the way of Greek and Bulgarian and Servian and miscellaneous Macedonian risings all over the province. We turned our backs to the snow and let the ponies go down the decline: they went as if this was what they had been longing for all the morning. Saad-ed-Din Bey and the three zaptiehs — policemen, that is: ragged ruffians riding in slippers with tags of rope for stirrups — entered into the sport with a will: a Turk is always ready for a bit of a race when he is reasonably sure of his seat. Only one man came off, and he didn't roll over the precipice. Having come down the far side of the pass in about a twentieth of the time it took to come up, and finding a little village with a little inn at the bottom, we voted unanimously for lunch.

The staple of the meal was hard-boiled eggs and sardines; its chief incident, I am sorry to say, the unmasking of the true character of Saad-ed-Din Bey. When we started he had been, as ever, intelligent and affable—nay, affectionate. “Oui, mon cher;” “Non, mon cher,” had been his discourse: it had been a little rapid perhaps, seeing that we had not yet known him twelve hours, and five of these passed in sleep; but you must make allowances for an impulsive child of nature. But as we rode I began to suspect his “Oui” and “Non.” “How many men are there to a battalion in your army?” “Oui, mon cher,” he would ingenuously reply. “No: I mean how many men are there—how many soldiers in one battalion?” “Non, mon cher.” Moreover, he pronounced each syllable with a kind of gentle staccato, as if he were teaching a child a lesson, which became irritating in the end. We had already despaired of his mind; at lunch, I am sorry to say, his manners and morals disappeared too. He manifested an intention—happily detected and frustrated in time—to take the one box of sardines for himself, and leave the three of us to divide the second. We had brought with us a couple of flasks of native wine and one of whisky, and of both unhallowed drinks Saad-ed-Din Bey drank largely. When there was no more left to eat and drink he developed a tendency towards sleep. We pointed out that he had undertaken to get us to Elasona in twenty-four hours; that it was our desire and our intention to get there. He gazed at us vaguely for a moment: "Impossible, my dear," he said thickly. "But you said yourself it could be done." "I thought so, my dear, but now—impossible." It had indeed for long been painfully apparent that Saad-ed-Din Bey had not the vaguest idea of the road, which he had professed to know like his pocket; by now he had given up the pretence of knowing it, and let the zaptiehs play guide. The zaptiehs said that we should only get to Serfidje by nightfall, whence it was a day's journey to Elasona. The only thing to do, after reflection, seemed to be to send on the best mounted zaptieh to Serfidje to order a carriage and four horses. It was no use to knock up our own beasts by a four-and-twenty-hours' day; we could leave them in Serfidje to come on with the baggage. And then we roused up Saad-ed-Din Bey and started off again. In the confusion of mounting he seized the opportunity of taking the horse of one of the dragomans—of course without asking leave of its owner—then started to ride races on it. Being asked not to, he resorted to the other kind of tactics, and desired to wait half an hour at each pool we came to. In a word, he became a complete and unrelieved nuisance. The only thing to be said for him was that he left off trying to talk French and conversed for the remainder of the journey with Charlie. We had had quite enough of the child of nature for one day.

The zaptiehs had taken a short cut, which, having afterwards travelled by the other way, I should reckon at from one-third to one-half as long again as the ordinary route. It led us over more mountains by a far worse path than the morning's—simply a track, a little hardened, where ponies had trod, winding in and out amidst a wilderness of loose grinding stones. Always up or down, not a foot of level, and the winding and the stones made it as impossible to go out of a wary walk down hill as up. A more heart-breaking, toe-breaking country to get over, on foot or on horseback, I had never seen, and the idea of supplying an army of a hundred thousand men by such a road seemed almost too ludicrous to be worth calling impossible. Yet here it was being done. Towards sunset, on an especially impossible part of the mountain, we overtook a battalion of infantry conveying ammunition and provisions. The line of ponies was miles long; it stretched down in and out of the rocks as far as I could see. Each carried its couple of boxes of cartridges or its couple of sacks of biscuit. Three or four were tied together, head to tail, and one soldier had charge of the lot. If the middle one had a difficulty with a stony bit of ground and hesitated, the beast before tugged at its head and the beast behind cannoned into its quarters. And then it stumbled and swayed and overbalanced: its legs were waving vaguely in the air, and the cartridge-boxes were bumping down the mountain, and miles of beasts in the rear were checking and bumping together and going over after the same manner. The pony had to be untied and picked up and its saddle refastened, and its load collected and reslung, and then the pony retied to its fellows. And then the baggage-train could move on again for a little—till the next beast went down.

This was my introduction to the Turkish soldier at work. The man was like the country—at first sight quite impossible. Ragged, dirty, casual, and slipshod, slouching along without an eye for his team—surely the phil-Hellenic prophets were right; these loafing ruffians could never stand up for a moment against a real army. The thing was absurd: why, they hadn't an untorn coat or a pair of boots to bless themselves with in the whole battalion! And yet—and yet we struggled on for an hour beside them, and we did not seem to be going ahead of them so fast. We were light riders, and they were heavy baggage, but somehow they seemed to stick to us. These Turkish soldiers appeared to have the qualities of their defects after all. They were dirty, but then they were not afraid to put their hands to what might soil them. They were ragged and bootless—but after all what could you do with boots over these stones? They seemed casual and careless, but then they were of an unending patience. Whether a horse went down for the first time or the twentieth, they helped it up and loaded it up again, without haste but without rest, and went imperturbably on. These were short, rather squat, bearded Reserves from Asia Minor: they were slow and heavy, and had lost the snap of youth. But if their legs were bandy and their shoulders bowed, they were inexhaustibly strong; they went on and on, and they looked as if they would go on for ever and ever. I began to perceive thus early what sort of tough stuff the Turkish soldier is.

So on and on, over the weary mountain, till at last, just as the sun was going down, we came out above a river-valley. At its far side, nestled under another wall of mountain, just catching the level rays of the evening light, was a little white town. That was Serfidje—and it looked about a day and a half's journey away. But it was something, even to have seen it. The horses seemed to have seen it too, or else the cool of the evening told them that the day's work was coming to an end. They scrambled down the remaining hour of mountain as nimbly as if they had just come out of the stable. We clattered over a long wooden bridge across the Vistrica—the model of a broad, shallow, rock-strewn, boiling mountain river. And then we trotted briskly for a long, long hour on the level, and entered the streets of Serfidje.

We were tired and hot and very dirty. But Saad-ed-Din Bey considered it the right thing to go straight to call on the Governor, and it seemed a pity not to use the knowledge of Turkish etiquette which was the one qualification still left to him. Into the Governor's house we bundled—up his clean stairs and on to the Turkey carpet of his drawing-room. There rose up to meet us an elderly, bald, pointed-bearded man in a frock-coat and white waistcoat—a completely accoutred European gentleman down to the slippers which all Turks wear indoors. He received us as if we had been long-looked-for friends. He sat us down on a broad cushioned divan—the feel of that divan after twelve hours of the Salonica saddle!—and a barefooted black boy brought coffee and cigarettes and a nip of brandy and tea. I began to put the Mutessarif high among public benefactors, but after all this was only the usual hospitality of the country: the best the Turk has or can get is just good enough for his guest. The Mutessarif introduced us to his other guests, the commandant of the garrison—grey-bearded and silent, with the demeanour of a high-priest, like all Turkish grandees of the old school—and the Civil-Inspector-General of the vilayet—a little, square, black-bearded man, who looked like a Jew, and was almost certainly a spy, but who spoke French fluently enough to have a little to spare to help out mine. We talked of the chances of war, of the country, of the blockade of Crete: the Mutessarif lent us the latest ‘Independance Belge.’ He gave us a brief sketch of his life: he had been before at Smyrna; one of his horses was at Smyrna now, running in a race. That was enough: we went instantly to inspect the four-year-old and the two-year-old that he had at present in his stables. And then we sat aghast, for he began to talk of Archer and Ladas. Archer and Ladas, I trouble you, in this little hole, a day and a half's journey beyond the end of the world at Salonica! To be sure he was of the opinion that Ladas won the Derby with Archer up, and we agreed with him that on that occasion Archer rode an exceptionally fine race. And I blush to say that we advised him to back Velasquez, and offered to put him up for Goodwood, and asked him to stay over the Twelfth. What could be too good for a man who talked of Archer and Ladas in Serfidje?

Saad-ed-Din Bey, for a cavalry lieutenant, took little interest in sport: he was trying to look as if he thought best with his eyes shut. Even the correspondent of a leading London newspaper was leaning back on the divan with his head on his hand murmuring inarticulate invitations to shoot. We hinted that we had better go. "Wait a little while," said the Mutessarif. And in a little while came back the black boy and salaamed. "Will you have a little dinner?" asked the Mutessarif. Would we? We went down to his dining-room and had a very big dinner indeed. A noble soup that seemed to be compounded of sour cream and tarragon, a ragout of mutton, a joint of mutton, with a wondrous salad of beetroot and cucumber, fish, a chicken, sweets, and pilau of rice. The order of the dishes was unorthodox, but the dishes were divine.

The wine, white and red, was the finest, and the Mutessarif gave us a gallon bottle to take away with us. Then up-stairs for coffee and a liqueur: by this time we could have worshipped the Mutessarif. But by this time we must go. Our host announced that he had requisitioned two carriages, and was sending an escort of twelve troopers. Saad-ed-Din Bey had left the table early, pretending that he didn't like wine: to do him justice, I think he did prefer whisky. He had sunk frankly on to a divan in the back-room, and his snores rolled rhythmically in upon us. We implored the Mutessarif to let him sleep on; he needed rest so badly. But he woke up by himself at the moment of starting, and we had to draw lots who should go in the carriage with him. We explained to the Mutessarif that it was an English form of gambling, and he was all eyes and ears in a second. "Who's won?" he cried joyously. "He's lost," said we, pointing to the groaning victim. Thereon our host preceded us down-stairs and shook hands most heartily at the carriage door. May Allah prosper the Mutessarif of Serfidje!

It seemed too uncomrade-like, on reflection, to leave a countryman all night in the arms of the unwashed Saad-ed-Din. So we three bundled ourselves into one carriage and put Charlie into the other. Neither Charlie nor Saad-ed-Din Bey quite liked the arrangement at first, but their spirits rose visibly when they heard that the bottle of wine also was to travel in the second carriage. The rest of the night was one of those dreams in which you are quite sure you are not asleep and are certainly not awake. About six in the morning I realised that I was slipping down into the maze of legs and revolvers, and belts and flasks, and boots and spurs, which formed the floor of the carriage. It was light, though the sun was not yet up. We were going over a high mountain-ridge, and there was a further mountain-ridge a few miles in front. The second ridge—I did not know it then—was the Col of Meluna. Two hours afterwards we were crossing a little river: soldiers were washing ragged linen in it. In front of us were two high hills, white with tents. Bugles were ringing out from both hills and from the little village between. We were at Elassona.

VIII.

ON THE FRONTIER.

IN any other friendly country a three-days-unshaved, two-days-unclothed, twelve-hours-unwashed, sweat-and-dust-caked correspondent would have sought out the military secretary, and asked when the Commander-in-Chief would allow him to pay his respects.

But as this was only backward, happy-go-lucky, generous, gentlemanly Turkey, we drove straight up to the headquarters gate, stumbled across the walled courtyard, over the mountainous cobbles which are the staple pavement of Turkey, and asked where was his Excellency. His Excellency Edhem Pasha, Commander-in-Chief of a hundred thousand odd soldiers, was squatting cross-legged on the druggeted cushions of a little divan which ran along one side of a little room; besides this the room had a chair or two, a couple of smaller divans, a table, and a map. Littered on the divan beside his Excellency were drifting heaps of papers, with mysterious Turkish symbols crawling over them, and an ash-tray or two. From his broad forehead, his sharp, fine-cut nose, his grey eyes—now motionlessly watchful, now lively and humorous—his bushy, grizzling beard, you might guess Edhem English, French, German, Russian, Turk, or what you will. But you could never guess him other than a man of quick intelligence and a gentleman.

They brought cigarettes and they brought coffee. By now I was accustomed to that. You can hardly spend half-a-crown in a shop—much less pay a call—without them; and I was learning not to settle myself in a seat till they were delivered and satisfactorily arranged on the neighbouring furniture or floor. Edhem Pasha read my introduction, and called for an aide-de-camp. A heavy man came in—very white-skinned for a Turkish officer, though ruddy from the sun—an open-faced, boyish Albanian of forty. To him the Pasha confided me. He was to show me the army, and I was to show him the telegrams I wrote about it. Never had a man such luck as I had when I was delivered thus early into the fostering hands of Kennan Bey. He talked French with marvellous proficiency, considering that he had never been nearer Paris than Belgrade; he laughed with a jolly explosion, like a child at a pantomime; he despised the Greeks; he was never tired of talking about Albanians; he had been wounded in action by Servians, Montenegrins, and Russians, though he said he never distinguished himself in battle; and he shouted "A la bonne heure" at every mention of war.

Kennan Bey took me round to present me to the authorities, and he presented me to the two-roomed house I was to share with my two companions of the road. In the afternoon—after we had refreshed ourselves with mutton, diffidently broiled by Charlie in a wash-hand basin, and eaten with pocket-knives and fingers—he appeared at the door with horses, and suggested a ride. So I climbed up into one of the Sultan's saddles, with stirrups that brought me in danger of knocking my chin against my knee, with balloon-like holsters fencing me in front and a mountainous cantle fencing me behind, and off we scrambled, and clattered through the rugged streets of Ellassona.

We rode first to inspect the second brigade of the third or Memdhuk Pasha's division, which was camped on a hill, anticipating supper. All the men at that time were under canvas, and nearly all on high ground, for Ellassona lies in a hole among hills, and when the Turks mobilised there on the similar occasion of 1886 twenty-five per cent of them went down with fever. As we rode up the hill we met Talat Pasha, the senior aide-de-camp of the Sultan present with the army; Kennan Bey said a few words to him in Turkish, and he galloped on ahead. Two minutes afterwards I saw white caps and dark uniforms swarming out of the tents; by the time we got to the top the brigade was under arms and in line. They had turned out the men for the inspection of a correspondent! And certainly they repaid inspection. Perhaps they did not form up quite so accurately as the Guards outside Wellington Barracks; perhaps they did not present arms with the same simultaneous click; perhaps they were a little out at elbow and knee. But they were hard, wiry men all. With a dash of black, rather than brown, tinging their yellow leather faces, with brows bold but puckered, and eyes fearless but expanding, they stared at the mysterious white face under a fez with something like the puzzled inquisitiveness of a spirited horse. They looked as if they were just going to shy. But there was no suspicion. I was with an Albanian like themselves, a man they knew and trusted. So they studied me carefully and strangely as they fell out, and two dusky-faced orderlies brought me their supper to taste. It was brown bread with a mess of lentils and haricot beans, rice cooked as they can only cook it in the East, and baked lamb. I could have eaten okes of it, and an oke is two pounds and three-quarters.

The next day we rode out to the frontier. Over a causeway of loose, tumbling stones, which ran up a bare-sided ravine, the native ponies picked their way without a stumble till we came out on a smooth space of lawn at the top. It was the Meluna Pass. The hills still rose bleak and barren on either side—on the left a sheer sugar-loaf, 2500 feet above sea-level, called Menekshe; on the right the slightly lower, slightly easier ascent of Parna Tepe—but in front lay the green plain of Thessaly. Two rough-stoned, red-tiled guardhouses faced each other not a hundred yards apart; between them was a yet rougher building, half hut, half cairn, which marked the frontier itself. With the Albanian sub-lieutenant in command of the dozen or fifteen men who occupied the post, we walked forward to meet the Greek lieutenant from the other side. The contrast was a strange one. There was the Greek, a dumpy young man, with forage-cap, waxed moustache, trim dark-blue tunic, sky-blue trousers, boots to the knee, and the strut of the Continental officer. And there was the Turk—old, lean, long-armed and long-legged, big-nosed and hollow-eyed, with a week's beard on his face, with fez and shabby dark-blue uniform torn at the knees, with sandals and dirty cloth gaiters wound round his legs. But the Turk strode over the rocks like a he-goat, and in this weather and this country I mentally put all my money at once on the Turk.

Then back over stony downs, with long-coated white and black ewes and lambs, over fields of young corn that would now be in ear in a matter of weeks, till we swung round to our left and began to climb again. Round a corner we came on tents, and presently I was saluting a sturdy, grey-bearded man in a blue pilot jacket and a fez down over his ears—Neshat Pasha, General of Division. Above his camp, between it and Meluna, rose the 2000 feet of Parna Mountain, a round mass of stones, thin grass, and juniper-bushes. Up, up, up on a new-cut soft-earth zigzag, till the ponies blew and the wind was edged with ice. Up, till we looked out over the checkered fallows and pastures of the little plain of Elassona, with its mountain ramparts speckled with white encampments on every side. Up, till the nearer hills sank, and the snowy head of Olympus gleamed majestically into view. Up, till at the very top we came to a battery of six Mantel field-guns, dragged up this back-breaking ascent in two hours by the untiring, invincible industry of the Turkish soldier.

The men were toiling at redoubts on the very crest of the hill. Down on the plain were some tiny black beetles, that seemed to be making a little toy rampart, as like as possible to the one I stood on. They were Greeks, but why they were erecting a redoubt in the middle of a ploughed field, just under the nose of a battery 2000 feet above them, I am not artilleryman enough to say. In company with an Albanian officer—nearly all the men used for mountain work seemed to be Albanians, and when you saw the way they skipped from stone to stone you were not surprised that it was so—I crept cautiously round a corner to see another Greek block-house. We had to stoop till we almost crawled for fear of being seen: all the officers on the frontier had the strictest orders to avoid anything that might provoke disputes, and for the most part they were almost absurdly careful to obey them. Here again were two hostile block-houses, this time within an easy revolver-shot one of the other. With two armies lined up like football teams, it was wonderful indeed that the kick-off had been delayed so long.

By now the sun was gone down, and the wind cut like a knife. Tramping down the mountain path, we came at every sheltered turn upon more tents—here a company, there a battalion, there two. Here was a patrol going out, their grey capotes ghost-like in the dusk; there the bakers were baking the evening bread in the ovens with which the commissariat had studded every mountain-side. Here were half-a-dozen ponies toiling upwards with what looked like a couple of carcasses apiece of black pigs; but the perpetual drip, drip over the ponies' flanks proclaimed them water-skins. Here was an encampment, its lines gemmed with fires: the tents, with their lights inside, gleamed more softly, like Chinese lanterns; in one of them somebody was playing a kind of bagpipe.

The stars were all out when we got down to the level. We rode home in single file and in dead silence. Albanian pickets do not hesitate to shoot if they hear a strange tongue, and a chance shot just now might mean, for aught we or Europe knew, the lives of a million of men. The stillness and the watching stars, the sleeping western mountains with the last pale streak of day sinking behind them—they seemed to give the lie to the guns and the forts and the long lines of wild-eyed riflemen. And then the hoarse challenge of the sentinels at the approaches to the village brought back the ominous truth again.

IX.

A DAY OF MY LIFE.

I WAKE up at half-past five, feeling very strong. I am lying in a bag on the bare floor of a bare little plastered room, with four windows filling up one side and a divan running below them. On either side snore two other correspondents. For a moment comes the shuddering suspicion that I am on a plank-bed in prison, for we have all had our hair cut with the horse-clippers.

“Charlie! Charlie! Where the devil are you?”

Enter Charlie in a velveteen-cord suit, knee-boots, and spurs : he bought them new in Salonica for this expedition. You wouldn't think it to look at them, but Charlie would contrive to be untidy in skin-tights.

“Any battle in the night, Charlie?”

“No, sir; no bin go fight. You wait other regiment go fight, you wait long time.” “Other regiment" is Charlie's designation for the army of his Majesty the King of the Hellenes.

Thereon Charlie brings tea in blue-and-white japanned teacups, bought in Salonica. They are almost the only articles bought in Salonica that after a week are not yet worn out. You have to buy goods at a place like Salonica before you realise the full significance of that blessed phrase, "the export market." However, let us thank heaven for the cups and the tea—and then for the early cigarette. With that we get up: we all have to get up together, for the beds occupy more than half the room, and the three hobbling writing-tables the rest: the beds must be rolled up and taken away into the sun before any dressing can be thought of. Charlie rolls up the beds, we sitting the while in shaggy black goat-hair capotes on the divan. Beds gone, baths come. Baths are rare in Salonica, and in Ellassona are quite unknown, so I have borrowed a sort of large wooden dish, like the things butchers carry meat in on their shoulders. They use such things here to wash clothes in, but propped up by a brick on each side they make very tolerable baths. It is said by people elsewhere that there is smallpox in Ellassona. I have not seen or heard anything of it, but on an inspection of myself I note that I am pitted from forehead to feet with little red-and-white blotches. It is not smallpox, though, and I recommend Charlie to try to recollect where he put the insect-powder.

I am mess-president this week, worse luck. Until I had, first, to buy everything I should want for a couple of months, and then to keep house for three men for a week, I never fully realised the importance of women and servants in the social scheme. I am now able to appreciate these most deserving classes of our population. Breakfast, lunch, and dinner to order. I go out down the stone steps ; they vary in height anywhere from 4 inches to 3 feet, and the safest way of getting down them is a bold jump. In the outhouse which we have promoted to be a kitchen is Andreas. Andreas is not my servant, but the three tenants of this house have clubbed dragomans on the principle of the division of labour. Andreas is cook, Charlie butler, valet, footman, and housemaid, while Dimitri, an elderly Greek of clerical appearance and indolent disposition, exercises a general supervision over things which do not concern him.

Andreas in the kitchen has got his coat off, and his little charcoal fire burning. For himself he is a little white and wispy-haired Levantine German, of a meek expression, although he saw Kassassin and Tel-el-Kebir.

“What flesh to-day, Andreas?”

“Ach, Herr, only sheep-flesh—always sheep-flesh.”

“And what do you propose to give us for dinner?”

Thereon Andreas unfolds his simple menu—soup, mutton-ragout, mutton cutlets, roast mutton, and sweets. I contrive to mitigate the rigour of this diet by prefacing the whole with tinned oysters, and interpolating a curried fowl instead of one of the muttons; but with that we must be content. For breakfast, meanwhile, tinned haddock, tinned sausages, coffee, toast, tinned butter, lettuces, oranges, and tinned jam. For lunch pilau, which is certain to be excellent, cold tongue, and Dutch cheese, with native wine, earthy but excellent stuff, sold by weight at about a penny a pound. Who dares to talk of privations in the Turkish camp?

Before breakfast we must go and see the Kaimakam about the supply and the price of forage. Kaimakam I believe to be the Turkish for second-in-command; anyhow a lieutenant-colonel is so named, and so is the highest civil functionary in this village. I had long been familiar with the word, chiefly in connection with Joint Notes of the Powers providing for the appointment—or not—of Christian Kaimakams in various parts. But I never took any real interest in the status and functions of a Kaimakam until I knew one to speak to, and until my stable bill depended on him. After that I began to appreciate his power for good, and I am firmly opposed to any project which would substitute a mere Christian for my excellent friend the Kaimakam of Ellassona. It is seven o'clock when we reach his house, but he is already far into his morning's business. The Turks count their hours from each day's sunset, giving night and day twelve hours each from that moment. It is thus possible, in summer, to get up at ten o'clock at night in broad daylight. It follows also that any given Turkish hour never happens at exactly the same time any two days together, and that a Turkish watch, being regulated only each week, is never exactly right. However, the arrangement seems to have the merit of getting the Turk up by sunrise; after that he can afford a little unpunctuality through the day.

The Kaimakam is a little, black-bearded, liquid black-eyed, black frock-coated Turk, with an expression mild almost to effeminacy. As a man, I own I was inclined to undervalue the Kaimakam Bey, until one afternoon he provoked a race, and rode away from my fastest pony with a boyish laugh in his mouth, and his toes somewhere about the level of his grey's ears. After that, he cheerfully trotted off up a half-perpendicular mountain to try and smuggle over some extra-special Greek wine for the use of the English strangers. Since then I have loved and respected the Kaimakam. As we enter he rises from before his desk on a little dais, salaams, shakes hands, sets us down, salaams again, and presents cigarettes. Presently a servant comes in with the relentless cups of coffee. From time to time an orderly comes in, clicks his heels together, and presents some document to be dealt with: so far as I can make out, the Kaimakam is at present performing the duties of an extra-quartermaster- and commissary-general. With the aid of Dimitri, the Kaimakam talking little French, we unfold our case. The khan where our horses are quartered is dark and dirty; it contains soldiers who steal our oats and our chopped straw; the owner, moreover, is a thief, who charges exorbitant prices for food and litter. At the beginning of our statement the Kaimakam says two or three words in an undertone to a subordinate, who goes quickly out of the room. At the end of it, the subordinate returns and says a few words in an undertone to the Kaimakam. It is all over; the new stable has been found, and the price of fodder fixed. Salaam, O just Kaimakam, protector of the stranger!

Then breakfast, looking out over the municipal garden—where they seem to grow mainly onions and coffee-tables—on to the fifty yards of pebbles, with five feet of stream running through it which is the river Xerias in embryo: the other end of it is in Greece. Greek women are washing clothes there in the sunshine, and not one of the untaught Asiatic Reservists dreams for a moment of offering them an incivility. Greek tradesmen make their profit out of the troops; the Greek Consul flies the Greek flag, manufactures stories of outrages, and circulates predictions of coming Greek attacks. But the rudest Anatolian or Circassian never lifts a finger against the Greek; and I believe I can say with perfect truth that fifty thousand of Tommy Atkins would have done more outrage on a Saturday night than these Turks have done all the time they have been here.

Then the unpleasantest part of the day—writing. Writing is a duty, no doubt, and therefore a pleasure, of course. But when the sun is shining through budding poplars, and long files of gun-horses are being led down to water, and bugles are singing from every hill till the blood leaps up and down in tune with them—why, then even writing letters for an influential London newspaper seems for the moment less of a privilege than it really is. So tell Georghi to bring my pony round—the one I didn't ride yesterday. Here is the orderly saying that Kennan Bey presents much salaam—"good compliments" is Charlie's rendering—and is ready to take us to see what is going on. Gobble up your lunch, if you can eat any after that breakfast. Let us get into the sun and the air of the hills. The air is always with us if we like to go up to it: Ellassona itself lies in a hole. We canter through the lines, we race along the dusty unmetalled roads, we switchback precariously over the rocky hill-tracks, till we come to the encampment chosen for the day's inspection. For let it be said that the Turk treats the British correspondent like an inspecting general; the commander-in-chief waits for him when he rides out to the frontier. Having made up his mind to take a correspondent with his army, he treats him as a guest and as a friend. To-day it is the cavalry—four regiments—quartered at Ormanli, five miles in rear of Ellassona. It is no use keeping them on the frontier, where they could not move among the mountains, and the horses would have nothing to eat and only take cold. Kennan Bey presents us to Colonel Yakoub Bey, a grizzled Circassian, and makes a bet that two regiments will parade within ten minutes of the bugle-call. They do it too—in eleven, which after all is the same thing in Turkey.

On coming back I desire to cash a cheque. Charlie and I walk through the market-place—the size of a good-sized London back-garden. Dirty pedlars implore us to try musty corn, but we pass on over a dunghill to the unpainted wooden bank. An empty packing-case decorates the threshold, whereto you climb up a wooden ladder. The banker's clerk—he is really a sub-agent of the tobacco monopoly—wears a rusty overcoat and a partly buttoned pair of trousers, a pink shirt and a fez, a pair of spectacles and a week's beard. He regards me with suspicion, and my cheque with positive aversion. But presently he makes some spidery marks on my letter of credit, counts out twenty dirty Turkish pounds, wipes his pen on his finger, wipes his finger on his seal, licks the paper, and makes the imprint. Great is the credit system.

Then dinner; take care not to put your chair-leg through the hole in the floor. Then one pipe, for English tobacco must be husbanded. Then bed at nine. As Charlie sprawls massively over the floor, laying out the beds, we read out from a grammar Turkish proverbs for him to translate. Perhaps his happiest effort is what the book gives as "If we die, we die": "he no live, dead him got," is Charlie's construe. But you get tired even of laughing, so I crawl inside my bag on the floor. I wonder if Charlie remembered the insect-powder; but sleep is too urgent to trouble about that. It is time to dream I am directing the battery on Parna-tepe, and that Charlie will get in front of the guns to lay out my bed. But if this is roughing it, where is luxury to be found?

X.

THE ARMY.

A CUP of tea, a five-mile canter on a willing pony through budding mulberry-trees, sprouting vines, green corn, and blood-red anemones ; a breakfast of porridge and treacle, tinned haddock, ham and eggs, jam and cocoa—it was magnificent, but it was not war. War was what we were there for ; it was war that had flushed Ellassona with men and spangled every purple hill with white tents. Rumours of war there were in plenty—stories of bandits trooping across the frontier with the King of Greece's commission left behind, to be called for, in a convenient guardhouse—bandits in hundreds, bandits with cannon, bandits fighting for eight-and-forty hours at a stretch, bandits to east and west, —everywhere bandits except where you could get at them.

But still it was not war. And though I was living from day to day in the midst of 50,000 soldiers, though I was under military law and technically a first-class camp-follower, though I slept nightly with saddle-bags packed with two days' provisions, and a servant listening for the ever-expected orderly from headquarters—up to the very moment of action I could hardly have told you whether I regarded the army of the Sultan as a reality, or only as the most elaborate, most extensive, most expensive box of toy soldiers my eyes ever saw. An empire under arms—even half an empire or a tenth of an empire under arms—must surely have something strange and new to hit the eye and leave its mark on the heart. Few people have seen it. For myself, I had never seen anything in the least like it. Yet I seemed to ride daily through this great concentration with nothing but the half-dazed yet unsurprised acceptance with which we pass through the most fantastic of our dreams.

The first impression of the Turkish army was one of melancholy. The men were so old. The Boers at Krugersdorp said it went against the grain to have to shoot such young men. But surely the spectacle of these middle-aged privates was far more pathetic. As I rode down the long, dark-coated, dusty-gaitered, loose-sandalled lines, nearly every man must be the father of a family.

Brown-bearded, solidly set, almost stiffening into elderliness, steady-eyed, but sober-eyed and grave, with faces speaking of the toils and dim perplexities of half a lifetime—who were these to be called away from their sheep-pens and opium-gardens to meet bullets and shell? It seems right and natural somehow that war should be for the young. In our own army it is different. A man chooses to be a soldier; it is his trade, and he must live by it; if he ties himself up with wife and children he does it at his own risk and at theirs. But these men had come from the hills of Macedonia, from the Marmora, from distant Angora and Trebizond, because they must. It was not their chosen life, yet they had no other. From twenty to thirty-four—in war-time even until forty—one month, two months, six months, eight months, almost every year they must turn out on to bleak mountains to defend their race and their faith against disaffection at home and menace abroad. This year it was Greece; last year it had been the Druses in Syria; the year before Greek and Bulgarian bands in Macedonia. What life was this? The rim of hills round Ellassona held in the first weeks of April perhaps the greatest tragedy in the world.

