The duke sent for John Wickliff, who was then the divinity reader in Oxford, and had commenced several disputations contrary to the form and teaching of the pope's church in many things, and had been deprived of his benefice. The opinions which he began to put forth in Oxford, in his lectures and sermons, were these:—That the pope had no more power than others to excommunicate any man—that even if it be given by any person to the pope to excommunicate, yet to absolve the same is as much in the power of another priest as in the pope. He affirmed, that neither the king nor any temporal lord could give any perpetuity to the church, or to any ecclesiastical person; for that when such ecclesiastical persons sinned, and continued in the same, the temporal powers ought to take away from them what before had been bestowed upon them, which he proved to have been practised here in England by William Rufus. Which (said he) if he did lawfully, why may not the same also be practised now? If he did it unlawfully, then does the church err unlawfully in praying for him.

Besides these his opinions and assertions, with others which are hereafter to be mentioned in order, he began also to touch the matter of the sacrament, proving that in the sacrament the accidents of bread remained not without the substance, both by the holy scriptures, and also by the authority of the doctors, but specially by such as were most ancient. As for the later writers he utterly rejected them, saying, that the simple and plain truth appears in the scriptures, to which all human traditions whatever must be referred, and specially such as are set forth and published now of late years. This was the cause why he refused the later writers of decretals, leaning only to the scriptures and ancient doctors, affirming out of them, that in the sacrament of the body which is celebrated with bread, the accidents are not present without the substance; that is to say, that the body of Christ is not present without the bread, as the common sort of priests in those days did dream.

Although through the favour and support of the duke of Lancaster, and Lord Henry Percy, he persisted hitherto, and was protected against the violence and cruelty of his enemies, at last, about A. D. 1376, the bishops still urging and inciting their archbishop Simon Sudbury, who had already deprived him, and afterwards prohibited him, had obtained by process and order of citation to have him brought before them, both space and time for him to appear was assigned to him after their usual form.

The duke having intelligence that Wickliff was to appear before the bishops, and fearing that he was too weak against such a multitude, called to him out of the orders of friars, four bachelors of divinity, one out of every order, to join them with Wickliff, for the greater security. When the day was come assigned to Wickliff to appear, which day was Thursday the 19th of February, John Wickliff went accompanied with the four friars, and the duke of Lancaster, and Lord Henry Percy, lord marshal of England—the Lord Percy going before them to make room and way where Wickliff should come.

As Wickliff, thus sufficiently guarded, was coming to the place where the bishops sat, they animated and exhorted him not to fear or shrink before the bishops, who were all unlearned as compared with him. With these words, and with the assistance of the nobles, Wickliff approached to the church of St. Paul in London, where a great concourse of people was gathered to hear what should be said and done. Such was the throng of the multitude, that the lords (notwithstanding all the authority of the high marshal) with great difficulty could get through. The bishop of London seeing the stir that the lord marshal kept in the church among the people, speaking to the Lord Percy, said, "That if he had known before what authority he would have assumed in the church, he would have stopped him from coming there." At which words the duke, not a little angered, answered, "That he would keep such authority there, whether the bishop liked it or not."

At last they pierced through and came to our Lady's chapel, where the dukes and barons were sitting with the archbishops and other bishops. John Wickliff, according to the custom, stood before them, to learn what should be laid to his charge. The Lord Percy kindly bid him to sit down; but the bishop of London in anger said, "he should not sit there. Neither was it fitting," said he, "that he, who was cited before his ordinary, should sit during the time of his answer." On these words a fire began to kindle between them, so that they began to rate and revile one another.

Then the duke, taking Lord Percy's part, answered the bishop with hasty words. The bishop far excelled him in this railing art of scolding; so the duke fell to threatening the bishop, that he would bring down the pride not only of him, but also of all the prelacy of England; and softly whispering in the ear of the person next him, said, that he would rather pluck the bishop by the hair of his head out of the church, than he would take this at his hand. This was not spoken so secretly, but that the Londoners overheard him. Upon which they cried out in rage, that they would not suffer their bishop to be abused so contemptuously, but would lose their lives rather than allow him to be drawn out by the hair. Thus that council, being broken up with scolding and brawling for that day, was dissolved before nine o'clock.

Upon the 21st of June (A.D. 1377,) the worthy and victorious prince King Edward III. died after he had reigned fifty one years. A prince not more aged in years than renowned for many heroic virtues, but chiefly remarkable and applauded for his singular meekness and clemency towards his subjects and inferiors, ruling them by gentleness and mercy, without rigour or severity. Among other noble and royal ornaments of his nature, he is described as a "father to the orphan, compassionate to the afflicted,—mourning with the miserable,—relieving the oppressed,—and a friend to all that wanted a helper in time of need" &c. But above all other things in this prince in my mind deserving to be commemorated, is, that above all other kings of this realm, to the time of King Henry VIII., he was the greatest bridle of the pope's usurped power, and outrageous oppressions: during all the time of this king, the pope could never entirely succeed in this realm, and John Wickliff was maintained with favour and sufficient support.

KING RICHARD THE SECOND.

After King Edward succeeded his grandson, Richard II, at the age of eleven years: who was crowned at Westminster A.D. 1377, and who, following his father's steps, was no great opponent to the doctrine of Wickliff: although at the beginning, partly through the iniquity of the times, and partly through the pope's letters, he could not do all he wished in his behalf. The bishops now seeing the aged king taken away, during whose old age all the government depended upon the Duke of Lancaster; and now again seeing the duke, with the Lord Percy, remain in their private houses without intermeddling, they thought now was the time to gain some advantage against Wickliff; who had some degree of rest and quietness under the protection of the duke and lord Marshal. It is already stated how when he was brought before the bishops, by the means of the duke and lord Henry Percy, the council was interrupted, and brake up, by which Wickliff at that time escaped without any further trouble. These articles were at that time collected out of his sermons.

That the Holy Eucharist, after the consecration, is not the very body of Christ, but figuratively.

That the church of Rome is not the head of all churches: and that Peter had not any more power given by Christ, than any other Apostle had.

That the pope of Rome has no more in the keys of the church, than has any other person in the order of priesthood.

That the lords temporal may lawfully and deservedly take away their temporalities from the church-men who persevere in offending.

That if any temporal lord know the church to be so offending, he is bound, under pain of damnation, to take the temporalities from the same.

That all the Gospel is a rule sufficient of itself to rule the life of every christian man here, without any other rule.

That all other rules, under whose observances various monastic persons are governed, add no more perfection to the Gospel, than does the white colour to the wall.

That neither the pope, nor any other prelate of the church, ought to have prisons wherein to punish transgressors.

Besides these articles, various other conclusions were afterward gathered out of his writings and preachings, which the bishops sent to pope Gregory at Rome: where being perused, they were condemned for heretical and erroneous by three-and-twenty cardinals.

The next year following, (A.D. 1378,) being the first year of King Richard II. Pope Gregory sent the following bull by means of one master Edmund Stafford, directed to the university of Oxford, rebuking them sharply, imperiously, and like a pope, for suffering so long the doctrine of John Wickliff to take root, and not plucking it up with the crooked sickle of their catholic doctrine.

Gregory the Bishop, the servant of God's servants, to his well-beloved Sons, the Chancellor and University of Oxford, in the Diocese of Lincoln, Greeting and Apostolical Benediction.

We are compelled not only to marvel, but also to lament, that you, considering the apostolical see has given to your University of Oxford so great favour and privilege, and also that you flow as in a large sea in the knowledge of the holy scriptures, and ought to be champions and defenders of the ancient and catholic faith (without which there is no salvation) by your great negligence and sloth will suffer wild cockle, not only to grow up among the pure wheat of the flourishing field of your university, but also to wax strong and choke the corn. Neither have ye any care (as we are informed) to extirpate and pluck the same up by the roots, to the great blemishing of your renowned name,—the peril of your souls,—the contempt of the church of Rome,—and to the great decay of the ancient faith. And further (which grieves us) the increase of that filthy weed was more sharply rebuked and judged of in Rome, than in England where it sprang. Wherefore let there be means sought by the help of the faithful, to root out the same. Grievously it is come to our ears, that one John Wickliff, parson of Lutterworth in Lincoln diocese, a professor of Divinity (would God he were not rather a master of errors) is run into a kind of detestable wickedness, not only and openly publishing, but also vomiting out of the filthy dungeons of his breast, diverse professions, false and erroneous conclusions, and most wicked and damnable heresies. Whereby he might defile the faithful sort, and bring them from the right path headlong into the way of perdition, overthrow the state of the church, and utterly subvert the secular policy. Of which his mischievous heresies some seem to agree (only certain names and terms changed) with the perverse opinions, and unlearned doctrine of Marsilius of Padua, and of John Gandane, of unworthy memory, whose books were utterly abolished in the realm of England, by our predecessor of happy memory John XXII., which kingdom does not only flourish in power, and abundance of faculties, but is much more glorious and shining in pureness of faith; accustomed always to bring forth men excellently learned in the true knowledge of the holy scriptures, ripe in gravity of manners, men notable in devotion, and defenders of the catholic faith. Wherefore we will and command you by your writing apostolical in the name of your obedience, and upon pain of privation of our favour, indulgences and privileges granted unto you and your university from the said see apostolical; that hereafter ye suffer not those pestilent heresies, and those subtle and false conclusions and propositions, misconstruing the right sense of faith and good works (howsoever they term it, or what curious implication of words soever they use) any longer to be disputed of, or brought in question; lest if it be not withstood at the first, and plucked up by the roots, it might perhaps be too late hereafter to prepare medicines when a greater number is infected with the contagion. And further, that ye apprehend immediately, or cause to be apprehended the said John Wickliff, and deliver him to be detained in the safe custody of our well-beloved brethren, the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London, or either of them. And if you shall find any gainsayers, corrupted with the said doctrine (which God forbid) in your university within your jurisdiction, that shall obstinately stand in the said errors: that then in like manner ye apprehend them, and commit them to safe custody, and otherwise to do in this case as it shall appertain unto you: so as by your careful proceedings herein, your negligence past concerning the premises may now fully be supplied and recompensed with present diligence. Whereby you shall not only purchase unto you the favour and benevolence of the see apostolical, but also great reward and merit of Almighty God.

Given at Rome at St. Mary's the Greater, xi. Kalend of June, and in the 7th year of our consecration.

The pope also sent letters of similar purport to the University of Oxford and to the bishops, and even to the King Richard.

The bishops being again assembled, and Wickliff being brought before them, they proceeded to examine him, when a certain personage of the prince's court, and yet of no very noble birth, named Lewes Clifford, entering in among the bishops, commanded that they should not proceed with any final sentence against John Wickliff. At these words they all were so amazed, that they became speechless. And thus by the unforeseen providence of God, John Wickliff escaped the second time out of the bishops' hands.

At the time of his examination, John Wickliff exhibited to the bishops in writing the following protestation, with a declaration of his mind, upon the following articles.

The Protestation of John Wickliff.

"First I protest (as I have often before done) that I do mind and intend with my whole heart (by the grace of God) to be a true christian, and as long as breath shall remain in me, to profess and defend the law of Christ. And if it shall happen that through ignorance or otherwise I shall fail therein: I desire of my Lord God pardon and forgiveness. And now again as before also, I do revoke and retract; most humbly submitting myself under the correction of our holy mother the church. And forso-much as the sentence of my faith, which I have holden in the schools and elsewhere, is reported even by children, and moreover is carried by children to Rome: therefore lest my dear beloved brethren should take any offence by me, I will set forth in writing the sentence and articles, for which I am now accused and impeached: which also even to the death I will defend, as I believe all christians ought to do, and specially the bishop of Rome and all other priests and ministers of the church. For I do understand the conclusions after the sense and manner of speaking of the scriptures and holy doctors, which I am ready to expound: and if they shall be found contrary to the faith, I am ready to revoke, and speedily to call them back again."

This protest was accompanied by an exposition of the articles exhibited against him.

The next year, which was 1382, by the command of William archbishop of Canterbury, there was a convocation held at London, at which John Wickliff was also commanded to be present. But whether he appeared personally or not, I find it not certainly affirmed.

Of the articles attributed to John Wickliff, there were ten which were condemned by the friars as heretical, the rest as erroneous, and are as follow. It may be supposed, that some of them were made worse by their sinister collecting, than he meant them in his own works and writings.

The Articles of John Wickliff, condemned as Heretical.