Greek against Turk was no business of mine. But when I saw those patient, weary, steadfast soldiers standing to their arms in sheets of rain, patrolling mountain-tops in stabbing winds, humped on pack-saddles, marching by cartridge-boxes twelve hours a-day — why, then I, too, became a Turk, soaked to the marrow with Turkish bitterness against the Greek. The quarrel was none of these men's seeking, and though they were ready and anxious to fight, they had none of the exaltation that effervesces out of mastik and Panhellenism. They were eager to fight only because they wanted to get it over once and for all—to get back to their homes with the promise of a few years in peace. They were called out by the menace of Greece; they stayed out to await attack, to do their duty, and to say nothing. The attack did not come, and their mucky little homes were going to rack and ruin the while. Little wonder that with the long days they grew impatient to go down into the green plain, with Larissa a dim blotch at its far end—to crumple up the Greeks and crush them under foot. Down at Larissa there must be hay for horses and fresh vegetables for men. In God's name, let us put an end to this weariness of waiting, and go down to Larissa.

There was not a doubt in anybody's mind that we could walk into Larissa whenever we pleased.

There were those, indeed, who expected to be viewing the Acropolis within forty-eight hours of the declaration of war; for though the Turkish War Office maps of the country looked the best extant—at any rate to eyes that could not read Turkish—the Turkish officer is occasionally hazy in his geography. Better informed or more cautious spirits did not expect being further than Larissa at the end of the time quoted—allowing time for a decisive action and a circuitous march, crossing the Xerias and Salamvria, so as to take Larissa on its unfortified southern side.

Whether this was Edhem Pasha's plan of campaign during the first half of April I am not able to say: that was one of the things he did not reveal to correspondents. At least one staff-officer, however, confided to me—not for publication and in the strictest confidence—that it was so; but then half-a-dozen others similarly confided half-a-dozen other schemes, each incompatible with this and with each of the others. All a correspondent could be reasonably sure of was the amount and distribution of Edhem's force, as to which all accounts did roughly tally, and which was as follows. The army along the frontier consisted of seven infantry divisions—of which one afterwards turned out to be only a brigade—with artillery, a cavalry division with horse-artillery, and eleven batteries of reserve artillery. At Serfidje there was an infantry division in reserve—which also at this time was only a brigade. The several divisions had best be designated by the names of their generals, which was the way the Turks always spoke of them. I believe they had numbers, but as no two authorities ever gave a division the same number, these were only a fruitful source of confusion. It was both humorous and pathetic to see the various military attachés, as they arrived one after another on the scene of action, eagerly copy down the numbers into their note-books—and then later try to come to an understanding among themselves as to the handling of a corps which one conceived to be at one end of the line and another fifty miles away at the other.

The seven divisions were posted to cover the line of frontier from Grevena on the west to Katarina on the Gulf of Salonica. Beginning in the west, on the Turkish extreme right, Hakki Pasha's division occupied the country between Grevena and Diskata: for practical purposes he may be said to have been at Diskata, as there were no operations of any moment westward of this point. Hairi Pasha was at Domenik, Neshat Pasha at Skompa, Memdhuk Pasha and Haidar Pasha at Elassona, Hamdi Pasha at Koskey — the Greek Karya, by which name the place has usually been called—and Hassan Pasha, who had only a brigade, at Platamona, though his headquarters in the early part of April were northward of this, by the coast, at Katarina. The cavalry division was at Ormanli, some five miles north of Elassona, and the artillery reserve at headquarters at Elassona. Measuring off a zigzag line on the map to pass through the various divisional headquarters named, the distance from the extreme right to the extreme left comes out roughly at 160 kilometers, or 100 miles.

The normal strength of a division was two infantry brigades of eight battalions apiece. The nominal strength of a battalion was 1000 men; moderate Turkish accounts put the normal strength at 750; for my own part, judging from all the battalions I saw during the campaign, I should doubt whether their average effective was much more than 600. Each division had four batteries of six guns apiece. Six divisions and a brigade thus works out at 62,400 men with 156 guns. The artillery reserve counted sixty-six guns more. The cavalry division was supposed to number four regiments of 1000 sabres apiece; I afterwards heard of, but did not see, a fifth regiment. In reality it was of nothing like this strength. When I saw two regiments paraded at Ormanli, I was told that about half the men were away on patrol, or escort, or orderly duty; and it is certain that, considering the weakness of this arm, the Turks were most generous in telling off troopers to attend on almost anybody who asked for them. One reason, perhaps, was that the troopers knew their way about the country, which many officers never did up to the very end. The cavalry as I saw it—at Ormanli; on the way to the front when an attack was expected on April 6th, and when it was presumably up to its full strength; and subsequently during the whole campaign—ran to one or two short of forty horses to the squadron. Giving it twenty-five squadrons of forty horses, the total effective force of the cavalry comes to 1000,¹ and it was certainly not more; the horse-artillery gives another eighteen guns. The reserve brigade at Serfidje adds another 4800 men. The grand total of the army of Thessaly, therefore, works out at 67,200 infantry (4800 in reserve, a day's march back), 1000 cavalry, and 240 guns.

The positions of the several divisions corresponded roughly to the several breaks in the mountain-chain which formed the frontier line. Hakkı Pasha was posted so as to meet any attack by the mountain paths from Kalabaka and Trikala, though these did not lend themselves to the passage of large bodies of troops. Hacı Pasha at Domenik covered the defiles of Damasi (the Turkish Tchahihissar) and Kalamaki, through which the rivers Xerias and Salamvria pass respectively through the mountains into the plain of Thessaly. Neshat Pasha covered a practicable route between Skompa and the Greek post of Kurtsiovali (spelt Gritzovali by writers from the Greek side). Memdhuk and Haidar covered the Meluna Pass, Hamdi Pasha the gap of Davia and the pass from Nezeros, and Hassan Pasha the line of march along the coast. The explanation of this extended front is to be found in the Sultan's order to Edhem Pasha to prevent the violation of Turkish territory at any point. The dispositions taken were doubtless admirably adapted to this end; no band of irregulars could get very far into Macedonia without running up against Turkish troops. Only when it came to the question of a counter-attack in force the strategical position was plainly a weak one. A hundred miles is a prodigiously long front for 70,000 men, and to concentrate a powerful force at any point must take a long time. The strongest point of the line was Ellassona, where 28,800 infantry, 1000 cavalry, and 156 guns could be concentrated in some five hours; in a day the reserve brigade from Serfidje would add 4800 infantry more.

Now when a Greek war was threatened in 1886—according to General von der Goltz,¹ who presumably drew up the plan of campaign himself—the intention was to make the main attack by the defiles of Damasi and Kalamaki, so as to take the Greeks on their left flank and Larissa in rear. The advantages of this scheme were many and obvious. It would not be necessary, as in the case of a front attack over the Meluna, to cross the Xerias and Salamvria in the face of the enemy. Larissa was fortified on the north of the Salamvria, and not on the south. And the cavalry could work round the rear of the Greek army and cut its retreat either south to Pharsala or south-east to Velestino and Volo: the army, in short, if defeated, must be annihilated. Whether Edhem Pasha—to be perhaps more accurate, his instructors at the Yildiz Kiosk—entertained this plan during the early part of April I cannot say.

He must have known of it. The weakness of his cavalry, as General von der Goltz has himself tolerantly pointed out, may have determined him against it. It was, indeed, possibly significant of an intention to act on Von der Goltz's plan that on the afternoon of 5th April, the day before the Greek National Fête, he sent a regiment of cavalry to Hairi Pasha at Domenik, and also began to move a brigade of Memdhuk Pasha's division, with guns, from Elassona in that direction. But nothing happened on the 6th, and otherwise Edhem's dispositions appeared from the first rather to point to the frontal attack, which was simpler, though it promised much less decisive advantages.

That we could possibly be beaten in a decisive action—whether on front or flank—nobody imagined for one moment. I did not know myself the strength of the Greek force opposite us; I did not even know our Commander-in-Chief's estimate of it, though, from the conversations I had with him, I gathered that he did not rate it very high. Seeing that the wildest accounts of the Greek army put it at 100,000, that its paper total was some 70,000, and that it was distributed along the whole frontier from sea to sea—an even longer line than ours, so as to cover Epiras, which on the Turkish side was practically an independent command—it was impossible to imagine that Edhem Pasha would possibly have to meet more than 40,000 men at the very outside. And Edhem, including Hairi's division of 9600 infantry and 24 guns, in addition to the force he could concentrate before the Meluna, could direct over 40,000 men upon Larissa at a day's notice. In numbers, therefore, he could hardly help having an equality or a superiority at the decisive point.

When we pass from quantity to quality, the case became clearer still. I had not seen the Greek army. It might be very fine, but it had not yet proved itself. In the Turkish army I had been looking for faults nearly all day for eight days, and of essential weaknesses as yet I could find none. The Turkish army had been represented by correspondents who saw it as specks along a sky-line, as undisciplined, as prone to disorder and outrage, as eaten up by disease, as lacking horses, transport, clothes, everything. Every statement was most untrue. I am not here to write a history of modern Turkey or discuss the wrongs of Armenian usurers and Anarchists. I only say what I saw. I heard a rumour—possibly emanating from the Greek Consulate at Ellassona—about the desecration of Greek churches by Albanians. I saw many Greek churches in the villages round Ellassona, but none desecrated. Troops were camped ten paces from the Greek monastery, whose little brown bit of Byzantine overhangs Ellassona, but the monastery had not crumbled away any faster for that. The Greeks in the town pursued their normal course of swindling the stranger four days in the week and observing feast-days the other three. Nobody interfered with them. You never saw a drunken soldier: the Turkish troops drink nothing but water and coffee; stewed grapes twice a - week furnish their nearest approach to a carouse. You never saw a street brawl. Black-browed Albanians, swarthy Asiatics, refined-looking Constantinopolitans, flat-nosed yellow Circassians, Syrians, Arabs, negroes — here were all the races of the hither East mixing in camp and coffee-house in discipline and good-humoured comradeship without flaw.

Smart, it must be owned, the army of Ellassona was not. I saw a battery starting for the frontier one day: the gun-carriages and the horses were piled up with ragged bundles, beside which a bank-holiday excursionist's baggage is a model of trimness. When a battalion lined up on parade you might see one man in a blue-faced uniform and another in a green. Their sandals looked like old list-slippers, their gaiters like badly-wound hospital bandages; they were tied up with loose ends of string. In the marching regiments, and especially those of the Reserve, the officers were sometimes out at elbow and at knee. The men moved a little slovenly at their drill, and their double hinted at rheumatism; what wonder in a peasant of five-and-thirty?

But all these were small matters. The uniforms might be curious, but they were warm; the men want no better protection. The sandals and gaiters might not fit like ammunition boots and putties, but neither did they gall the foot and cause men to fall out on the march. The officers might be a little dishevelled, but every one was dead keen and—at any rate among the Albanians, of whom I had seen most up to now—utterly a stranger to fear; they knew their men, and their men trusted them. The elder were tried in war. The younger were well trained in the military college at Constantinople; many of these spoke French fluently, though they were never nearer Paris than the Bulgarian frontier. There was indeed the other side of the medal: the elder officers were not trained and the younger were not tried; but at any rate they were likely to be as good as the Greeks. As for stiffness at the double, a man has a right to be a little stiff when he can march twelve hours a-day, knapsack on back, as many days as his officers like to keep him at it. Smart the army assuredly was not; useful, workmanlike, untiring, fearless, it most assuredly was.

For disease, it was said there had been small-pox, and that some ten men died of it. The very Greeks now admitted, with regret, that it had disappeared. There was a good deal of pulmonary sickness and some dysentery; two or three men died daily in the outlying camps; but what was that in 40,000? Here and there on the broken hill-paths you met a man, painfully humped on a wooden pack-saddle, clinging to the pommel, his heels stuck through stirrups of string. A comrade led his beast carefully; you needed only to look at the rider's paste-white, drum-drawn skin to know he was on his way to hospital. No doubt there was sickness. But seeing that half the hospital at Ellassona was still used as a barrack, while best part of the very complete, even luxurious, English-made hospital stores were still unpacked on the 17th of April, it may be said with confidence that sickness was surprisingly small. The troops were nearly all camped on hills, and if the wind was asthma and bronchitis at night, it was quinine and iron in the morning.

Lastly, transport. Edhem Pasha told me without reserve that there were only provisions for fifteen days, and he spoke of it as a defect to be remedied immediately. Depots were being rapidly established at Serfidje and at Ellassona. Who, if anybody, was responsible for the transport and commissariat service as a whole, I inquired again and again from the headquarters staff, and I could find nobody who knew. It seemed to work itself. Of course it was utterly unorganised, and yet it was wonderfully efficient. There was naturally no Army Service Corps in the army—there were not even any Engineers that I ever saw—and infantry battalions had to do the work. Each battalion so detached was of course so much off the fighting strength of the army; and it is here worth while to remark, in the case of a war wherein, on a superficial view, the Greek command of the sea appeared to bring no advantage with it, that the impossibility of sea-transport cost the Turkish army thousands of ineffective infantry and thousands of pounds. As for the pack-ponies, somebody seems to have discovered that biscuit or fodder was wanted, and somebody sent off the beasts and the men. Each battalion of Reserves from Asia Minor was supposed to have brought 200 baggage-animals with it—and curiously enough it generally had. The beasts and the men went somewhere and got what was wanted and brought it in: they took their time about it, but they always brought it in. The truth was that, for transport purposes, each battalion was an independent unit as in Germany; thus the Turks accomplished piecemeal what they would never have done in combination. The transport, in short, was as eloquent a testimony as any observer could have asked both to the weakness and to the strength of the Turkish army—to the faults of its organisation and the rough common-sense and unwearied industry that correct them.

XI.

AMONG THE GREEKS.

CERTAINLY the Greek village was clean, well-liking, and prosperous. I had ridden through a Turkish village the day before—at any rate, it was partly Turkish—and I had not got the stench of it out of my throat yet. It was a jumble of huts, partly unmortared stone, partly mud-bricks dried in the sun and washed by the rain into mud again. The tiles of the country are half cylinders: they lay one course concave side up, the next convex side up. This makes a pretty roof, and an effective, till the wind blows; then, as the tiles are not fastened in any way to the rafters, they begin to crack and carry away. The dirty little houses had dirty little courts before them, enclosed in high stone or mud walls. Here and there squatted a soldier; here and there a beggar; here and there a black blot which, on a nearer view, became a Turkish woman in domino. The road that ran through this village was an open sewer ; the horses plashed along it hock-deep in filth. In the middle of it dogs were gnawing at a dead donkey, one half bones and the other half putrefaction. Now and again we had to scramble over heaps of dung as high as a man. And on the top of these played children—pretty, brown-skinned, limpid-eyed girls, with pigtailed down their backs, and trousers down to their bare feet. They were fat and ruddy enough, the children ; but the stink of that village was an abiding horror.

The Greek village was very different. It lies snugly in a corner, under bare hills ; but on what short grass there is live little flocks of sheep and goats, and a few cows. On the two level sides it is deeply fringed with mulberry orchards and vineyards ; the mulberries were rushing out into leaf till all the village was fragrant of young green. The road to this village is broad and level, and is blocked by only one bank and two or three ditches in a couple of miles or so. The streets in the village itself are many of them but six feet wide, it is true, but they are decently clean and decently paved. Many of the windows are blind, being boarded up for want of glass ; but the houses are all stably built, the courtyards are evenly paved ; there are wells in the courtyards, mulberry trees again, and sometimes little flower-gardens. Some of the richer houses are even stuccoed. There is a main street with cafés, a wooden bridge over a dry river-bed, and seven churches. In this village there is no permanent inhabitant who is not Greek.

And that was the only thing against it. But for its Greek inhabitants, that village would be a little paradise. You will call me prejudiced for saying that—perhaps even anti-Christian; listen while I tell you about it.

I rode over on a Sunday afternoon to buy some photographs. The photographer was a leading citizen of this village, “although,” said my guide—himself a Greek—“there are others also who are very rich.” The photographer was a tall, thin man, with a hooked nose, bright eyes, high forehead, and a general expression of predatory intelligence. There was a restless deference about all his movements which was not the self-contained politeness of the Turk. The Turk is always polite, but you can see that he always holds himself your equal, not to say your superior; the Greek is always obviously, even jerkily, anxious to please and to conciliate. In this Greek village the people squatting on the roadside got up as the Frank rode past and touched their dirty leather skull-caps; the Turk never, unless the Frank was with an officer or somebody he knew. When the Frank alighted, crowds of Greek children sprang up from nowhere to hold his horse, not entirely out of disinterested hospitality; the Turkish infant is rather disposed to heave half a brick at the infidel, till he has convinced himself that the infidel is a friend; then he regards him with solemn, not impertinent, curiosity. He will even unbend so far as to accept of backsheesh if it is offered, but he will not go out of his way to seek it.

The purchase of photographs took some little time, although there were only two possible things to purchase. But in Turkey it would be grossly rude to buy even a view of Ellassona and a portrait of Edhem in less than half an hour or so. That done, I was carried off by the Greek dragoman to see the notables of the village. Up bare stairs, into a bare room, and there was a doctor—lean, pale, stooping, a weak beard appearing patchily on his pinched face. He wore a fez and an ill-fitting grey overcoat, though the sun glared out of a cloudless sky. There, too, was his wife—a double-pigtailed, aproned, untidy caricature of a German shop-keeper's wife. His drawing-room was uncarpeted and bare-walled; but there was a vague hint of the Western hire-system about his furniture. Presently came in a slipshod child, also double-pigtailed, with a tray of little glasses of sweet brandy. Other eminent citizens dropped in, and began to converse in whispers of broken French. All were thin, even cadaverous; all were pale and unshaven; all talked in half-voices; all wore overcoats and insinuating smiles.

One especially—an advocate in a sloppy, snuffy, brown overcoat, a smile more humbly conciliatory, a voice more meekly hushed than all the others—was evidently the spokesman. With sighs and deprecatory smiles, he began to hint of the sufferings of the Greeks. He said nothing definite; he hardly said anything aloud, but there was a world of suggestion in the way he left his sentences unfinished. I asked him about his practice.

“Ah, here we have Turkish law; I might almost say that we have no law at——” and then he checked, with a resigned smile. I suggested that as he admitted he had left Athens to spend two years in Constantinople to qualify for the Turkish courts, there was presumably some sort of law and possibly even a little money in it.

“Well, yes,”—and again that smile of resignation,—“a very little, perhaps; but then you see they have taken away my house and quartered a general in it."

"Did you expect generals to take houses with them to the front?"

"Well, well; no doubt they are right; one must have patience."

"But they pay you for it, I suppose?"

"Well, well; perhaps they may—a little—a very little; one must be patient. Only I saw, the other day, a Turkish soldier selling eggs."

"You mean he had stolen them?"

"Oh no; I do not say that. Still"—smile—"I saw him selling eggs. Four eggs. Who knows? Well, the Turks are here in great numbers; what can we do?"

He left these remarks to soak in, and took me round to another leading inhabitant. This one was like the first, except that his slipshod little girl gave mastik instead of cognac—mastik being a poor relation of absinthe. Each leading inhabitant took his nip. This drawing-room was more elaborate than the last; the walls were partly adorned with a paper suggesting Gossage's navy-blue soap; the furniture breathed stronger hints of the hire-system; there were a few tawdry ornaments, which might have been bought at the sale of a Bloomsbury lodging-house. The brown reach-me-down began to improve the occasion again.

"A Turkish soldier died this morning."

"Really."

"Yes," and the smile crawled over his face; "he died this morning. Many have died now."

"How many? Is it true that there is smallpox here?"

"Well, no; not exactly smallpox. Still many have died—perhaps ten or twelve."

I thought I would go back to Ellassona, and I told him so. But no, that could not be. He begged me, as a friend—my flesh crept—to come and see his own house. His own house was the most comfortable I had seen. He had a large garden, rugs on the floor and the divan, and some sticky-looking pictures of saints, which he called antiquities; his tipple was sweeter and oilier than any of the others.

"But I thought the Pasha had taken your house."

"Well, yes; he has. I have a much better house than this, and the Pasha has taken my best house. Still, it is but a little while; I can shift here."

Then suddenly his whisper became more confidential, his smile more greasily fawning than ever.

"I saw a man to-day who overheard one Turkish officer talking to another."

"Well?"

"He said he wished he had lived in the days of Sultan Selim."

"Well?"

"Do you not know what Sultan Selim said? He said, 'If you wish to live happily in this country, you must first of all kill all the Christians.'"

"And did the Turkish officer kill all the Christians?"

"Not all."

"Any?"

"Well, no; not yet. But who knows?"

With that he called my attention to a be-draggled Greek who was muttering thickly in a corner.

"He crossed last night from Greece; he says they are all mad there—mad for war."

Madness I know little about, but I am a fair judge of intoxication, and certainly this man had all the symptoms of a bona-fide traveller. There-with the little man launched out into stories of half-a-dozen Greek bands who had crossed the frontier in the night and were fighting the Turks at that moment. Some of them, it appeared, had got several days' march into the interior during the ten hours of darkness; others were exchanging murderous volleys with the oppressor on hills so near that you could almost have heard a donkey bray upon them. I since convinced myself that every single tale was false.

I departed. As he stood by my stirrup, the brown overcoat made one more attempt.

“They say that our children can learn in the public schools. That is so in theory; but in practice——”

I had had enough of it. I wanted to gallop in the evening air. I wanted to get the taste of the mastik out of my mouth—and the taste of the Greeks too. I preferred the smell of the Turkish village. I was almost half converted to the abominable theories of Sultan Selim.

XII.

THE RAID.

It was on the morning of the 9th of April that we first heard of the raid on Baltino. It was the custom of the correspondents in Ellassona to stroll round the headquarters some time after breakfast—not with any lively expectation of getting news, but with the desire of satisfying their consciences that there was no news to get. The positions had all been inspected; the promise of war seemed to be fading further away with each day; the routine of asking for news and being told there was none seemed all the duty left. But on this 9th of April, as I stood in the little wooden hall of headquarters, I discerned the familiar portly legs of Kennan Bey coming down the steep stairs in unwonted excitement. Next minute his ruddy face appeared, and he almost rushed into my arms. “News, my dear friend, news!” he shouted. “A thousand Greek brigands have crossed the frontier near Krania. They are fighting now, my friend—in a great forest—shooting since daybreak—pst, pst!" Kennan Bey's style was nothing if not picturesque.

"Then we shall have war after all?"

"Hush! Listen, my dear friend. The brigands at present conceal themselves in the forest. We wait to know for sure whether there are Greek regulars among them. As soon as we learn that there are—ha, ha, my dear friend! Larissa in six hours! Athens in fifty-eight hours! Du bon vin! Des jolies femmes! Ha, ha! A la bonne heure! A la bonne heure!"

It was something to telegraph at any rate—but it was not much more. For Krania—this particular Krania; the woods are full of Kranias on the Turko-Greek frontier—is a good forty miles' journey from Ellassona as the crow flies, and I knew by weary experience that the crow flies a good deal straighter, as well as faster, than horses could go in this country. It meant at least two good days' journey there and two back: allowing a day there, that meant five days away from Ellassona; and in the meantime it was obvious, even without Kennan Bey's rapid imagination, that most important events might happen at headquarters. So I stayed where I was.

What happened, therefore, I only know by hearsay, and by now I had learned that hearsay in this country was worth very, very little more than nothing. Sure enough, when I went to see Kennan Bey later in the day, the brigands had grown to 2000; next morning they were 3000 with guns. I greatly doubt whether Edhem Pasha had received more than one message meantime from the scene of the fighting. It was going on in a country whose wildness I could well imagine from the specimens I had seen; the nearest telegraph station was presumably Metzvo, some ten miles away; as the direct wire from Grevena was said to be cut by the Greeks, all news had to fetch an enormous circuit by Monastir, and I knew enough of the Turkish telegraph to know what that meant. Was Kennan Bey, therefore, a liar? Heaven forbid! He merely said what he firmly believed to be true. His oriental imagination had run away with him: 3000 men with guns were certainly more picturesque than 1000 men without. For the Levantine mind—Turk or Greek, Armenian or Jew—is the slave of the picturesque. It has no comprehension of the Western desire for hard, literal fact. Why take pains to be accurate when it is so much easier and more amusing to be picturesque? Kennan Bey was simply Tartarin de Tarascon in aiguillettes and a fez. And so was everybody else from Edhem Pasha on his divan to Georghi sleeping under the horses' bellies in the stable. They do not wish—as a rule—to deceive; they cannot help it; they are deceived and deceive themselves.

So much in self-defence for the many confessions of ignorance I have already made and shall have to make. I bound myself by a vow long before the war began to state nothing on any authority unless I had either seen it myself or had heard it from a European who had seen it; and though the resolution cost me some excellent stories, on the whole I do not regret it. To return to our brigands. Seyfoullah Pasha, Sub-Chief of the General Staff—Seyfoullah Bey he was then; an officer becomes a Pasha only when he becomes a general—was sent off at once to Krania to see if he could recognise among them any officers of the Greek regular army. Seyfoullah had been Military Attaché in Athens and Turkish Consul at Larissa; he knew most of the officers of the Greek army to speak to, most of the rest by sight, and all the others by reputation; an ardent sportsman, always riding, shooting, or walking, he also knew all Thessaly and all the road to Athens like his pocket, as the Greeks found out to their sorrow. It was the first prominent service of this most brilliant officer, and on his report, as we supposed, hung the chances of peace and war. During the next days life was all expectancy. We heard that the invaders had had temporary successes, as was natural with a band of their force acting against isolated frontier-posts; they had burned four block-houses and surrounded two others; they had taken eight prisoners. But fourteen battalions were closing in on them from Hakki's division at Grevena and from the Epirus army at Metzvo and Janina; their disposal and capture was only a question of time. The enemy were being held at bay in the forest, and only creeping out by night. And then, on the night of the 10th, came the news that they had been repulsed. Two days later they had got unrepulsed somehow and were besieging Baltino, a village close to the frontier. But they had lost fifty-two killed as against the Turks' two. They were certainly a little puzzling, these official reports. Meanwhile it was stated for certain that Seyfoullah had distinctly recognised two Greek officers, whom he had known in Athens; also that two of the killed wore Greek uniforms. That was all we wanted—but still war did not come. Then we heard, on the 14th, that the invaders had been finally driven back into Greece; then that rifles and sword-bayonets had been picked up which bore the Greek government stamp—but still war did not come. Finally, one night as we were at dinner, there clanked in an aide-de-camp of his Majesty the Sultan, and behind him an orderly with a Gras rifle and a couple of Greek bayonets. There they were on the table, and we could see for ourselves if it was not true that the Greek Government had been cognisant of the whole thing all through. Certainly it was true, said we, with conviction, as indeed there is little enough room for doubt that it was. But still no declaration of war.

“But never mind, my dear friend,” cried Kennan Bey. “Prisoners are coming—fifty prisoners, my friend: what fun!” Next day when I saw him I asked when the fifty prisoners would arrive. “Fifty prisoners? No, no, my friend, you have been misinformed. Nine prisoners. Ha, ha! Fifty would be too much to expect.” Next day I asked after the nine. “Nine? Ah yes, the nine. But they couldn’t march—ha, ha, ha!—these poor Greeks—but they are bringing one. Un gros gaillard—gros comme ça!”

The whole population of Ellassona had been in the streets for days, firmly convinced that prisoners were coming in every moment. Nothing would persuade, for example, the Levantine imagination of Charlie that prisoners were not coming in whenever he saw a crowd in the streets. "The soldiers say so," he cried, with a superior smile; "of course they know, the soldiers." But at last one afternoon the prisoner arrived.

I was coming in from an attempt to teach my horse to jump—the only recreation left, now that war seemed to have blown over for good. In the blackening dusk I saw a dim knot of men under the portico of the Kaimakam's house; the prison is in the Kaimakam's back-garden. Inside a ring of braided and buttoned Turkish officers, of breeched and gaitered English correspondents, stood a man, talking fast and loudly. I was excited, for I had never seen a brigand before: I went up to the ring and looked at him. And this was a brigand! The gros gaillard was a squat, little man, well under five feet, slouching, dirty, unshaven, with a greasy, red skull-cap and an ill-fitting cord suit. As he gabbled on, now crossing his arms, now waving them like windmill-sails round his head, he looked for all the world like an unemployed orator on Tower-hill. Defiantly, and even proudly, he told his story to the interpreter. He came from Corfu, and he belonged to a battalion of the Reserve. He went first to Larissa, then to Trikkala, then to Kalabaka. His captain and his lieutenant ordered him to make war, and the whole battalion—so I gathered—went forward together. With others they were a thousand strong. The officers put off their uniforms and put on kilts. Everybody knew they were going to make war—at Trikkala, at Kalabaka, everywhere. They all cried, “Zeto ho polemos”—and as he said the words, the grubby little prisoner flourished his arms, and stood up his whole four feet six. They went over the frontier at sunrise; he did not know whether the Greek officers stationed at the block-houses saw them, though he admitted that a thousand men cannot hide behind a juniper-bush. They came to the Turkish blockhouses; some of the garrisons retired, and they burnt their block-houses. One they besieged, and when the Turks had fought many hours and shot away all their ammunition, they surrendered—eight men to a thousand. The eight were taken back to Kalabaka. After that they went on four hours’ march into Turkey. Then they met the Turks again, and they were defeated. They had an army doctor with them and he was shot, but they saved the colours. Then he got cut off from his comrades with twenty-five others. Twenty-four were shot, and so he surrendered. And there he was—till an orderly took him away to the prison again. And this absurd little brigand was the first I saw, and the last I heard of the raid on Baltino.

XIII.

A BIRD'S-EYE BATTLE.

"ONE band Greeks come inside last night," remarked Charlie, as his large red face met my awakening eyes. "Where?" "Karya; bin shoot all night; bin shooting always."

I thought it was only another Baltino affair—Greek Reservists disguised as brigands, two days' shooting, and the matter handed over to be settled between Constantinople and Athens. However, it was certainly worth going to headquarters about: Charlie might have stumbled on to the truth for once. And at headquarters, sure enough, I found my friend Kennan Bey unwontedly grave. It was serious this time. The Greeks had attacked in force at seven on the evening of the 16th; hard fighting had been going on all night. Kennan himself had just been ordered to Karya with reinforcements. "You had better be off at once, my friend."

Karya is not far from Ellassona—perhaps fifteen miles or so. I would go and spend the night. So I had them pack up my bed and a box of food and load them on a pack-saddle. I mounted my larger and more brazen-mouthed pony, mounted Charlie on the one which trotted like the gas in a seltzer syphon—it suited his style of riding, with a pillow on the saddle, better than it did mine—and off we went to Karya.

The road to Karya—which the Turks call Koskeuy—is like the road to everywhere else in this country. Now up, now down, here a precipice on the right, there a torrent on the left; stones everywhere, prickles everywhere, baggage-animals everywhere. We met the usual maddening files of donkeys, quite hidden under stacks of brushwood for fuel: this is the worst kind of baggage-beast. You know there must be a donkey somewhere in the middle of the moving mass, but you can't get at him with the longest whip to drive him off the path; you have to hitch yourself over the edge of the precipice and let Birnam Wood go by. All this was usual. But as we struggled on the Karya road there came a new experience. "Pop, pop; pop, pop, pop; pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop; pop." It was not very different from the sound of shooting many pheasants, but I knew they were shooting men. My heart began to try to beat in time with the pops. When four or five came together I wondered how many were down that time ; I hurried lest both sides should be killed out before I got there. So I turned a corner and came on the village of Karya — small and ramshackle and dirty — wedged into a recess under hills like cataracts suddenly turned to stone, above these the solemn whiteness of Olympus. Olympus is the back-scene of Karya ; its foreground was the fight.

There was a broad valley, perhaps a mile to a couple of miles across ; at the other side of it grey-green hills, part stones, part young grass, part wood. The hills rose to various summits — four or five in all, though these were hardly individual enough to make the whole thing more than a crested ridge : you might as well call it one hill as five. I suppose they were 3000 feet or 4000 feet high, and quite steep. Along them ran the frontier ; you could recognise it by the little dabs of white which stood for blockhouses. Across the valley came the pops — sometimes rare and distinct, sometimes a rapid popple when all the separate reports ran into each other. It sounded like a machine that was now going round slowly, now quickly. Every now and then the pops were varied by a boom—a gun. Here and there a tiny patch of dirty smoke curled languidly off the broad hillside. That was the battle. Through a glass I watched it for a long time from Hamdi Pasha's headquarters, and I made out some black dots on a tongue of the ridge about one-third of the way up. That was a battery of artillery. At the very top was a line rather like the leg of a beetle under a microscope: that was a battalion of infantry. Pop, popple, boom, little black dots, and little black streaks: that was all.

No; there was a little more of it. On the other side of the trickling burn in which Karya does not wash was the hospital, and they were bringing in wounded. I went over and entered in. Of course it reeked of iodoform: hospitals do. But though iodoform is not a smell that allows rivals to live with it, there was distinctly another smell. Blood. And there was another sound besides the sort of rustle which rises out of the swift half-stealthy movements of a hospital staff. Groans, wails, sentences cried out aloud, in strange, thick gutturals—a volume of sound like a man's voice, and a fretful, passionate intonation like a child's.

There came to meet me at the door a very young surgeon, an Albanian, as fair as a fair

Englishman, with a skin like strawberries and cream, hair like vine tendrils, eyes as simple as a baby's, and as compassionate as a good woman's—the most beautiful man I ever saw. He wore a blue overall, his sleeves were tucked above the elbow, and to the elbow and above it his arms were clotted with blood. Yet the young man looked to me then like an angel. The wounded turned on their beds and looked at me with eyes that felt as if they would bore through me. One man howled aloud like a beast, and tore off the bandage from his wound. A white-bearded captain shot through the thigh showed his bullet-rent with a smile of humorous patience. But beast or humorous gentleman, the beautiful young Albanian looked at all with the same clear pitiful eyes, tormented them with the same quick, unsparing, merciful hand.

It was pleasanter to go out into the sun and listen to the battle. It still popped on—now fast, now slow, as if the gods were opening much champagne for a picnic on Olympus. I went no nearer it, for I saw a little shiver of excitement run round a group of aides-de-camp, and hastened to ask about it. It had come. This last Greek outrage was too much, I heard; war was declared, and the Marshal Pasha would advance in force to-morrow all along the line. I jumped on my pony, turned round the tired pack-horse, not yet unladen of his baggage, and started full scramble back to headquarters. The fight I left to crackle out if it liked.

It was going on all right. During the night the Greeks had pushed right down to the base of the frontier hills; but Hamdi now had nine battalions of his division engaged, and the Greeks were back again on the sky-line. But the whole thing was a joke compared with what was to happen at Ellassona to-morrow. I must be with the Marshal. A war-correspondent's place in general actions is not before the firing line, but behind the general staff, and I hastened to put myself in that romantic position with as little delay as might be.

But there was no doubt about it. War, long promised, long delayed—war, which, in my letter posted the night before, I had solemnly declared not to be coming—war was on us at last. As I rode along the valley path, the sound of rifle-fire kept pace as it ran like a train of gunpowder along the sheer heights above. A third of the way back I met Kennan Bey's four battalions—the men, loaded up with biscuits and water and ammunition, toiling painfully through the scrub, their eyes glued to the blackening hills before them. For the second half of the journey the road climbs; by this time the sun had gone down, and under the shadow of the mountain-side even the white baggage-horse was no more than a patch of ghostly grey. But at the top we came out into the moonlight—full moon as bright as a London winter sun—and there was no doubt about it. On the heights blazed signal-fires, and the plain replied to them. On the horizon, near Meluna, blazed a blockhouse—whose, it was impossible to say. And the ripple of musketry all round the hill-fenced plain of Ellassona was deepened more and more often by the voice of cannon. As we rode into Ellassona the lines of tents lacked the soft glimmer of other nights; they were all dark and cold and empty; the men had gone up to the fighting front. It was war all along the line, and it was war in force. To-morrow we should fight over fifty miles of frontier, with over 50,000 men.

XIV.

THE BATTLE OF THE MELUNA.

TO-MORROW came. I woke in my boots, and I was out before daybreak. Not for one moment in the night—so I was told—had the rifles and artillery kept silence. Now the sun came out clear in the blue sky ; Olympus had even taken off his cloud-cap for the great day. As the sun stood up over Mount Menekshe I saw along the foot of the Meluna Pass what looked like a thick streak of white cloud : it was the banked smoke of the night's fighting. The still air let it rest where it lay. There was not a breath of wind ; but for the firing there would not have been a sound ; the whole plain glowed in the flooding sunshine. I remembered that it was Easter Sunday.

But I forgot it again in a moment. I rode off to find the Marshal and his staff, childishly happy ; was I not going to see the biggest fight since Plevna ? The Marshal was just moving down to the front from the little hill where was the camp of the Second Brigade of Memdhuk Pasha's division. With him were the long lines of red fezzes and white, blue uniforms and dancing rifles, of four Albanian battalions—the reserve, the best men in the army, perhaps almost the best soldiers in the world. They roared with a deep bass of delight, and a little ferocity, as they swung down the little hill, across the fallows and the fields of young corn. Some way behind a black centipede wound over the plain—the cavalry coming up from their quarters, five miles in rear. With the Marshal went the Staff—bearded veterans of the Servian, Montenegrin, and Russian wars, and spruce young aides-de-camp from the Yildiz. We marched towards the line of smoke at the foot of the hills. We marched till we drew up on the road to the Col of Meluna. There we halted in face of the row of low but steep and bare hills. Three blockhouses, their chimneys perked impudently into the sky-line, marked equal intervals of perhaps half a mile along the summit; Menekshe and Parna Tepe towering on either hand marked the limits of the field of the main fight. On either side of us stood fields of the same green barley, but in them three batteries of six guns apiece thrust out their grimly impertinent nozzles, sniffing at the wreaths of smoke on the hills. A fourth battery was driving up ; the horses swung round and the guns were unlimbered in line with the others. The teams to work them squatted round in the attitude of humble adoration proper to the gunner in presence of his gun ; the red fezzes only appeared like poppies above the green. Here all dismounted and set themselves to watch the battle of Meluna.

And the battle ? It was the battle of Karya over again on a larger scale. The Greeks had again been first. Attacking in force at dusk on Saturday evening, they had swarmed up the low hills which flank the Pass and occupied the line of the frontier ; they had surrounded the Turkish blockhouse at the head of the Pass itself ; they had come down the Turkish side almost on to the plain. It is nearly five miles from Ellassona to the head of the Pass, and it was two in the morning—so they told me—before the Turks came into action in force. With four battalions they drove the Greeks back up the hills, and rescued Sub-Lieutenant Yunus and his beleaguered outpost from the blockhouse. They said the fighting had been tremendous, but from what I saw this day I question it. The shooting off of rifles was tremendous, no doubt ; but if the fighting had been very fierce, how could Yunus and his score of men have been left alive after an attack of eight hours?

The position now, at seven in the morning, was exactly the same as I had left it at Karya at seven the last evening. The Greeks had been driven back to the crest, where they held the line of the three blockhouses. The road up the Pass makes a bend to the left, about a mile in front of where we sat, round a low hill : on this hill a battery of mountain-guns was in action against the left-hand blockhouse. Infantry were crawling slowly down below the guns, across the road, and then up to the attack of the hill. Infantry were crawling up the hill right in front of us to attack the central blockhouse. Infantry were crawling up over the skirts of Parna Tepe to attack the right-hand blockhouse. At the bottom of the hills they were black blotches on the grey steeps ; towards the top they spread out into lines of dots, as the men deployed, lay down and opened fire. They fired no volleys. They simply crept, crept upwards : now a dot was a fixed point for a quarter of an hour : the man had found good cover. Then it began to travel upwards again—always nearer to the goal—the black chimney against the blue. It was slow ; but the attack was developing.

Bang ! An ear-cracking explosion not ten yards behind me, and the horses were dancing like mad. The artillery was beginning. They had sent a couple of guns forward before this to the turn of the road, but they had come trailing back again: the elevation was too great just under the hills. Now they were opening from where they stood—three thousand nine hundred metres from the blockhouses. I looked at my watch: it was only eight o'clock, but the battle seemed to have been going on half a lifetime. Ali Riza Pasha, the smart and jovial General responsible for the artillery, leapt on to the roadside and prepared to enjoy himself. "Mehemet Ali Effendi," he sang out; the tall black-browed officer in command of the battery replied; there came an unintelligible order, and then Mehemet Ali was bending tenderly over the gun. Then the word of command—"Hey-y-y—hutt!"—it sounded, with a furious accent on the "hutt." A gunner flung his weight on to the lanyard—bang, the fizz of a rocket, a scream as the shell passed between the echoing heights on either side; all eyes strained on the blockhouse; then a crack, a flash, and a belch of dirty smoke as the shell burst every time in the right spot—two miles and a half away. At the bang the gun had jumped back as if it had put all its strength into the shot and wanted to watch what it had done; its men rushed round it and caressed it as if it were a baby, and they were afraid it might have hurt itself. Shell after shell seemed to pitch on to the very foot of the left-hand blockhouse: at each good shot there was a burst of little exclamations: grey-bearded generals clapped their hands. Edhem himself—seated cross-legged on the ground, gazing impassively in front of him, as if this were somebody else's battle and he was an intelligent critic—Edhem himself looked up and laughed. It was curiously like Gentlemen v. Players.

The fields behind us were red and white with fezzes, where the reserves squatted in long lines in the furrows, and blinked lazily at the grey puffs on the hills. At ten o'clock, "Memdhuk Pasha!" suddenly cried Edhem. Up bustled short, round, white-bearded Memdhuk Pasha—"a man of little instruction," as a superior young aide-de-camp had informed me, "but popular with the soldiers, because he always fights when he can get at the enemy." A few words to Memdhuk Pasha and he was bustling away rearward. And presently the long lines of fezzes rose up into men and went forward towards the Pass. Slowly, but with an adamant resolution in the set of the men's bodies, they spread out over the fields and rolled forward. Now we should see ! At the very base of the heights, in green meadows, they massed again—and halted. It must be to get their breath for the assault. But eleven o'clock came, and twelve o'clock came, and one o'clock came—and still they halted under the shelter of the hills. And it occurred to me as a self-evident truth, which common-sense should have impressed before, that a battle which takes half an hour to read about takes a good deal longer to happen.

But what was happening ? Was anything going to happen at all ? The guns were still banging away : they must be killing the killed ten times over, and the very horses no longer condescended to shy at them. Up on the heights the black lines of our infantry seemed to be going up a kind of treadmill—ever advancing, never arriving. But at last, towards one in the day, there was a stir round the middle blockhouse, which lay opener than the other two. Surely our men were getting forward this time. They were now on the level : they must surely be on either side of the blockhouse by now ; surely, surely they must be past it. Yes, they were. An orderly came galloping furiously along the road and passed a dirty scrap of paper to the Marshal : the Greeks had fallen back. The centre of their defence was ours.

The ambulances were coming up by now—by rights they ought to have been up hours before. Half-a-dozen wounded, heads or hands or legs roughly bound up with red-stained bandages, were already sitting by the roadside near us, looking neither at the battle nor the Marshal. Most of them shut their eyes or stared at the ground; they gave the impression of being quite dazed and very sick. The ambulances rumbled past us in a cloud of dust, and bumped along the road till they got to the foot of the ascent, where the reserves were lying. Presently they came rumbling back again—not very full, only with two or three men apiece, making perhaps a dozen all told. Some looked full of fight yet—Memdhuk Pasha hauled one man out and sent him up into the fighting line again; others were lying all of a heap, heads only held up a little by comrades hardly better off than themselves, just as they had been dumped in. First and last I do not think the ambulances took in more than twenty to thirty wounded by nightfall. But that was not all: those who were hit up on the hills, and could not get down, had to lie where they were till nightfall.

It was now two in the afternoon. The sun was pitiless: if you sat down, the road was almost like a baker's oven. The plain and the hills swam in the glare, and the black infantry on the face of the slopes looked as if they were blinking at us. The guns beside us were now lobbing shrapnel over the ridge to break the steadiness of the Greek supports below. But their fire was slackening, till only two guns were left in action, and they but slackly served. The fusillade above us had died out almost entirely. What wonder? The men had some of them been in action over twenty hours now, without any more food and drink than the dry biscuit they carried with them and the water in their canteens, and without a wink of sleep. And from now on, if I may say so, the battle of Meluna became a bore. Charlie gave his Excellency Field-Marshal Edhem Pasha my horse-rug to sit down on. Villagers lined the roadside as if a battle were a Jubilee procession. Some grey-bearded sons of the Prophet went so far as to put up sunshades. The fighting became Oriental or Balkanic—no attempt to gain ground and break the enemy, but a dogged firing from behind cover till a man dropped. It became a kind of picnic battle—a thing you might invite a few friends to, and take them in to Ellassona and give them afternoon tea when they got tired of it.

And so it went on, or stood still, till seven in the evening. By this time it was beginning to get dark, but it was also beginning to get cool. Now, if ever, was the moment which was to turn the action from a profitless twenty-six hours' fusilade to a decisive advantage. It was too dark to see the hill-tops plainly, but it was possible to hear the bugles singing out the advance. The Turks charged with fixed bayonets. The Greeks stood their ground till the assailants were some thirty yards away—and then gave back. They had had enough: the Turks had outstayed them. The battle of the Meluna was over. Everybody was dog-tired, famishing for sleep. But the Turks had won the gate of Thessaly.

XV.

THE MORROW OF THE BATTLE.

IN the battle of the Meluna, according to the official information, the Turks lost thirty men killed and two hundred and seventy wounded. The loss of the Greeks we did not know—so far as I am aware nobody knows it yet—but it was probably not much heavier. There were engaged on the Turkish side the divisions of Memdhuk and Haidar Pashas, though five battalions of the latter never actually went into action. Besides these, Nes-hat Pasha's division was engaged all day to the south, on Edhem's right—the Pass of Meluna looks roughly south-east—in what may perhaps be called strategically, though, owing to the broken ground, not tactically, the same battle. The Turkish force engaged was thus very little, if any, short of 30,000 men, with four field-batteries as well as mountain-guns. What the Greek strength was I do not know—again nobody seems to know, and there were no European correspondents present with them—but it was probably not much inferior to the Turkish. The conclusion is that 60,000 men, in twenty-six hours' continuous fighting, only lost sixty killed and something under six hundred wounded. At Gravelotte the Germans lost over 19,000 men out of 230,000—more than 8 in 100. At Leipzig—which, to be sure, took four days to fight—the Allies lost over 45,000 out of 300,000—15 to the 100. At Meluna the loss can hardly have been more than 1 to the 1000. The battle deserves to be immortal merely for its bloodlessness; never was a decisive advantage more cheaply gained.

On the morning of April 19th, I went up at sunrise to the ground over which the battle had been fought and perceived the truth. The truth was that the forces were very much spread out; they fired no volleys; each man built him a little heap of stones, lay down behind it, and fired when the spirit moved him. That is the way they naturally fight in this part of the world—because they enjoy it. This kind of battle takes a long time. It is the traditional hill-fighting of all the Balkan peninsula—the method of the irregular bands in Macedonia, of the private feuds of Albania, of faction-fighters and brigands everywhere. It bespeaks want of energy rather than want of courage : an English correspondent told me he had seen a company of Turks fight so until the last man was killed. None the less the three blockhouses might be the centre of furious firing to-day if it had not been for the Turkish artillery. At a distance of very nearly 4000 yards their batteries planted round after round within ten yards of the blockhouses. If there was one man who enjoyed the battle and had reason to be proud of it, it was Ali Riza Pasha. The Turkish artillery, when it is limbered up, gives the general impression that somebody is taking dirty old clothes to the wash. The harness is patchy, the traces are rope ; one horse or another has generally got his leg over the traces ; the guns seldom go quicker than a walk. But plainly the Turkish artillery could shoot.

When I got to the sward on the head of the Meluna the first person I saw — and I have seldom been so surprised to see any one still alive — was my friend Yunus Effendi. I have described him already — the elderly, tatterdemalion, dare-devil, Albanian sub-lieutenant who commanded at the blockhouse. Everybody knew Yunus, and despite his undeniable ferocity everybody liked him. The top of the Meluna was a favourite picnicking ground for correspondents on both sides before the war began ; the officers of the General Staff were constantly up there, so that Yunus numbered among his friends all the Europeans and all the high officers, as well as the Greek officers at the blockhouse opposite. He had a performing ram, which he had trained to go to sleep at the word of command, and which never failed to please. Yunus descried us in the distance, and came waving his arms to greet us. He was in boisterous spirits. He had killed Greeks and Greeks and Greeks! When the fighting began he had seized a rifle, and commenced operations by picking off his friend in command of the Greek blockhouse. After that he had killed two more officers, including a major, and had sent his sword down to Edhem as a guarantee of good faith. There seemed at last a reasonable probability that Yunus would be promoted.

We got up on to the rough stone breastwork, which the Turks had already run up on the Greek side of the captured Greek blockhouse, and looked over down into the plain. The enemy were firing desultorily from the foothills on the right, which still remained to them, but I did not see anybody hit. They fired a shell or two from some guns they had mounted during the night, but these did no damage either. All along the line of the fight there were built little shelters of loose stones, anything from eighteen inches to four feet high—some big enough for one man only, some for two or three or four. Behind these the cartridge-cases lay in piles—some Turkish Martini, some Greek Gras, sometimes both mixed when a position had changed hands. Between these little breastworks there was hardly an empty case to be seen; hardly anybody had fought except under cover. You could understand then that the fight had looked and sounded as if two army corps were annihilating each other, and that really there were less than a hundred men killed.

The Greek blockhouses were half smashed. The furniture was gone—carried off, or looted, or burned. Two especially were nothing but heaps of rubble and skeletons of charred beams. The ground round them was cut up till it looked like a badly ploughed field. The floors were littered with every kind of paper, official and unofficial. I picked up a Greek prayer-book with a ragged bullet-hole right through the middle of it; curiously, there was no blood on it, and I wondered whether its owner could have propped it up in a loophole as a sacred shield. At one blockhouse were three Greek bodies; the Turks had buried their dead already. Later on I came on a dozen more. Stripped to shirt and drawers; heads caked with blood ; brown faces contrasting with white arms and chests ; flesh puffed and swollen ; skin yellow like wax ; flies feasting on the half-decomposed faces ; hands clenched, looking curiously small and smooth, like hands at Mme. Tussaud's ; wounds dry, but dirty and gaping ; one man's face torn and bashed into a mass of squashy red,—that is enough, once and for all, to say of the dead.

I had now come to the extreme right of our battlefield of the previous day, tending southwards along the frontier, on the Greek side of Parna Tepe, so as to reach the sphere of influence of Neshat Pasha. All along the line the soldiers were sitting about smoking, making coffee, singing, and laughing. They had had a night's sleep, and were ready for as much more fight as the officers liked to put them to. Some were hard at work taking the stones from the little shelters, and building ramparts on the Greek side of the blockhouses. Imagine a vastly superior army on vastly superior ground entrenching itself on the morrow of a victory, and you will get some idea why it is that a Turkish campaign takes time.

After a little while the casual shooting began to crystallise about the lower hills of the Greeks. A battalion came slouching past me—a long line of shuffling sandals, rifles held anyhow, fezzes worn anyhow, but scorched faces that bespoke the spirit of a soldier better than all the buttons and pipeclay in the world. I joined myself to this battalion as it began to spread itself into the order of attack. As a matter of fact, it never attacked. The battalion just in front of it had split up into two long irregular lines of men, shambling carelessly across a stony dip, and climbing up a hill that looked like a petrified waterfall with the petrification all broken loose.

At the top they began firing down on the Greeks, without haste and without rest, quietly going each man about his business. The Greeks replied, but the Turks remained quite unperturbed, strolling up and down into favourable positions, now firing five rounds in five minutes, now putting in a hot crackle like a bonfire of dry wood. Then at last the bugler put his bugle to his lips and his face to the sky, like a duck drinking. Then rang out the advance, and the Turks went forward with a swinging trot. And then, before I had quite made out what it was all about, that little fight was over. The Greeks had scuttled into the plain. I only saw two dead, but probably there were more. There were also eleven prisoners—young men, beautifully attired in neat blue and black uniforms, excellent boots, smart forage-caps, and stylish blue-grey overcoats. One was an Italian, who could speak neither to his comrades nor to his captors. "Io Italiano; parlate Italiano?" was all he had to say. The dishevelled Turks stared, round-eyed, with half-curious, half-scornful wonder at their dandy prisoners. But Captain Mehemet Bey, strolling casually about to look for dead, summed the matter up. "Soldatt Grek," he epigrammatically remarked, "costume bienn, cœur mauvais; soldatt Turk, costume mauvais, cœur bienn."

I rode fourteen weary hours over the hills that day, desiring to find my old acquaintance Neshat Pasha, and hear what he had done the day before. I came on him about five in the evening, walking up and down the parapet of a captured redoubt—looking with his glass and his pilot-jacket like a master-mariner on his bridge. His knowledge of French is limited to the word "mademoiselle," so that I was not able to gather very clearly at first hand what he had done the day before. He had had to hold his men hard all day, I gathered, to prevent them from going forward too fast and being outflanked. In the afternoon he had assaulted the Greek positions on Papa Livad, the mountain on his right front, and taken them without serious loss. The Greeks had evacuated the little village of Kurtsiovali—their end of the Pass of which Skompa, Neshat's original headquarters, is the Turkish. The village was entirely commanded all round by heights now in the hands of the Turks; nevertheless the Crown Prince was severely blamed in Athens for ordering, or permitting, its evacuation—which gives a good idea of the capacity of Athens for military criticism. Neshat had lost one of his Brigadiers—Hafiz Pasha, a grave long-bearded veteran of eighty who had been through the Crimean and the Russo-Turkish wars. He led his brigade into action—so the Turks told us—on horseback: when his aides-de-camp urged him to dismount he answered, “My children, I never dismounted for the Russians; shall I now dismount for the Greeks?” A moment later he was hit in the left arm, but still refused to dismount; next moment his right hand also was shattered. Even then he refused to retire, and a third bullet hit him in the throat and finished the brave old man.

Neshat had got up some mountain guns, and was under the impression that he was about to bombard and capture Tyrnavo. But between Neshat and Tyrnavo rose the lofty mountain of Kritiri, still in Greek hands, of which more later.

ON THE COL OF MELUNA.

THE week which followed the battle of the Meluna was in many respects the most farcical of a farcical campaign. On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, there was next to nothing done at all. In the battle of Meluna the Turks had given twenty-six hours to an issue which a European army would have decided one way or the other in four or five. They now devoted the best part of a week to reconnaissances and combinations which a European general would probably have got through within a day. For correspondents the week was a long but slightly tiresome picnic. We got up religiously at four every morning, for it was the one element of excitement that we never knew from day to day that the grand advance would not take place. We rode up to the Col and sat down; about an hour afterwards would arrive the Marshal with his staff. They also sat down, and looked at Thessaly. There was usually something going on in the plain of a nature which at last threw light on Mr Gladstone's once puzzling distinction between military operations and war. Then came lunch—"le plus interessant portion de la jour," as an English correspondent idiomatically described it. Then we looked at Thessaly during the afternoon—there were sentinels at the head of the descent to prevent us from going down into it—and rode home to dinner. Andreas was in the kitchen, as usual, with his coat off: "Was für Schlacht heute?" he would cheerfully ask.

From my own point of view the week was chiefly remarkable for the development of Charlie and of the censorship. I had been inclined at first to look with some little suspicion on Charlie. He was entirely without honour in his own country, his reputation in Salonica being more than shady. But very quickly Charlie developed into an ideal correspondent's servant. His command of English was small, and hardly improved in quantity during the campaign, while it steadily declined in quality. It was embarrassing, when giving lunch to a German officer who knew English a great deal better than Charlie ever will, to have him stroll up and ask, "'Oo's this feller?" But it was rather lucky that it was no worse.

Yet although Charlie always professed his incompetence to do anything that was suggested to him—the word “possible” never exists in a dragoman’s vocabulary—he not only could do, but in the end would do, any mortal thing required of him, from looting a reel of cotton to interviewing the Commander-in-Chief, the great Mushir Pasha himself. Neither work nor play came amiss to him; he was never at a loss in the most unexpected turn of circumstances. Although a Jew, he had no objection to going under a mild fire. Best of all, he entirely grasped the importance of getting news quickly on the wire. It was his great delight during this week to keep a horse saddled in a quiet corner where he thought no other correspondent would notice it; then when there was a message to send, to lead it unobtrusively down the hill, gallop at top speed to Elasona, take the dispatch to the office, and then get a fresh horse from the stable and repeat the process. I should think he must be almost the only one of the Sultan’s subjects who appreciates the value of time.

The other main development of the first half of the week was the censorship. You must know that at Turkish headquarters there were four—afterwards more—aides-de-camp of the Sultan. Nominally they were a kind of extra aides-de-camp to Edhem; really they were spies with the power of telegraphing cipher reports of what went on behind Edhem's back to the Yildiz. One of these—Nedjib Bey, an exceedingly able and promising young man if only anybody could have trusted him—was understood to be more or less responsible for seeing that the European correspondents committed no indiscretion. If there was an official censor, it was he. If he was not straight, and was alternately rude and fawning, he was at all events intelligent. Other officers, however, were quite ready to censor telegrams, and nobody seemed to object to their assuming the authority to do so: Seyfoullah, for example, was an excellent censor, not afraid to let you criticise, and with the additional advantage of being always present when there was anything to telegraph about. Before the war the censorship worked well enough. But when we all got up to the Col of Meluna we were suddenly told one morning that there was a new censor appointed—Enver Bey; all telegrams must be seen by Enver Bey. Enver, otherwise a very capable officer, professed his inability to read our telegrams, though he understood French well enough and they were all in capital letters. Next day we were told that no telegrams could be allowed at all—not even a telegram to say that no telegrams could be allowed—until after a decisive action had been fought. There was no reason to expect that a decisive action would ever be fought at the rate things were going on, but as it was the same for everybody, nobody objected.

But later in the day it was discovered that it was not the same for everybody; that one correspondent had taken telegrams to Enver—who apparently knew nothing of the new rule; what should the censor know about the censorship regulations?—and had got them through. On that we went in wrath to the Marshal Pasha. The Marshal—exceedingly bored—ordered that in future Mustapha Natic Bey—Grumbkow Pasha's aide-de-camp, who had little else to do—should be censor, and he alone. I took a telegram to Mustapha Natic which contained, as everybody's despatches did, the word "stop," meaning that was the end of a sentence. The device is usually adopted in telegraphing long reports to newspapers for clearness' sake; in view of the Turkish telegraph service it was as necessary as it was inadequate. The censor had just passed two telegrams which bristled with the word. He looked at me sternly. "Stop," he cried, in a voice of thunder: "qu'est ce que veut dire 'stop'?" I translated it into French and German, both of which he spoke fluently. "Point," he roared, with rising horror! "Punkt! Nein, nein; das geht nicht; ça ne convient pas; croisez ça, je vous en prie." I explained in sandwiches of French and German that it was a punctuation mark—that it was to facilitate deciphering. But no! That "stop" was evidently a code word of the profoundest and most damnable significance. Out it had to go.

Meanwhile the war was pretty well standing still. The operations of the days from Monday to Thursday were most puzzling to an ignorant mind; it was some consolation to find that they were equally incomprehensible to German experts of the highest standing. I am not sure that I can give a coherent account of them even now; but I will try. First, as to the proceedings of the main army, which I saw. A little before nine on Tuesday morning, April 20th, the cavalry went down into the plain to reconnoitre. Why this was not done on Monday I cannot say, since the Greeks were driven off all the foot-hills at about ten in the morning. I believe that Grumbkow Pasha—a colonel in the Kaiser's army, but serving as Inspector-General of Artillery in the Turkish service—advised Edhem to send down a battery of horse-artillery with the cavalry, but the cautious Marshal declined, and the cavalry at first went down unsupported. From where we sat, as in an amphitheatre seat at the opera, we could see every movement. The plain is patchwork of green corn and brown fallow, with a blue stream cutting it down the middle, and a yellow one—the Xerias—cutting it parallel with the horizon. Two roads diverge in the shape of a V from the village of Ligaria at the bottom of the Pass and run along under the opening hills—on the left to the village of Karatsali, on the right to Tyrnavo. On the left half of the blue stream are woods, full of cover; beyond them the villages of Deliler and Mussalar. On the right, perhaps half of the way between the Pass and the Xerias, is a little round hill—a molehill it looks away down in the plain; behind it the long line of Larissa, white houses set in green trees, twinkles hazily half-way across; the mountains of Othrys close the plain at the further end.

The cavalry wound down the long zigzags of the Pass, where the Greeks had most considerately mended the road unto Thessaly. One squadron grey horses and the next browns, dark uniforms, black sheepskin caps, swarthy Circassian faces, they got smaller and smaller, disappeared behind hills, reappeared lower down, and finally began to crawl over the chequer-board of young corn and fallow. Along the road, among the deserted Greek tents, under the hills, out on to the plain, by the wavy blue line of the river, now a black serpent, now straightening into a column, now spreading into two or three lines, in the openest order, they advanced into Thessaly.