1. The substance of material bread and wine remains, in the sacrament of the altar after the consecration.
2. The accidents do not remain without the subject in the same sacrament, after the consecration.
3. That Christ is not in the sacrament of the altar truly and really, in his proper and corporal person.
4. That if a bishop or a priest be in deadly sin, he cannot ordain, consecrate, or baptize.
5. That if a man be duly and truly contrite and penitent, all exterior and outward confession is but superfluous and unprofitable.
6. That it is not found or established by the gospel, that Christ did make or ordain mass.
7. If the pope be a reprobate and evil man, and consequently a member of the devil; he has no power given to him over faithful christians, except it be given him by the emperor.
8. That since the time of Urban VI., there is none to be received for the pope, but every man is to live after manner of the Greeks, under his own law.
9. That it is against the scripture, that ecclesiastical ministers should have any temporal possessions.

The other Articles of John Wickliff, condemned as erroneous.

10. That no prelate ought to excommunicate any man except he knew him first to be excommunicate of God.
11. That he, who so excommunicates any man, is thereby himself either a heretic or excommunicated.
12. That a prelate or bishop excommunicating any of the clergy, who has appealed to the king or the council, is thereby himself a traitor to the king and realm.
13. That all such who leave off preaching or hearing the word of God or preaching of the gospel for fear of excommunication, are already excommunicated, and in the day of judgment shall be counted as traitors to God.

14. That it is lawful for any man, either deacon or priest, to preach the word of God without the authority or licence of the apostolic see or any other of his catholics.

15. That so long as a man is in deadly sin, he is neither bishop nor prelate in the church of God.

16. Also that the temporal lords may, according to their own will and discretion, take away the temporal goods of the churchmen whenever they offend.

17. That tithes are pure alms, and that the parishioners may, for offence of their curates, detain and keep them back, and bestow them upon others, at their own will and pleasures.

18. Also, that all special prayers applied to any private or particular person, by any prelate or religious man, do no more profit the same person, than general or universal prayers do profit others, under similar circumstances.

19. Moreover, if any man enters into any private religion, whatever it be, he is thereby made the more unapt and unable to observe and keep the commandments of God.

20. That holy men, who have instituted private religions, whatever they be (as well such as have possessions, as also the order of begging friars having no possessions) in so doing, have grievously offended.

21. That religious men, (i. e. monks,) being in their private religions, are not of the christian religion.

22. That friars are bound to get their living by the labour of their hands, and not by begging.

23. That whoever gives any alms to friars, or to any of the mendicant orders, is accursed, or in danger thereof.

While the archbishop and suffragans, with the other doctors of divinity and lawyers, with a great company of babbling friars and monastics were gathered together to consult as to John Wickliff's books, at the Gray Friars in London, upon St. Dunstan's day after dinner, about two o'clock, the very hour that they should go forward with their business, a wonderful and terrible earthquake fell throughout all England. Several of the suffragan bishops being frightened, thought it good to leave off from their purpose. But the archbishop confirmed and strengthened their hearts and minds, which were daunted with fear, to proceed in their attempted enterprise. Then discoursing upon Wickliff's articles, not according to the sacred canons of the holy scripture, but according to their own traditions, they pronounced and gave sentence, that some of them were simply and plainly heretical, others half erroneous, others irreligious, and some seditious, and not consonant to the church of Rome.

Whereupon the lord archbishop of Canterbury, wishing to check such heresies and errors, delivered to the chancellor, his letters patent to be executed as follow :

"William by the grace of God archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolic see, To our well beloved son in Christ the chancellor of the university of Oxford, within the diocese of Lincoln, greeting, grace, and benediction. The prelates of the church, about the Lord's flock committed to their charge, ought to be so much more vigilant as that they see the wolf, clothed in sheep's attire, fraudulently go about to worry and scatter the sheep. Doubtless, the common fame and report is come unto our ears, &c. We will therefore and command, straitly enjoining you, that in the church of our blessed lady in Oxford, upon those days in the which customarily the sermon is made, as also in the schools of the university upon those days when the lectures are read, ye publish and cause by others to be published to the clergy and people, as well in their vulgar tongue, as in the Latin tongue, manifestly and plainly without any curious implication, that the same heretical and erroneous conclusions, so repugnant to the determination of holy church, as is aforesaid, have been and are condemned; which conclusions we also declare by these our letters to be utterly condemned. And that furthermore you forbid, and canonically admonish and cause to be admonished, as we by the tenour of these presents do forbid and admonish you, once, twice, thrice, and that peremptorily, that none hereafter hold, teach, and preach, or defend the heresies and errors above said, or any of them, either in school or out of school by any sophistical cavilling or otherwise: or that any admit to preach, hear or hearken unto John Wickliff, Nicholas Herford, Philip Reppington, canon regular, or John Ashton, or Lawrence Redman, who are vehemently and notoriously suspected of heresy, or any other whatever, so suspected or defamed; or that either privately or publicly they either aid or favour them or any of them, but that immediately they shun and avoid the same as a serpent which puts forth most pestiferous poison. And furthermore we suspend the said suspected persons from all scholastical act, till such time as they shall purge themselves before us in that behalf: and that you denounce the same publicly by us to have been and be suspended; and that ye diligently and faithfully inquire after all their favourers, and cause to be inquired throughout all the halls of the university. And that when you shall have intelligence of their names and persons, that ye compel all and every one of them to abjure their outrages by ecclesiastical censures and other pains canonical, under pain of the greater curse, which against all and singular the rebellious in this behalf, and disobeying our admonitions, we pronounce: so that their fault, deceit, and offence in this behalf deserve the same (the said admonition of ours being first sent) which in this behalf we esteem and allow canonical, that then and again according to the effect of these our letters, &c. The absolution of all and singular such, which shall incur the sentence of this instrument by us sent forth (which God forbid) we specially reserve unto ourselves: exhorting you the chancellor by the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ, that to the utmost of your power hereafter you do your endeavour, that the clergy and people being subject to you, if there be any who have strayed from the catholic faith by such errors, may be brought home again to the praise and honour of his name that was crucified, and to the preservation of the true faith. And further our will is, that whatever you shall do in the premises, in manner and form of our process in this behalf it be had and done: and that you for your part, when you shall be required thereto, plainly and distinctly do certify us by your letters patents, having the tenour hereof."

The conclusions and articles mentioned in this letter are above prefixed. Of which some were condemned for heretical, some for erroneous.

After this, the archbishop directed his letters of admonition to Robert Rigge commissary of Oxford, for repressing this doctrine: which notwithstanding, both then, and yet to this day (God be praised) remains.

The Examination of Nicholas Herford, Philip Reppington, and John Ashton.

Some days afterwards, on June 18th 1382, in the chamber of the preaching-friars afore mentioned, before the archbishop in the presence of divers doctors and bachelors of divinity, and many lawyers both canon and civil, whose names are under written, appeared Nicholas Herford, Philip Reppington, and John Ashton, bachelors of divinity. Who after oath taken to give judgment upon the conclusions aforesaid, were examined severally, each by himself, before the archbishop. Who there required day and place to deliberate upon the conclusions, and to give their answer to the same in writing.

Two days afterwards, when the answers were returned, the lord archbishop of Canterbury demanded of all the doctors what their judgment was touching the answers that were made upon such conclusions. All which doctors severally said, "That all the answers given to the first, second, third, and sixth conclusions, were insufficient, heretical and subtle; and that all the answers made, especially to the ninth, tenth, and last conclusions, were insufficient, erroneous, and perverse." Whereupon the lord archbishop of Canterbury, considering the answers to be heretical, subtle, erroneous, and perverse, accordingly as the doctors had weighed and considered, admonished Nicholas and Philip; assigning to them eight days' space, that is to say, until the twenty-seventh day of the month, and that then they should appear before the said lord archbishop of Canterbury, to hear his decree that should be made in that behalf. This done, the archbishop of Canterbury admonished and cited John Ashton, under the tenor of these words following :

"In the name of God, we, William, by God's permission, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, legate of the see apostolical, and through all our province of Canterbury, chief inquisitor of all heretical pravity, do monish and cite thee, John Ashton, master of arts, and student in divinity, appearing before us, judicially to say and speak the plain verity touching these conclusions, to which we refer thee, and to which we have caused thee to swear, laying thy hand upon a book," &c.

After this citation, John Ashton was examined before the bishops, and his answers not proving satisfactory to them, they determined against him, and then the archbishop proceeded thus :

"And thou John Ashton, admonished and commanded by us, as is aforesaid, after thine oath taken, without any reasonable cause, or any other license, neither wouldest thou, nor yet wilt, but refusedst, and yet dost contemptuously, to answer to such conclusions before us ; judicially according to our admonition and commandment aforesaid ; we do hold all such conclusions to be by thee confessed, and thee the aforesaid John, with all thy aforesaid conclusions, convicted. And, therefore, we do pronounce, and declare by giving sentence that thou John Ashton, concerning those conclusions, which by us, with good deliberation of divers prelates, our suffragans, and also divers and sundry professors of divinity, and other wise men and learned in the law, according to the canonical sanctions, being condemned and declared for a heretic, and heretical hast been, and still art a heretic, and thy conclusions heretical. And as touching thy other conclusions, by us heretofore counted erroneous, and for erroneous condemned, we do pronounce and declare sententially by these our writings, that both thou hast erred, and dost err."

On the appointed day, the archbishop, with the doctors, being assembled in the chief house of his church at Canterbury, before the hour of nine, expected Nicholas, Philip, and also Thomas Hilman, calling them and looking after them ; nevertheless they appeared not before two o'clock the same day. At which hour the archbishop of Canterbury examined Thomas Hilman, who then and there judicially appeared, what his opinion was touching the aforesaid conclusions, who, somewhat stammering at them and their meaning, at last to all the conclusions then read and expounded to him, thus answered, "I suppose and judge all and singular those conclusions lately condemned by my lord of Canterbury to be heretical and erroneous, even as the same my lord of Canterbury, and other doctors of divinity, of the canon and civil law, by common consent and counsel have supposed and thought. And the same (being for heresies and errors, as before is said condemned) I do, as much as in me is, condemn, protesting that I will hold and affirm the contrary of those conclusions, and in the same faith live and die." Then the archbishop of Canterbury, sitting as tribunal or judge, pronouncing Nicholas and Philip, guilty of contumacy and disobedience, for not appearing in court, excommunicated them for their contumacy, as follows :—

"William, by God's permission, archbishop of Canterbury, &c. To our beloved Son in Christ, whoever he be, that this instant Sunday shall preach at St. Paul's cross in London, salutation, grace, and blessing. Forasmuch as we appointed a certain day and place to Master Nicholas Herford, and Master Philip Reppington, canon regular of the monastery of our lady of Leicester, being doctors of divinity, and suspected of heretical pravity (after certain answers not fully made, but impertinent and nothing to the purpose, as also heretical and erroneous) in divers places of our province commonly, generally, and publicly taught and preached, and that therefore they should judicially appear before us, to do and receive peremptorily in that behalf whatever the quality of that business should move us to : and that we have for their contumacy in not appearing before us at that day and place, adjudged as right therein required. We, by these presents, command and commit to you, firmly enjoining you, when all the multitude of people shall be gathered together to hear your sermon, that in the day and place appointed you publicly and solemnly denounce the aforesaid Nicholas and Philip, holding up a cross, and lighting up a candle, and then throwing down the same upon the ground, to have been so and in such manner excommunicated, and still continuing so.

"Fare ye well. In our manor house at Lambeth, the thirteenth day of July, the year of our Lord 1382, and first year of our translation."

The archbishop sent also another letter to Master Rigge, commissary of Oxford, straightly enjoining and charging him, not only to denounce the sentence of excommunication, and to give out public citation against them, but also to make diligent search and inquisition through all Oxford for them, to have them apprehended and sent up to him, personally before him to appear at a certain day prescribed for the same. Whereby it may appear how busy this bishop was in disquieting and persecuting these poor men, whom he should have nourished and cherished as his brethren.

The archbishop not contented with this, solicits the king to join the power of his temporal sword, for he well perceived that as yet the popish clergy had not sufficient authority, by any public law or statute of this land, to proceed unto death against any person in question of religion, but only by the usurped tyranny and example of the court of Rome. Where note, gentle reader, for thy better understanding, the practice of the Romish prelates in seeking the king's help to further their bloody purpose against the good saints of God. The king being but young, and not arrived at years of ripe judgment, was seduced by the archbishop to give his private assent to an ordinance, which was indeed the very first law to be found against religion and the professors thereof, bearing the name of an act made in the parliament held at Westminster, in the fifth year of Richard II. Where among other statutes then published, and yet remaining in the printed books of statutes, this supposed statute is to be found, (cap. 5. & ultimo).

"Forasmuch as it is openly known that there be divers evil persons within the realm, going from county to county, and from town to town, in certain habits under dissimulation of great holiness, and without the licence of the ordinaries of the places, or other sufficient authority, preaching daily not only in churches and churchyards, but also in markets, fairs, and other open places where a great congregation of people is, divers sermons containing heresies and notorious errors, to the great blemishing of the christian faith, and destruction of the laws, and of the estate of holy church, to the great peril of the souls of the people, and of all the realm of England, as more plainly is found, and sufficiently proved before the reverend father in God the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishops and other prelates, masters of divinity, and doctors of canon and of civil law, and a great part of the clergy of the said realm, specially assembled for this great cause ; which persons do also preach divers matters of slander, to ingender discord and dissension betwixt diverse estates of the said realm, as well spiritual as temporal, in exciting the people to the great peril of all the realm : which preachers being cited or summoned before the ordinaries of the places, there to answer to that whereof they are impeached, they will not obey the summons and commands, and care not for the admonitions nor censures of the holy church, but expressly despise them ; and moreover, by their subtle and ingenuous words, draw the people to hear their sermons, and maintain them in their errors by strong hand, and by great routs : it is ordained and assented in this present parliament, that the king's commissions be made and directed to the sheriffs, and other ministers of our sovereign lord the king, or other persons sufficiently learned, and according to the certificates of the prelates to be made in chancery from time to time, to arrest all such preachers, and also their favourers, maintainers and abettors, and to hold them in arrest and strong prison, till they justify themselves according to the law and reason of holy church. And the king wills and commands, that the chancellor make such commissions at all times, that he by the prelates, or any of them shall be certified and thereof required as is aforesaid."

An Examination of the aforesaid supposed Statute, and of the invalidity thereof.

As this supposed statute, was the principal ground whereupon proceeded all the persecution of that time; it is therefore not impertinent to examine the same more particularly, whereby it shall appear, that as it was fraudulently and unduly devised by the prelates only, so was it in like manner most injuriously and disorderly executed by them. For immediately upon the publishing of this law, without further warrant either from the king or his council, commissions under the great seal of England were made in this form, "Richard by the Grace of God," &c. "Witness myself at Westminster the 26th day of June, in the sixth year of our reign." Without more words of warrant under-written, such as in like cases are both usual and requisite, viz: "per ipsum regem:" "per regem et concilium:" "per breve de privato sigillo." All or any which words being utterly wanting in this place, as may be seen in the king's records of that time; it must therefore be done either by warrant of this statute, or else without any warrant at all. Whereupon it is to be noted, that whereas the statute appointed the commissions to be directed to the sheriff, or other ministers of the king, or to other persons sufficiently learned, for the arresting of such persons; the commissions are directed to the archbishop and his suffragans, being as it appears parties in the case, authorizing them further without either the words, or reasonable meaning of the statute, to imprison them in their own houses, or where else they pleased.

Besides also, what manner of law this was, by whom devised, and by what authority the same was first made and established, judge by that which follows, viz.

In the statute of St. Michael next following, at a parliament summoned and holden at Westminster, the sixth year of the king, among sundry petitions made to the king by his commons, to which he assented, there is one in this form. Article 52.

"That whereas a statute was made the last parliament in these words,—It is ordained in this present parliament that commissions from the king be directed to the sheriffs, and other ministers of the king, or to other persons sufficiently skilful, and according to the certificates of the prelates thereof, to be made to the chancery from time to time, to arrest all such preachers, and their favourers, maintainers and abettors: and to detain them in strong prison, until they justify themselves according to reason, and law of holy church: and the king wills and commands, that the chancellor make such commissions at all times as he shall be by the prelates or any of them certified and thereof required, as is aforesaid,—the which was never agreed nor granted by the commons; but whatever was moved therein, was without their assent. That the said statute be therefore disannulled. For it is not in any wise their meaning, that either themselves or such as shall succeed them, shall be further justified or bound by the prelates, than were their ancestors in former times," whereunto is answered, "Il plaist al, Roy. I," the king is pleased.

Hereby notwithstanding the former unjust law was repealed, and the fraud of the framers thereof sufficiently discovered: yet such means were taken by the prelates, that this act of repeal was never published, nor ever since printed with the rest of the statutes of that parliament: so that the repeal being concealed, similar commissions and other process were made from time to time, by virtue of the statute, as well during all the reign of this king, as ever since against the professors of religion.

The young king was further induced by the importunity of the archbishop, to send special letters to the vice-chancellor and proctors of the university of Oxford, in which he straightly and sharply enjoins them to make a general inquisition through the whole university, for John Wickliff, Nicholas Herford, Philip Reppington, John Ashton, and such others; and also for all whom they know or judge to be suspected of that doctrine, or to be maintainers, receivers, and defenders of the parties, or their opinions; to the intent that they being so apprehended, may be within seven days of their admonition expelled the university, and cited before the archbishop of Canterbury, moreover commanding the vice-chancellor and proctors with their assistants, that if any person or persons in any house, hall, or college, or in any other place shall be found to have any of the books or treatises compiled by John Wickliff, Nicholas Herford, &c. they will cause the said person or persons, to be arrested and attached, and their books to be seized and presented within one month, without correction, corruption, or alteration, to the archbishop upon their faith and allegiance, as they would avoid the forfeiture of all privileges of the university, &c.

The vice-chancellor at this time in Oxford was Master Robert Rigge. The two proctors were John Huntman and Walter Dish; who, as far as they durst, favoured the cause of John Wickliff, so that when some public sermons at the feast of the Ascension, and of Corpus Christi were to be preached in the cloister of Saint Frideswide (now called Christ's church) before the people, by the vice-chancellor and the proctors: they committed it to Philip Reppington and Nicholas Herford, so that Herford should preach on the Ascension-day, and Reppington upon Corpus Christi day. Herford was observed to defend John Wickliff openly as a faithful, good, and innocent man; at which there were great outcries among the friars. This Herford, after he had long favoured and maintained Wickliff's part, grew in suspicion among the enemies of truth. For as soon as he began somewhat liberally and freely to utter anything, which tended to the defence of Wickliff, by and bye the Carmelites, and all the orders of religion were on his watch, and laid not a few heresies to his charge; which they had strained here and there out of his sermons. After this the feast of Corpus Christi drew near: upon which day it was expected that Reppington would preach. This man was a canon of Leicester, who protested openly, that in all moral matters he would defend Wickliff. But as to the sacrament he would as yet hold his peace, until such time as the Lord should otherwise illuminate the hearts and minds of the clergy.

Now the day of Corpus Christi approaching near, when the friars understood that this man would preach, they arranged with the archbishop of Canterbury, that the same day, a little before Philip should preach, Wickliff's conclusions, which were privately condemned, should be openly defamed in the presence of the whole university.

These things being thus done, Philip Reppington at the hour appointed, proceeded to his sermon. In which among many other things, he was reported to have uttered these sayings, or to this effect:

"That the popes or bishops ought not to be exalted above temporal lords.

"That in moral matters he would defend Master Wickliff as a true catholic doctor.

"That the duke of Lancaster was very earnestly affected and minded in this matter, and wished that all such should be received under his protection," besides many things more which touched the praise and defence of Wickliff.

And finally, in concluding his sermon, he dismissed the people with this sentence,—"I will in the speculative doctrine, as pertaining to the sacrament of the altar, keep silence and hold my peace, until such time as God otherwise shall instruct and illuminate the hearts of the clergy."

When the sermon was done, Reppington entered into St. Frideswide's church, accompanied with many of his friends, who, as their enemies surmised, were privately armed under their garments against danger. Friar Stokes, the Carmelite, who was the chief champion against Wickliff, suspecting all this to be against him, kept within the sanctuary of the church. The vice-chancellor and Reppington, friendly saluting one another in the church porch, sent away the people, and so every man departed home to his own house. There was not a little joy through the whole university for that sermon; but in the meantime, the unquiet and busy Carmelite slept not his matter. For by his letters he declared the whole matter to the archbishop, exaggerating the dangers he was in, and desiring his help and aid, omitting nothing to move and stir up the archbishop's mind, who of his own nature was ready enough to prosecute the matter. The vice-chancellor being afterward accused for contempt of the archbishop's letters, when he perceived and saw that no excuse would prevail to avoid that danger, humbling himself upon his knees, he desired pardon, which, when he had obtained, by the help of the bishop of Winchester, he was sent away again with certain commands, and suspensions of heretics. Then began the hatred on both sides to appear and develop itself, and all men were offended at these friars and monks, to whom they imputed whatever trouble or mischief was raised up, as to the authors and causers of the same.

Nicholas Herford, and Philip Reppington, being privily warned by the vice-chancellor, conveyed themselves out of sight, and fled to the duke of Lancaster; but the duke, whether for fear, or for what cause I cannot say, in the end forsook his poor and miserable clients.

Being repulsed by the duke, and destitute of his support, whether they were sent, or, of their own accord went to the archbishop, is uncertain; but Reppington was reconciled again to the archbishop, and admitted to the university. And so was also John Ashton. Of Nicholas Herford all this while I find no special relation.

In the meantime, about the twenty-third day of September, (A. D. 1382), the king sent his mandate to the archbishop for collecting a subsidy, and to have a convocation of the clergy summoned against the next parliament, which should begin the eighteenth day of November. All which being done, the parliament was assembled at Oxford the eighteenth day of November, where the convocation was kept in the monastery of Frideswide. The archbishop, with other bishops, sitting there in their pontifical robes, declared two causes of their present assembly, one to repress heresies, which began afresh in the realm; the other to aid and support the king with some necessary subsidy of money.

The convocation being continued the next day, the archbishop, with the other prelates, assembling themselves as before, the archbishop, after the usual solemnity, desired the proctors of the clergy, appointed for every diocese, to consult among themselves, in some convenient place, what they thought touching the redress of matters, and to be notified and declared to him and to his brethren, &c.

Further, forsomuch (saith he) as it is so noised through all the realm, that there were certain in the university of Oxford who held and maintained conclusions heretical and erroneous, condemned by him, and by other lawyers and doctors of divinity; he therefore assigned the bishops of Sarum, Hereford, and Rochester, with William Rugge, then vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford, (for probably Robert Rigge was then displaced,) as also William Berton, and John Middleton, doctors, giving them his full authority with cursing and banning to compel them to search, and to inquire with all diligence and possible ways over all and singular whatsoever, either doctors, bachelors, or scholars of the university, who did hold, teach, maintain, and defend, in schools, or out of schools, the conclusions mentioned before.

On which day, in the presence of the prelates and the clergy in the chapter-house of St. Frideswide, came in Philip Reppington, who there adjured those conclusions and assertions, in this form of words:

"In the name of God, Amen. I, Philip Reppington, canon of the house of Leicester, acknowledging one catholic and apostolic faith, do curse and also abjure all heresy, namely, these heresies and errors under written, condemned and reproved by the canonical decrees, and by you, most reverend father, touching which hitherto I have been defamed; condemning, moreover, and reproving both them and the authors of them, and do confess the same to be catholically condemned. And I swear also by these holy evangelists, which here I hold in my hand, and do promise, never by any persuasions of men, nor by any way hereafter, to defend or hold as true, any of the said conclusions underwritten; but do and will stand and adhere in all things, to the determination of the holy catholic church, and to yours, in this behalf. Over and besides, all such as stand contrary to this faith, I do pronounce them with their doctrine and followers worthy of everlasting curse. And if I myself shall presume at any time to hold or preach any thing contrary to the premises, I shall be content to abide the severity of the canons. Subscribed with mine own hand, and of mine own accord, Philip Reppington."

And thus he was discharged, and afterward was made bishop of Lincoln, and became at length the most bitter and extreme persecutor of this side, of all the other bishops within the realm.

After the abjuration of this Reppington, immediately was brought in John Ashton, who, appearing before the archbishop and the prelates, did in like form of words abjure as Reppington had before done.

Of this John Ashton we read, that afterward, by Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, he was cited and condemned; but whether he died in prison, or was burned, we have no certainty.

As to Nicholas Herford, he did not appear during the time of this convocation, and therefore was excommunicated; against which he appealed from the archbishop to the king and council. The archbishop would not admit it, but caused him to be apprehended and put in prison. He escaped out of prison, returning again to his former exercise and preaching as he did before, though in as covert and secret a manner as he could. Upon which the archbishop, thundering out his bolts of excommunication against him, sends to all pastors and ministers, commanding them in all churches, and on all festival days, to proclaim the excommunication against him to all men.