Then suddenly from beside the little hill came a white puff, and then a yellowish-grey one—the shell bursting in a fallow a quarter of a mile ahead of the cavalry. The Greeks were there, with guns. The cavalry drew back under cover by the river-side. By this time, though, Albanian infantry had gone down with hoarse cheers and growling national songs. Guns had gone down, too, after all Edhem's caution, and presently a battery crawled up by the cavalry, and opened. Then came puffs of Greek smoke to the right, then more to the left, till four of their batteries were in action. Clouds of rapid dust revealed skirmishing cavalry; clouds of slower dust, supporting infantry. There was a pretty exchange of shells, but I don't think many people were hurt. It was only a reconnaissance, and it showed that the Greeks meant to defend the line of the Xerias.

Next day came the invasion of Thessaly. Down, down they wound, along the zigzags of Meluna—horse and foot and guns in a stream that looked as if it would last for ever and choke up the whole plain. The top of the Col, where there is a little lawn between the blockhouses, was the starting-point. The lawn was blocked with battalions of infantry. Some had piled arms, propping up four, one against the other, as if they were going to roast meat under them. Others nursed their rifles lovingly. Some stood, others squatted on the grass; the lawn and the lower slopes were dark blue and red with them. In the interstices of these stood the artillery horses—six in a team, grey and bay and chestnut, with the peculiar look of patience in their eyes and the set of their heads that only a horse can really assume. They were waiting for their guns, and their guns blocked the whole road on the horrible, as yet but half-mended, Turkish ascent of the pass; ropes trailed out before them, waiting for infantry to pull them up. No six horses and no twelve could ever have got them up those hopeless, rolling, scrunching scree.

Down, down, the army of Turkey began to wind—sometimes slowly, sometimes bent-backed at the double, according as the distances between battalions opened or closed. If you are to get fifteen or twenty thousand men down a pass in a morning, you cannot afford to waste a single yard of ground. Even the dozen pack-horses which carry the frugal baggage of each battalion—the rest of the regulation 200 were probably fetching ammunition, of which a prodigious amount had been blazed away—seemed almost space wasted. On one spiral or another the head of the gigantic column appeared, winding, winding endlessly. Then the head was lost, and nothing left but the tailless body. Presently the head crawled out again at the very bottom. A dark mass began to form, to enlarge, till it spread all over the rich, moist-looking green below. Still the black descending line was unbroken, only now it was dappled grey chargers going down, and then guns were harnessed and began to follow them. A gun is a meek-looking creature enough when it is limbered up, and the descending batteries looked curiously graceful by the side of the unlimbered, short, peppery little devils protecting their position from above. Gun after gun, battery after battery—then more cavalry, then more infantry—men and men, horses and horses, guns and guns—a world of living energy and mechanical force poured itself slowly, but very remorselessly, down into Greece.

The black lines shown up by the very, very faint red thread of the fezzes began to divide and crawl over the plain. Columns began to work away to left and right. Slowly, slowly—how agonisingly slowly—they crept over the plain towards the line where we knew that there were Greeks. Would they be fired on now—or in five minutes—or in ten—or in half an hour? Then the perpendicular lines shifted slowly into horizontal lines; they were forming up into skirmishers and supports and all the order of battle. On, on, on—were the Greeks blind? No; a puff of smoke and a puff of dust, what seemed half an hour after—but well ahead of the dimmest dots. And after that, nothing. Only the lines of little black dots moved on, and on, and on. So slow, so steady, so relentless. At last they stayed, and there was a system of black Turkish dots stretched fanwise over the Grecian plain. Black, and waiting grimly, inexorably. The head of the force from Ellassona was presumably on a level with Neshat and Hairi on the right. It was all ready now. Would it be for to-morrow?

THE BATTLE OF MATI.

It was not for to-morrow. On the morning of the morrow—Thursday, April 22nd—occurred a mysterious manœuvre, which so far as I know remains yet unexplained. At eight in the morning began the usual artillery duel with the usual futility. This was the third day of desultory shooting, and both sides profess not to have lost a single man by it. Almost the whole force of the Turkish infantry was massed on the plain, working along to the left. They occupied the village of Karatsali, which was found empty. At the same time there appeared to be a forward movement on the right also, and the cavalry was screening everything in front. Then, as I sat on a low hill on the Turkish right some way into the plain, I saw the columns marching back from Karatsali. There was with me a well-known German military writer, Major Falkner von Sollenburg, and I asked him if he knew what it meant. He thought they had got mixed somehow, as there was hardly space to move all the troops. But still they came back. And when they began to pile arms about Ligaria whence they started, Major von Sollenburg grimly remarked that he did not know what it meant.

When we saw the leftward movement we naturally concluded that the intention was to join hands with Hamdi Pasha, advancing from Karya, and envelop the Greek right, which rested on the villages of Deliler and Mussalar. Hamdi had had very hard—at any rate very lengthy—fighting since we left him on the afternoon before Meluna. He was said to have lost heavily, but in the absence of any statistics at the Turkish headquarters it is impossible to say how much. However he had now at last cleared his front and was advancing upon the right of the Greeks. Major von Sollenburg told me—though he can only have had it from Turkish sources: there was no European with Hamdi—that on this Thursday morning the left of the Ellassona force was actually in touch with the division from Karya. If this is true, the loss of the day is even more wonderful than ever.

However, the strategy of both sides was now apparent. The Greeks had made their main attack on the Meluna, but their flank attacks on Hamdi at Karya and Hairi at Damasi had also been strong. It is probable that the incursions at Karya had been intended to draw a large part of Edhem's force thither to the left wing, and leave him weak in front at Meluna. That failed. But both this attack and that on our right wing by the Reveni Pass was so far successful that they delayed Edhem's advance four days. The Marshal seems not to have entertained at this stage the plan mentioned above, and originally outlined by General von der Goltz. This plan, it will be remembered, was to attack Larissa in rear from beyond the Salamvria and thus cut the Greek retreat: if that had been done, Hairi's division would have been the force to do it. Whether this general was really held in check by the Greeks for five days I cannot tell. He struck me from all I heard and saw of his conduct in the field as a sluggish and incapable commander. I met him at the very end of the war, and he produced a pocket-book, whence he triumphantly stated that he had only lost ten men killed and thirty-six wounded during the whole week. This is very likely true; as by his subsequent action—or inaction—at both Pharsala and Domoko Hairi gave the impression that he thought it the function of a general to lose battles, if necessary, but on no account to lose men. But if Edhem had really meant to make his main attack on the Greek left flank, he could have gone to Damasi and exercised the same personal supervision over Hairi as he did over Memdhuk at Meluna. Moreover, he could have reinforced him by Hakki Pasha's division from Diskata; whereas he preferred in fact to bring Hakki round behind the right to the centre. The plan was now plain. The Greeks would be simultaneously attacked in the centre by three divisions and a brigade from Ellassona, on the right—our left—by Hamdi, and on their left by Hairi. Hairi was only ready by Thursday night, which perhaps explains why the manœuvre of Thursday morning was not finished, though it hardly explains why it was begun. As for the general scheme of this frontal attack, there may very likely have been good reasons for it which I did not know. But there was one great reason against it: it left the Greeks an open line of retreat—as we were soon to find out.

Another conceivable reason for Edhem's delay might be suggested in the continued Greek possession of Kritiri. Kritiri, at least, I believe to be its Greek name; the Turks called it Losphaki; in any case it is a very high mountain with a blockhouse on the top, and it commands

Tyrnavo.¹ The mountain is high and steep, and horribly stony. It was approachable only in front by a stony ravine, and was defended by tier on tier of escarpment and stone wall; to take it by assault was almost impossible. From this position—the last high one in their possession—the Greeks on Tuesday and again on Wednesday morning delivered a furious attack on the division of Neshat Pasha. The firing was the heaviest of the war so far. The Turks brought several guns into action, and shelled the enemy intermittently for a couple of hours or so. Some of the shrapnel burst two hundred yards in mid-air—little round white clouds they looked like, suddenly springing into sight out of nothing, and then expanding, thinning, and floating away into nothing again. But others burst dead on the ridge of the mountain, and may have done some damage. Anyhow, the artillery served its real purpose—less to kill than to flurry and frighten; a hot infantry fire also was poured in from the defence. The attack on the Turkish position was repulsed, and the firing weakened from banging volleys to crackles, and from crackles to rare pops, and then went out altogether. Neshat lost but a few men—among them was his second brigadier, Djelal Pasha. But the Greeks still held Kritiri; Kritiri, therefore, had to be outflanked. It is true that, as it was never assaulted and was never intended to be assaulted, Edhem might as well have outflanked it on Wednesday as on Friday. But probably he did not wish to advance his centre into the plain between the Greeks on the high ground about Nezeros and those on Kritiri. That would explain the delay in attacking until Thursday, Edhem wishing first to have Hamdi clear his left flank; but it would not explain the delay in attacking until Friday afternoon.

On Friday afternoon, April 23rd, however, was fought the so-called battle of Mati—the deciding action of the first stage of the war. Until we saw the English newspapers none of us with the Turks had ever heard the name of Mati, or knew that there had been a battle at all. Mati, it appears, is the name of a spring and chapel near the little hill on the Greek left centre. The battle consisted of the usual artillery practice and the capture of Deliler and Mussalar. The position was exactly what it had been all the week. The Turkish centre—consisting of Memdhuk's division, the reserve brigade, under Mehemet Pasha, which had been moved up to Elassona from Serfidje before the opening of the war, and Hakki Pasha's division in support—was crowded into the narrow end of the V-shaped plain below. The left centre rested on the village of Karatsali, secured by the hills above; the extreme left was Hamdi's division, which, however, we could not see from the Col. The right was Neshat and Hairi, but they took no part in this day's engagement. The Turkish front looked south-east. The Greek right faced our left in the village of Deliler—a long, straggling group of stone and mud cottages, nominally two villages, really one. A quarter of a mile to its right rear is the village of Mussalar, also occupied; about half a mile to the right rear again the junction of the Xerias and Salamvria. Thence their batteries stretched across the plain to the little round hill, and thence on again to Tyrnavo on their left. Above Tyrnavo they still held the formidable Kritiri. The Turks had of course the advantage of numbers—35,000 men, or 55,000 counting Neshat and Hairi; the whole Greek force, according to Reuter's correspondent, was thirteen battalions of 1000 infantry apiece, five squadrons and 36 guns. Their right wing, which was the only force seriously engaged, had 8000 infantry. On the other hand, the Turkish position on the left centre was too cramped to enable it to display its full strength; moreover, the Greeks, having been allowed for days to entrench themselves, had the odds of position. Between the armies the fields of barley were already waist high and in ear, but in the dry fallows every shell and bullet, hoof or foot, kicked up clouds of dust. There was good cover, however, in the grateful patches of thick wood. All that you saw from the Col of Meluna. No troops could cross the brown without showing dust storms on it; none could cross the green without showing black lines for infantry, black and brown and white lines for cavalry, black blots with smaller black satellites grouped round them for guns. Except in the woods you could see every move on a chessboard a hundred square miles in size, with 70,000 men for pieces, and the fate of two nations for the stake.

It was the finest place to see a battle one could imagine. Only—there was no battle to see.

It began with the artillery, and with the artillery, as it turned out, it practically ended. It began in the centre with a smart cannonade from either side. Both shot wild at first: the Turkish shrapnel burst in little white balloons the height of Nelson's column above the Greek batteries; the salvoes from the Greek batteries raised six separate whirls of earthy cloud, now in the plough before the Turks, now in the plough behind them, but on them never. But presently the Turks began to drop shells right round the little black swarming ant-hills that stood for Greek guns; the Greeks went on banging away, now short, now over, impartially, the whole afternoon.

Meanwhile—it was now about one o'clock—the main attack was developing two miles to the left. Here the Turkish artillery seemed to be putting in splendid work. A vast ploughed field, perhaps a mile across, lies before the village of Deliler. At its right hand top corner is a big square, many-windowed, grey-brown house on a little knoll; it may be a convent, it may be a private house, but it looks like a furniture repository. To the right the knoll slopes down among trees to a little minaret; this point was the fulcrum of the defence. Ali Riza Pasha, enjoying himself thoroughly, as always when his darling guns were in action, moved three batteries nearly up to the edge of the ploughed field, well under the fire of the Greek skirmishers, and plugged round after round plump on to the knoll. It may not have cost the Greeks much blood, but artillery aims mainly at the nerves. By now a battalion of infantry was stealing round on the right of the knoll—the Greek left. Covered by trees the black dots strolled leisurely forward. From above they did not seem to move; they looked like pieces on a board worked automatically by some great player behind. They established themselves under cover of an open wood on our right of the minaret, and the curling blue smoke showed they were making good use of the position. The Greeks knew it too; they were firing hard at Riza's three batteries from their right of Mati hill, but the range was too great to touch him. They advanced a battery on their right and tried from there. They shot miserably as ever, and Riza took no notice. They advanced half the battery nearer still; Riza still took no notice.

And now was come the moment for the main attack in front of the house and knoll and minaret—two battalions of infantry across the great fallow. Little dots of skirmishers, little clumps of main body, black lumps of supports began to dapple the brown. Slowly, slowly they moved—but they moved. The field began to be full of them. It began to be so full that the men seemed to be standing still and the field to be drawn slowly back through them, like the great brown roll of a musical box through the black teeth. The Greeks kept up their fire briskly, yet there were but few Turkish dots left to be drawn back with the brown field. Now the foremost assailants were nearly at the green margin beyond; now they were on the very edge; now they were over and scampering up the slope. The fight was over, too. Some little black dots and streaks, some wisps of blue smoke, some puffs of bursting shell—that was the battle of Mati, the fight that won Larissa.

The Greek position was now broken up—by three battalions and three batteries, with the loss of ten men killed and thirty-eight wounded. About four o'clock the artillery opened on their left, under Kritiri, and a feint was made of an infantry advance. But meanwhile their right was turned. Our left advanced; it occupied Mussalar, and reached the junction of the rivers. The cavalry began to rush round their rear. At dusk the Greek army began to realise what was happening—and it was all over.

For next morning, when I came up to the top of the Pass, the Greeks were gone. Gone from the line of entrenched batteries, gone from the little round hill, gone from Tyrnavo, gone from impregnable Kritiri—clean gone and not to be found anywhere. The plain was wrapped in blue smoke from burning Deliler and Mussalar, and behind the smoke had vanished the Greek army.

XVIII.

THE OCCUPATION OF LARISSA.

THE Marshal sat in his captured tent on the lowest spur of the frontier mountains. Below gushed a spring of living water out of the rock ; soldiers filled their cans from it and drank greedily ; just below, where the spring widened to a pool, horses splashed knee-deep and drank greedily also. Beside the pool was a huge tree, such a tree as is not found on the bare Turkish side. Under its grateful shade, kicked at by horses and bitten at by unnumbered flies, sat the correspondent of the 'Daily Mail' writing—need you ask?—a telegram.

To him entered an aide-de-camp of his Majesty the Sultan, radiant in blue and scarlet and gold. His Excellency informs you that Larissa is taken. Larissa taken ! Why, it was for to-morrow that we still expected that long promised, long delayed great battle along the Salamvria before Larissa.

Larissa taken! When and how and by whom, and above all why? Only half an hour before the Marshal had said "C'est fini," but this was finishing with a vengeance. Larissa taken early this morning, almost without a shot fired! Well, let us at least go and see.

I started off to ride straight across country, intending to swim the rivers, but at all costs to get into Larissa with all speed. There proved to be no water in the first river, and over the second the Greeks in their panic had not even broken the bridge, though they had left a case of dynamite on the further side of it. I saw it two mornings after still there; the Turks, with their magnificent carelessness, had never thought of clearing it away, and there it may be still.

The plan of going across country did not succeed. I fell in with some Turks, and joined myself with them, and as the Turk has no great love for going across country, and hardly ever knows his way anywhere, we decided to take the main road from Tyrnavo. So to Tyrnavo we rode, under Kritiri, the inaccessible. Tyrnavo was empty and quite silent. A few fowls in the courtyards, a few dogs in the streets. But all the houses empty, doors and windows wide open, broken tables blocking the gates, pillows, shirts, and petticoats littering the streets—the village was as cold and dead as if the last day were come. Having decided to retreat, the Greeks had not done things by halves.

Clattering over the long wooden bridge across the broad, dry, stony bed of the Xerias, I came out on to the main road to Larissa. Two inches thick with white dust, it was yet the broadest and best-metalled road I have seen in this part of the world. On the right was a vast cavalry barrack. "That was built by us," said a Turkish officer. Never could there be seen more hopeless, handless, headless confusion. Saddles and harness were strewn in heaps; regimental papers flew before the wind in clouds. There was a knapsack, here a cap, there an artillery ammunition-waggon hanging over the ditch, with the wheels broken and the traces cut; there—shame!—a little pile of cartridges. A soldier may throw away much, and there is still hope for him; once he begins to throw away cartridges, there is none. And there by the roadside were a couple of dead Greeks—their swollen heads black with flies: they had been killed by their comrades in the stampede.

Over the scattered, smashed, dishevelled, disgraceful relics of Greece marched the conquering Turk. Already a huge army was pouring in from every opening into the plain—horse and foot and the perpetual patient baggage-trains. The Turkish transport might be rough, but it was very ready. But the conquering Turk displayed no exultation. Here, between the rich corn-fields of the plain of Thessaly, he marched as always — strongly, sloppily, composedly: what news to such as he that the Greeks were afraid of him, and that he was going in to take their city? The Turk had been there before, and no Greek ever drove him out of it. "We built that," said my little lieutenant.

And it was still so when the faint blotch on the skyline hardened into the lattice-work of white houses and dark green cypress-trees that I had often seen from the mountains as Larissa. As the dominant impression of the town was the sweet smell of laburnums in the public places, of roses and sweet peas in the gardens, so the impression of the occupation of the town was fragrant and kindly. The entry of the Turkish troops into Larissa was the sweetest and most lovable thing I had seen during this week of war. I am afraid that Canon McColl will not believe me, but I am speaking the truth. That the Turkish army entering a town taken from the enemy should be a pleasant sight, should be almost a kind of Sunday-school treat, will be surprising information to many Englishmen. But I have eyes in my head, and I saw it.

The little lieutenant I had ridden in with had two uncles in the town—the most substantial Mussulman citizens of the place; the elder was one of the deputies for Larissa in the Assembly at Athens. To his house we rode. Hassan Avni Bey had been there before—he had property in Thessaly himself—and from the moment the town had come in sight his face had been relaxed into an irrepressible boyish smile. As we turned a corner and reached his uncle's gate he jumped down from his horse and rushed inside. Some of his uncle's grooms were in the flowery garden; they shook his hand and laughed aloud with joy. We went into the house; the steward caught him in his arms and kissed him. His uncle came rushing into the hall and hugged him and kissed him till the little lieutenant's body was like a pricked balloon; then his uncle took to kissing me. He took us into his room and sat us down. And then came a babble of inquiry, of congratulation, of irresponsible, half-childish happiness. Out of it all I tried to extract the story of the flight and of the capture. But my host knew little enough. He had not left the house for twelve days—he had not dared. The Mussulmans of Larissa had been assaulted in the street; their fezzes had been torn off and themselves half-killed. He put it all down, good man, to the Ethnika Etairia. He did not think his Greek fellow-townsmen would have done him any harm—and they would have been devils indeed if they did, since half-a-dozen of them, who could not get away, were taking refuge in his back-kitchen at that very moment. Presently there was brought in a sick Greek officer, who had been deserted by his comrades and by the Greek doctors. Hassan Bey took him in on parole, and the best his estate could provide was not too good for the Greek prisoner.

He told me that the Greeks had fled in panic from Tyrnavo on Friday night; I had seen the signs of that for myself. The Crown Prince had come in on Friday evening, and was off again for Pharsala by two in the morning. Troops had come bolting and screaming into Larissa all night; in the morning they too were off for Pharsala. All Saturday the population fled wildly southwards. The Greek authorities had let the two hundred convicts out of jail and armed them; and they had been smashing and stealing and shooting all Saturday night. On Sunday morning came the Turks. That was all he knew. The Turks had come, and that was all he wanted to know.

The rest I heard from Seyfoullah. At eleven on Saturday night a squadron of Turkish cavalry stole up to the entrenchments and found them empty. But they lit on four Greeks, and from these prisoners learned the truth. The town was garrisoned by pickpockets and wife-beaters; the Greek army had vanished. At day-break Seyfoullah and Grumbkow advanced with two squadrons of cavalry and a horse battery. The pickpockets opened fire, but a shell or two sickened them. One squadron dismounted and stood to their carbines; the other defiled over a little wooden accommodation bridge into the town. The big stone and iron bridge over the Salamvria—here fast and deep, and as broad as the Thames at Oxford—the pickpockets were going to dynamite. But four horsemen dashed across—and it was over. The Greeks had taken all the engines and rolling-stock of the railway to Volo; short of that they had deserted everything. Town and fortifications, guns and ammunition, clothing and provisions, and fodder—the Greeks had taken to their heels and left it all. They had lost everything—including honour. They had not been beaten; they had scuttled for their lives after two days of desultory shell-fire that, on their own showing, had killed nobody. It was not the retreat that damned them; for that the Crown Prince has been most unjustly blamed, since with the position at Mati turned there was no natural line of defence left north of Pharsala. What whelmed Prince and people in equal damnation was the shameful manner of their flight—a flight in which officers ran bellying with terror and left their men behind, a flight headed by the Commander-in-Chief, the King's son. He will make a fit king for Greece. A brave race may swagger; an unwarlike one may placidly confess to cowardice. But for a race of swaggerers and cowards at the same time it is difficult to see a place in the future of Europe.

But never mind the Greeks. We went out into the streets again to see the troops marching in. The veiled Mussulman women had come out, now that the soldiers were abroad in the town; they were walking up and down under their parasols. Children—Turk and Jew and Greek alike—were playing in the streets. Dogs were basking in the sun. Hens were pecking with a hen's presumption up and down the main thoroughfares with no fear of the looter before their eyes. The shops were mostly close-shuttered. Up and down with wondering eyes—they had hardly seen Salonica coming through, and to many Larissa was the first town of their lives—strolled half-barbarous Anatolians. And with it all no outrage. I will not say that there was no single case of disorder; a few men were arrested for looting. They were condemned to be shot, but I am happy to say they were let off next morning with a thrashing. But I patrolled the city for hours, and I do say that the order, the discipline, and the good-humour of the Turks could have been exceeded by no nation in the world; more, I do not believe that any nation could have equalled it. In no other country I ever heard of are soldiers so well disciplined, so simply, unquestioningly, even childishly obedient to their officers. The officers had forbidden pillage and violence, and the soldiers obeyed. I have seen more rioting at a supper bar in the National Liberal Club than I saw on the first day of the occupation of Larissa.

Why? Partly, no doubt, it was due to the admirable arrangements made by the officers. I saw Hakki Pasha, who had entered the town with his Division—a Turk of the old type, short, stout, grey-bearded, grave, yet with a jolly twinkle somewhere under the surface of his eyes. When I congratulated him he was almost embarrassed, and said it was an accident. So, in truth, it was. But the discipline he established was not an accident, and any general in the world might be proud of it to his death. Sentinels stood at every corner, mounted patrols paced down every street. The bank and all the other principal buildings had sentries of their own, and it was pleasant to see how hard Albanians scorned the Greek sentry-boxes and sat down contentedly on the stones. There was only one possible objection to the arrangements made—they were not necessary.

Partly, too, the good order may have been due to the fact that the Turks entered Larissa in cold blood ; also that the Greek population had for the most part bolted, and that the Greek criminals released from jail had skimmed the cream of the loot. But to the Turk, you must remember, it is almost less irritating to have to fight for a place than to be cheated of his battle and come in without firing a shot. Yet, when all is said and done, the great fact remains that Larissa was only half a hostile city. The thousands of Jews remained — these dauntless soldiers of current coin—the Jews remained, and did good business in Greek notes, taken from the dead, at 30 per cent of their face value. Many Greeks remained also, and each hour of the occupation brought more into the streets.

But Larissa was not a hostile town. The Turk was returning to his own. On the dusty road in

I passed many families on horseback, in carts, on foot, hastening home again now that the day of persecution was over. I met more than one Turkish soldier who had been born in Larissa and lived there all his life. The persecutions of their Greek neighbours had driven such to Salonica; thence to volunteer for the front was an easy step. Now they were coming home to their homes and their children. As the troops marched in, the Mussulman population came trooping into the streets to salute their deliverers. For a fortnight many had not left their houses because of the Ethnike Etairia; the night before they had been promiscuously fired at, after the evacuation, by Greek irregulars: I kicked up dozens of regulation Gras cartridge-cases in the street. They streamed out to meet their brothers and their sons, to welcome the exiles and the volunteers to their birthplace. They laughed and cried and hugged each other in the street. The stranger did not escape: even I, because I came with the army and wore a fez, was laughed at and kissed and saluted till my arm was stiff with salaaming, and my stomach sugared with cups of coffee. The Greeks were quite forgotten, and all Larissa shone with one expansive, grave, courteous, friendly, very happy, Turkish smile. The Turk was come to his own again.

But always no outrages—let us end with that. If you have never ridden into a conquered city, where the conquered are in terror of you, where all their stuff lies masterless before you, when you have many short, cold, hard nights and many long, dry, sweat-and-dusty, not quite undangerous days to avenge—if you have never felt it you do not know what temptation is. It is the richest moment of your life. But it is full of temptation. It was not my conquered city, and it was not my enemy, but if it had been I know quite well I should have behaved a hundred times less considerately than the Turks.

XIX.

CAPUA.

IN Larissa I set up housekeeping with the same two companions as at Ellassona: no man could have asked for better. Hassan Bey gave us dinner that Sunday night, for our men and beasts and goods were all scattered over the thirty miles of up and down between us and Ellassona. After dinner—I have described a Turkish gentleman's dinner already; the order of the dishes is confusing, but the dishes themselves are beyond the dreams of gluttony—his steward took us to sleep in a house over the way. I don't know whose house it was, and we never paid a piastre of rent for it; but Hassan Bey had been civil governor for nearly twelve hours, and it was doubtless quite regular. We went up half-a-dozen steps into a bare-boarded hall with bare rooms opening on either side; the house seemed empty. Then into an inner room and—could it be? In the name of the Prophet, beds! Clean deal trestles and planks, clean mattresses, clean sheets and pillows! We slept that night.

Housekeeping in Larissa was a perplexing business the first day or two for men who tried to be honest. Nothing belonged to anybody. Our baggage arrived the next morning. All we knew about the rights of property at present was that the house we were in seemed to be ours, and that our horses and provisions and clothes certainly were, so we crammed the latter into the former. For two days that house was a combination of a casual ward, a left-luggage office, and a circus. You could not walk from one room to another without tumbling over rifles and bayonets—for rifles and bayonets had slumped heavily with the capture of Larissa, and now ran 3s. 4d. and 10d. respectively—bits, bags, saddles, dirty shirts, and cooking-pans. In the little courtyard—about the size of an average suburban drawing-room—stood thirteen horses; the less trustworthy tethered to trees and the railings of the steps, the more pious left to stand by themselves. We had found a derelict puppy in Ellassona, and it had been carefully brought on in a nose-bag to the new base; within two days it had attracted four other dogs worse than itself; they refused to be cast out, and as the parents and guardians of the poor little devils were quaking at Volo or Pharsala or Athens, we had to give them food and shelter.

Most embarrassing of all, Charlie had come in not a quarter of an hour after his arrival in Larissa with a more than usually complacent grin on his face and under his arm a peacock. I began to explain to him the wickedness of looting, but he cut me short. "I bin find 'im," he said with indignation, "and I bin fetch 'im to Mushir Pasha." I gathered he had wished to present him to his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief as a small testimonial of esteem. "But Mushir Pasha he say, 'What I bin do with 'im? You fetch 'im for yourself.'" And then almost timidly, "You want 'im, M'S'eevens?" It was a stringent rule in our household (a) that no looting was allowed; (b) that if any looting did accidentally take place, the master of the looter had the first call on the loot. I said I didn't want him. I have a rough general notion how to provide for hens, geese, ducks, or turkeys, but I am quite ignorant of the very elements of peacock-culture. However, the other men thought it would make for the decoration of the house, so Charlie was allowed to put it down and leave it. Thereon, with an expression of wounded dignity I have never seen equalled, it got under my bed and refused to be addressed.

It sat there four hours with an occasional grunt of indignation, till at last it condescended to be persuaded to go out into the yard. And there it stayed five days, very angry with the horses, who regarded it with unaffected terror, and all shied, as at the word of command, whenever the peacock wagged its tail. At the end of that time we went forth to war again, and when we returned I was thankful to find that somebody had re-looted it.

As for the men, the first day of their arrival the nine of them slept in the hall, which was carpeted with snoring bodies. After that the dragomans put down our beds on the floor of one room, the cavasses slept on the provision-boxes in the hall—always one across the door of our room. And when Hassan Bey gave us a deserted stable the grooms slept, after their manner, under the horses' bellies. Looking back, I am not quite sure I was a good master to Georghi, my groom; about Charlie and Aslan my conscience is quite clear. Georghi was a most deserving and hard-working man; being a Greek, he had to do all the little jobs of hewing wood and drawing water which no self-respecting Turk could put his hand to. In theory he got a few extra pence daily for this service, deducted from the wages of his fellows; in practice it was commuted for a handsome backsheesh at the end of the campaign. I do not think that Georghi took his clothes off once during the two months he was in my employ ; certainly he never slept in, or even on, a bed. For him the only variation on the stable was the grass and the sky, which I should have preferred, but he did not. On one occasion also, I am ashamed to say, I hit him for kicking a horse ; after all, the horses were always kicking him. Yet he was always cheerful, always very careful of his beasts, and latterly turned out a very handy needlewoman. I console my conscience with the reflection that at the end of the campaign he was much richer and not appreciably dirtier than before.

Larissa was our base during the remainder of the campaign. A day or two after the occupation they brought over the little Salonica-Jewish operator who could read French capitals ; and where the correspondent's telegraph operator is, there must his base be. After the taking of Volo it was possible to telegraph thence also, but Larissa was still nearer the scene of the main action. So that if any of us sent in one of his men from time to time with a telegram, the messenger used to bring back his saddle-bags stuffed with wine, sardines, corned-beef, tea, and especially bread. You never know how useful humble bread is—even black bread—until you are called on to go without it. And it was curious that all the things a man rightly despises in England—tea and jam, for example—became the richest delights of life in Greece. Even champagne—by restricting its use to the night of a victory, we just made it last out the war—champagne, most despicable and pernicious drink in our hours of ease, was bubbling exhilaration after a sixteen hours' day on that dusty, dusty plain of Thessaly. As for more solid food, the staple was still "Fleisch mit Bohnen, frische Bohnen, meine Herrn," as Andreas would alluringly remark from day to day: that is to say, leather mutton and a wooden kind of broad-bean; but the time came when we should have been glad enough to get it. Our stuff in tins was beginning to run out by now, though tinned oysters never failed; still even tinned oysters pall in time. But taking it altogether, I recall with pride that our mess all through the campaign was the envy of the Europeans and the hardly disguised objective of any Turk who wanted a good dinner; it was the best table in Larissa after the Marshal's. And if anybody thinks us sybarites, let him who was not welcome to his share, and uncommonly glad to get it, throw the first stone at us.