Not contented with this, he addressed his letter to the king, requiring the aid of his temporal sword. See and note, reader, the seraphical charity of these priestly prelates towards the poor redeemed flock of Christ.

The letter of the Archbishop to the King.

"To the most excellent prince in Christ, &c. William, &c., greeting, in him by whom kings do reign, and princes bear rule. Unto your kingly highness by the tenor of these presents we intimate, that one Master Nicholas Herford, doctor of divinity, for his manifest contumacy and offence in not appearing before us being called at the day and place assigned, is therefore included in the sentence of the greater curse, publicly by our ordinary authority; and in the same sentence has continued now forty days, and yet still continues with obdurate heart, wickedly contemning the keys of the church, both to the great peril of his soul, and to the pernicious example of others. Forsomuch, therefore, as the holy mother, the church, cannot proceed any further in this matter, we humbly desire your kingly majesty to direct out your letters for the apprehending of the said excommunicate, according to the custom of this realm of England, wholesomely observed and kept hitherto; to the intent that such, whom the fear of God doth not restrain from evil, the discipline of the secular arm may strike and pluck back from offending. Your princely highness, the Lord continue. From Lambeth, the fifteenth of January."

And thus far concerning Nicholas Herford, and the others. But all this while what became of John Wickliff is not certainly known;—it appears that he was banished and driven to exile. In the meantime it is not to be doubted, but he was alive during all this while, as may appear by his letter which he about this time wrote to Pope Urban VI.

"Verily I do rejoice to open and declare to every man the faith which I hold, and specially to the bishop of Rome, which faith as I suppose it to be sound and true, he will most willingly confirm, or, if it be erroneous, amend.

"First, I suppose that the gospel of Christ is the whole body of God's law; and that Christ, who gave that same law himself, I believe to be a very man, and in that point, to exceed the law of the gospel, and all other parts of the scripture. Again, I do give and hold the bishop of Rome, forsomuch as he is the vicar of Christ here in earth, to be bound most of all other men to that law of the gospel. For the greatness amongst Christ's disciples did not consist in worldly dignity or honours, but in the near and exact following of Christ in his life and manners; whereupon I do gather out of the heart of the law of the Lord, that Christ for the time of his pilgrimage here was a most poor man, abjecting and casting off all worldly rule and honour, as appears by the gospel of St. Matthew, the eighth chapter, and second of the Corinthians, in the eighth chapter.

"Hereby I do folly gather, that no faithful man ought to follow, either the pope himself, or any of the holy men, but in such points as he has followed the Lord Jesus Christ. For Peter and the sons of Zebedee, by desiring worldly honour, contrary to the following of Christ's steps, did offend, and therefore in those errors they are not to be followed.

"Hereof I do gather, as a counsel, that the pope ought to leave unto the secular power all temporal dominion and rule, and thereunto effectually to move and exhort his whole clergy; for so did Christ, and especially by his apostles. Wherefore, if I have erred in any of these points, I will most humbly submit myself unto correction, even by death, if necessity so require; and if I could labour according to my will or desire in mine own person, I would surely present myself before the bishop of Rome; but the Lord has otherwise visited me to the contrary, and has taught me rather to obey God than men. Forsomuch then as God has given to our pope just and true evangelical instructions, we ought to pray that those motions be not extinguished by any subtle or crafty device. And that the pope and cardinals be not moved to do any thing contrary to the law of the Lord. Wherefore let us pray to our God, that he will so stir up our Pope Urban the sixth, as he began, that he, with his clergy, may follow the Lord Jesus Christ in life and manners; and that they may teach the people effectually, and that they likewise may faithfully follow them in the same. And let us especially pray, that our pope may be preserved from all malign and evil counsel, which we do know that evil and envious men of his household would give him. And seeing the Lord will not suffer us to be tempted above our power, much less then will he require of any creature to do that thing which they are not able; forsomuch as that is the plain condition and manner of antichrist."

Thus much wrote John Wickliff to Pope Urban. But this pope was so hot in his wars against Clement, the French pope, his rival, that he had no leisure, and less will to attend to Wickliff. By which schism God provided for poor Wickliff some rest and quietness.

Concerning which schismatical wars of these popes, it will not be irrelevant to digress a little, so as to say something of the tragical doings of these two holy popes striving for the triple crown, that the christian reader may see what difference there is between the popes, and Christ with his apostles. For though in the gospel it is written, that certain of the disciples did strive which should be the greater; yet we do not read that one of them ever took weapons against the other; and it appears too that for so striving as they did they were sharply rebuked by our Saviour Christ.

About the beginning of the year 1383, Pope Urban studying how to conquer his rival pope, took to himself the sword of Romulus, instead of the keys of Peter, and set upon him with open war. And devising with himself whom he might best choose for his chief champion; he thought none more fitted for such affairs than Henry Spencer, then bishop of Norwich, a young and stout prelate, more fitting for the charge of a camp, than for the peaceable church of Christ. To this bishop of Norwich the pope had sent his bulls about this time, to confer the cross on whoever would go with him into France, to destroy the antipope. In which bulls these privileges were granted.

1. That the bishop of Norwich may use his sword against the antipope, and all his adherents, favourers, and counsellors, and with violence put them to death.

2. That he has full power to inquire after all schismatics, and to put them in prison, and to confiscate all their goods, moveable and immovable.

3. That he has power and authority to deprive all laymen that are schismatics of all manner of secular offices whatever, and to give their offices to other fit and convenient persons.

4. That he may deprive all such clergy, and declare them to be schismatics, and to give and bestow their benefices either with cure or without cure, their dignities, parsonages or offices, to other persons more meet for the same.

5. He has power and authority over lay persons that are exempt, and clergy both secular and regular, yea, although they be friars mendicants, or masters and professors of other houses or hospitals of St. John's of Jerusalem, or St. Mary's of Flanders, or professors of what order soever.

6. He has power to dispense with any secular clergy soever, being beneficed either with cure or without cure, and also with such as have dignities, parsonages, or offices, being regulars either exempt or not exempt, that every one of them may be absent with him from their dignities and benefices, &c., under the standard of the cross, without license of any of their prelates being required, and yet to receive and take the entire income of their benefices, as though they had been personally resident upon the same.

7. There is granted to all that pass the seas in this quarrel, either at their own expenses, or at the expenses of any other, full remission of their sins; and as large privileges are granted to all those that go over the sea with him, as to any that pay their money, or go to fight for the Holy Land.

8. Also all such as with their proper goods and substance shall give sufficient stipend to able soldiers, mustered at the discretion of the foresaid lord bishop, or by his deputy, although themselves be not personally at this business, yet shall they have like remission and indulgence, as they who have been personally with him in this expedition.

9. All they are partakers of this remission, who give any part of their goods to the said bishop to fight against the said schismatics.

10. If any shall chance to die in the journey who are soldiers under the standard of the cross, or else before the quarrel are killed by some means, they shall fully and wholly receive the said grace, and shall be partakers of the remission and indulgence.

11. He has power to excommunicate, suspend, and interdict what persons soever be rebellious or disturbers of him in the execution of his power and authority committed to him, of what dignity, state, degree, pre-eminence, order, place, or condition soever they shall be; whether they shall be either of regal, queenly, or imperial dignity, or of what dignity soever, either ecclesiastical or civil.

12. He has power and authority to compel and enforce any religious person soever, and to appoint them, and send them over sea, if it seem good to him, yea, although they be professors of the friars mendicants, for the execution of the premises.

The Pope's Absolution pronounced by the Bishop.

"By the authority apostolical to me in this behalf committed, we absolve thee A. B. from all thy sins confessed with thy mouth, and being contrite with thy heart, and wherof thou wouldst be confessed if they came into thy memory; and we grant to thee plenary remission of all manner of sins, and we promise to thee thy part of the reward of all just men, and of everlasting salvation. And as many privileges as are granted to them that go to fight for the Holy Land, we grant to thee; and of all the prayers and benefits of the church, the universal synod, as also of the holy catholic church, we make thee partaker."

This courageous, or, rather outrageous bishop, armed thus with the pope's authority, and prompt with his privileges, came to the parliament, where there was great consultation and contention, and almost no less schism, about the voyage of this popish bishop in the parliament, than was between the popes themselves. In which parliament, there were many who thought it not safe to commit the king's people and subjects to an unskilful priest. So great was the diversity of judgments in that behalf, that the voyage of the bishop was protracted to the Saturday before Passion Sunday. After which Sunday the parties agreed that the bishop should set forward in his voyage, having given to him the fifteenth which was granted to the king in the parliament before. Which things thus concluded in the parliament, this warlike bishop preparing all things in readiness, set forward in this journey. And forthwith entered the seas, and went to Calais, where, waiting a few days for the rest of his army, he then took his journey to the town of Gravelines, which he besieged so desperately, without any preparation of engines of war, or counsel, that he seemed rather to fly upon them, than to invade them. At length, through the superstition of our men, trusting to the pope's absolution, they entered the town with their bishop, where, at his command, they destroyed both man, woman, and child, and left not one alive!

From Gravelines this warlike bishop set forward to Dunkirk, where not long after, the French meeting with him, he joined with them in battle; in which battle (if the story be true) twelve thousand of the French were slain in the chase, and of our men seven only were missing. It would require a long treatise here to relate all things done in these popish wars. Also it would be no less ridiculous to view and behold the glorious temerity of this new upstart captain. As when the bishop coming from Dunkirk to the siege of Ypres, a great number of Englishmen were lost there, and much money consumed, and yet nothing done, to the great shame and ignominy of the bishop. Again, after the siege of Ypres, the bishop proceeding with a small force to fight with the French king's camp, contrary to the counsel of his captains, was feign to break company with them, whereby part of the army went to Burburgh, and the bishop with his part returned to Gravelines, both which towns shortly after were besieged by the French army. In fine, when the bishop could keep Gravelines no longer, he crossed the seas, and came home again as wise as he went. And thus making an end of this pontifical war, we will return from whence we digressed, to the history of John Wickliff.

Which John Wickliff returning again within a short space, either from his banishment, or from some other place where he was secretly kept, repaired to his parish of Lutterworth, where he was parson; and there, quietly departing this mortal life, slept in peace in the Lord, in the beginning of the year 1384, upon Silvester's day

Here may be seen the great providence of the Lord in this man, as in several others whom the Lord so long preserved amidst the fury of so many enemies from all their hands, even to his old age. For it appears by Thomas Walden, that he was a very aged man before he departed. Such a Lord is our God, that whom he will have kept, nothing can hurt.

This Wickliff had written several works, which in the year A. D. 1410 were burnt at Oxford. And not only in England, but in Bohemia likewise, the books of Wickliff were consumed by the archbishop of Prague, who made diligent inquisition for them, and burned them; the number of volumes which he is said to have burned, most excellently written, and richly adorned with bosses of gold, and rich coverings (as Eneas Silvius writes) were about two hundred.

We will now add the testimonial of the University of Oxford concerning Wickliff.

The public testimony given out by the University of Oxford, touching the commendation of the great learning and good life of John Wickliff.

"Unto all and singular the children of our holy mother the church, to whom this present letter shall come, the vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford, with the whole congregation of the masters, with perpetual health in the Lord. Forsomuch as it is not commonly seen, that the acts and monuments of valiant men, nor the praise and merits of good men should be passed over and hidden in perpetual silence, but that true report and fame should continually spread abroad the same in strange and far distant places, both for the witness of the same, and example of others; forsomuch also as the provident discretion of man's nature, being recompensed with cruelty, hath devised and ordained this buckler and defence against such as do blaspheme and slander other men's doings, that whensoever witness by word of mouth cannot be present, the pen by writing may supply the same.

"Hereupon it followeth, that the special good will and care which we bear unto John Wickliff, sometime child of this our university, and professor of divinity, moving and stirring our minds (as his manners and conditions required no less) with one mind, voice and testimony, we do witness, all his conditions and doings throughout his whole life to have been most sincere and commendable; whose honest manners and conditions, profoundness of learning, and most redolent renown and fame, we desire the more earnestly to be notified and known unto all the faithful, for that we understand the maturity and ripeness of his conversation, his diligent labours and troubles to tend to the praise of God, the help and safeguard of others, and the profit of the church.

"Wherefore we signify unto you by these presents, that his conversation (even from his youth upward, unto the time of his death) was so praise-worthy and honest, that never at any time was there any note or spot of suspicion noised of him. But in his answering, reading, preaching and determining, he behaved himself laudably, and as a stout and valiant champion of the faith; vanquishing by the force of the scriptures, all such, who by their wilful beggary, blasphemed and slandered Christ's religion; neither was this doctor convicted of any heresy, neither burned of our prelates after his burial. God forbid, that our prelates should have condemned a man of such honesty for an heretic; who, amongst all the rest of the university, had written in logic, philosophy, divinity, morality, and the speculative arts, without an equal. The knowledge of which all and singular things we do desire to testify and deliver forth, to the intent that the fame and renown of this said doctor may be the more evident and had in reputation amongst them unto whose hands these present letters testimonial shall come.

"In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters testimonial to be sealed with our common seal. Dated at Oxford in our congregation-house, the 1st day of October, in the year of our Lord 1406."

Now as we have declared the testimony of the university of Oxford, concerning the praise of John Wickliff;

it follows likewise that we set forth the censures and judgments of his enemies, blinded with malicious hatred and corrupt affections against him, especially of the pope's council gathered at Constance, proceeding first in condemning his books, then his articles, and afterward burning his bones. The copy of which sentence given against him by that council here follows.

The sentence given by the Council of Constance, in condemning the Doctrine, and five and forty Articles of John Wickliff.

"The most holy and sacred council of Constance, making and representing the catholic church, for the extirpation of this present schism,<sup>1</sup> and of all other errors and heresies, springing and growing under the shadow and pretence of the same, and for the reformation and amendment of the church, being lawfully congregated and gathered together in the Holy Ghost, for the perpetual memory of the time to come.

"We are taught by the acts and histories of the holy fathers, that the catholic faith, without which, as the holy apostle St. Paul saith, it is impossible to please God, hath been always defended by the faithful and spiritual soldiers of the church, by the shield of faith, against the false worshippers of the same faith, or rather perverse impugnors; who through their proud curiosity will seem to know more, and to be wiser than they ought to be, and for the desire of the glory of the world have gone about oftentimes to overthrow the same. These kinds of wars and battles have been prefigured to us before in those carnal wars of the Israelites against the idolatrous people. For in those spiritual wars the holy catholic church through the virtue and power of faith, being illustrated with the beams of the heavenly light, by the Providence of God, and being helped by the help and defence of the saints and holy men, hath always continued immaculate, (and the darkness and errors, as her most cruel enemies being put to flight), she hath most gloriously triumphed over all. But in these our days the old and unclean enemy hath raised up new contentions and strifes, that the elect of this world might be known, whose prince and captain in time past was one John Wickliff, a false christian, who, during his lifetime, taught and sowed very obstinately many articles contrary and against the christian religion and the catholic faith. And the same John Wickliff wrote certain books which he called a Dialogue, and a Trialogue, besides many other treatises and works which he both wrote and taught, in which he wrote the aforesaid, and many other damnable and execrable articles, which books for the publication and advancement of his perverse doctrine, he set forth openly for every man to read; whereby, besides many offences, great hurt and damage of soul has ensued in divers regions and countries, but especially in the kingdom of England and Bohemia. Against whom the masters and doctors of the universities of Oxford and Prague, rising up in the truth and verity of God, according to the order of schools, within a while after did reprove and condemn the said articles.

Moreover, the most reverend fathers the archbishops and bishops, for that time present, of Canterbury, York, and Prague, legates of the apostolic see, in the kingdoms of England and Bohemia, did condemn the books of the said Wickliff to be burnt. And the said archbishop of Prague, commissary of the apostolic see, did likewise in this behalf determine and judge. And moreover he forbid that any of those books which remained unburned should be hereafter any more read. And, again, those things being brought to the knowledge and understanding of the apostolic see, and in the general council, the bishop of Rome, in his last council, condemned the said books, treatises, and volumes, commanding them to be openly burned. Most straightly forbidding that any men who should bear the name of Christ should be so hardy either to keep, read, or expound any of the said books or treatises, volumes or works, or by any means to use or occupy them, or else to allege them openly or privily, but to their reproof and infamy. And to the intent that this most dangerous and filthy doctrine should be utterly wiped away out of the church, he gave commandment throughout all places, that the ordinaries should diligently inquire and seek out by the apostolic authority and ecclesiastical censure, for all such books, treatises, volumes, and works. And the same so being found, to burn and consume them with fire; providing withal, that if there be any found who will not obey the same, should process be made against them, as against the favourers and maintainers of heresies. And this most holy synod hath caused the said forty-five articles to be examined, and oftentimes perused by many most reverend fathers of the church of Rome, cardinals, bishops, abbots, masters of divinity, and doctors of both laws, besides a great number of other learned men; which articles being so examined, it was found (as in truth it was no less) that many, yea, and a great number of them be notoriously reprovèd and condemned by the holy fathers for heretical; others not to be catholic, but erroneous; some full of offence and blasphemy; certain of them offensive to godly ears, and many of them to be rashful and seditious. It is found also that his books do contain many articles of like effect and quality, and that they do induce and bring into the church unsound and unwholesome doctrine contrary to the faith and ordinance of the church. Wherefore in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, this sacred synod, ratifying and approving the sentences and judgments of the archbishops and council of Rome, do by their decree and ordinance perpetually for evermore condemn and reprove the said articles, and every one of them, his books which he intituled his Dialogue and Trialogue, and all other books of the same author, volumes, treatises and works, by what name soever they be intituled or called, the which we will here to be sufficiently expressed and named. Also we forbid the reading, learning, exposition, or alleging of any of the said books unto all faithful christians, except so far as shall tend to the reproof of the same; forbidding all and singular catholic persons, under the pain of curse, that from henceforth they be not so hardy openly to preach, teach, or hold, or by any means to allege the said articles, or any of them, except, as aforesaid, that it do tend to the reproof of them; commanding all those books, treatises, works, and volumes aforesaid, to be openly burned, as it was decreed in the synod at Rome, as it is afore expressed. For the execution whereof duly to be observed and done, the said sacred synod doth straightly charge and command the ordinaries of the place diligently to attend and look unto the matter, according as it appertaineth unto every man's duty by the canonical laws and ordinances."

The Decree of the Council of Constance, touching the taking up of the Body and Bones of John Wickliff, to be burned forty-one years after he was buried in his own Parish at Lutterworth.

"Forasmuch as by the authority of the sentence and decree of the council of Rome, and by the commandment of the church, and the apostolical see, after due delays being given, they proceeded to the condemnation of the said John Wickliff, and his memory, having first made proclamation, and given commandment to call forth whosoever would defend the said Wickliff, or his memory, if there were any such (but there did none appear, which would either defend him or his memory.) And moreover witnesses being examined, by commissioners appointed by Pope John and his council, upon the impenitency and final obstinacy and stubbornness of the said John Wickliff (reserving that which is to be reserved, as in such business the order of the law requireth) and his impenitency and obstinacy even unto his end, being sufficiently proved by evident signs and tokens, and also by lawful witnesses, and credit lawfully given thereto. Wherefore at the instance of the steward of the treasury, proclamation being made to hear and understand the sentence against this day, the sacred synod declares, determines, and gives sentence, that the said John Wickliff was a notorious obstinate heretic, and that he died in his heresy, and they curse and condemn both him and his memory.

(1) The schism here alluded to was that of the popedom. There being at that time no less than three rival popes. Benedict XIII., Gregory XII., John XXIII. The Council of Constance was con-

"This synod also decrees and ordains, that the body and bones of the said John Wickliff, if it might be discerned and known from the bodies of other faithful people, should be taken out of the ground, and thrown away far from the burial of any church, according to the canon laws and decrees. Which determination and sentence definitive being read and pronounced, the lord president, and the aforesaid presidents of the four nations, being demanded and asked whether it did please them or no? They all answered (first Hostiensis the president, and after him the other presidents of the nations) that it pleased them very well, and so they allowed and confirmed all the premises, &c."

What Heraclitus would not laugh, or what Democritus would not weep, to see these sage and reverend Catoes occupy their heads about taking up a poor man's body, who had been dead and buried for the space of forty one years? and yet perhaps they were not able to find his right bones, but took up some other body, and so of a catholic made an heretic! Yet herein Wickliff had some cause to give them thanks, that they at least spared him so long till he was dead, and gave him so long respite after his death, forty-one years to rest in his sepulchre before they ungraved him, and turned him from earth to ashes: which ashes they also took and threw into the river. And so he was resolved into three elements, earth, fire, and water, thinking thereby utterly to extinguish and abolish both the name and doctrine of Wickliff for ever. Not much unlike the example of the old Pharisees, who when they had brought the Lord to the grave, thought to make him sure never to rise again. But these and all other must know, that as there is no counsel against the Lord; so there is no keeping down of the truth, but it will spring and come out of dust and ashes, as appeared right well in this man. For though they digged up his body, burnt his bones, and drowned his ashes; yet the word of God, and the truth of his doctrine, with the fruit and success thereof, they could not burn; which yet to this day, for the most part of his articles, do remain; notwithstanding the transitory body and bones of the man were thus consumed and dispersed.

These things thus finished and accomplished, which pertain to the history and time of Wickliff; let us now by the support of the Lord proceed to write of the rest, who either in his time or after his time, springing out of the same university, and raised up (as one might say) out of his ashes, were partakers of the same persecution. Of whom speaks Thomas Walden, where he says, that after Wickliff many suffered most cruel death, and many more did forsake the realm.

In the number of whom was William Swinderby, Walter Brute, John Purvey, Richard White, William Thorpe, Raynold Peacock bishop of St. Asaph, and afterward of Chichester.

To this catalogue also pertains Laurence Redman master of arts, David Sautre, divine, John Aschwarby vicar, as they call him, of St. Mary's church at Oxford, William James an excellent young man, well learned, Thomas Brightwell, and William Hawlam a civilian, Rafe Grenhurst, John Scut, and Philip Norice; who being excommunicated by Pope Eugenius IV., in the year 1446, appealed to a general council.

Peter Paine also, who flying from Oxford unto Bohemia, stoutly contended against the sophisters, as administering both kinds in the sacrament of the last supper. Also the Lord Cobham, &c., with others, whose names are named in the king's writ, sent to the sheriff of Northampton, which writ of the king follows in this tenor: "Forsomuch as John Attyate of Chepingwarden, John Warrmar, Robert Brawpod, &c., being receivers and favourers of heretics, and especially of John Woodward priest, publicly defamed and condemned of heresy, will not be justified by the censures of the church, as the reverend father John bishop of Lincoln hath certified us: we therefore desiring to withstand all defenders and favourers of such heresies, do will and command as well the forenamed, as namely the aforesaid John Woodward to be apprehended, straightly charging the same to be imprisoned by their bodies, or otherwise punished as shall seem good to the justices, until they and every of them shall submit themselves to the obedience of the aforesaid bishop in that behalf accordingly. Whereof fail you not under pain of an hundred pounds. Witness ourselves: given at our manor of Langley the 8th day of March, the twelfth year of our reign."

To these above rehearsed, and other favorers of Wickliff, within this our country of England, we may add also the Bohemians; for the propagation of the doctrine of Wickliff in that country took root, coming from England to Bohemia by the following occasion.

There happened that at that time a certain student of the country of Bohemia was at Oxford, one of a wealthy house, and also of a noble stock; who returning home from the university of Oxford to the university of Prague, carried with him certain books of Wickliff. It happened at the same time that a certain nobleman in the city of Prague had founded and built a great church of Matthias and Matthews, (which church was called Bethelhem), giving to it great lands, and finding in it two preachers every day, to preach both holy-day and working-day to the people. Of which two preachers, John Huss was one, a man of great knowledge, of a pregnant wit, and most highly esteemed among them for his worthy life. Thus John Huss having familiarity with this young man, in reading and perusing these books of Wickliff, derived such pleasure and profit in reading them, that he not only began to defend the author openly in the schools, but also in his sermons, commending him for a good man, an holy man, and heavenly man, wishing himself, when he should die, to be there placed, where the soul of Wickliff should be.

And thus much briefly concerning the favorers and adherents of John Wickliff in general. Now particularly and in order let us (by Christ's grace) narrate the histories and persecutions of the parties aforesaid, beginning with the valiant champions William Swinderby and Walter Brute.

The History of William Swinderby.

In the year 1389, William Swinderby priest, within the diocese of Lincoln, being accused and seized for certain opinions, was presented before John bishop of Lincoln, after the form and order of the pope's law, according to their usual rite; his accusers were friar Frisby an Observant, friar Hincely an Augustinian, and Thomas Blaxton a Dominican.