I stayed in Capua from Sunday April 25th until the small hours of April 30th—and what about the war all this time? Again, I am afraid, we enter on a period during which I know little of the war—except that there was no war to know about. Information as to its progress came mainly from Kennan Bey, who turned up at our house, with loud cries of Mashallah (Thank God) and A la bonne heure, the second morning at nine o'clock, and stayed to lunch. The more I look back on the Turco-Grecian war the fainter become the lines of men and the crash of guns, and the clearer Kennan's round and ruddy face and his jovial voice. But as a source of information Kennan was not, on the whole, trustworthy. It was aptly remarked at the time that he would have made a magnificent journalist. You remember about the gros gaillard, that inimitable touch? Kennan had a firm grasp on the principle that picturesqueness of description is attained by the use of particular rather than general terms. He was just as good on the morning of the Greek flight. "Mais, mon cher ami," he began in a hushed voice, as if he hardly liked to say it, "ils sont lâches, ces Grecs—lâches, mon ami." Then, his pictorial enthusiasm rising,—"des fusils, des cartouches, des canons, du maïs, du cognac—ils semblant vivre de cognac, ces Grecs—les bas de leurs femmes—ils ont tout laissé." "Their wives' stockings": what could be better put? There was also a good deal of the melodramatic about him. The first time he dined with us he said he was an Albanian, and then in a hushed whisper : "We Albanians carry two weapons : this," tapping his regulation Smith - Wesson, "for our enemies, and this"—he hauled out a deringer from under his trousers and his voice rang—"for our friends." One day in Meluna he planted himself within easy ear-shot of us as an Albanian battalion went by, and began an audible soliloquy about his countrymen : "Aslan, aslan—les lions, les lions," he almost sobbed. He was at the top of his histrionic form one day when I offered him a drink of wine in the presence of half-a-dozen officers, all of whom had taken it gladly. He waved his hand with a gesture of renunciation. "Non, non, mon ami," he said with the manner of a St Antony ; "c'est défendu par notre religion." And then his jollity got the better of him ; "Moi, je bois secrètement," he roared in a voice of thunder. Only once did I ever know him weaken. He was accustomed to represent that he was always on most important missions, riding all night with two hours' sleep in the twenty-four. One morning, when he was playing his very best, I was so indiscreet as to ask him where he had been. "Elassona peut-être ?" I suggested—sixty miles there and back. "Oui, oui," he responded wearily, "Elassona—peut-être." "Peut-être" was not worthy of Kennan Bey.

A cautious correspondent was not likely to telegraph home too much of Kennan's information, and though he and others announced the fall of Volo daily, I waited for official information. The general scheme of operations was a slow, a very slow, parallel advance by the Turkish troops all along the line. The truth was that everybody was taking it easy, partly to enable provisions and ammunition to come up to Larissa, and partly because it is the Turkish tradition to take things easy in the hour of victory. However, Hairi Pasha on the extreme right had occupied Zarkos without opposition apparently on the 27th, and Trikkala apparently after an insignificant skirmish on the 28th. In the centre Memdhuk and Neshat's divisions were strolling towards Pharsala. On the left Hakki's division was supporting the cavalry under Suleyman Pasha, which seemed to be alternately taking Volo and being repulsed at Velestino, eight miles on the hither side of it. Hamdi was at Larissa, Haidar at the Meluna; Hassan of Katerina seemed to have strayed into the sea and been swallowed up. The only thing certain was that the advance was being made very slowly, but that in a day or two the heads of our columns must run up against the Greeks. The difficulty was to know whether it would be at Velestino or at Pharsala. It looked fairly plain, however, that the main attack would be made at Pharsala, which was known to be the Crown Prince's headquarters, and on which three divisions were converging. Now when that attack was made Edhem would be there, and Edhem was sitting in the Crown Prince's deserted quarters at Larissa without any immediate sign of getting up. Reasoning thus, I started out at dawn on April 30th for Velestino.

XX.

DEFEAT AND WATER.

IN the first battle of Velestino we were beaten by the Greeks. It might be called a repulse or a postponed attack, if you like: one correspondent, with the censorship in his eye, had the happy inspiration of calling it a concentration in rear. The phrase was polite and perfectly correct, but beaten is the plain English of it. Frankly, it was a defeat—the only one of the war. The action was not ordered by Edhem Pasha; had he been present he would unquestionably have forbidden it. The Greeks under Colonel Smolenski numbered, according to correspondents with him, 12,000 men, with four batteries, in an exceedingly strong defensive position. The Turkish force engaged consisted of one brigade of Hakki's division under Naim Pasha, and the Cavalry division under Suleyman Pasha—roughly, 6000 men with four batteries.

To attempt to take such a position with half the defending force was plain madness. The only possible excuse for it was that the Greeks, after their flight from Larissa, were supposed to be so demoralised that the mere sight of a Turkish soldier was expected to start them on the run again. But at Velestino the Greeks were commanded by their best leader. Smolenski's task was a very easy one, but he showed it to be possible that, given a capable command, the Greeks might make soldiers yet.

It was unquestionably foolhardy to tackle Velestino with so inadequate a force. Yet it might be said for Naim and Suleyman—or, more accurately perhaps, for Colonel Mahmud Bey, a son of Ghazi Mukhtar, who was the real inspirer of the attack—that to tackle Velestino somehow or another was emphatically the right thing to do. It was the most vital strategic point at that time in Greek hands. They were now defending the line of the Volo-Pharsala railway; their main force was at Pharsala on their left wing; Velestino was the centre, and Volo the right wing. Velestino was the junction of the Volo-Larissa and Volo-Pharsala-Trikkala railways. If Velestino were taken the Greek line would be cut in half; Smolenski then must either retire to Volo into a corner or fall back southward to Halmyro, leaving Volo isolated, and the Crown Prince at Pharsala with his right flank uncovered.

Thus, no doubt, reasoned Mahmud. But Edhem's strategy remained the sounder. The enemy's connecting line, it must be remembered, was the railway, and his base was, as always, the sea. From these facts two deductions followed. First, it was manifestly perilous to attack one point singly, for at whatever point was attacked the Greeks could concentrate a superior force by means of the railway, and the attacking force ran a danger of being destroyed. The right course was to attack Pharsala and Velestino simultaneously, so that neither position could call up aid from the other. This was what Edhem subsequently did with success; but on April 30th, as Mahmud should have known, there were no Turkish troops near enough to Pharsala to make themselves felt. Secondly, the Greek base being the sea, there was no point in breaking the centre. If it fell back on Halmyro the left would simultaneously fall back on Domoko—as it happened a much stronger position—and would continue to draw its supplies, through Stylida and Lamia, from the sea. If Smolenski went to Volo he could transport his army by sea to Stylida, and fall into line as the right wing of the force at Domoko. The only justification of Mahmud's plan would be the probability of a much more rapid and energetic pursuit than, knowing his countrymen, he had a right to count on. Edhem's plan was to make a feint on Veles-tino, while attacking the Greek left at Pharsala, and endeavouring to envelop and destroy it. This last he failed to do, but that was the fault, not of the plan, but of its execution. Europeans would naturally sympathise with Mahmud's wish to be at the enemy and keep him on the run; for all that, the first battle of Veles-tino, though a pretty fight, was an inexcusable blunder.

It is some forty miles from Larissa to Veles-tino, and by the time we got to the Turkish headquarters, at about 10 o'clock, the action was in full swing. The position was rather like an inverted Meluna. There was the same V-shaped plain running up to the base of the heights—only this time the Greeks had the heights, and the Turks were in the plain. In the centre, as at Meluna, the heights sank to a long Col; to right and left swept forward bare and precipitous grey mountains. Those on the right were spurs of the Kara Dagħ — a triangular mass of mountains which projects into the plain of Thessaly, with the valley of the Pharsala-Velestino railway as its base; on our left front was Pilaf Tepe, a spur of Pelion, and on our left flank the steel-blue sheet of Lake Karla. We could just see Velestino—white minarets sparkling among green poplars—below the right-hand corner of the Col: more was hidden by a thick wood straight in front of our centre; it looked a few hundred yards deep, but it was really a matter of miles. The railway junction was masked by this wood; the Pharsala branch swept round southward over the Col, the Volo branch disappeared behind Pilaf Tepe.

From the hills, when I rode up, sounded the usual spluttering fire. I passed through the little village of Rizomylo, where stood the ammunition-horses and a weak reserve of a battalion: in the shade, at the foot of the belfry-tower, sat three Greek prisoners. I was told I should find the Pasha in front of the village to the left. I did—and when I found him even I was tactician enough to stand aghast. The Turkish army had no centre! In the wood before us, they said, the Greeks had made earthworks. One company of our skirmishers was just inside the fringe of the trees: now and again the crack of a rifle floated back to us on the still air. A couple of hundred yards in front of the wood a couple of companies had thrown up a light shelter-trench ; on their right, in a corn-field, was a fourth company. Half a mile of plough and dried grass behind them, and there stood Naim and Suleyman, a battery unlimbered on their right, with its horses a quarter of a mile behind ; on their left, a little forward, the motionless line of a couple of squadrons of cavalry : the rest of the cavalry was on the right with Mahmud. Besides this, nothing !

Naim had stripped his centre bare to feed the wings, and all the fighting was on the hills. He was making the desperate effort to turn both flanks of the enemy with half the enemy's force. The heaviest fighting was on the left. We could see our men toiling up the grey flanks of Pilaf Tepe ; we could hear their irregular, intermittent, individual fusilade, and the volleys with which the Greeks answered them. The enemy had mountain-guns up there too. On the right—far, far away up the heights on the right—there were also guns on both sides, hammering slowly and methodically away at each other. There were Greek entrenchments here also on the lower slopes, and Greek infantry, too, up on the crest : every now and then a movement from the Turkish infantry on the skirts of the hills awoke a growling volley. But there seemed little doing.

Our men appear to struggle forward, but to get no forwarder. Plainly the enemy was holding them; it seemed a moment to send in the reserves. Only where were the reserves to send?

It was a day of foolhardy desperation. For about mid-day, feeling no doubt that unless some added pressure drove back the Greek left it was hopeless to lie firing all day in the cruel sun, Mahmud charged with cavalry against the Greek entrenchments on their left centre. I did not see it, for it was away on the right: there were trees between, and the ground dipped before rising to the Kara Dagħ. But Mahmud told me the story of it himself riding into Volo, and he seemed in no way ashamed of it. There was not space, he said, to deploy with some 300 troopers. He charged in column, up-hill, against earthworks filled with infantry and artillery. There were two earthworks, one a little in front of and above the other: he had directed his men at that. But the horses swerved from the ascent, and carried them against the second, so that they got the fire on flank and front. The horses began to drop: he bade the men dismount and charge on foot. But the fire was too hot: they got close up to the entrenchment, and he was exchanging revolver-shots with an officer in the earthwork, when a trooper beside him shot the Greek dead. But it was no use; the fire was too hot, and they went back again. It was as desperate a piece of heroism as Balaclava, and as wickedly useless. The cavalry were lucky to get off with the loss of thirty odd; but the killed and disabled horses were far more. And that is what comes of giving colonelcies to men of thirty, and allowing them to command brigades.

This battle of Velestino will be remembered chiefly for Mahmud's charge. But in my mind it will stick for ever as the battle of thirst. Never have I seen such thirst. Men, horses, asses, the heavens above and the earth beneath, all were parched and caked and burned and split with a raging thirst. Not a breath of air came over the hills, where the Greek smoke hung heavily. As the sun climbed up the hard blue sky to mid-day it became more than could be borne—even by the Turk, the sturdiest bearer of things unbearable in the whole world. The horses seemed dazed and stupid in the pitiless glare; the troopers lay down, each behind his horse, in the little patches of shadow, and went to sleep with their dry mouths open. In the little trenches they had thrown up the infantry had less even than the poor protection of a horse. As I rode along that line my eyes met eyes of wild, wondering distress, mixed with the beginnings of despair. Up on the hills there may have been a whiff of breeze now and again, but the rocks and loose stones were fiery furnaces by noon.

"Send water," cried the querulous bugles from the heated slopes all the afternoon. They sent water, as much as they could. The centre of our position was the village Rizomylo; from its little belfry I watched the fight when the sun began to sear that part of my head left defenceless by the fez. In the village was a well, and on its loose stone wall stood men dipping and hoisting like madmen: the amount of water they turned up in the hour might mean victory or defeat,—must needs mean many men's lives. Out of the buckets they tipped into skins—two slung over a pack-saddle. Then off went the dirty, tan-faced philanthropist, tugging at his horse's unbridled head, tramping all over the field, all up the hills, dealing out precious, precious water. Men tipped the cans till the sun heliographed on their shiny bottoms: they did not drink—they poured the water down; you could fancy you heard it hiss.

But then more sun, more heat, more maddening thirst! Water would not quench it. The dripping trail of the water-skins over the baked fields faded away as if the earth were made of blotting-paper. And opposite the very wells flamed redly a solitary house, which had caught fire in the attack. The heat of it was nothing to the skin, but the dry glare of it under the dry glaring sun was red-hot torment to the eye. It quite burnt up all the refreshment of the well.

About three o'clock, when the last drop of moisture had been squeezed out of men's bodies, the Greeks began to pour their men over the hills behind Velestino in swarms. Four trains had come in since the first shot; hour by hour we were more hopelessly outnumbered. Some in column, some in line, they swarmed blackly down the slopes; their fire swelled from a swift succession of cracks into the gr-r-r-r-r of an angry beast. The Turks held their position, though they answered the fire but sparsely, being short of ammunition—and there was none nearer than Larissa. The Greeks had plenty—another gift of the railway. The musketry on the left had almost crackled out now, but the Greek cannon boomed ominously faster. On the right the Greeks now swayed forward, now drew back; our men now swayed back, now dashed smartly forward. But on the whole they were shifting down and inwards, outflanked and driven back on the centre. If the Greeks had but come out of the wood in front they must have crumpled up the weak centre like paper and the brigade would have been lost.

So as the shadows began to stretch across the plain our general realised that he had some 6000 men spread over a front of six miles or so, and began to draw them in. The Greeks opened briskly with their guns, but they did not succeed in flurrying the operation. Slowly, reluctantly, but always with the calm bearing of conscious superiority, the Turks retreated to Gherli, seven miles in rear. The Greeks stuck to their heights and made no attempt to follow. Strategically they were victorious. We tried to take the village and the railway junction, and failed. But spiritually I never saw anything less like a beaten army than the Turks. Some of them insisted on singing, despite all their officers could do: it was just what they wanted, said they, that the Greeks should know where they were and come down to follow them. And there they were at half-past five next morning, marching out to their positions before the village, composed, alert, and trim, though not to the point of affectation: one man in three attired in part of the uniform of some Greek regiment, and all quite ready to go and look for the rest of the suit.

As dusk fell most of the correspondents present started to ride to Larissa with their despatches. But thirty-five miles at night and thirty-five miles back next morning after that parching day was too much to ask even of a Salonica pony; besides, if there were fighting next morning it would probably begin at sunrise. So my two messmates and I decided to make a night of it at Gherli. We rode off the field with our friend, Hussein Avni Bey, and it so happened that his family owned Gherli: he called out a gross old Greek with unearthly red rims round his eyes, and told him to put us in the best house and give us of Gherli's best. So we were left in the bare upper rooms of the best house in Gherli with two Albanian cavasses but no interpreter. Luckily, both Aslan and Hassan spoke Greek, so the only thing to do was to communicate with them. I gave a very fair imitation, as I flatter myself, of a cock, and thereafter tucked like a hen to indicate eggs. Enormous grins spread over the faces of the Albanians—they were the only people in the army besides ourselves who enjoyed playing the fool—and they disappeared. Then returning, "Too, ta-too, ta-tooo—no; tuck, tuck, tuck, tuck, tegg—yes." So we ordered tuck, tuck, tuck, tuck, tegg, and be quick about it, and banked up our belts and saddles and bridles on the divan, and began to smoke.

The eggs were just about due when Hassan appeared on the stairs—which ran straight into the rooms, of course, after the manner of a loft—and, with much gesticulation, uttered the word Mulazim. It means “lieutenant,” and for a moment we had the horrible suspicion that he meant a lieutenant had come and taken the eggs. But there was the clank of spurs and a sabre on the stairs; evidently a lieutenant was coming up. And then uprose the face—of Saad-ed-Din Bey, by all that’s wonderful! “Bon soir, mon cher,” he prattled, just as if we had never been parted. He was looking for quarters for Suleyman Pasha, whose aide-de-camp he now was. He had evidently not washed since we left him at Ellassona when first we saw the Marshal; he was yellow with dust, and had a bullet-hole through his sleeve; his face was heavy with sleep. And yet somehow he was not the old Saad-ed-Din. War had taken hold of the stupid, sponging, unmannerly cub, and made a man of him. He refused wine and tobacco, he refused food, he refused conversation. His General had sent him to find a house, and he went away to find it.

The eggs were satisfactory in quality, though disappointing in number. There was some white wine, made chiefly of resin, to cool the feverish blood of a Thessalian summer: nearly all Greek wine is thus resinated, and the only person I ever knew who could drink it is myself. The red-eyed Greek showed a disposition to visit us at bed-time, but we got the cavasses to clear him away. And then Aslan appeared at the top of the stairs, spread out his—or rather my—sheepskin at the top, pulled out his long-barrelled revolver with a mixture of a smile and a scowl, and went to sleep upon the stairs. He was a born brigand, Aslan, if ever I saw one, but as true as a bull-dog. And so we curled up in our coats and went to sleep on the crawling divan, and woke up in time for the fight at dawn.

But, of course, there was no fight. And we had started to ride back, when, at ten in the morning, we met reinforcements coming in. At their head Hakki Pasha—short, stout, grey, cut to what seems the regulation pattern of a Turkish General of Division. Then battalion after battalion till there was a brigade, with guns crawling smoothly and relentlessly through the dust. Then my eye lit on Yunus Effendi—his keen eye measuring the distance to the Greek hills, striding out elastically as though five-and-twenty miles of marching were a before-breakfast appetiser. Yunus appeared to belong to no special battalion or division that he knew of.

He attached himself to any corps that seemed likely to see fighting, and it was all one to him whether he had an independent command or fell into the line with his captured Gras rifle.

But Yunus saw no fighting that day. Reuter's Agency and I decided to put in another night at Gherli on the chance. Nothing happened. Reuter had the happy gift of laying in reserves of sleep during odd moments, and snored steadily with face under a handkerchief. And I spent the day looking out of window, with the tail of my eye on the guns: as long as they didn't harness them there could be nothing much doing. But the great joy of the window was that it commanded a view of three wells. I watched them, hour by hour, trying to wash yesterday out of my eyes. Every now and then I took a swallow of resin-and-water myself to make quite sure it was real. From the two smaller wells they were ladling out water in empty petroleum cases. The biggest was of the primitive lever kind. The cross-bar balances on a tree; the bucket hangs from one end of the cross-bar, and there is a weight on the other. When the weight is slacked off by the hand the bucket goes down and fills; when the weight is released the bucket bounds up. Round the well's mouth was a stone platform—dripping wet. The stones were all wet, and the ground round was wet with damp, cool, blessed mud. The soldier on the platform hauled up bucket by bucket, and sluiced it with a splash into the trough for the horses.

Swish, swish! Gulp, gulp, gulp! Ah-h-h!

IN A CONQUERED CITY.

THE action at Velestino was incidental music between the first act of the war and the second. It was no part of Edhem's scheme, and except in the way of reconnaissance had no influence on it. The Greeks generously put down our loss at 550, but it was certainly less. Even in the way of reviving the self-confidence of the Greeks it was wholly unimportant, as they retreated just as consistently, though perhaps not quite so unsteadily, after it as before. The second act of the war, which now began, was punctuated by an even longer wait than Edhem had yet indulged us with. Nevertheless this second half, the operations on the southern border of Thessaly, was a great deal more interesting than the first. It gave us two real battles—battles with some combination in them, such as there was not at Meluna, and battles with some fight in them, such as there was not at Mati.

We rode back to Larissa, finding that there was no present intention of doing anything at Velestino, on the morning of May 2nd. Aslan was left at Gherli with a horse on vedette duty; the moment they took out the guns he was to ride top speed into Larissa and let me know.

At headquarters they told you it was the necessary interval of calm between the first and second phases of the war. The troops had to be re-victualled over a hundred miles of road from their base. They had to be concentrated for attack on the Greek line along the railway in front of Mount Othrys. It was a strong position, and must be attacked with deliberation. Had they only had the fight in them on that last day of April, the strategical importance of a railway might have been illustrated by the utter destruction of a whole brigade. However, they did not attack, and now we were going to attack them.

Only when? To-morrow, of course; is not this the land of to-morrow? But on the impatient Western man to-morrow palls when he gets too many of it running. You would never believe that war could be dull,—but it can. More, dulness is the worst hardship of it. It was so here, at any rate. Food was not plentiful, but day by day you saw more little shopkeepers peeping out timidly over their counters through half-opened shutters, more hawkers on the pavement, dozing under carcasses of lambs, or over heaps of onions, lettuce, and peas. Sleep, too, was fairly abundant when once you had schooled yourself to disregard solemn prophecies of great things for to-morrow : you might go to bed in your pyjamas, get up after sunrise, even take a bath. Fatigue, the worst strain of this straddling campaign, disappeared when you rode only to keep your horses in condition. But the hardship of boredom remained.

You got sick of the sun beating mercilessly down on the emptiness of Larissa. You got sick of the sun, seriously angry with the flies, the fleas, moths, bugs, beetles, and mosquitoes. When you were on the move they were a joke ; when you were idle they magnified themselves into a plague. You got sick of the orderly soldiers tramping, round-eyed but contented, up and down the parched streets, till you could almost pray for a mutiny or a massacre. I suppose it was the revulsion from excitement that made all tame ; else why should not an Englishman be able to spend a placid week in one of the first cities of Greece—even a city without inhabitants ? No doubt the excitement of war may be exaggerated—especially in an Eastern campaign, where leisurely, all-day fights tend to degenerate into pleasure-parties. But you do not realise the full value of the excitement of battle till you get a spell of war without it.

Yet, after all, I think that what really bored, what really killed energy and intelligence—killed everything except time—was the dead emptiness of the place. Larissa was a dead city—a city with the skeleton of houses, without the flesh and blood of men and business. It was the curse of this campaign that it was not really war, but a political demonstration. It began as the servant of diplomacy, instead of its master, as war should be; so it went on. Everybody had his eye on the Concert of Europe and the terms of peace. And it was a move in the game that the Greek inhabitants of Larissa should bolt out of it as the Turks approached. It always looks well to be afraid of massacre. As a matter of fact, the move failed utterly: not only was nobody massacred, but hardly anybody was even robbed. Yet Larissa remained dead.

It was not dead now exactly for want of people. There were very many Mussulmans in Larissa, who all remained. Most of the Jews remained, and those who fled mostly came back within a couple of days. Even of the poorer Greeks many returned, not being able to afford the luxury of fictitious martyrdom. I rode out to the battle of Velestino in company with a young Greek, who was going to Volo to fetch home his mother; only as he could not ride head down through the battle he had to return disconsolate. Even on the second day of the occupation I found a typical Greek patriot. My guide—a Jew—unearthed him from a blank-looking house with a high wall and a locked gate. He unlocked the gate and leaned in the gateway to talk,—a young man with hair like a new clothes-brush, and a beard like an old tooth-brush, dressed in a shirt, trousers, and slippers, smiling a smile of mingled self-gratulation and nervousness. He had been to a village two hours to the south, but hearing that the Turks did nothing to anybody he had come back again. He swore he had not been a soldier, but from his age I inferred that he had; I drew the same conclusion from his condemnation of the Greek officers.

“They are no use except to drink mastik and talk big words in the cafés,” he said; “but the soldiers are brave.”

About the officers he may have been right. But considering how the roads out of Larissa were littered with arms, ammunition, and accoutrements—considering also himself—I rather doubted him about the soldiers. After all there is no getting away from that panic, and if anybody still says the Greeks fought well after the first day, let him try to imagine the Turks smitten with the like terror.

But even the fight at Velestino and Greek deserters did not suffice to make Larissa exciting. For the rest there was nothing to do but look at the soldiers. The uniforms which the Greeks left about had come in very handy for the Turks. Not the very least in the world did they care whose uniform it was, or whether it fitted, or how it looked; so long as it held together and they could get it on it did well enough. One dark-green uniform appeared to be especially popular; I don't know in the least what it was, and no more did the present owners of it, but infantry, cavalry, and artillery now wore it quite impartially.

For a few days Larissa accordingly turned dark green, but later on dark blue and white became the prevailing colours. Huge swarms of Albanian irregulars arrived, and, much as I admired the Albanians, I must own that they were very irregular indeed. More than half of them must have been boys of seventeen or eighteen, smooth-faced, clean-limbed, tireless, agile, and enjoying themselves like a school cricket team going out to play a match. Their dark-blue jackets were mostly new, their white national fezzes—varying in shape from a skull-cap to a Pierrot's hat—uneearthly clean. But the older men were irregular indeed. Many were masses of rags, for the Greek uniforms were all snapped up before they arrived. One man wore his bayonet dangling between his legs in front, another sticking horizontally out behind; many carried it always fixed, ready for any sport that might turn up. One day I was riding out as a party of them marched in. They had come through many hours of scorching sun, and they were laden with rifles and cartridges and knapsacks and overcoats. But they saw some soldiers chasing that unclean and accursed animal, a pig. The double call of religion and sport was too strong. Off they dashed after it in heavy marching order; some headed it off in front, others set off to run it down from behind. Most tried to pig-stick it with bayonets; but many, whether in front or behind, fired frequent snapshots with the gayest disregard of their comrades on the other side. By some wonder they hit neither the pig, each other, nor me. But it was decidedly more dangerous than the battles of Meluna and Velestino put together.

Still, you can get tired even of Albanian irregulars. It even became pathetic to see them prowling disconsolately up and down the lines of closed shutters, or poking wistful heads into the dark shops, where they had again begun a tentative trade in bread and milk and tobacco. The Albanians did not come for pay, which they never expected to get; much less out of loyalty to the Sultan, which they never profess. They came for loot, and to loot they were not allowed. Seyfoullah Pasha had been appointed Governor: night and day he was about the streets, on foot or on horseback, but always alert, always athletic, often with a stick, and always with a fist. "It is the only way," he remarked, with a genial brandish. It was; and the malefactor respected him for it. Seyfoullah organised a mixed gendarmery of Mussulmans, Christians, and Jews to help keep order. The day it began operations I saw a hubbub at the street corner and Seyfoullah with his sword drawn. I rushed out and found that a Christian guardian of law had been detected by the Governor himself in the attempt to take up a fellow-Christian's bed and walk. It was not the best testimonial to the mixed gendarmery system, but Seyfoullah was most soundly thrashing the mixed gendarme. Yet even among the police and the irregulars malefactors were almost lamentably rare.

After all, a city wants citizens to make it live. A city peopled only by soldiers and those who cater for them is not a city. It is the shell of civilisation, with primitive barbarism inside it. Armies and war are the negation of all the complexities of civilisation—of complex commerce, of complex enjoyments, of complex annoyances, of complex social relations. You buy your food; you enjoy it; you are tired or wounded; you obey your officer. War is all simple, and a city is not the place for it. It is a country sport, and in town it is out of place and tiresome.

On May 4th, thank heaven, a thunderstorm came on; that at least was a change from the sun. And to-morrow we were going out into the country again to attack Pharsala. No more empty streets and blind, deaf houses. But when would to-morrow come?

Of course the unexpected always happens; to-morrow came to-morrow. At five o'clock on the morning of Wednesday, May 5th, our sentinels, whom we always kept all night at the headquarters gate, rushed in to say that the Mushir Pasha was starting for Pharsala.

THE BATTLE OF PHARSALA.

It may as well be owned at this point that the war, as a war, had not hitherto been a success. In the general view war is neither a science nor an art, nor yet a resource of diplomacy, so much as a contrivance for killing men on the largest scale that men have yet devised. Looked at in this light, the war failed for two reasons: first, the reluctance of the Greeks, who would not stand up to be killed; and, secondly, the evil fate, whether it were bad luck or bad management, which beset the designs of the Turks to kill them. Again and again the plans of Edhem Pasha, which anybody must admit to be conceived in the best spirit of generalship, just failed of full execution. Again and again he was just on the point of annihilating the Greeks—when the Greeks had run away. Sometimes they ran clean away; sometimes they ran away after a pretence at a fight just before the real fight was going to begin. Of the first branch of their tactics Mati is a good example; of the second both Pharsala and Domoko. Both were most enjoyable battles—battles at which it was possible to understand the plan and watch its developments; both furnished bits of very fine fighting. But both left off just when the real killing of Greeks was about to begin.

Pharsala was beyond question the most interesting battle we had yet had—would have been, that is, if it had been a battle at all. The force was large, the position open, and the combinations interesting. But as a matter of fact Pharsala, which began as a Gravelotte and was meant to develop into a Sedan, ended as a rear-guard engagement on a large scale to cover a retreat. The Greeks came out to fight, and they had to fight to get back. Therein consisted the battle.

The town—it is no more than a big village, but as the other villages near are all little ones, let it pass for a town—is huddled at the very foot of the broad band of mountains which kilts Southern Thessaly: it goes there by the name of Kasiardiari, but is really an outcrop of Mount Othrys. In front of it is the Volo-Trikkala railway; in front of that the half dried-up river, Kutchuk Kanarli; in front of that a broad belt, studded with villages, —four miles or so of upward sloping ground ; in front of that a long row of low hills ; and in front of that again the rolling miles of the plain of Thessaly. That was the Greek position, and an army that was set on fighting might have searched half Europe for a better. The range of low hills offered unnumbered positions for artillery ; it had to be attacked up a long incline absolutely naked of cover ; there was plenty of room to make the very uttermost of all the force they had, and good artillery with good infantry behind it would have stood against ten times their number at least until they had done slaughter that would bid most armies pause. Good judges told me again and again that it was a position which would have cost the Turkish army at least five thousand men.