The articles or conclusions were exhibited against him by the friars in the bishop of Lincoln's court. Which articles although he never preached, taught, or at any time defended, as appears in the process; yet the friars with their witnesses standing against him, declared him to be convicted; bringing dry wood with them to the town to burn him, and would not leave him, before they made him promise and swear for fear of death, never to hold them, teach them, nor preach them privily, or openly; and that he should go to certain churches to revoke the conclusions, which he never affirmed. Which he obediently accomplished, with this form of revocation, which they bound him to.

The Revocation of William Swinderby.

"I, William Swinderby, priest, although unworthy of the diocese of Lincoln, acknowledging one true catholic and apostolic faith of the holy church of Rome, do abjure all heresy and error opposed to the determination of the holy mother church, whereof I have been hitherto defamed, namely, the conclusions and articles above prefixed, and every one of them judicially objected to me, by the commissary of the reverend father in Christ

Lord John, by the grace of God bishop of Lincoln; and do revoke the same, and every one of them, some as heretical, some as erroneous and false, and do affirm and believe them to be so, and hereafter will never teach, preach, or affirm publicly or privily the same. Neither will I make any sermon within the diocese of Lincoln, without first asking and obtaining the license of the aforesaid reverend father and lord, the bishop of Lincoln. Contrary to the which if I shall presume hereafter to say or do, to hold or preach, I shall be content to abide the severity of the canon, as I have judiciously by the necessity of the law, sworn, and do swear," &c.

Thus you see the conclusions and articles of this good man, falsely objected to him by the malicious and lying friars; and also the retraction to which they compelled him; by which it may be conjectured, what credit is to be given to the articles and conclusions which these cavilling friars, wresting all things to the worst, have objected and imputed to Wickliff and all others like him, whom they so falsely defame, so slanderously belie, and so maliciously persecute. After these things in the diocese of Lincoln, Swinderby removed to the diocese of Hereford; where he was as much or more molested by the friars again, and by John Tresnant bishop of Hereford, as by the process set out at large in their own registers may appear.

Here follow the informations laid before John Tresnant, bishop of Hereford, against William Swinderby in the cause of heretical pravity, as the popish heretics call it.

"Reverend father and high lord, Lord John, by God's sufferance bishop of Hereford: it is lamentably declared unto your reverend fatherhood on the behalf of Christ's faithful people, your devout children of your diocese of Hereford, that notwithstanding the unbelief of very many Lollards, who have too long sprung up in your diocese, there is newly come a certain child of wickedness, named William Swinderby; who by his horrible persuasions, and mischievous endeavours, and also by his public preaching and private teaching, perverts the whole ecclesiastical state, and stirs up, with all his power, schism between the clergy and the people. And that your reverend fatherhood may be the more fully informed, who and what manner of man the same William Swinderby is; there are proposed and exhibited here to your fatherhood, on behalf of the faithful people of Christ, against the same William Swinderby, cases and articles. Which if he shall deny, then shall these cases and articles be most evidently proved against him by witnesses worthy of belief, and by other lawful proof and evidences, to the end that your fatherhood may do and ordain therein, as to your pastoral office belongeth.

1. William Swinderby, pretending himself a priest, was openly and publicly convicted of certain articles and conclusions being erroneous, schismatical, and heretical, preached by him at several places and times, before a multitude of faithful christian people. And the same articles and conclusions he by force of law revoked and abjured, some as heretical, and some as erroneous and false, avouching and believing them for such as that from thenceforth he would never preach, teach, or affirm openly or privily any of the same conclusions: and if by preaching or avouching he should presume to do the contrary; that then he should be subject to the severity of the canons, according as he took corporal oath, judiciously upon the holy gospels.

2. Also the conclusions, which by him were first openly taught and preached, and afterward abjured and revoked, are contained in the process of the bishop of Lincoln, written word by word. And for the cases and articles, they were exhibited by the faithful christian people against the said William Swinderby, together with the conclusions, and are hereafter written: of which cases and articles the tenor here follows:

3. The said William, contrary to the revocation and abjuration, not converted to repentance, but perverted from ill to worse, and given up to a reprobate mind, came into your diocese, where he running about in sundry places, has presumed to preach, or rather to pervert and to teach of his own rashness, many heretical, erroneous, blasphemous, and other slanderous things contrary and repugnant to the sacred canons, and the determination of the holy catholic church. What those things were, at what place and what time, shall hereafter more particularly be declared.

4. The same William, notwithstanding your commandments and admonitions sealed with your seal, and directed to all the curates of your diocese, ordaining among other things that no person of what state, degree, or condition soever, should presume to preach or to teach, or expound the holy scripture to the people, either in hallowed or profane places within your diocese, without sufficient authority, under any manner of pretence, as in the same your letters of admonition and of inhibition, is more largely contained; which letters the same William received into his hands, and read word by word in the town of Monmouth of your diocese, in the year 1390, so that these your letters came to the true and undoubted knowledge of the same William; yet notwithstanding, he has presumed in various places and times to preach within your diocese, after and against your commandment aforesaid.

5. The same William in his preaching to the people, on Monday the first of August, 1390, in the parish of Whitney in your diocese, held and affirmed, that no prelate of the world, of what estate, pre-eminence or degree soever he were, having cure and charge of souls, being in deadly sin, and hearing the confession of any could do anything in giving him absolution: as being one who neither looses him from his sin, nor, in correcting or excommunicating him from his demerits, binds him by his sentence, unless the prelate shall himself be free from deadly sin, as St. Peter was, to whom our Lord gave power to bind and loose.

6. The same William in many places said and affirmed, in the presence of many faithful christian people, that after the sacramental words uttered by the priest when he intends to consecrate, the very body of Christ is not made in the sacrament of the altar.

7. That accidents cannot be in the sacrament of the altar without a subject; and that there remains material bread there to such as are communicants of the body of Christ, in the same sacrament.

8. That a priest, being in deadly sin, cannot by the strength of the sacramental words make the body of Christ, or bring to perfection any other sacrament of the church, nor minister it to the members of the church.

9. That all priests are of equal power in all things, although some of them in this world are of higher and greater honour, degree, or pre-eminence.

10. That only contrition puts away sin, if so be that a man shall be duly contrite; and that all auricular and outward confession is superfluous, and not requisite of necessity to salvation.

11. Inferior curates have their power of binding and loosing not immediately from the pope or bishop, but immediately from Christ: and therefore neither pope nor bishop can revoke to themselves such kind of power, at their will and pleasure.

12. That the pope cannot grant annual and yearly pardons; because there may not be so many years to the day of judgment, as are in the pope's bulls or pardons contained. By which it follows that these pardons are not of such value as they pretend.

13. It is not in the pope's power to grant to any penitent person remission of the punishment of the fault.

14. That person that gives alms to any, who in his judgment is not in want, commits sin in so giving it.

15. That it is not in the power of any prelate, of what order soever he be, privately to give letters for the benefit of his order, neither does such benefit profit to the salvation of the soul, them to whom they be granted.

16. That the same William, unmindful of his own salvation, hath many and oftentimes come into a certain desert wood, called Dervallwood, of your diocess, and there in a certain chapel not consecrated, or rather in a profane cottage, has in contempt of the keys, presumed of his own rashness to celebrate, nay rather to profane.

17. The same William has also presumed to do such things in a certain profane chapel, situated in the park of Newton nigh to the town of Leintwarden, of your diocess."

The Citation.

"John, by God's permission, bishop of Hereford, to his dear sons our dean of Leamster, to the parsons of of Croft, Almad, and Whitney, and also to the vicars of Kingston, Ladersley, Wiggenmore, and Monmouth Clifford, and of St. John's altar in our cathedral church of Hereford, and to the rest of the deans, parsons, vicars, chaplains, parish priests, and to others whosoever in any place are appointed through our city and diocess of Hereford, sendeth greeting, grace and benediction.

"We bid and command, charging you straightly, in the virtue of holy obedience, that you cite or cause to be cited peremptorily (and under the pain of excommunication) William Swinderby, pretending himself to be a priest, that he appear before us, or our commissaries on the twentieth day of this present month of July, at North Lodebury, within our diocess, with the continuance of the days following in other places also to be assigned unto him if it be expedient, till such things as have been, and shall be laid against him, be fully discussed, to answer more at large to certain positions and articles, touching the catholic faith, and the holy mother church's determination that have been exhibited and ministered unto the said William. And to see and hear also many things that have openly in judgment before us, and a great number of faithful christians, by him been even in writing confessed, to be condemned as heretical, false, schismatical, and erroneous. And to see and hear positions and articles denied by the said William, to be proved by faithful witnesses, and other lawful trials against the said William. And to receive for his false, heretical, erroneous, and schismatical doctrine, that which justice shall appoint, or else to shew causes why the premises should not be done.

"And if the said William conceals himself, or cannot be cited in his proper person; we will that in your churches, when most people shall then come together to divine service, you openly with a loud voice, and that may be understood, cause the said William peremptorily to be cited unto the premises, certifying the said William, that whether he shall appear the day and place appointed or no, we notwithstanding will proceed unto the premises against the said William, according to the canonical decrees, by form of law, in the absence or contumacy of the said William notwithstanding. We will, moreover, if the said William shall appear at the said day and place, as is aforesaid, before us, friendly hear him, and honestly, and favourably, as far as we may with God's leave, deal with him; granting free license to come and go for his natural liberty without any hurt either in body or goods. And see that you fully certify us of the things that you or any of you shall do about the execution of this our commandment, and that by your letters patent signed with your seal authentic, giving also faithfully to the said William, or to his lawful proctor, if he require it, a copy of this our present commandment.

"Given at our house of Whitburne, under our seal, the fifth day of the month of July, in the year of our Lord 1391."

William Swinderby either explained or defended the various conclusions objected against him, and concluded in the following words, which we insert in the ancient style in which they were written:

"The fifth article telleth of forgiveness of sins, and is this; that very contrition withouten charity and grace, do away all sins before done of that man that is verily contrite; and all true confession made by mouth outwardly to a wise priest and a good, profiteth much to a man, and it is needful and helping, that men shew their life to such, trusting fully to God's mercy, that he forgiveth the sin.

"And hereto I say, that there been two remissions of sin, one that belongeth only to God, and that remission is the cleansing of the soul from sin, and the other remission, a certifying that one man certifieth another, that sins been forgiven of God, if he be sorry with all his heart for them, and is in full will to leave them for ever; and this manner of forgiveness longeth to priests. Of the first manner of forgiveness David saith, 'And I said, I will confess my unrighteousness unto the Lord, and thou forgavest me my misdeed.' And Zachary, saith, 'And thou, O child, shalt be called the prophet of the highest, &c. To give knowledge of salvation unto his people for the remission of their sins, by the bowels of God's mercy.' And John Baptist, 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.' And St. John the Evangelist saith in his epistle, 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all our iniquity.' And it followeth, 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ, and he it is that is the propitiation for our sins.' And of the other remission of sins, Christ speaketh in the gospel, and saith, 'Whose sins ye forgive they shall be forgiven.' And man's forgiveness availeth little, but if God forgive our sins through his grace.

"The sixth conclusion toucheth indulgences and pardons that the pope granteth in his bulls, and men callen it an absolution a pena et culpa.

"Of this manner of speech I cannot find in the gospel, ne in no place of holy writ, ne I have not read that Christ used this manner of remission, ne none of his apostles. But as me seemeth, if the pope had such a power, sithen the pains after a man's death had been much greater than any bodily pains of the world; me thinketh he should of charity keep men out of such pains, and then men needed not to find so many vicious priests, after their life, to bring their souls out of purgatory. Another thing me thinketh, that sith the pope's power ne may not keep us in this world from bodily pains, as from cold, from hunger, from dread, from sorrow and other such pains, how should his power help us from spiritual pains, when we been dead? But for that no man cometh after his death to tell us the sooth of what pain they been, men now tell thereof what him list. St. John saith in his Apocalyps, that he saw under the altar the souls of them which were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they had. And they did cry with a loud voice, saying, 'How long, Lord holy and true, dost not thou revenge our blood of them which dwell on the earth?' And white stokes were given to every of them to rest awhile, till the number of their fellow servants and brethren should be fulfilled, which also remained to be slain as they were, &c. Here seemeth it, that these souls were not assoiled a pena, that is, from pain; for their desire is not fulfilled. And they were bidden abide awhile, and that is a pain. And if martyrs were not assoiled from pain, it is hard for any man to say, that he assoileth other men a pena. Also good men's souls have not but spiritual bliss, and they want bodily bliss until their resurrection in the day of doom. And after they desired to have that bliss, and abiden it, and that is pain to them. And I cannot see that the pope hath power to bring him from this pain. But if any man can shew me that he hath such a power granted in the troth of holy writ, I will gladly leffen it.

"The seventh point speaketh of the pope, and is this; sith it is only due to God, as I have said before, to geve and to grant plenar remission from pain and from blame; that whatsoever he be, pope or other, that presumptuously mistaketh upon him the power that is only due to God, in that, inasmuch as in him is, he maketh himself even with Christ, and blasphemeth God as Lucifer did, when he said, Ascendam, et ero similis altissimo, that is, I will ascend, and be like the highest, &c.

"For that I say, if the pope hold men of arms in maintaining of his temporal lordship, to avenge him on them that gilden and offend him, and geveth remission to fight and to slay them, that contrarien him, as men sayden he did by the bishop of Norwich, not putting his sword in his sheath, as God commanded to Peter, he is antichrist. For he doth the contrary of the commandment of Jesus Christ, that bad Peter forgiven to his brother seventy sithes seven sithes. Well, I find in the gospel, that when Christ sent his disciples to Samaria, the Samaritans would not receive them. And some of them bidden Christ, that he should make fire come down from heaven to destroy the city. And he blamed them and said, 'Ye know not of what spirit ye are; the Son of Man is not come down to destroy, but to save the lives and souls of men,' &c. If Christ then come to save men, and not to slay them; who that doth the reverse hereof is against Christ, and then he is antichrist. Christ bade Peter put his sword into his sheath, and said, 'All which take the sword, shall perish with the sword.' And I cannot find that Peter drew out his sword after that time, but suffered as Christ said, 'When thou shalt wax old, another shall gird thee, and lead thee whether thou wilt not.' And, therefore, said Peter, 'Christ suffered for us, leaving us example that we should follow his steps.' And Paul saith, 'Not defending yourselves, but give place to anger, leave revenging to me and I shall reward them,' &c. And therefore it seemeth to me, that it is much against Christ's lore, that his vicar should be a fighter; sithen that he mote be a shepherd, that should go before his sheep, and let them come after him, and not with swords to drive them away from him. For as Christ saith, 'A good shepherd shall put his life for his sheep.' And zif all that Christ had two swords, when that he was taken of the Jews, he said himself it was for that the scriptures moten zif be fulfilled, 'He was reputed among the wicked;' and not figure two swords that men sayen the pope hath to govern with the church. And when I see such doings of the pope, and many other that accorden not with Christ's lore, ne his living; and when I read divers scriptures of holy writ, I am foul astonished whether they shoulde be understood of him, or of any other. And I pray you for God's love tell me the sooth. Christ saith, 'Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall seduce many,' &c. Christ (I wet well) is as much to say, as he that is anointed, and two anointings there were in the law, one of kings, another of priests. And Christ was both king and priest, and so the pope saith that he is. And if all that have been emperors of Rome, and other heathen kings have been antichrists, they come not in Christ's name. But whoso cometh in Christ's name, and feigneth himself Christ's friend, and he be privily his enemy, he may lightly beguile many. St. Paul saith, before there cometh a defection first and the son of perdition shall be revealed, which is the adversary, and is extolled above all that is named God, or which is worshipped, so that he shall sit in the temple of God, shewing himself as God. And it followeth in the same place; and now ye know what holdeth till he be revealed in his time, for he worketh already the mystery of iniquity. Only he that holdeth, let him hold till he come abroad, and then that wicked one shall be revealed, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the spirit of his mouth, &c. And St. John saith in the Apocalyps, 'I saw another beast ascending out of the earth, and two horns like to the Lamb. He spake like the dragon, and had the power of the first beast.' Many such authorities astonished me oft sithes; and therefore I pray you, for the love of God, to tell me what they mean."

After two sittings in July, and two in August, the last of which was on the sixteenth of August, 1391, they proceed to sentence, October the third.—

"The name of Christ being invoked, we, John, by the permission of God, bishop of Hereford, sitting in tribunal seat, having God before our eyes, weighing and considering the articles by the aforesaid faithful christians put up against the said Swinderby, pretending himself to be priest, with his answers upon the same, Actis et Actiatis before us in the cause of heretical perversity, with mature deliberation had before in his behalf, with masters and doctors of divinity, and also of other faculties, with their counsel and consent, do pronounce, decree, and declare the said William to have been and to be a heretic, schismatic, and a false informer of the people, and such as is to be avoided of faithful christians. Wherefore we admonish, under the pain of the law, all and singular christians, of what sex, state, condition, or pre-eminence soever, that neither they nor any of them within our diocese, or any other, do believe, receive, defend, or favour the said William, till he shall deserve fully to be reconciled to the bosom again of holy church."

Of the process, answers, and condemnation of this worthy priest, and true servant of Christ, William Swinderby, you have heard. What afterwards became upon him I have not been able to ascertain; whether he died in prison, or whether he escaped their hands, or whether he was burned, there is no certain relation made. This remains out of doubt, that during the life of King Richard II. no great harm was done to him, which was until the year 1401, when King Richard being wrongfully deposed, Henry IV. seized the kingdom of England. About the beginning of his reign we read of a certain parliament held at London, in which it was decreed, that whoever shewed themselves favourers of Wickliff, who at that time were called Lollards, they should be apprehended, and if they obstinately persevered in that doctrine they should be delivered over to the bishop of the diocese, and from him committed to the secular magistrate. This law (says the history) brought a certain priest to punishment the same year, who was burned in Smithfield in the presence of a great number. But it does not appear what was the priest's name. Notwithstanding, by divers conjectures it appears to me that his name was Swinderby, who was forced to recant before the bishop of Lincoln. This is plain for all men to judge that if he were burned, then the bishops, friars, and priests, who were the causes thereof, have a great thing to answer to the Lord, when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

The history of Walter Brute.

After the history of William Swinderby, I thought good and convenient to add the acts and doings of Walter Brute, his joint fellow and companion, being a lay-man, and learned; brought up as it seems in the university of Oxford, being there also a graduate. The treating of whose history, as it is something long, so therein will appear many things worthy to be read and considered.

First, the mighty operation of God's Spirit in him, his ripe knowledge, modest simplicity, his valiant constancy, his learned treatises, and many conflicts sustained against God's enemies. On the contrary part in his adversaries may appear might against right, man's authority against plain verity; against whom they, having nothing directly to allege, proceed in condemnation against one whom they are not able to confute. The chief occasion, that seemed to stir up the heart and zeal of this Walter against the pope, was the impudent pardons and indulgences of Pope Urban, granted to Henry Spencer bishop of Norwich, to fight against Pope Clement, mentioned before. Secondly, the wrongful condemnation of the articles and conclusions of William Swinderby; the whole order whereof, in the process here following, more plainly may appear.

The process of John, bishop of Hereford, against Walter Brute a learned lay-man, of the diocese of Hereford, touching the cause of Heresy.

"In the name of God, amen. To all manner of faithful christian people, that shall see and hear this our present process, John by the sufferance of God bishop of Hereford sends greeting and continual charity, in the Lord.

We would that you all should know, that of late by many faithful christian people, and specially zealous followers of the catholic faith, we were lamentably informed by way of complaint; that a certain son of ours, named Walter Brute, a learned lay person, of our diocese, has under a cloaked shew of holiness damnable seduced the people; and, setting behind him the fear of God, seduces them as much as he can from day to day, informing and teaching openly and privily as well the nobles as the commons, in certain conclusions, heretical, schismatical, and erroneous, and heretofore condemned. And they have also exhibited against the same Walter, the articles underwritten, in manner and form as followeth.

“ Reverend father and lord, we the faithful people of Christ, and zealous lovers of the catholic faith, and also your humble and devout children, do minister and exhibit to your reverend fatherhood the articles underwritten, touching the catholic faith, contrary and against malicioys persons, and detractors of the same faith, and the determinations of holy mother church, and namely, against the child of Belial, one Walter Brute, a false teacher and seducer amongst the people: humbly beseeching, that you would vouchsafe to have regard to the correction of the enormities underwritten, according to the canonical constitutions, even as to your pastoral office doth belong.

1. We do give and exhibit and intend to prove that the same Walter Brute, being unmindful of his salvation, has been by many and divers faithful christian people frequently accused of the cursedness of heresy; as by the swift report, slander, and rumour of the people, proceeding before the most reverend father and lord, lord William, archbishop of Canterbury, and also before the reverend father and lord, lord John, late bishop of Hereford, your predecessor, and now bishop of St. Asaph, hath been testified, and also hath been many and divers times cited to answer to articles avouched, and openly and publicly taught by him against the catholic faith. But he in this matter of heretical cursedness (so grievously and shamefully spoken of) has never purged his innocency; but lurkingly, and running into corners, has many years laboured to advance things erroneous, and schismatical, and also heretical, and to imprint them in the hearts of faithful people.

2. The aforesaid Walter Brute has openly, publicly, and notoriously avouched; and commonly said and taught, and stubbornly affirmed; that every christian man (yea and woman) being without sin, may make the body of Christ so well as the priest.

3. The same Walter has notoriously, openly and publicly avouched and taught, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the very body, but a sign and a memorial only.

4. The aforesaid Walter has said commonly, and avouched, and also has laboured to inform men and companies, that no man is bound to give tithes, nor oblations; and if any man will needs give, he may give his tithes and oblations to whom he will, excluding thereby their curates.

5. That such as preach and prefer crosses, and pardons (granted by the high bishop to them that helped the purpose of the reverend father lord Henry, by the grace of God bishop of Norwich, when he took his journey to fight for the holy father the pope) are schismatical and heretics, and that the pope cannot grant such manner of pardons.

6. The said Walter has often said, and commonly avouched, that the pope is antichrist, and a seducer of the people, and utterly against the law and life of Christ.

7. Whereas of late your reverence proceeded in form of law against William Swinderby; and that the said William Swinderby had given his answers in writing, containing errors, schisms and heresies, even as you with the mature counsel of masters and doctors in divinity, and other faculties have determined and given sentence, and have pronounced the same William Swinderby to be an heretic and a schismatic, and an erroneous teacher of the people: nevertheless, the aforesaid Walter has openly, publicly, and notoriously said, avouched and stubbornly affirmed, that the said William's answers are good, righteous, and not able to be convinced, in that they contain no error, and that your sentence, given against the said William, is evil, false, and unjust; and that your assistants have wickedly, naughtily, perversely, and unjustly condemned the answers aforesaid.

“ Now thereupon immediately those same faithful christian people have instantly required, that we would vouchsafe that other articles given by the same faithful christians against William Swinderby, together with the writings and answers of the same William, should be admitted against Walter Brute. Which things being done, the same faithful christian people, and especially Sir Walter Pride, the penitentiary of our cathedral church of Hereford, personally appearing before us, sitting in our judgment seat in the parish church of Whiteborne of our diocese brought forth and exhibited two public instruments against the same Walter Brute, in the case of cursed heresy aforesaid.

“ At last, Walter Brute did present to us divers scrolls of paper, written with his own proper hand, for his answers to the same articles and conclusions above written; which scrolls were as follows:—

“ In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and the Holy Ghost, Amen. I, Walter Brute, sinner, layman, husbandman, and a christian (having my offspring of the Britons, both by my father's and mother's side) of the Britons, have been accosed to the bishop of Hereford, that I did err in many matters concerning the catholic christian faith; by whom I am required that I should write an answer in Latin to all those matters. Whose desire I will satisfy to my power, protesting first of all, before God and before all the world; that like as it is not my mind, through God's grace, to refuse the known truth, for any reward, greater or smaller, yea, be it never so big, nor yet for the fear of any temporal punishment; even so it is not my mind to maintain any erroneous doctrine for any personal advantage. And if any man, of what state, sect, or condition soever he be, will shew me that I err in my writings or sayings, by the authority of the sacred scripture, or by probable reason grounded on the sacred scripture, I will humbly and gladly receive his information. But as for the bare words of any teacher (Christ only excepted) I will not simply believe, except he shall be able to establish them by the truth of experience, or of the scripture: because that, in the holy apostles elected by Christ, there has been found error by the testimony of the holy scripture, because that Paul himself confesses that he rebuked Peter, for that he was worthy to be rebuked, Gal. ii. 14. There have been errors found in the holy doctors, that have been before us, as they themselves confess of themselves. And oftentimes it happens, that there is error found in the teachers in our age: who are of contrary opinions among themselves, and some of them do sometimes determine one thing for truth, and others do condemn the self same thing to be heresy and error. Which protestation premised, I will here place two suppositions or cases for a ground and a foundation of all things that I shall say, out of which I would gather two probable conclusions established upon the same, and upon the sacred scripture. By which conclusions, when they shall be declared after my manner and fashion, it shall plainly appear what my opinion and judgment is concerning all matters that I am accused of. But because I am ignorant and unlearned, I will get me under the mighty defences of the Lord: O Lord, I will remember thine only righteousness.