The Greeks abandoned it. They seem to abandon everything. The battle was not timed for the day it happened, but that seems little enough excuse. The Greeks had been there for a fortnight. They were no doubt inferior in numbers. On the showing of correspondents on their own side, they had—allowing amply for reinforcements sent to Velestino—25,000 men and 50 guns to about 40,000 Turks. But even that they might have known beforehand. They knew presumably that they would be outnumbered when they took up their position, and the position was good enough to go far to redeem the balance. Still they abandoned it, and from that moment the battle degenerated into a rear-guard engagement to cover the habitual retreat. Velestino had not stiffened them much after all.

On our left was the division of Memdhuk Pasha, in the centre those of Hamdi and Neshat Pasha, on the right, coming down from Trikkala, along the line of the railway, was Hairi Pasha, of whom more later. Memdhuk, Hamdi, and Neshat had been advancing southward in a slow and intermittent fashion during the fortnight since the taking of Larissa. There are two roads—or cart-tracks—to Pharsala from Larissa over the endless corn-waves, each one exactly like the last, that make the plain of Thessaly. The westernmost, which was said to be the shortest, though there is very little in it either way, passes through no village till it reaches Subasi, nearly fifteen miles out of Larissa; I always preferred the other, as the villages of Nebegler, Hisarlik, Bakratsi, and Karademirtsi punctuate at nearly equal intervals the tedious five-and-twenty miles, and encourage you with the knowledge that you really are getting forward. You begin to ascend the line of low hills which was the Greek first position about Subasi and Karademitsi, on either side respectively, distant from Pharsala some eight to ten miles ; at Tatari, five miles north of the town, where the two roads join, you are over the ridge and down on the plain of Pharsala. Memdhuk was on the eastern road, and by this road Edhem followed him and I followed Edhem ; Hamdi and Neshat were on the western. Edhem only contemplated a reconnaissance in force for the 5th ; simultaneous attacks on Pharsala and Velestino were to follow on the 6th. The Greeks, however, were in line at daybreak. They had two brigades in the first line with two half brigades in support ; a brigade was supposed to number 8000 men, so that it was nearly equivalent to a Turkish division.

The battle may be divided into three parts—the reconnaissance, the retreat, and the fight. Finding Greeks on the crest of the ridge, Edhem sent his advanced-guard against them, with a view presumably to occupying it as an admirable position for his artillery in the morrow's engagement. I fancy that nobody quite knew—except, of course, Seyfoullah, who knew every tree and stone, and could have walked to Athens blindfold—that the army was almost tumbling on to the top of Pharsala. Later I pointed the place out to Memdhuk Pasha when he was over the ridge and in full view of it, and asked him its name : he had not the least idea. As the Turks advanced the Greek artillery opened about nine in the morning and the fire was returned. Then followed the usual artillery duel—bang, puff, and a bursting shell from our side ; puff, bang, and a bursting shell from theirs. The Greek practice was the best they had yet made—probably they had measured off the ranges beforehand ; but even so, it could afford to be better than usual and yet not do very much harm. The Turkish was not so good as usual ; but even so it was good enough, or else some unexplained cause was good enough to persuade the Greeks to retire.

Retire at least they did, after about two hours cannonade, and the second phase of the fight began. By this time Memdhuk and his Albanians—advancing to the left of the Eastern road past the hill of Tekes—had got well into touch with their right wing and were beginning to outflank it. The artillery of the two central divisions with the corps artillery was advancing on to and over the heights. Memdhuk may not be much of a scientific soldier, but he is a fighter, and it was impossible to keep him back ; plainly now the battle must be fought to-day or not at all.

The Greeks, on their right at least, retired very well : I learned afterwards that the rear-guard—as usual in moments of retreat—was the Foreign Legion. It was good to see the way the little turbaned, grey-bearded, pot-bellied hero, Memdhuk, hammered into them as they withdrew past Tatari towards the bridge over the river and the railway station. He pushed forward battery after battery to the edge of the hills, and sent battalion after battalion down into the plain. The shells seemed to burst right into the firing figures lined up across the brown fallows on either side the road. As the columns of infantry crested the ridge and saw the enemy they broke into a run and whooped like bank-holiday makers; as they went down they spread steadily into line and went on firing steadily as if there were no stubbornly-firing enemy at all. I saw three, who had gone on faster than their comrades, standing coolly upright on the road and answering the fire of the whole Legion. None the less the Foreign Legion fired stubbornly and retired swiftly, but without ever breaking into a run. The smoke of their fire wafted backwards over the fired, and ours wafted forwards. But they got back over the river, and they did not lose many men.

I had read of retreats over bridges, and I expected horrible slaughter. But the truth was that the river was easily fordable at almost every point, and the Greek centre and left walked over it easily enough: the Foreign Legion retired over the bridge only because it covered the railway station and the direct road into Pharsala. The Greeks, it seemed, had made a hideous blunder—supposing they wished to win the battle, which apparently they did not—in leaving their open position. They were now narrowing into a semicircle, whose arc passed through the villages of Pasia Megula, north of the Kutchuk Kanarli, near the bridge, and Vasili south of the river. These they still held and must hold if they were to get away to Domoko. For behind Pharsala ran a wall of grey mountains, and the guns could not pass over it. The main road of retreat to Domoko was by their left.

So now began the third stage of the battle—the fight. Memdhuk now went down to the centre to confer with Edhem, and I went with him. On the way we passed an Albanian—a boy of about seventeen—who had been hit in the foot. He was standing on one leg just inside the zone of fire, and appeared to be pointing out to a boy of twenty—his brother, Charlie said—that it was not worth while going back for a little thing like that. His brother solved the question by taking him on his back and carrying him away. When we got to the Marshal we could see that the enemy was being swept back across all the plain. It remained for the Turks to pummel the Greeks as they cramped themselves up round Pharsala; it remained for them to hold back the Turks as they could, so as to get away the guns and decamp under cover of night into the mountains. It was a race between night and victory, and night won. But here comes the stroke of bad luck—or bad management. Hairi Pasha's division on the extreme right was to have worked round behind Pharsala, on to the Domoko road. That road skirts the mountains all the way on its left; about a mile out of Pharsala mountains rise upon its right also. But three or four miles on the right mountains sink again: they are a kind of island in the plain, and it is perfectly easy to march past them from the north and come down on the road ten miles or so from Domoko. Had Hairi done this, night would not have saved the Greeks; they were surrounded, annihilated. Hairi in the first place was late; true he had had a thirty-mile march from Kardista. And, in the second place, he missed his direction, and so he appeared towards nightfall on the Greek left front instead of their left rear. And that for them made all the difference between retreat and annihilation.

It was a battle that just failed. Yet all the same, before it failed there was one very fine bit of fighting which it was worth coming all the way from England to see. By this time Memdhuk had worked round to Barakli and Sechi; Hamdi had closed in on the arc of the semicircle; Neshat was a little further out. The artillery of the whole army had advanced till the Greeks were the centre of a ring of batteries, all belching shell into the villages and the railway station and the plain beyond, whence the Greek gunners sent a half-hearted reply. Pasia Megula was shelled and fusiladed and taken about four in the afternoon. But in the centre of the Greek position, just across the river and blocking our central advance on Pharsala, was a little village called Vasili. That village the Greeks were defending and the Turks were attacking. I rode carefully all round it the next day—I remember there was a big house flaming in the middle of it which must have been full of cartridges: they went off like crackers—and it was an awful village to attack. You approached it over half a mile of ploughed field, and as infantry laboured through it they might have been shot down as wheat goes down under the reaping-machine. Arrived at the end of that the storming-party had to get down a six-foot bank into the river, which here was nearly waist-deep and twenty yards across. Then there was a ten-foot bank to scramble up, and then the village, embanked everywhere, trenched everywhere, loopholed everywhere. It was a place that in anything but a toy war would have murdered regiments. Yet the Turks went at it not only without flinching back, but, more difficult still, without hurrying forward. Probably they did not guess how strong it was; but, on the other hand, they might have guessed it to be even stronger. Anyhow, they heard the bullets cracking past like whips, and the shells screaming like mad horses; they saw their comrades fling wild arms abroad and lurch forward on to their faces. Yet these indomitable men never once moved out of their steady slouch. "Allah! Allah! Allah!" they cried, with a fierce but very self-contained enthusiasm, as they tramped first through deep corn and then out over the bare plough. "Allah! Allah! Allah!" the sound swelling and mingling to a hoarse roar as they lined out into open order and began firing quickly, but not hurriedly. "Allah! Allah! Allah!" as the jets of fire ran more clearly round the village, and men went down beside them, and the bullets kicked up little dust-devils between their legs.

And Allah saw them through. The Greeks bolted. I doubt if they lost even a man, for the Turks looked to shoot very high. But they saw their masters coming, and they went to kennel. They could not stand there and face those slipshod heroes shambling composedly forward past death to victory.

They took the village as darkness settled down from the western mountains. By this time the shells had cleared the railway station also, and our skirmishers were over the river. When the dawn came Pharsala was empty, and we went in. The battle of Pharsala was a very important action, though comparatively a bloodless one. Our loss was possibly 200 ; the Greeks owned to the same, but probably lost more ; we took four guns and 50 prisoners. But after this action the Greeks could not hold Velestino, outflanked on their left, and Velestino lost meant Volo lost. The Greeks were still in line through Halmyro and Domoko ; but they had lost the strategic advantage of the railway from wing to wing. Yet that was all nothing. The real battle of Pharsala was those squat, heavy, dirty, sloppy, ragged-bearded, Allah-inspired invincibles strolling upon Vasili.

XXIII.

THE COMEDY OF VOLO.

“By the Lord, there’s the British flag!” And by the Lord there it was—the glorious, imperturbable, confident Union Jack waving opposite the booking-office of Velestino railway station in the very middle of the Turkish army.

It was four in the morning; we were looking for water to make tea. But the three Englishmen present—and also, please observe, a free but most fraternal citizen of the United States—got up and rushed at the flag. And there holding it was a white-ducked, clean-faced, clear-skinned, straight-eyed bluejacket of twenty. There were some other men there, and some other flags, but I stood for a little space to cool my eyes with the bluejacket. How good he looked! How honest and steady and trim and fearless, and what dumpy ruffians the dear, fearless, good-natured, dishevelled Turks looked by the side of him. I was almost relieved; I had not turned into a Turk after all.

But what was it all about? Had England annexed Greece, or had the Powers intervened to stop the war, or what? It soon came out. A deputation of the British and French Consuls, with several British and American correspondents, had come to tell us that Volo was evacuated and at our mercy, and to beg us not to hurt the peaceable inhabitants. We knew the fact, and the request was a good deal of an impertinence. But, of course, they didn't know that, poor dears; their minds were stuffed with Greek stories of Turkish ferocity, and their nerves were jumpy with recollections of a fortnight's panic. They never stopped to ask themselves whether any sane man, to put it no higher, would massacre the shopkeepers of Volo within sight of warships from half Europe.

I ought to tell you, meantime, what had been happening since Pharsala. Pharsala was fought on the 5th of May, and this was the morning of the 8th. On the 6th, according to Turkish etiquette after victory, nothing was done; on the 7th we rode to Velestino. Just as we were starting in the morning came news that Hakki had forced back Smolenski from Velestino, and was on the road to Volo. There had been skirmishing nearly every day in front of this position, but the main action appears to have been on the 5th. As the battle of Pharsala was going on the same day, I could not be also at Velestino : I was lucky in that this was the only considerable engagement of the war I missed. For the sake of the connected story, I take what seem to be the main outlines of the fighting from the reports of correspondents with the Greeks ; there was no correspondent on the 5th with Hakki.

The fighting appears to have opened at half-past six in the morning. The attack, as in the first action, was chiefly directed against the Greek left : on the other wing Laka Karla prevented any turning movement, and the steep and lofty Pilaf Tepe had to be attacked, if at all, in front. About eleven o'clock the Turks began to gain ground on the spurs of the Kara Dagħ : the Greeks opened on them with a mountain battery, but it was silenced by Turkish shrapnel. About noon the Greeks began to retreat, but Hakki did not follow his advantage—either because he did not know of it or on general Turkish grounds. By two the Greeks had left all their trenches, and were in full retreat. Their left was turned, and their retreat in danger of being cut along the railway from Pharsala. Colonel Smolenski therefore evacuated Velestino on the afternoon of the 5th. He fired a few shots at the Turkish advanced-guard on the morning of the 6th, and in the afternoon retreated, apparently in good order, towards Halmyro, which he reached next morning. Edhem had sent off Memdhuk's division from Pharsala to reinforce Hakki on the night of the 6th; it arrived next afternoon, but the fighting was over. Edhem himself, with the Headquarters Staff, arrived towards evening the same day. So did I—little dreaming of the intoxicating eminence that awaited me on the morrow.

It was highly informal, no doubt, for Consuls and journalists to come out waving flags of truce and ensigns of the Powers and negotiate for the surrender of the second port in Greece. It was also, as I have suggested, something of an impertinence. But the Turks were the last people on earth to object to anything on the score of informality, and as they are not always on the lookout for offence, are the last people to take it. Informal or not, let it be put on record that British journalists came out to save Greeks when the Greek army had left them to their fate, and the Greek mayor and corporation stayed dithering at home.

However, it was not so bad as that. Captain Nedjib Bey was sent off with a proclamation assuring peace to the peaceable and evil to the evildoer. I galloped out after him: if war-correspondents were to be elevated into high contracting parties, why not even I with the rest? In fact Nedjib welcomed my two friends and me most eagerly, and took no single step in the capitulation without consulting us. It is a shame to be looking always on the weakest side of human nature; but it did occur to me that this was Nedjib's richest day in the whole war, and that he looked to us to immortalise it. But what of that? Was that any reason for not taking a hand in the surrender when it was offered? It would be rather a fine thing to negotiate a capitulation between two correspondents of the 'Daily Mail.' True, it was not exactly a capitulation, since the town was not militarily occupied. But there was still one military, or naval, element left. The Greek fleet, true to the last to the national tradition, was not going to be left out when there was any talking to be done. It appeared that there lay in Volo harbour a battleship—the Psara, flagship of Admiral Somethingopoulos or Tweedledouris or another—two sloops, and an armed transport. What were they going to do? They might shell us as we went in, and we could do nothing. On the other hand, that would surely justify us in reprisals in the way of smashing up public buildings, and other things that the Greeks would hardly like. The question altogether was a queer one. Did Volo surrender, or did it not? If it did, the Greek ships could do nothing. If it did not, we were justified in shelling defenceless citizens. What would the Greek fleet do?

But the question solved itself like all the other questions of this wonderful war. We strolled on, and the Greeks went away. The Consuls had gone on ahead, feeling that the Greek fleet, which at the moment had not gone away as it was told to, might cut up nasty. We went in steadily—the flags of the Great Powers in an aureole round the fez of the Sultan's aide-de-camp, and three correspondents, two Albanian cavasses, and a stray cavalry trooper, who had come to see the fun, riding behind like the general, and staff, and army. That was the invading army—an officer, a man, and five Bashi-Bazouks. It was the most ridiculous and yet the most sublime thing in the world. For absurd as we were, we carried with us the life or death of a town. And as we drew near to it this became very clear. The outskirts of Volo are obscure, and as you ride in there are gasworks on the right-hand side, but beyond this I am bound to own I noticed Volo very little. I was looking at the people. For as we got into the town we passed through lanes of them—shaggy, dirty, dumpy people, banked up on the roadsides, with obsequiousness in their mien and terror in their faces. There was no doubt about it—the people of Volo were most horribly afraid. I don't know what tales they had been told, but I am pretty sure they would have left if they could. Only they were at the end of their tether, in a corner of their country, and they had to wait there for their fate.

So we went on towards the centre of the town—always the same grotesque mixture, with five-sevenths of the invading army made up of correspondents and their servants. As we got towards the central streets the populace seemed reassured; we had not massacred anybody so far, and they began to think they had a chance. They still took off their hats most obediently. Many had bought fezzes for the occasion, and I saw one so uninstructed in the use of that symbol of victory as to take it off, which the Turk never does, indoors or out. Women appeared presently on the balconies with smirks of welcome. The substantial inhabitants began to meet us—that is to say, the inhabitants not quite substantial enough to command a passage to Athens. They also smirked uneasily.

As we passed each group of kow-tow it fell in behind us till we were the head of a procession half a mile long. It looked like a great festival. But except the invading seven I don't think anybody quite enjoyed it except the boys. They trooped in and scuttled on with a will—brush-haired, smug-faced little ragamuffins with no school open to-day. Through war and panic, bloodshed and ruin, the boy, thank God, remains the boy. The pity was that they could only grow up into Greeks after all.

And so, the centre of a scraping, quaking city, we arrived at the town-hall. We jumped down carelessly off our horses, and flung the reins into crowds that competed for the honour of holding them. Then up into the council-chamber, or whatever they call it. Who cared what conquered Greeks call it? There was a crowd of jabbering Greeks inside; we pushed them out of the way. Who cared what conquered Greeks had to say?

"Is the Mayor here?" Not he. "Where is the representative of the Mayor?" Not here. "Where—is—the—representative—of—the—Mayor?" Now they comprehended that there had to be a representative of the Mayor. "You." "No, you." At last they produced a bald-headed, grey-bearded, quaking little man, and he trembled up to the table. "Listen to this: 'The town of Volo is now under the humane and puissant protection of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan Abdul Hamid II.'” And so on. “Does the town submit?” The town submits. “Then sign your name there.” Then the bald-heads began to wag again. “You sign.” “No, you.” At last they produced a man to sign. I don’t know who he was, and I’m sure nobody cared.

Now on to the balcony. Here is a grey-bearded elder; no doubt he is a leading citizen. “Do you understand French? Very well; then translate this aloud to the people. ‘The town of Volo is now——’” and so on. I looked down arrogantly at the people as he translated. “Louder,” said I, as if I were the governor of the town, and obediently he raised his voice. The people looked up timorously; there were only a thousand of them, and there were four fezzes on the balcony, with two and a trooper’s sheepskin cap in reserve in the refreshment-room. But as they listened their cowed faces lightened. They were spared; they lived again. And then a Greek on the balcony called for three cheers for the Sultan. How they rang! All the Greeks who called him a monster at dawn that morning emptied their lungs with a relish. Faugh! All the same, I suppose conquered townsmen have their feelings, and it is a relief to hear that you are to be neither robbed nor killed. But you can’t expect the conquerors to think much of that. To us it appeared just despicable sycophancy.

And then a shuffling rattle down the street, and in came the Turks. They had not waited to hear whether the town capitulated,—why should they? The Greek admiral had tried to bluff it out, but already his smoke was trailing behind him. And in came the Turks. One battalion only—but what a battalion! Dusty, ragged, probably hungry, they strode in with shuffling strides, but very long ones, looking neither to left nor to right, desiring no pillage nor ravishment, doing what their officers told them. They had marched through Thessaly at the word of command; at the word of command they would march through the fires of hell as long as there was a man who could step. Were they elated, triumphant, arrogant, intoxicated, like us? Dear, no! They just shambled in as always. They had conquered, but what of that? How should they do else than conquer?

ON THE ART OF CAMPAIGNING.

It is a noteworthy phenomenon of war that time goes with it about a dozen times as slowly as anywhere else. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that there is a dozen times as much time packed into it. Pharsala and Volo gave such crowded, glorious hours. But Pharsala was now a week old and Volo two days, and Volo had dwindled a generation back and Pharsala a century. There had been nothing since of interest to the world. But there had been a vast deal of interest to me.

In war, when no arrangements hold, when all rules of life are cancelled, and all institutions of society hung up in abeyance, when you come down to the very bed-rock and bottom of things, and all the little, contemptible, convenient arrangements called civilisation suddenly vanish clean away, and leave you to depend for your bare necessities upon your bare naked self—in short, when it comes to this, that if you are hungry you have got to find a sheep and kill it and cook it before you can fill your stomach, and if you are sleepy you have to find something to keep out cold and wet enough to let you sleep, and you don't care in the least whose sheep it is, or whose shelter—why, when it comes to all this, there are events happening once and twice and all day long far more important than scores of battles and captured cities. There had been half a dozen milestones in my life since Pharsala and Volo.

The night after the battle of Pharsala I was too tired to do anything but eat all the food I had and drink all the drink my numerous friends left me. How well I knew them by now! “Ha, ha, vous avez du vin: quelle chance!” and up went the full bottle to the dry lips, and down with “Merci beaucoup, cher ami,” it came empty. Lucky were you if the emptier was endowed with censorial powers and you could improve the occasion by getting your telegram countersigned. After meat and drink I had just energy left to trudge to the village of Tatari, see the horses into an empty stable, and then lie down and sleep on a solid mud-bank—I learn they are neither less nor more civilised than similar erec-tions in Ashanti—such as the peasantry of this country build outside their hovels.

But then there was the night after that. I had ridden all day over a quarter-county or so of battle-field—for a correspondent, unlike the Turks, cannot do nothing on the morrow of victory—and I was hungry and I had nothing to eat. I must own that I was not quite so much alone with my bed-rock self as I have suggested above. I had Charlie and Aslan, who had just returned from taking a telegram to Larissa, and Georghi. And I must also own that my part in the struggle with the naked forces of nature was rather that of the directing mind than the executing hand.

I called to Charlie and gave him a Medjidieh, value 3s. 2d. “Get a lamb, Charlie,” I said with Homeric simplicity. “No got,” was Charlie’s ready response. “Then get.” “Where I get? No can buy.” “Then steal.” “Very well, sir,” and Charlie mounted the galumphing, flea-bitten, grey baggage-pony which he regarded as the best horse in the Turkish army. He galumphed away with a vague but watchful eye fixed speculatively on the horizon. In half an hour he returned with, not one, but two black lambs slung in front of his saddle. Of one he tied the legs together and left it bleating on the ground; the other he carried away. "What have you done with it?" I asked when he came back. "Give him to the servant of the one Pasha," he cried, with a grin of expansive triumph; "ten piastres backsheesh." In the art of making war support war, and hedging loot therewith, Charlie could learn nothing from Hannibal or Napoleon.

But let us eat. There was no difficulty about the killing, and skinning, and cutting up, and cooking. A podgy, brown-bearded soldier appeared from nowhere, stripped off his coat, and cut off the lamb's head. The little black head still bleated and the little black body still kicked, and it was the most grotesquely pathetic sight, bar the Karya hospital, I had seen in the whole war. Then the soldier made an incision in the skin of one leg, and blew into it till the little black lamb was like a full-grown water-skin. Then he slit up the skin and ripped it off in a wink. "Every man to his trade," he grinned, and went off well satisfied with his work and sixpence. He was a butcher from Angora. That is the blessing of a conscriptive army; you need never go far for any tradesman you may be pleased to want.

Meanwhile they lit brushwood in a hole, ripped the rafters from a convenient barn,— the proprietor will miss them if he ever comes back, but what would you? War is war, and soldiers must eat, and even correspondents—and we had a glorious fire. We thrust the ends of the beams into the fire till they got charred, then broke off the charred ends and rammed the beams in again. When there was a good deal of live wood we let the fire out; Aslan slashed up the lamb with his yataghan, and propped the pieces on crooked sticks over the embers; Charlie cut up the liver into little bits, strung them on a string, and roasted them likewise. Aslan preferred the lights, which he dumped down frankly in the ashes. Then we assembled our company in a deserted stable—three English, two Americans, and a German—and established a table out of the broken door. Then with jack-knives and fingers we fell to and ate gloriously. It was burnt outside, and raw inside, very tough and very greasy. But it was glorious, and in the fierce glutting of animal needs the very water—what had become of that last flask of whisky?—for the moment seemed almost sanitary. Then we wrapped ourselves up in our capotes, and went to sleep on fresh-cut rye in the stable till the dawn crept bashfully in through the broken roof. Who said that war is not all glory?

But all evenings are not like that. For example, there was the cold night in Velestino station; no rye there, and nothing but the hard gravel platform to sleep on. There was the night at Volo—a bed to sleep on certainly, but no bed-clothes, and I had had a horse roll over my legs in the afternoon, and the night was a sleepless alternation of sweat and shiver and aches and mosquitoes. There was the next day, going back to Larissa, with a twenty-mile gallop in a Greek springless waggon over a Greek highroad. I sat and lay and stood and knelt, but I could not get away from the agonising jolts without getting out of the carriage. It was the worst hardship of the whole war, but after all that was my own fault. What business had I to let my horse get himself lost—hastily ridden off by the conscientious Georghi, of course, who found it too good an opportunity of a mount that could gallop—while I was lunching?

But the next night was not my fault. Why must his Excellence choose to make his headquarters on an out-of-the-way hill by a desolate ruined shrine called Tekes? Why, as I followed him, must inky rain-clouds beat up from over Meluna to bring on nightfall an hour too soon, and swallow up the baggage from sight of me and of the headquarters? Why must the clouds immediately thereupon dissolve into streams of dogged rain? Who was to have foreseen a December night in the middle of the dog-day heat of Thessalian May? There was corn fit to cut even now, if there was anybody to cut it; why should winter dip down over it so suddenly?

There was a tent, to be sure. In theory, I own, no man need wish for more than a tent, even when its door will not shut, and its canvas lets in water. I know that thousands of Turkish soldiers spent an uncomplaining night without a tent, many without an overcoat, and some without the egg and bit of cheese, the last cigarette, and liqueur-glass of resinous red wine that I had. In theory the war correspondent wraps his shaggy coat round him and sleeps peacefully. In practice he hasn't got a shaggy coat; at least I hadn't that night—only a waterproof overcoat between myself and a friend, and that had to go on the dank ground. In the old story the Highland chieftain kicked away the lump of snow which his soft son was using for a pillow. In this new story, if anybody had kicked away my revolver, which was my simple cushion, I would have shot him with it. Moreover, the war correspondent of romance never buys a paste-board box of vaseline because the skin is peeling off his nose; and if he did the box would never telescope in his pocket while he was asleep, and let out the vaseline over his long-cold pipe, and his long-stopped watch, and his last two matches. All trifles, of course. Hunger and thirst, cold and wet, dirt and stickiness, pain and sleeplessness—they are none of them any real hardship when you are in fair condition; and by this time I was as lean as Greek mutton, and as hard as soldier's biscuit. But taking hunger, thirst, cold, wet, dirt, stickiness, pain, and sleeplessness all together, they are so near an approach to hardship that they begin to tell on the temper.

When I got up next morning, and there was no great inducement to be abed, the rain had stopped. But a clammy mist was sucking at the wringing ground. There was a half-view over the rolling ridges of Southern Thessaly—for the plain of Thessaly is no more level than Salisbury Plain, or any other plain—and you could see bedraggled horses plucking hopelessly at sun-dried grass, and bedraggled soldiers puffing hopelessly at sodden brushwood. The path up to the little hill had turned to a slide you could have tobogganed down. And as I shivered and stamped the wet out of my boots came the cheering news that nothing was to be done to-day in the way of war, and I might just as well have stayed in Larissa.

But, after all, the worse off you are the more room there is for improvement. The baggage had turned up in the night—that wonderful baggage, which never could be persuaded to arrive anywhere before one o'clock in the morning. The men would waste hours after sunrise, so as to time their arrival accurately for the small hours of the morrow. But if the baggage came late, it always came, and that could be said of nobody else's. It was almost pathetic to see the Germans. In hours of ease they were always giving us little lectures about commissariat, and explaining how in the German army the trooper's saddle and the private's knapsack contained everything that man or horse could possibly want, in a weight of I forget how few kilos. Next morning you would find the German shivering on a bare hill and devil a kilo about him. His verfluchter dragoman had not turned up, and he didn't know where his servant was, and he had mislaid his horse. Meantime he was sucking at a peppermint-drop: they were found most effective in the German manœuvres, he assured you, for keeping out hunger, thirst, and cold. All the same he accepted an invitation to breakfast.

For the excellent fellows had annexed a tent belonging to the military attachés and had made a fire in it, and Andreas was cooking breakfast. Andreas could never be persuaded to go into action. Not that he was afraid—had he not seen Kassassin and Tel-el-Kebir?—but war bored him, and he preferred the kitchen-fire. We had tried Dimitri once in action—at Velestino, in the unavoidable absence of Charlie, gone to Ellassona to try and cash a cheque and pay up the long-outstanding telegram account—but Dimitri was not a success. Dimitri was the elderly Greek who looked like a divine and spoke French like a raven. His pony came down on the road and Dimitri came over his head. It was the horse's fault, he explained, for he prided himself much on his knowledge of horses: Moi, z'ai acété beaucoup de chevaux, he would croak. He rode slowly and miserably, with sticking-plaster on his nose, as far as Rizomylo. And there the first thing he saw was a group of Albanians, of whom he was ever in hideous terror, and a blazing Greek house. That was Dimitri's first sight of war, but it was enough. "Ze suis malade," he explained, and we were constrained to send him back with telegrams. He asked for an escort of cavalry, but Mahmud Bey had used up all the superfluous troopers that day, and he had to quake in alone.

However, we were now going south to Domoko—at least we thought so, poor innocents!—and had to have a line of communication between it and the telegraphic base. So Charlie, with a telegram-rider for each man, was to be the advanced guard, and Andreas, with telegram-riders in Pharsala, was to be the point, and Dimitri—so he persuaded himself—was the main body and remount and veterinary officer in Larissa. But meanwhile Andreas was cooking breakfast. They had brought a bucket of water to wash in. Then tea and tinned sausages and a borrowed cigarette—what more do you want? How anxious was the Herr Hauptmann not to eat a whole sausage to himself, lest we went short! But when we succeeded in proving that four ones were three, his appetite seemed to suggest that even the regulation peppermint-drop left an unfilled space somewhere.

Then the rain soaked in a little and a little sun came out. The come-and-go of the soldiers began to be interesting. A bronze-skinned, smooth-faced boy fired off his rifle—partly because it was the feast of Bairam, partly out of wantonness. His major called him up and rated him a little in Turkish, then slashed him three times across the face with a riding-whip ; the boy saluted, and was taken down the hill under arrest. It looked brutal, but it would do him good : it is boys like that who set fire to cottages. However, that was not my affair : no more, for the moment, were the operations—if any—of to-day and to-morrow. I was happy again, and could lie down peaceably on a horse-rug in front of the tent and write down my views on the art of campaigning.

XXV.

AT TEKES.

MONDAY, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday—seven mortal days in a tent on a little hill by a ruined shrine in Thessaly. I suppose when the real history of this war comes to be written—assuming that anybody ever thinks he knows enough about it to tackle the task—the grave historian will take the week at Tekes as a matter of course. “After the occupation of Volo it was found necessary to recruit the energies of the troops, and to perfect the transport arrangements: it was not until May 17th, exactly a month after the opening of hostilities, that Edhem once more moved forward.” That will be quite enough for the week, unless the grave historian should chance to be a German. In that case he will describe how the reserve division, Haidar Pasha, was moved up from Meluna through Larissa to the front; how a brigade of Nizam, or troops with the colours, from the Second or Adrianople Army Corps, armed with the Mauser rifle, likewise reached the front; how many baggage-animals loaded with what sort of stores started out of Larissa, and where, if anywhere, they arrived,—all that and more he will tell you, and I, for one, shall read it with the greatest interest.

But to the ordinary correspondent, to whom one division is very much like another, and one baggage-animal does not differ in glory from another, the week at Tekes was a little uneventful. The Mauser rifles were something to talk about certainly: the whole camp was full of stories as to how many Greeks one bullet would kill at 2000 yards. But for the rest—you crawled out of your tent in the morning: anything to-day? No; not to-day. To-day it is Bairam; to-day it is raining; to-day we are awaiting reinforcements; to-day we have not got quite all our supplies. Have a little patience: you Europeans are always in a hurry. Wait till the day after to-morrow. It is a bad sign when the Turk abandons to-morrow and seeks refuge in the day after. For if to-morrow never comes, how can you ever possibly win through to the next day?

Of course the young enthusiast following his first campaign expects a battle every day. Meluna and the following week set a bad precedent, for we never lacked at least a little pot-shooting with artillery. Certainly it was unreasonable to expect general engagements and captured cities for a whole month on end. Yet when all that was allowed, it was impossible not to feel that the Turks were very slow. Was it not their old fault to throw away victory by sloth? For we were now, after a month of war, pretty well where we might have been at the end of the first week. If we had gone straight forward after Meluna, if we had harried the Greeks on their flight from Larissa with cavalry and horse-artillery and flying columns of infantry, they would never have concentrated at Pharsala, would have needed no beating there, and we might have been at Domoko three weeks back instead of hoping to be there the day after to-morrow. But setting all that aside, we were doing with Domoko exactly what we had done with Pharsala. We were giving the Greeks about a week to talk themselves into self-confidence, to bring up reinforcements, to throw up entrenchments, to mount guns of position, to measure off ranges. Of course it may have been unfair, both here and elsewhere, to blame Edhem for delay. It was said the Sultan had given him a free hand; but in Turkey, where personal government is really personal, and you will do well not to forget it, a free hand is not quite so free as it is in other countries. Free or not, it was noteworthy that Edhem had never yet gone forward faster than the field-telegraph, whose other end was in the Yildiz. But the field-telegraph had been up along the road into Pharsala for nearly a week now—up in the true Turkish fashion, at just the level where an unwary rider might cut his throat on it. It was true, too, though we at Tekes did not know it, that the air was full of proposals for peace; but the Yildiz would consent to no armistice as yet. Why could we not have either peace or war? We might have had three divisions before Domoko on May 6, the morrow of Pharsala, and yet have sent a division to strengthen Hakki on the left wing, and had also a division and a brigade coming up in reserve.

Instead, on May 16, we were at last going to advance to-morrow. To-morrow very early, said the staff-officers reassuringly—as if it were any consolation for a week of idleness to go to your bed in spurs and be hauled off it at two in the morning. We were advancing, of course, on Domoko. What force we might find there, and in what state, we did not know. Less than 30,000, and those deserting fast, said the Greek sergeant—a Volo Jew—who had deserted two days ago; they had suffered much from the week's rain, having no tents and next to no rations. But then it was plainly the deserter's game—even supposing him not to be a spy, which was always possible—to magnify the hardships which had been too much for himself. There had, indeed, been a tardy reconnaissance three days back and a little shooting, but we knew nothing of any information that might have been gathered. We might find the Greeks in force at Domoko, fifteen miles south of Pharsala; we might find only a rear-guard, the main body holding the Furka Pass, a dozen miles further on. And when we did find them—who knew? Would they fight at last? Of course the army hoped so. But the Crown Prince, we heard, had telegraphed to Athens that the army was prepared to resist to the last: that looked bad. Only if the Greeks did not defend the Othrys line they would never defend anything at all. There were magnificent positions, said Seyfoullah—nothing like them between us and Athens. It was Greece's third chance, and her last.

We should once more have a vast superiority in numbers. I gathered the plan to be this. Hairi's division was to advance by his right front across the tongue of plain which runs southward into the Othrys from the line of the Kutchuk Kanarli, and has its extremity at Domoko. He would thus get on to the hills and advance on the left flank of the Greeks by Amarlar, Velisiotæ and Skarmitsa. Neshat, with the newly arrived Mauser brigade from Adrianople added to his division, was to advance in front by the main road along the plain: behind him was the corps artillery, and behind the artillery Haidar's division in reserve. Hamdi's division was to march over the eastward heights by Tsiatma and Gerakli, so as to come in on the right flank of Domoko. The Crown Prince would thus be simultaneously attacked in front and on both flanks by something like 45,000 men. Meanwhile Memdhuk's division advanced wide to the eastward upon the foot of the Furka Pass to cut the Greek retreat. Hakki simultaneously advanced through Halmyro, presumably to get round the Greek extreme right, and, if possible, cut them off from Stylista and Lamia. The plan, no doubt, was Seyfoullah's: he was the only man who knew the country well enough to frame it. But it was Edhem's old strategy—turning and cutting the retreat. The plan was sound enough, only it presupposed intelligence, energy, and resolution on the part of the generals of division who were to put it into execution.

With this force and these dispositions there was no need to feel uneasy about the result. Yet we remembered that war, after all, is not a sum in arithmetic. If we were attacking under 30,000 men with three to two, and more to meet him when the three had done with him, it was only just to Turkish valour to bear in mind that we were attacking. The defensive positions of the Othrys were worth regiments on regiments. The Greek engineers were very good, and they had been allowed plenty of time. Unless the complex scheme of action were timed and worked out to a nicety, the Greeks might put Edhem to loss and trouble even yet.

In the meantime, whatever you might say of his Excellency's energy as a general, there can be no question about his taste in the selection of a camp. His green tent stood on the summit of the hill of Tekes in a circle of nine cypress-trees. Inside the tent was half taken up by the only civilised bed in camp, and the half which was not bed was half table. But outside the sight was glorious. Down the long slopes of the hill and along the ridge to its left the green had been freshened and the tents whitened by the rain until they shone in the sun like diamonds among emeralds. At the elbow of the ridge and the hill was the tomb of two holy Mussulmans—a round grey building also girdled with cypresses, and with many-coloured threads twined round its window-bars, as testimony to the devotion of the faithful. The shrine had gone to rack and ruin ever since Greece took Thessaly. The little caravanserai where pilgrims lodged was half tumbled down; the horses of the General Staff were stabled in its courtyard, and at sundown owls screeched a mournful croon in the crumbling chambers.

But now the holy men of Islam were having their revenge. They must have laughed in their graves to hear the old fanfare at five in the evening, when the soldiers get their bread and the hills ring with cheers for the Padishah. They must have joined keenly in the wailing lilt of the Albanian songs at sundown. Even the gun-horses plucking at their pickets among their supper of chopped straw, and neighing through the night when the rest of us wished to sleep, must have been pleasant music to those holy men. If they could only have risen up with us in the morning and seen the sheen of dawn over the green plain, on the grey houses of Pharsala, and over the checkered light-and-shade of the mauve mountains! Right and left, on the plain and before the town and on the mountains, gleamed acres of white tents—all full of conquering Turks.

They would be straggling out of the tents now at sunrise, serene in their shabby middle-aged confidence of victory, chopping wood for fires, drawing water from the springs to soak their dry biscuit, weaving branches into little round bowers to shield them from the midday sun. There is nothing like the lazy industry of the Turkish soldier: he never hurries, but war has yet to invent the task that will find him wanting. There was only one thing that might be too much for him—that beautiful, diaphanous, soft-shining belt of mist stretched over the plain. That was the fever of Thessaly squeezing itself out into the morning. Perhaps it was as well that we were to strike camp and be moving again.

So we rode down to Pharsala on the evening of May 16, and established our depot there in a house we found empty. Next morning we rode out and overtook the first brigade of the central advance; then rode on into the narrowing plain and sat down to see the battle of Domoko.

MAUSER RIFLES.

A BAND! I had an idea that bands never went into action nowadays, but this was unquestionably a band. Rather a good band, too—not the barbaric clash and blare of the usual Turkish music, but something with a melody as well as a rhythm! As I marvelled it swung round the little hill where I sat—sure enough a real complete military band. And behind it, striding out, erect, elastic, almost supernaturally un-Turk, came the brigade from Adrianople. All young men, for they were of the Nizam, or regular army, whereas nearly all the regiments in action hitherto have been of the Redif. All had white canvas knapsacks; all the fezzes were in shape; all the rifles were Mauser repeaters, not Martinis, and all were sloped at the same angle; all the uniforms were uniform, clean, well-fitting; all the men kept step, long and brisk. The army corps of Adrianople is the pick of the Turkish army. It was a revelation after the sloppy, ragged-bearded Redifs. Here were battalions both Turk and un-Turk—Turk in the solid, dogged resolution of their advance, un-Turk in the spick-and-span smartness of their gear, in the springing, swinging smartness of their gait. With the music swelling and dwindling at their head, and the dancing rifles swaying up and down with it along the column, quivering with the expectancy of their first battle, the young men strode along the dusty road towards Domoko.

It was the last Greek stronghold this side of the old frontier—by nature the strongest hold of all, and by circumstances that which they were like to hold most strongly. I am no expert in military positions, but I should doubt if there could be found a stronger in the whole world. Domoko stands at the head of a pass which climbs from the Thessalian plain on to a little tableland, which is really one of the mountains of Othrys. We could see the town miles above us, as it seemed—broad, flat, white houses, one storey with a door for the stables below, one storey with many windows for the living rooms above—hanging in the air, clinging round a sugar-loaf peak, with a flat, battlemented, medieval-Venetian fortress like a diadem on the top.

From the fortress and from a peak above, behind and to the left of the town, thundered two big fortress guns, five or six inches apiece. From positions right and left of the winding road, which zigzags up the cleft between two mountain masses, thundered the guns of four field-batteries. On the lowest slopes, across the road and to right and left of it, bending forward so as to converge a fire on any front advance, ran the dim, grey-yellow streaks which I had learned to know for entrenchments, held by infantry. Against all this—against six times their force, against a sheer two thousand feet of death—marched buoyantly the Mauser rifles.

It was a hideous bungle from start to finish. To attack such a place in front was staring madness, as Edhem saw quite clearly. But to attack it he had five divisions and a brigade. Of course it was necessary to deliver a feint in front to keep the Greeks to their guns and their trenches, and the Mauser rifles, with a division of Redif behind them, were there to do it. But who could have ever thought that on seven battalions out of seventy would be laid the burden of fighting the whole battle? The plan, if you remember, was this. Haidar Pasha's division was in reserve. The division of Neshat Pasha, with the Adrianople brigade—which was, in fact, only seven battalions—took the main front road along the valley to the foot of the ascent to Domoko. Hairi was to march along the hills on our right, and Hamdi on the left; thus the position would be turned on both sides. Meanwhile Memdhuk was to pass right by Domoko, and occupy the Furka Pass behind it. It was one more attempt to surround the Greek army—to destroy or capture it. And once more the attempt failed.

Hairi Pasha was the first to appear. At eleven o'clock the head of his advance-guard came into view of the little eminence where I sat and watched between the two armies. First a group of loose skirmishers; then, after an interval, a little group of men—the point; then the solid mass of the main body of the advance-guard; then the connecting-link with the main body; then, with no more interval, but steadily blackening the plain, trooping on, till they seemed to swallow it up in their multitude, came the masses of Hairi's infantry and the long trails of Hairi's guns. But Hairi—first blunder—was marching in the plain in such a line that he must either clog Neshat at the bottom of the pass, or get up into the mountains in face of the Greek left. And Hairi—second blunder—did not start till six in the morning, so that the Greeks could watch every step of his advance, and his men had to fight after five hours' march under the sun. Neshat started about the same time and came into action a couple of hours later. Memdhuk himself only started in earnest—he was posted forward on the left and some say he broke camp earlier, but what matter?—at four in the morning and Hamdi at five, though he too had to make a long circuit over a perpetual seesaw of rugged hills. A night-march would have brought the troops into action fresh, and after all they could not have missed their times and their directions much worse in the dark than they did in the day. But there was no night-march; divisions arrived, not together, but dropping in one after another. And for the third, and blackest blunder of all—but that presently.

Hairi found the enemy at eleven. We could see the Greek cavalry cantering about in the village of Tsioba, but his skirmishers could not. They crawled on—when would they be fired on? On and on, till they looked to be shambling on to certain death. Then the half-dozen horsemen between us and the village galloped violently back, making signals. Surely the skirmishers would see them. No; they shambled on. Then suddenly the white smoke shot out from behind a hedge in front of the huddle of red roofs. Half the squadron had dismounted, and were using their carbines ; the other half were already mustering for retreat in a court at the back of the village. But even when the fire came—even then the skirmishers did not seem to notice. They only spread out a little to left of the village, and shambled on. Crack, crack, crackle—the troopers were putting it in very briskly, but not one of the twenty-odd shambling figures either went down or stopped. Then the smoke drifted lazily away, more figures dashed into the court behind Tsioba, and then the whole group streamed out in mad gallop across the plain. Then, when we could see that the village was empty, the twenty-odd raised their rifles, and began to fire. Still firing they shambled into the village, and they shambled out of it the other side. The division, which had halted, crawled on again, crawled through Tsioba, crawled on an hour across the plain. There it came to the foot of the hills, and there again it met with a feeble fire. And there it stayed.

There it stayed. Hairi was ordered to advance, but there was a battalion or so in front of his sixteen ; he said he would lose too many men, and there he stayed. Neshat Pasha also was ordered to advance with his twenty-three battalions, of which the men from Adrianople were the leading brigade. He had come up with his staff to the rocky slope where I sat. The brave old man was in boisterously high spirits, as always in action; he laughed and clapped his hands like a boy when the advance-guard flushed a hare. But he seemed to have no idea at all of the part he was expected to take in the battle. When the order came to advance, he did not like it. Already he had got his men huddled up in the road in front of the Greek guns, till a shell or two, well planted, hurried them at the double under the shelter of a huge granite wedge that cropped up out of the plain. There they had waited, about a mile or over from the enemy, while Neshat tardily sent a couple of batteries forward to his left on the open plain and attempted a fire against batteries behind earthworks, hundreds of feet above. But now, at half-past three, Neshat was ordered to advance, and what wonder if he did not like it? Hairi was standing still, his battalions black and motionless upon the plain. He had brought one battery into action, which kept up a lazy fire, more by way of requesting the Greeks to let the division pass than of driving them before it. Now he could hardly make himself felt before dark. We had heard a little intermittent firing on the left, which must be Hamdi; from its position, and from the rugged way he had to come, it was pretty clear that he, too, could not get at the enemy before dark. Neshat had sent the second of his three brigades up towards the hills on his left, presumably with a vague idea of supplementing Hamdi's flank attack, or of replacing it with one of his own. But this had already halted, and even it could not conceivably make itself felt for an hour or more. Some one had blundered; every one had blundered. And about half-past four or five, to retrieve the blunders, to make one attempt to get something done before nightfall, against that terrible tier of entrenched fire they slammed in the Mauser rifles.

They brought up all their available guns to help the boys in their desperate venture. As the carriages of the corps artillery clattered and roared along the road, I galloped beside them, and scrambled up on to the granite hill just as the brigade was deploying from behind it. They trooped out into the tall corn-fields in an order which showed that, with all their smartness, they had been taught little enough of the methods of war. They trooped out like draughtsmen on a draught-board. In this loose order the rear ranks must needs shoot the front ranks, while no possible volley could be fired to terrify an enemy they could hardly hope to hit. As they moved confidently forward under their first fire, a shell, with an angry, spiteful "phutt," burst in the middle of a clump of them not yet deployed. All went down; half stayed down, but the other half sprang to their feet again, shook themselves, and moved confidently forward again. More shells fell among them; more little, dark, motionless blots drilled holes in the green wheat-field. But always they moved on.

And now began the most furious fight of all the war. Ten batteries to right and left of our little hill hammered away at the Greek guns. The Greek guns sometimes whizzed a shell over our rock and sometimes dropped one into the gun-horses to left and right of it. But in the main they relentlessly hammered away at the men from Adrianople. They went on. One of our guns blew up a Greek limber full of shell; there was a geyser of flame, then a geyser of grey smoke, spreading very slowly out into a mushroom. But the other batteries still peppered the men from Adrianople, and the men from Adrianople still went on. They came up to a thousand yards of the entrenchments, and curling blue lines of smoke showed that their skirmishers had opened fire—opened fire against three-foot banks of earth. And then there burst from the Greek lines a hellish storm. Savage volleys snarled along the trenches in front and left and right. They came so fast that you would have said it was the Greeks who had repeating Mausers, instead of our dotted brigade. The flashes ran like red lightning along the works; the dull smoke rose from them in rolls, and hung sullenly on the skirts of the hills. Still the young men went on. How pitifully their poor little individual puffs showed by the side of the smashing, crashing hail of the Greeks! Yet they went on. And now, on the Greek right, we saw figures hurrying helter-skelter back from the most advanced trenches. They were Italian red-shirts, we found out next day, and they left their dead behind them. But from the Greek centre and left the lead came thicker yet, as the brigade pushed on and on—and then, at five hundred yards or so, coming out of the corn-field into the fallow, it stopped. On the low ground, before that torrent of fire, every man must have been swept down. Still they clung on.

But now their only hope was either night or Hairi or Hamdi. Night would save them from annihilation: Hairi or Hamdi might lift them to victory. “O das Kamel, das Kamel,” screamed a German captain between his clenched teeth, and shook his fist away towards the right: “der brillanteste Brigad der ganzen Armee!" But Hairi was still black and motionless on the plain. Will he never move? Is he not moving now—no; not there—further on the right? No; he is not moving, damn him, and he will never move. The trickle of fire from the young men in front is getting feebler. The sun is dipping down over the hills, though, and the shadows are slanting right across the plain. And there is Hamdi coming in—at least, there is a brisk fire on the hills leftward—and is that not Hamdi's men answering it from the other hill? Yes, it is Hamdi, and it is miles and miles away. It is all over. Now we can hardly see the smoke, it is getting so dark. Hairi is blotted out in the shadow; may he never leave it! And now there is nothing left but the flashes in front. The guns have said their say; they are limbering up and drawing back for the night. And in front are still the belching spurts of fire from the Greeks; and in front still—how pitifully few and far apart—the distressful, desperate, defeated, dauntless sparks from what is left of the Mauser rifles.

Out of 4000 or so that went into action, they lost, killed and wounded, more than 1000. Two battalions out of the seven lost their commanding officers. One battalion lost all its officers but two. They came limping and groaning past my fire all night. The Greeks went in the night, of course. Hamdi had done that: he came late, but he came in time to turn the murderous bungle into an empty victory. But in the morning the field was like a sieve with those little black holes. In the morning I saw twenty of the boys just being covered up in one shelter-trench—arms and legs cramped as in the sleep of nightmare. In the morning the corn-field was sown anew before it was reaped, with dead young men in new uniforms, and beside them, just out of reach of clutching, blackening fingers, Mauser rifles.

XXVII.

THE GHEGAS.

THEY turned up somewhere about a week after we occupied Larissa. They wore a neat enough blue uniform along with the white pointed Pierrot-fez of Albania, but they were not regular troops. They were all volunteers; they came to the war from the north of Albania, of all whose clans the Ghegas are reputed the most tameless. They came unpaid for the fighting, the glory—and the loot. It is a mistake to suppose that the Albanians refuse to serve in the Sultan's army; there are battalions on battalions of Albanian regiments. So that the irregulars had few men of military age. About two-thirds were in their teens—some of them smooth, open-faced boys, who looked as if they might be in the Fifth Form; others larrikins of twenty, hair shaved in front, and one tuft hanging out raggedly behind like a Red Indian's scalping-lock; but for that and their straight lithe bodies they might have come straight out of Bethnal Green. Half the remainder were old, old men of sixty or seventy or eighty; fierce browed fathers and grand-fathers, who had tramped down from the mountains to show the boys the way to glory—and loot.

Larissa they drew blank. They spent a day or two on its pavements looking hungrily at the tight shop-shutters; there were too many sentries. But they gutted about a third of Pharsala after the battle, and Domoko they turned into a little hell. They did not loot much—the Greeks had not left much to loot; but they burned and they shot at large about the streets. Some of them made a hollow pretence of shooting pigs, but most loosed off at random, aiming at nothing, for the pure delight of the thing. Bullets whistled as joyously as cocoa-nuts on a bank holiday; it was splendid fun—only about half as dangerous as a battle.

But the burning became a nuisance. It was said the Greek irregulars burned a mosque as they retreated; certainly the mosque was burned, and I saw a great fire in Domoko before daybreak, before as yet our men had gone in. But whether the Greeks burned the mosque, or it caught fire from the next houses, the Albanians did the rest.

It was all I could do to get my pony through the live embers the morning after the fight. Half the village by the afternoon was empty shells. And at eleven that night the nuisance became a curse. I had taken an empty house, having declined, in view of the Ghegas, an invitation to sleep in the same building as the deserted Greek ammunition. I was sleeping peacefully on the floor after three nights' bivouac. Suddenly I heard the voice of Charlie. "I'm fright," he hoarsely exclaimed; "'ouse on fire: come on boys." Sure enough the house—or to be quite literal, the adjoining one—was on fire, flaming to heaven and sending a Niagara of sparks on to our roof. As I put on my clothes again and went to finish the night on the road, I damned all white fezzes with a will. And all up and down the hot streets these tireless Fifth Form boys and bank-holiday 'Arries went on shooting, shooting, shooting at nothing till dawn.

But next day I had my revenge. I saw the Ghegas in action. First, however, I must explain what had happened on the 18th, the day after the battle. I spent it myself about Domoko, riding round the Greek positions and chasing the censor. The Greeks, we found, had left one gun of position behind them—also two big houses full of ammunition, estimated by the enthusiastic captors at a million rounds. They had also found letters on the dead red-shirts which they were wholly unable to read, but which filled them with mingled indignation and pride. There were half-a-dozen of them, mostly half illiterate. Here was one just written from a son to his father, which would now never be sent, thanking him for twenty lire, and wishing that he had never been such a fool as to come to Greece; here was one from a wife to her husband, thanking God that the war was over and that he would soon return. Here was the passport of Robert Sinclair, lieutenant in one of his Majesty of Norway's dragoon regiments—made out for a journey through Germany, Austria, and Italy. The owners were all lying dead on the slopes of the road up to Domoko.

Meanwhile the Greeks were making the best of their way over the Furka Pass to Lamia. Memdhuk, of course, arrived too late to cut them off at its foot. His skirmishers just got up in time to fire a few shots at them, and then they were off and over the heights. In the afternoon Seyfoullah took the Turkish advance-guard up to the Pass; but he only found a rear-guard in occupation of it, and after an hour's desultory firing they withdrew down the southern slopes. Seyfoullah had only one battery of mountain-guns with him; the Greeks for a wonder had broken the road up to Domoko in two places, where it passed over mountain-burns, and it was not till well after mid-day that the field-artillery got up to the village. In the early morning of the 19th the guns were sent on over the ten miles of fairly level table-land between Domoko and the Pass. The divisions of Memdhuk, Haidar, Hairi, and Hamdi were by this time gone forward also, though I do not think either of the latter went up the pass: in the evening they were camped, at any rate, Hamdi to the left of the ascent, and Hairi at the village of Daukli to its right.

I rode out in the early morning, passing much infantry and artillery on the road, and began to ascend the wooded serpentine of the Pass. Nobody expected any fighting; everybody believed the war over. But half-way up I met the advanced batteries of the corps artillery coming down. A little farther on I met his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief coming down. Mahmud Bey was with him, and had important news to tell: the advance-guard was in the plain of Lamia; the cavalry had occupied Thermopylæ; the Greeks were in full retreat over Oeta to Athens. I ought to have known better at this time of day than to believe Turkish information, but to-day this seemed not so unlikely : if it was true, this was indeed the end. However, the Marshal said I could go on to the top of the Pass if I liked, and I went—not so much in the hope of seeing any Greeks as with the wish to look down on the other side. At the top I found Haidar and Memdhuk ; Memdhuk, too, was just going down. He was not in the least abashed by his failure to cut off the enemy. “There was an English journalist,” said the jolly little General, “came to Ellassona before the war, and advised us not to try to beat the Greeks : go home and tell him you saw Memdhuk Pasha sitting on the top of the Furka Pass.” Memdhuk belongs to the school which regards the occupation of territory as the one end of war : here was he on the Furka Pass, and whether the Greeks had been smashed or not was all one to him. The war was over, said Memdhuk and Haidar also. Nevertheless, I just went down a little way to look round the elbow of the Pass at Thermopylæ.

From one of the little hawthorn-grown promontories that jut out over the winding road I saw a line of black heads breaking the curve of a round hill below. A battalion of Reserves was struggling up a larger hill which commanded it. Somebody remarked that the men on the lower hill wore no fezzes. By George, they're Greeks !

With the word came a crack and a splutter, and then the familiar snarl of a volley. The battalion on the upper hill hesitated; some of the Turkish officers looked grave. But Seyfoullah Pasha was in command, and Seyfoullah is no disciple of the Turkish school which enjoins a week's rest to give a retreating enemy time to take himself together again. A company of Turks was lying behind the promontory on which I was. I thought they were in reserve, but they may have been shirking. Seyfoullah galloped right into the middle of them on his big chestnut, lashing out with his riding-whip. They slouched moodily round the hill into action.

Then down came the Ghegas. A whoop and a yell and a dozen rifle-shots behind us, and they were streaming down the slopes like a couple of football teams when a fast man has got away with the ball. No pretence of order; no officers visible, though a standard was tossing about somewhere in the middle of the scrimmage; no care to see where the enemy was, before opening fire; no effort not to shoot their brothers in the back. A couple of staff-officers rode furiously up to them; they raced on without a moment's heed. Seyfoullah rode at them with an oath to try to form them in line, to turn them leftwards to cut off the enemy. But not they.

They scampered straight down the slope in a long, loose trail, and began to bound up the higher hill straight for the enemy. Every man was yelling; everybody was firing fast and joyously into the backs of his brethren. It was not war; it was just fighting—blind, deaf, mad, lustful fighting. The croakers who complain that war is turning into mathematics never saw the Ghegas going into action.

Of course the Greeks took no notice of them; why should they? A few spent bullets may have come their way, but that was nothing. They kept up their volley-firing at the battalion above them. They were reinforced; the growling volleys swelled. It looked as if the little rear-guard skirmish might grow into a general action. And our field-guns were all the other side of the Furka, and our infantry was somewhere on the rearward slopes also—only nobody quite knew where. They routed up a mountain battery, but it was slow and opened too far in rear. Haidar Pasha hurried down to command, but he did not seem quite to realise what was going on. Time went on, but the Greeks did not go back. More than one eye turned anxiously back up the pass.

But other eyes happened to light on the gold and crimson standard of the Ghegas. They were not scampering now like boys on a football field.

The standard was not dancing ; it was going very sober and steady and slow—but it was going on. The Ghegas were all going on. Bent half double, they were striding with lithe stealthiness over the rocks, following the standard, firing. They were firing slower now,—they were firing at the enemy. The crimson bunting and the white fezzes crawled on with caution, yet with swift-ness : here a quick glide forward, there a shot or two behind cover. And so the red and white stole on. Now it was at the corner of the big hill round which, between it and the Greek hill, ran the road. And now I woke up to the fact that the volleys had suddenly ceased.

The Greeks were in retreat. And the Ghegas had done it—the worst soldiers and the best fighters in the world. They never came back nor halted, nor formed up into any kind of formation. They strode on like young roes down the Pass after the Greeks. As I followed them down I found plenty of hard-faced boys tossed aside on the road with bullet-holes through their faces. I found a white-headed old man coughing and choking on a rock, with his four sons supporting him, and perplexedly wondering whether anything could be done that he should not die. But if the sons stayed behind, the cousins and nephews went on. So they pushed the Greeks down. They were still a sort of football team, only better together. Till the armistice came up with the white flag they dribbled the Greeks down towards Lamia.

The next day they took away the Ghegas' rifles, and confidence revived. They disbanded them and sent them home. The Ghegas trailed off as they had come, back to their happy valleys, to fill up the interval to the next war as best they can with blood-feuds and any stranger-shooting that may offer itself. Some trailed after the broad-shouldered young ruffians who marched with the standard, whose braided trousers and embroidered gaiters proclaimed them chiefs. Others went quite alone and unarmed, sleeping carelessly in the middle of the road: who would dare lay finger on a Gheg? One smiling, white-haired, turbaned, spectacled patriarch of eighty rode all by himself on a bare-backed donkey—probably the last loot of a well-spent life. And though from the point of view of loot the campaign had been a string of unredeemed disasters, I incline to think, on a general view, that donkeys, and even ponies, will be plenty this season in the happy valleys of Albania.

HOMeward.

THE armistice came up with the white flag from somewhere about Lamia. We could see the grey town at the bottom of the Pass; we could see the black columns of the Greek main body heading across the plain for the snow-crested wall of Oeta opposite us; we could see the broad miles of sea-lapped flat which they absurdly call the Pass of Thermopylæ. The Greeks' rear-guard was on the last slope—the Ghegas were driving it down; the one mountain battery had come forward and was shelling it merrily; the cavalry was just behind us on the winding road; it was only two o'clock. At last, thanks to Seyfoullah's energy, we should get at the Greeks retreating along the level, with four hours of good daylight to cut them up in. And then, of course, up came the white flag.

The guns sank into sulky silence. With difficulty they silenced even the Ghegas. Up came the tall officer in green with a crooked sabre, and the strutting little man in black; never did I see—small blame to him—so queer a mixture of embarrassment and swagger. From Haidar Pasha in nominal command to the powder-blackened bombardiers, we crowded round to see what they had to say to Seyfoullah. Seyfoullah led them aside awhile and spoke Greek: they saluted and started back down the pass. Then it came out. They said that an armistice was made—an armistice when we were all but into the plain of pursuit. Seyfoullah replied that he knew nothing about that, but he would cease firing until he heard from Edhem. And on the top of that comes a message from Edhem to say the armistice is concluded indeed; we must cease firing and go no further down the Pass. And that was the end of the Turko-Grecian war.

So find the ponies, Charlie, and let us mount and get back over to Domoko before it is dark. In one way the end of all things came none too soon. For lunch that day we had just one tin of corned beef—the tin painfully torn asunder with a pocket-knife—between four owners. To the four we had to add a Swiss officer, who gave us a little, little slice of black bread apiece, and had, of course, to be thanked in beef; and Seyfoullah, who for his share of the feast contributed a soldier's biscuit and half-a-pint of water. The horses had nothing at all, neither drink nor fodder, for the slopes of the Pass were long burned bare by the May sun. The most of Seyfoullah's half-pint of water went to moisten the biscuit to breaking-point, and Charlie refused point-blank to ask the soldiers for any more. "You ask the one soldier, 'e give it," explained Charlie, "then 'im no got it water for 'isself,"—and who could press the point? Perhaps it was just as well the war was over. But it was possible that supplies had come up from the depot at Pharsala during the day: let us hurry home.

Of course we lost ourselves that night. We had added a dishevelled landau to our caravan during the days at Tekes, and we left it at the foot of the Pass to fill itself up with green corn for the horses; there was not a bite in Domoko. And half-way across the table-land it was unanimously declared by the soldiers that the Mushir Pasha had not gone back to Domoko at all, but was now in the village of Daukli, away westward. It might be true. You never knew what his Excellency would do: his Excellency had a very educated taste in water, and was accustomed to go where the spring was good. So we sent back the disgusted Charlie to head off the carriage, and back across country in the gathering dark we headed for Daukli. The ponies were faint and starving, but the game little men took ditches with a will, and only snatched a little in passing even at the tall barley. And so we got to the blazing bivouac, where the Albanians were building up screens of brushwood to keep off the cold night wind. "Mushir Pasha here?" "No; Mushir Pasha not here; Ferik Pasha there." Ten thousand imprecations: it was only a—well, a General of Division. It turned out to be Hairi Pasha; and recalling what I had sent off the day before about Hairi's conduct in action, it was almost a relief that he did not offer dinner.

And then a cheery "M'Seevens" out of the dark, and the admirable Charlie was there with the carriage, and the carriage was full to overflowing with green corn. Charlie had been boarded on the way by Ghegas demanding bread, but he readily answered that this carriage belonged to the Marshal. The ponies would just submit to wait a second while we slipped off the bridles, and then how they fell to! Meanwhile we ate bread and cheese—what bread! what cheese!—and conversed with an officer of the Ghegas. He gave us tobacco—no Albanian is ever short of tobacco, as the Sultan's customs-officers can tell you. Not quite realising who he was, we offered to pay him, whereat he opened the door of a little hovel close by and disappeared. But he came out again and relented when we apologised, and offered to show us his horse. He had brought a small horse from Albania, he explained, but it had died; but now the Pasha had given him a good horse. We said we were always delighted to see a good horse. Solemnly he opened the door of the hovel. It was a windowless cellar—perhaps fifteen feet by ten. From one corner a fire drenched it in bitter smoke. In front of it on the damp earth, one rolling over the other, lay eight of the Ghegas asleep, and snoring like electric tramcars. Behind, rifles between their knees, binding filthy rags on to raw wounds, were two more. And at the very back, leaning faintly against the wall, a running sore on its back and its hip-bones sticking through its skin, eleven-two in its shoes, loomed the good horse. We thanked him much for showing it, and got out into the air again; but all the same it was interesting to have seen the quarters of a gentleman of the Ghegas.

It was too late to try and catch the censor now. Hairi kindly lent us a cellar to sleep in; it was all he had to lend, and they brought us a most adorable dish of mutton-fat after we had half gone to sleep. We rode back to Domoko in the grey dawn next morning. A day to rest and write, and call finally on Edhem Pasha, and then I was off to ride home. I had only been away ten weeks, and only half of it war, but I felt as if I had not been in England since I was a boy. One long look from the top of the pass at the flat carpet of the Thessalian Plain, in its walls of mountain—and it looked yet more beautiful than it had done on the first day from Meluna. Then down, down, and through the strings of dis-banded Ghegas and ponies still bringing up precautionary ammunition from Pharsala. Two hours' shelter from the mid-day sun in Pharsala, picking up the depot, and then out again to Larissa. Was the Thessalian Plain ever so rollingly, damnably interminable?

It was the campaign all over backwards. Here was the grey granite wedge whence we watched the Mauser rifles go down before Domoko. There the corn-fields where we followed the attack upon Vasili. There on the left was the barn where we roasted the lamb; above the Marshal's Bairam camp at the shrine of Tekes. Larissa now, to pack up the traps. Who is it coming in? Saad-ed-Din Bey to borrow a tin of butter? Give him three, God bless him! Then we came to the spring whence we started to ride into Larissa.

Then up the winding reaches—and here was dear old Meluna—how absurdly desolate and naked now, with only one captured siege-gun on its way to Constantinople. And now dear old Ellassona, with six hours' sleep on a Wallach's un-Keatinged divan. Out again next morning. Serfidje now, with the dear old Mutessarif, as kindly a gentleman as ever, cooking a royal dinner at three in the afternoon. Over the pass again to Karaveria—who would have thought it was so far up when we cantered down in half an hour: there is the very place where Andreas came off—and then lunch with real cherries! And then the train, and then once more—was it not years ago?—the first hotel in Salonica. It was almost impertinent in Salonica to be so obtrusively the same age as it was two months before. The train once more—don't cry, Charlie; we'll meet again, and you shall be my dragoman again when Austria comes down to Salonica—and lunch at Uskub once more, and the frontier, and Vienna, and Dover, and London.

A SUMMARY.

It would have been more impressive as a war if it had been less delicious as a comic opera. It had its solemn moments, no doubt. Nobody has yet invented a kind of war which can be conducted without hurting somebody sometimes, although Prince Konstantinos came nearer to it than had ever seemed possible. For, whereas we had believed that the object in war was to destroy the enemy's army, what we saw looked more like a benevolent conspiracy between the two generals commanding-in-chief to spare innocent blood. The Greeks hurried away the moment it threatened to be necessary to start shooting Turks in earnest. Upon that the Turks held back for a week, apprehensive lest the men might forget themselves, and do irreparable hurt to the Greeks. Domoko and the pursuit over the Furka were the only exceptions on either side.

It was a race for defeat between cowardice and apathy, and cowardice won. Cowardice—it is useless to try and explain facts away with any other word. It is true that Europeans from both sides have said that the Greek rank and file fought well; others, more discreet, have said that they would have fought well if they had been given a chance. Perhaps a correspondent following his first campaign has no right to dogmatise. But even he has one standard of comparison—the Turks—and it is impossible to imagine the Turks breaking in panic after three days of intermittent ineffective shelling, as did the Greeks. Unless the Greeks have enormously understated their own losses—which is likely—and unless the Turks have enormously underrated their own success—which is not—the Greeks left one magnificent position after another before they had so much as begun to suffer. The rank and file were ordered to retreat, no doubt; but they were not ordered to retreat in disorder and throw away their ammunition. They were not ordered, it may be presumed, to evacuate Deliler or Vasili before they were driven out—yet out they went when they got under fire and saw the Turks coming.

The truth seems to be that they made a mistake, which in a less conceited people would perhaps be pardonable: they underestimated their power of enduring the strain of continued fighting. They did not realise what fighting meant. They fought well the first day, at Meluna, and never once afterwards. The great battle of Mati, which broke them down, was not a battle at all. Until I saw the descriptions of it in the newspapers I did not know that anybody ever thought it was a battle. The real battle was for Saturday, and the Greeks bolted on Friday night. After that they were quite done with. A regiment retreated very steadily and well at Pharsala, and I complimented them, thinking them to be Greeks, but next thing I learned that they were the Foreign Legion, placed, as usual, in the post of danger. Then, at Velestino and Domoko, they fired good volleys at a weaker enemy from behind earthworks. But at Velestino they could have cut Naim's brigade to pieces if they had dared break his feeble centre; at Domoko they were off the moment they began to be outflanked. So they were always. And why not? say their friends. Outflanked by a superior enemy, what could they do but retreat? Strategically the Crown Prince was, first and last, in the right. Yes; but they knew when they went to war that the enemy would be superior; they knew that the strongest position could be turned. If their object was not to fight, it would have been best attained by remaining at peace. Once at war, nations of spirit believe it their duty to fight—to fight at strategical advantage, if possible, but always to fight. At Plevna Osman was not only outflanked, but surrounded. He deliberately stayed to be surrounded, and he nearly saved Turkey. But such deeds as those of Plevna are to the Greeks foolishness. They strove not to die for their country, and they succeeded.

The Turks gave them every chance. It was amusing to find people in England thinking that the Turkish army was officered and directed by Germans. How many German officers were there really with the Turks? asked all my friends when I returned. And I answered confidently: not one. Grumbkow Pasha arrived on the third day of the war, and he left on the eighth; after him I am sure there was not one single German. Certainly I did not know all the officers in the Turkish army; but I do know that if Germans had been directing the campaign they must occasionally have shown themselves in the neighbourhood of the General Staff, and they never did. But, indeed, the silly fiction is its own refutation. Nobody except a Turk could possibly have conducted a campaign with such consideration for a beaten enemy. Ask the German correspondents. Disillusioned enthusiasts—how reverently they approached a real war, conducted by the army of the Kaiser's friend! How eagerly they watched the movements, and with what joyful recognition they labelled them with their technical names! And then—then, when there were movements, and nothing to develop them, and often when there were no movements at all—then to see doubt and perplexity melt into contempt, and laughter, and tears! How they swore, and wept; and called a pasha—a German captain, mark you, called a general—“das Kamel!” No, no; if it had been a German army in disguise, there would have been some order and system in it. Movements would have been timed; operations would have been carried right through; and generals would have been degraded and shot nearly every day.

The Turkish army beat the Greeks in its own wonderful way. To what extent it beat them is almost more difficult to explain than it is to say why it beat them. Never was there a war about which it was so heart-breakingly impossible to be sure of a name or a number or a date. Names of places you could generally identify on the map; if you could not, it was hopeless to ask them of anybody but Seyfoullah. Even Sey-foullah has been spelt on half-a-dozen different systems since he attained a European reputation, and I am only moderately confident of my own rendering because I have seen him spell it thus himself. For dates the Turk seldom goes beyond yesterday and to-morrow; hours of the day the Turkish system rules out altogether. Numbers were, if possible, more hopeless still. To expect the Turkish army to know what force it had, and what men it lost, is to ask grapes of thistles. You can make rough guesses. For instance, I know on European authority that after Domoko 800 to 900 men came into hospital; so that with killed and wounded who never came into hospital, but just left themselves to get well, the loss was probably from 1200 to 1500. On a very rough calculation the losses of the whole campaign—including sick—may have mounted up to 7000. But no Turk would ever put it at anything so unsensational. Most would probably answer with perfect truth, "It is not known." Others, as a low or a high figure appealed to their momentary sense of the fitness of things, would answer a hundred or a hundred thousand.

Really nobody knows. I suppose there must be some sort of untrustworthy roll-call kept somewhere, but I never saw any sign of it in Thessaly. Even if there had been, it would be impossible within a matter of weeks to find out whether a man was killed, wounded, or only missing. Nobody knew the country; nobody knew the disposition of the country. Men lost their battalions by the score, and strolled over the Thessalian Plain by the day looking for them. "Have you seen my battalion?"—the question has been put to me a dozen times in a day's ride. Of course Charlie always directed the straggler to the last battalion we had met. Ten to one it was the wrong one—in which case off went the wanderer on his travels again—ten to one in the wrong direction. One day on the Meluna an Albanian private—dirty, dust-stained, white-capped, rifle slung over shoulder—stalked the headquarters, and asked if anybody there could kindly direct him to his battalion. He had got separated from it, he explained, with a comrade or two, and he wanted to get back quickly, as he had heard there was fighting. I expected to see him shot or confined to barracks—except that there were no barracks to confine him to. But oh dear no! A colonel politely pointed out the direction of his battalion, and he went off and beckoned to his friends below the hill. But evidently they backed their opinion against the staff; they strolled off their way and he his. When you get little incidents of this kind day by day, how can you possibly tell the strength of an army or the tale of its losses?

The Turkish army is summed up in the Turkish transport service; it is like the pack-horse, which brings up its ammunition and bread and water. Strong, patient, stupid, slow, and indomitable, it goes its own way, whoever tries to guide it. Nobody is responsible for it; nobody knows who organises it; it knows not itself whence it comes, nor whither it goes; when it set out, nor when it means to arrive. Untroubled, it stumbles and blunders on, and somehow Allah brings it straggling into camp at nightfall. So it is with the Turkish army. It makes wonderful marches; only it starts at the wrong time, and arrives at the wrong place. It walks unafraid into a blizzard of bullets; only it has no firing-line and no fire-discipline, and the rear ranks shoot down the front ranks, and the artillery shells both. The cavalry cheerfully charges earthworks with other earthworks on its flank; only when the enemy is retreating the cavalry is held religiously back from pursuit. Engineers there were none at all: crossing the line one day to Pharsala, I came on a couple of Italian engineers whom they had to import from Salonica to patch up a Greek railway-engine. Infantry battalions were taken from the fighting-line by half-dozens for road-making and transport. Thus the Turkish army shambled on to victory.

In fine, the Turks have the best soldiers and the worst officers in the world. The Turkish soldier is titanically enduring, heroically fearless, angelically disciplined. He obeys his officer like a good child; he will walk starving through a street of bread-shops if his officer but says "Don't touch." Albanians are different—neater and quicker in body, impetuous and uncontrollable in spirit. But with the Turks, even as they stand, good officers could do anything in the world, and good officers are what they lack. For if the Turkish soldier is the raw material of the finest fighting in the world, his officer is the finished product of one of the worst Governments in the world. Nobody becomes a scoundrel in a moment, but it must be owned that his career leaves him very little alternative in the long-run. He is not, of course, the monster of cruel iniquity which British fancy often paints him. Outwardly he is a nearer approach to the British idea of a gentleman than the Briton will often encounter between Dover and Zibeftche. Courteous, dignified, hospitable, often vain, but never a swaggerer, he has the root of gentlemanliness in him—a sure self-confidence and self-respect. You will not find in him the jerky self-assertiveness of many Continental officers. He can maintain his dignity without any duello or court of honour. He is quite sure of himself.

You may divide the Turkish officer into two clearly marked types—each with virtues, each with vices. As favourable examples I cannot do better than take two I knew fairly well—Hussein Avni Bey and Yunus Effendi. Avni was a Constantinopolitan, Yunus a Ghég from the wilds of Albania. Avni was a man of wealth. One uncle was a Pasha; two others owned extensive property in Thessaly; Avni himself had an estate there. Yunus hadn't a penny to bless himself with: he dressed in rags, and the reason he longed for promotion was that he had a wife and two children, and could hardly keep them from starving. Talat Pasha, he told me, gave him a pound for distinguishing himself at Meluna, but even a pound would not last for ever. Try to imagine a general tipping a subaltern a sovereign for gallantry in action, and you will get a better idea of the two classes of Turkish officer than I can give you in pages of comparison. Avni, to resume, was twenty-three; Yunus was on the fringe of fifty, but Avni, being a full lieutenant, was Yunus's superior officer. Avni was a man of refinement and education: he spoke and read French very well; he was quite emancipated from fanatical Mohammedanism, and carried his bottle of sweet champagne like a man. He was well-read in his profession, and spoke of "les lois de la tactique" with the same hushed awe as of "sa Majesté Impériale." One of these laws, I remember, was that you must never on any account attack the enemy unless with at least double his force. Nor can I imagine Avni doing any such thing, for he had not even the makings of a real soldier. He had never been out of a town in his life before: I don't believe he had even seen his estate in Thessaly, although he had once visited Larissa. He was a wobbly and tactless horseman: he puffed heavily uphill; he could ride along a road twice daily for a week, and then not recognise it when he struck it in the middle. He could live on next to nothing—apparently all Turks can—but he was more than a bit of a slug-a-bed. He never did anything on his own responsibility. Although he had no duties to speak of—he spent two days map-making at Larissa, and complained that it told heavily on his eyes—he preferred to go off for a picnic on his estate to waiting to see what happened after the repulse at Velestino. One day I was riding with him up to the Meluna, when there came down a pony with baggage, which he thought he recognised. "The Marshal is in retreat, the Greeks are advancing," he cried, and without another word whipped round and was well on his way down the Pass before he could be persuaded to ask whether his fears were not groundless.

Yunus, on the other hand, would have attacked an army of the enemy by himself if there had been nobody else present to help him. He was as brave as a bull-dog and as wiry as a ferret. He knew every stone of his mountains, and went over them like a hart. He could live for ever on dry biscuit and water, and sooner than touch wine he would have read a book. Only I don't think he could read, nor yet write his name. He knew his men and his men knew him, and obeyed him; but except this I am afraid he had not the least possible qualification to command them. Take him out of the mountains he knew, and I doubt if he could have led his men straight. Certainly he could not if an enemy to be gone for had presented himself on the way; to go for the enemy was the beginning and the end of Yunus's tactics. He had no field-glass—though he could see better without than I could with one of Ross's best—and had not the vaguest idea of what was going on: if he had got his men into a hole he would have left them there shooting till the last man dropped.

Such were Avni and Yunus. If Avni has luck

he will die a Pasha—a well-meaning but incompetent Vali, or a safe but timid General of Division. If Yunus has luck he will be shot in a frontier scrimmage, a captain at seventy. Remember that both these men—in that both were honest, and sincere, and good-hearted—were exceptionally favourable specimens of their class. Some of the other Yunuses whimpered over wounds that would not take a private out of the firing-line. Some of the other Avnis were rank cowards. There was a high-officer whom we used to call the Turkish military attaché, because he was always sitting about with us taking notes, and never took any other part in the campaign. Riding with him one day from Pharsala to Velestino, we came on a village that had not yet been occupied by the Turks. We were about a dozen armed men—but nothing would persuade him to go through the village, and he implored us not to go. Of course the Greeks came out and salaamed and brought us milk to drink, and even Aslan, who had promised himself at last the bit of Bashi-Bazouking which his soul longed for, was constrained to put his revolver back again. But the Turk had galloped round behind a hill—and met us quite unashamed on the other side. Besides this, the worse sort of Constantinopolitan was idle, an intriguer, a peculator, and a spy ; and so, according to his opportunities, was the worse sort of provincial.

As for the Generals—excepting only Edhem, Seyfoullah, and Riza—they were hopeless, especially the Generals of Divisions. All were excellent, good fellows ; all were insubordinate, sluggish, absolutely incapable of combination, ignorant of the very range of their guns. When they ought to have cut off the Greeks and the Greeks got off, they were as pleased as little children. Quite honestly they could see no difference between destroying the enemy and merely forcing him to retreat. Quite honestly they believed each time that the Greeks had had a tremendous thrashing, and were all but annihilated. They had not the least idea of their own losses : how could you expect them to estimate those of the enemy ?

It was a war of hyperbole—a page out of ‘Tartarin de Tarascon.’ It had been planned—nobody quite knew how—that the enemy was to be surrounded and annihilated ; the enemy was not to be seen anywhere, the Turk was occupying his position, and the sun was very hot—why, surely, yes, he had been surrounded and annihilated. Of course. “ Oui, oui, mon cher ami, je vous donne ma parole d’honneur, la parole d’un aide-de-camp de sa Majesté : l’armée de l’ennemi n’existe plus.” You want to see the dead and prisoners with your own eyes? Dear, dear, these English! why, I tell you it is so: yes, I saw it myself. Dear, dear, these English are never satisfied—strange creatures. For himself, the Turk was quite satisfied. He believed his own fictions whole-heartedly. He sat down, looked at his beard for days together, and smoked cigarettes and drank coffee until some day somebody discovered that the enemy was not annihilated after all. Then the Turk got up, collected any troops that were lying about, spent a week in making a plan, forgot it as soon as it was made, and let the Greeks go again. Then again he quite sincerely gave his word of honour there were no more Greeks left, and fell to contemplating his beard again.

And the Greeks were scurrying across country for their little lives, screaming, "The Turks are upon us!" Queer war.

XXX.

WHAT WAR FEELS LIKE.

THE strange thing about war is that it is so wonderfully like peace.

Going to war is like coming of age. You expect to wake up one morning and find everything changed—a new self in a new world. You do wake up, and you are very much the same sort of boy at twenty-one as at twenty. So with war. You are rather disappointed to find yourself doing exactly the same things in war as you do in peace. You wear very much the same clothes ; you eat—when you can get it—rather more than the same amount of breakfast ; your disposition is no harder nor bloodthirstier than before. The horrors of war, of which you expected so much, leave you quite unmoved—just because you did expect so much.

You wondered whether you would be sick when you came across the dead, and you were not even sorry. They were so still and restful—neither hot nor cold, nor hungry nor thirsty, nor tired nor famishing for sleep any more; it was not possible to be very sorry for them. Even when death had caught them unawares, twisting them awry and gnarling arms and legs, they only looked like strange shapes turned out of a mould, and you cannot weep for a shape out of a mould. When a shell had ripped all the features off a face, it was not pleasant to look at; but there was nothing human left about it to stir compassion. Put it in a Greek trench and cover it up; hang up its fez on a peg at its head. The poor crumpled fez that used to get so carefully blocked and ironed every morning in Ellassona,—it was so much more pathetic than the body. Somebody will cry for the body, but not us. There are plenty of bayonets left in its battalion; roll up your overcoats, and sling on your water-cans, and march, and leave it behind.

The wounded were worse, but even with them tragedy soon lost its poignancy. In any other army the treatment of them would have been an atrocity. As soon as the war was general and wounded were plenty the ambulance service broke down utterly. A man was hit at six in the morning. One of the rare surgeons, or else a comrade, tied up the place with a handkerchief, and left water, if there was any, at his side. There he lay in the sun till nightfall. When it was dark, and the Greeks had begun retreating, his comrades came back with a pony and a pack-saddle. The wounded man was hoisted on—clinging with his hands to the pommel if he could; if not, spread-eagled on his belly and tied with ropes. So he stumbled on all night, ten or twenty or thirty miles to the hospital. Arrived there—unless he had the luck to get into the Ottoman Bank Hospital, with expert Swiss and French and Turkish surgeons—the army doctor prodded at him with a probe. By the time the limb was a bundle of bleeding ribbons it was nearly an even chance that the bullet would be worried out. And when he saw the bullet the bleeding bundle turned peacefully over and went to sleep. He had seen with his own eyes that the bullet was out,—that was all right. And in three weeks he was on his legs again. Why not? He never touched liquor in his life, and seldom saw meat; his blood was clean and sweet, his muscles lean and hard, his nerves he had never heard of in his life. Why should he ever die?

With the dead gone out of the world of human sympathy, and the wounded beginning to heal up from the moment they were hit, there was little enough left to draw the line between war and peace. Not even in action. It was interesting to see masses of men trying to kill each other, but not surprising: you knew before that this was what they did in war. It was more surprising to see them sit about and talk and smoke through the best part of an engagement, quite unperturbed. And a cigarette tasted no better and no worse in war than in peace.

I had a sort of silly idea that they put civilians away during war-time. It was pleasant, then, to see elderly gentlemen in flame-coloured night-gowns and rainbow-coloured turbans, sitting about watching the battle, smoking cigarettes, and applauding well-placed shells as if they were late cuts to the boundary. One day when I was watching a side-issue of a fight on a stony hill, a slim gentleman with an umbrella came up and saluted me. It was my banker, who had shut up his bank and his tobacco-monopoly business and come out to spend a quiet afternoon with the war.

Yet war was still like coming of age. One day you start thinking and you suddenly see that some time, somehow—you don't know when or how—you have really become a man: the boy of twenty is gone, and there is a new self in his place. So once more with war. Gradually, imperceptibly, there was an utter difference after all. You saw it much better when you got into the enemy's country. The preoccupations of peace had imperceptibly ceased to preoccupy; things that mattered everything had ceased to matter in the least. The sum of it was that everything artificial, conventional, social, had vanished, and you were left the bare, natural man. Not absolutely so, perhaps, in a correspondent's case, for civilisation naturally hung longest round headquarters; but even for a correspondent very nearly so. It no longer mattered what your clothes looked like; but it mattered as it had never mattered before that they were not too hot in the sun and not too cold in the night wind. Bread was a food that you never set much store by before, and perhaps it may be true that it contains less nourishment than cocoa, chocolate, or beef-lozenges. But bread fills up the empty stomach while the other things do not, and the empty stomach howled aloud to be filled. And so you searched diligently for common, vulgar bread, or soldier's dog-biscuit for that matter. Your stomach had to be filled. In peace there are hosts of people whose business it is to make it easy for you to fill your stomach at the proper time. In war they are all gone, and you have got to see to filling it yourself when it needs it.

In peace, if you have rheumatism, you remember Elliman's Embrocation and St Jacob's Oil. You buy some, and presently say it has cured you. In war you haven't got Elliman's Embrocation and St Jacob's Oil, so you just leave it alone and let nature cure you—like a savage.

You come back to the common, natural division of day and night. We civilised English people have superseded day and night. We have got curtains to shut out the morning sun and electric lamps to supplement the stars. But in war marching and shooting can only be satisfactorily done by daylight, and there is no daylight to spare. So marching and shooting begin as soon as there is light to march and shoot by, and if you are not awake by then you will miss it. And if you have not suppered yourself and found your sleeping-place and looked to your horses by nightfall, you will lose supper and bed and horses together. There is nothing left then but to go to sleep, which you have been hungering to do half the day. So you go to sleep when it begins to get dark, and you get up as soon as it begins to get light—just like a savage.

It is in this return to the naked state of nature that consist both the charm and the devilishness of war. The charm you will understand readily. War is the only quite complete holiday that has yet been invented. Perhaps you realise it best when your tailor's bill, after a devious and precarious journey of three weeks or so, is delivered to you on the morning of an engagement. How utterly pointless is the absurd little scrawl! What in the world has it to do with anybody? Bills, debts, taxes, business—yes, and engagements, etiquette, matters of public interest, meal-times, the law of the land, respectable clothes, return of post, hours of the day, days of the week, days of the month—all the complex civilised tyranny summed up in the word “arrangements”—you are free of it all. You have to eat and drink, to keep yourself warm, to get from one place to another, and, so far as is compatible with doing your duty, to avoid being shot. That is all. You feel in war as you feel when you have got your clothes off—alone with your naked untrammelled self.

Yet it is this suspension of everything which has validity in time of peace that makes the devilish cruelty of war. If nature, in the absence of Elliman and St Jacob, cannot keep you from rheumatic fever, why, then, as like as not, you have to die. You never did any harm to the Greek gunners over there, but their shell won't turn aside from you for that. You get rid of arrangements when you don't want them, but then they won't come and help you when you do.

Crueller still is it to see peace trying to go on by the side of war. It is an intoxicating privilege to be able to ride straight across a field of young vines in war-time, but after all the vines were planted for purposes of peace. You cut green corn for your horses—you have to—but you can't help thinking of the man who ploughed and sowed and will never reap. During the first battle of Velestino I saw a hen go, business-like, into a barn, and after a little while come out, her cackle shrilling triumphantly over the grinding musketry and banging guns. By evening the barn was burned, and the egg with it; the hen was plucked and on the fire. It was a small thing, but it seemed hard that she should have been put to the trouble of laying that last purposeless egg.

Saddest of all were the foals. The new-dropped foals, whose mothers had been taken straight away to carry cartridges, went trotting up and down the line of march calling for them. You knew the slightly querulous, expectant expression of a foal's hairy little face. The baby was getting very hungry and tired. He was quite confident of finding his mother,—she was there only an hour ago. But where could she have got to meanwhile, and why didn't she come to comfort him when he cried? They all starved. And I saw one little bit of a chestnut filly foal trying to struggle up a slope of the Furka with a forefoot lopped off at the pastern. Some devil must have done it to prevent her from following her dam. She tumbled over and whinnied, jumped up and hobbled a foot or two, tumbled over again and moaned. Yet the soldier was only a devil in that he should have shot her through the heart instead of cutting off her foot. For the chestnut filly had to die anyhow. She was part of what we call the inevitable wastage of war.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Spectator.

"An admirable, brief, and most intelligent portrait of America and the American of to-day, for which we may all be grateful. We do not know anything more lifelike, or in which a vivid perception of the points which best elucidate character and circumstances are better displayed. The survey is rapid, the impression keen."

Speaker.

"The whole book is quick with living interest, and many of its verdicts are uncommonly shrewd."

Times.

"The book is not only brightly written, but it has a value as containing the remarks of a shrewd observer, both on the immediate question on which the election turned and on the present phase of a national character which is undergoing more rapid modifications than any other national character in the world, except the Japanese."

Daily Telegraph.

"One of the smartest books of travel which has appeared for a long time past.....Brings the general appearance of Transatlantic urban and rural life so clearly before the mind's eye of the reader, that a perusal of his work almost answers the purpose of a personal inspection. New York has, probably, never been more lightly and cleverly sketched."

Daily Chronicle.

"One of the best, brightest, most informing, most sympathetic, most impartial studies of America ever given to the British public."

Guardian.

"The best book that we know of for giving the English reader a vivid and distinct notion of what the United States are like—like in their views and tendencies as well as outside things."

World.

"Nothing seems to have escaped his observant eye, whether it be hotels, trains, dairy-farms, or strikes; whether Niagara, the Mormons, the Chinese quarter at 'Frisco,' or where New York lives. All these and many other matters are written of with breezy frankness and in a quaint and humorous spirit; in fact, the whole three-and-thirty chapters do not contain a dull page."

Graphic.

"The book is distinctly one to be read by every Englishman."

Bookman.

"Every line is lively, commonsensible, quick-witted, and unprejudiced."

“K. S. Ranjitsinhji has produced the best and most complete work on cricket that exists.....A thorough treatise on the art and craft of cricket in all its departments, full of personal experience and observation, and expressed with unusual freshness and variety.”—Times.

“The most monumental book on cricket which has yet appeared. The volume is splendidly got up, and really deserves to rank high as a scientific treatise,—there is no other word for it.....It is the most complete exposition of the theory of cricket which has been given to the world.”—Spectator.

“Ranjitsinhji's pages are full of information. While acquiring his own perfection as a player, he has obviously made a close study of his contemporaries, his criticisms revealing an intimate knowledge of all their peculiarities of play.”—Daily News.

OLD MEMORIES. By General Sir HUGH GOUGH, G.C.B., V.C.
With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

“The book is written in a straightforward, soldierly, thoroughly interesting fashion, and as a collection of side-lights thrown by an old soldier on important events it is both welcome and valuable.”—Daily Mail.

“We have rarely met with a more straightforward modest record of gallantry than this book. Gen. Sir Hugh Gough tells his story like a brave man and a soldier.”—Academy.

THE WOODLAND LIFE. By EDWARD THOMAS. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

“Very daintily drawn and beautifully-finished sketches in pen and ink of wild nature in our woods and meadows.”—Pall Mall Gazette.

“These sketches contain much clever word-painting, and at their best remind one somewhat of a landscape by Mr Alfred Parsons, founded on an exact knowledge of the external features of hedgerow and woodland, combined with a true feeling for tone and colour, and bringing a welcome breath from the country to those whose daily lives are ‘in cities pent.’”—Times.

LIFE OF VICE-ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE TRYON, K.C.B.
By REAR-ADMIRAL C. C. PENROSE FITZGERALD. With 2 Portraits and numerous illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo, 21s.

“Admiral Fitzgerald has discharged his very difficult task with no less skill than discretion.....He has drawn the portrait of a remarkable seaman with a seaman's frankness and directness of delineation, and with a felicity of touch which makes his work full of interest.”—Times.