“ God the Father Almighty uncreate, the maker of heaven and earth, hath sent his Son (that was everlastingly begotten) into this world, that he should be incarnate for the salvation and redemption of mankind, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, everlastingly proceeding from the Father and the Son, and was born of Mary the virgin, to the end that we might be born anew. He suffered passion under Pontius Pilate for our sins, laying down his life for us, that we should lay down our life for our brethren. He was crucified, that we should be crucified to the world, and the world to us. He was dead, that he might redeem us from death, by purchasing for us forgiveness of sins. He was buried, that we being buried together with him into death by baptism, and being dead to sins, should live to righteousness. He descended into hell, thereby delivering man from thralldom, and from the bondage of the devil, and restoring him to his inheritance which he lost by sin. The third day he rose from the dead, through the glory of the Father, that we also should walk in newness of life. He ascended up to the heavens, to which nobody has ascended, saving he that descended from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven. He sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty, until his enemies be made his footstool. He being in very deed so much better than the angels, as he hath obtained by inheritance a more excellent name than they. From whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead, according to their works, because the Father hath given all judgment to the Son. In whose terrible judgment we shall rise again, and shall all of us stand before this judgment seat, and receive joy as well bodily as spiritually, for ever to endure, if we be of the sheep placed at the right hand; or else punishment both of body and soul, if we shall be found amongst goats, placed on the left hand, &c.

“Jesus Christ the Son of God, very God and very man, a king for ever, by establishing an everlasting kingdom (breaking to powder all the kingdoms, of the world,) Daniel ii. 44. A priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, whereby also he is able evermore to save such as come unto God by him, and always liveth to make intercession for us, Heb. vii. 25. He offering one sacrifice for our sins, hath made perfect for ever by one oblation those that be sanctified, Heb. x. 14. Being the wisdom that cannot be deceived, and the truth that cannot be uttered, he has in this world taught the will of God his Father, which will he has in work fulfilled, to the intent that he might faithfully instruct us, and has given the law of charity to be observed by his faithful people, which he has written in the hearts and minds of the faithful with the finger of God, where is the Spirit of God, searching the inward secrets of the Godhead. Wherefore, his doctrine must be observed above all other doctrines, whether they be of angels or of men, because that he could not, and would not err in his teaching. But in men's doctrine there chances oftentimes to be error; and therefore we must forsake their doctrines, if covertly or expressly they are repugnant to the doctrine of Christ. Men's doctrines being made for the people's profit, must be allowed and observed, so that they be grounded upon Christ's doctrine, or at least be not repugnant to his words.

“If the high bishop of Rome calling himself the servant of the servants of God, and the chief vicar of Christ in this world, makes and maintains any laws contrary to the gospel of Jesus Christ; then is he of those that have come in Christ's name, saying, I am Christ, and have deceived many, by the testimony of our Saviour in Matt. xxiv. 23. And the idol of desolation sitting in the temple of God and taking away from him the continual sacrifice for a time, times, and half a time, which idol must be revealed to the christian people by the testimony of Daniel. Whereof Christ speaketh in the gospel; when ye shall see the abomination of desolation that was told of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place; let him that readeth understand, he is the pestiferous mountain infecting the whole universal earth, Jer. li. 25. And not the head of Christ's body. For the person ancient in years, and honourable in reverence, he is the head, and the prophet teaching lies, he is the tail, Is. ix. 15. And he is that wicked and sinful captain of Israel, whose foreappointed day of iniquity is come in time of iniquity, who shall take away the diadem and take away the crown, Ez. xxi. 26. To whom it was said; Forasmuch as thy heart was exalted, and didst say, I am a God, and sittest in the seat of God, in the heart of the sea, seeing thou art a man and not God, and hast given thine heart, as if it were the heart of God; therefore behold I will bring upon thee the most strong and mighty strangers of the nations, and they shall draw their swords upon the beauty of thy wisdom, and shall defile the commandments, and kill thee, and pull thee out, and thou shalt die in the destruction of the slain. And it followeth, In the multitude of thine iniquities, and of the iniquities of thy merchandize, thou hast defiled thy sanctification. I will therefore bring forth a fire, from the midst of the whole earth, and will make thee as ashes upon earth. Thou art become nothing, and never shalt thou be any more, Ez. xxviii. Furthermore, he is the idle shepherd forsaking his flock, having a sword on his arm, and another sword on his right eye, Zech. xi. 17. And sitting in the temple of God, he doth advance himself above all things that is called God, or whatsoever is worshipped, 2 Thess. ii. 4. And in the defection or falling away shall the man of sin be revealed, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of his mouth. For every kingdom divided in itself shall be brought to desolation. He is also besides, The beast ascending up out of the earth, having two horns like unto a lamb, but he speaketh like a dragon, and as the cruel beast ascending up out of the sea, whose power shall continue forty-two months. He worketh the things that he hath given to the image of the beast. And he compelled small and great, rich and poor, free men and bond slaves, to worship the beast, and to take his mark in their forehead or their hands, Rev. xiii. 16. And thus, by the testimony of all these places, is he the chief antichrist upon the earth, and must be slain with the sword of God's word, and cast with the dragon, the cruel beast and the false prophet that hath seduced the earth, into the lake of fire and brimstone to be tormented world without end.

“If the city of Rome do allow his traditions, and do disallow Christ's holy commandments, and Christ's doctrine, that it may confirm his traditions; then is she ‘Babylon the great,’ or the ‘daughter of Babylon,’ and the ‘great whore sitting upon many waters,’ with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth are become drunken with the wine of her fornication. With whose spiritual whoredom, enchantments, witchcrafts, and Simon Magus merchandises, the whole world is infected and seduced; saying in her heart, ‘I sit as queen, and am not a widow, neither shall I see sorrow and mourning.’ Yet is she ignorant that within a little while shall come the day of her destruction and ruin by the testimony of God, Rev. chap. xvii. Because that from the time of the continual sacrifice being taken away, and the abomination of desolation placed, there be passed one thousand two hundred and ninety days by the testimony of Daniel, and the chronicles added do agree to the same. And the holy city also hath been trodden under foot of the heathen, for forty-two months, and the woman was nourished up in the wilderness (unto which she fled for fear of the face of the serpent) during one thousand two hundred and sixty days, or else for a time, times, and half a time, which is all one. All these things be manifest by the testimony of the book of Revelations, and the chronicles thereto agreeing. And as concerning the fall of Babylon aforesaid, it is manifest in the Revelations, where it is said, ‘In one day shall her plagues come, death, lamentation, and famine, and she shall be burned with fire. For, strong is the Lord, which shall judge her.’ And again, ‘Babylon that great city is fallen, which hath made all nations to drink of the wine of her fornication.’ And, thirdly, ‘One mighty angel took up a mill-stone, that was a very great one, and did cast it into the sea, saying, With violence shall that great city Babylon be overthrown, and shall no more be found. For her merchants were the princes of the earth, and with her witchcraft all nations have gone astray, and in her is there found the blood of the saints and prophets.’ And of her destruction Isaiah speaketh in the thirteenth chapter, 'And Babylon, that glorious city, being so noble amongst kingdoms in the pride of the Chaldeans, it shall be that like as the Lord did overturn Sodom and Gomorrah upside down, it shall never more be inhabited, nor have the foundation laid in no age, from generation to generation.' Jeremiah saith, 'Your mother that hath borne you is brought to very great confusion, and made even with the ground.' And again, 'The Lord hath devised and done as he hath spoken against the inhabitants of Babylon; which dwell richly in their treasures upon many waters, thine end is come.' And, thirdly, 'Drought shall fall upon her waters, and they shall begin to dry: for it is a land of graven images, and boasteth in her prodigious wonders; it shall never more be inhabited, neither be builded up in no age nor generation. Verily even as God hath subverted Sodom and Gomorrah with her calves.'

"Pardon me (I beseech you) though I be not plentiful in pleasant words. For if I should run after the course of this wicked world, and should please men, I should not be Christ's servant. And because I am a poor man, and neither have nor can have notaries hired to testify of these my writings; I call upon Christ to be my witness, who knows the inward secrets of my heart, that I am ready to declare the things that I have written to the profit of all christian people, and to the hurt of no man living, and am ready to be reformed if any man will shew me where I have erred; being ready also (miserable sinner though I be) to suffer for the confession of the name of Christ, and of his doctrine, as much as shall please him by his grace and love to assist me a miserable sinner. In witness of all these things I have to this writing set the seal of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: which I beseech him to imprint upon my forehead, and to take from me all manner of mark of antichrist. Amen."

These two suppositions (as they are termed in the schools) written by Walter Brute, and exhibited to the bishop, although they contained matter sufficient either to satisfy the bishop if he had been disposed to learn, or else to have provoked him to reply again, if his knowledge therein had been better than his: yet could neither of them work any effect in him. But he receiving and perusing them when he could neither confute that which was said, nor would reply or answer by learning, to that which was truth, said, "That this his writing was too short and obscure, and therefore required him, to write upon the same again more plainly and more at large." Whereupon the said Master Walter satisfying the bishop's request (and ready to give to every one an account of his faith) in a more ample treatise renews his matter before declared. Of this treatise we give the following extracts:—

"Reverend father, forsomuch as it seems to you that my motion in ray two suppositions or cases, and in my two conclusions, is too short and somewhat dark: I will gladly now satisfy your desire, according to my small learning, by declaring the same conclusions. In opening whereof, it shall plainly appear, what I do judge in all matters that I am accused of to your reverence; desiring you first of all that your discretion would not believe that I do enterprize of any presumption to handle the secrets of the scriptures, which the holy and just, and wise doctors have left unpounded. It is not unknown to many, that I am in all points far inferior to them, whose holiness of life and profoundness in knowledge is always allowed. But as for mine ignorance, and multitude of sins, they are to myself and others sufficiently known: wherefore I judge not myself worthy to unloose or to carry their shoes after them. Do you therefore no otherwise deem of me, than I do of mine own self. But if you shall find any goodness in my writings, ascribe it to God only: who, according to the multitude of his mercy, doth sometimes reveal those things to idiots and sinners, which are hidden from the holy and wise, according to this saying, 'I thank thee,

O Father, for that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, O Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight.' And in another place, 'For judgment am I come into this world, that they which see not, might perceive; and that they which see, might be made blind.' And Paul says, 'That God hath chosen the weak things of the world, to confound the mighty; that no man shall glory in himself, but that all men should give the glory to God.'

"He that hath the key of David, who openeth and no man shutteth, shutteth and no man openeth, does (when and how long it pleases him) hide the mysteries, and the secrets of the scriptures from the wise, prudent, and righteous; and at his pleasure reveals them to sinners, and lay persons, and simple souls, that he may have the honour and glory in all things. Wherefore, as I have before said, if you shall find any good things in my writings, ascribe the same to God alone. If you shall find otherwise, think ye the same to be written in ignorance, and not in malice. And if any doubt of error be shewn me in all my writings, I will humbly allow your information and fatherly correction."

"In the first conclusion of mine answer, I have conditionally put it, who is that antichrist lying concealed in the hid scriptures of the prophets: I will pass on the declaration of that conclusion, bringing to light those things which lay hid in darkness, because nothing is hid which shall not be disclosed, and nothing covered which shall not be known. And therefore the thing which was said in the darkness, let us say in the light; and the thing which we have heard in the ear, let us preach upon the house-tops. I, therefore say, that if the high bishop of Rome, calling himself the servant of God, and the chief vicar of Christ in this world, makes and justifies many laws contrary to the gospel of Jesus Christ: then is he the chief of many, who coming in the name of Christ, have said, I am Christ, who have deceived many; which is the first part of the first conclusion, and is manifest. For Christ is called of the Hebrews the very same that we call anointed. And among them there was a double sort of anointing by the law, the one of kings, and the other of priests. And as well were the kings, as the priests, called in the law, Christs. The kings, as in the psalm, The kings of the earth stood up, and the princes took counsel together, against the Lord, and against his Christ, or anointed. And in the books of the Kings very often are the kings called Christs. And our Saviour was Christ, or anointed king, because he was a king for evermore upon the throne of David, as the scripture very often witnesses. The priests also were called anointed, as where it is written, Touch not my Christs; that is, mine anointed ones, and do my prophets no harm. And so was our Saviour Christ, 'a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec.'

"Seeing then that the bishops of Rome do say that they are the high priests; they say also therein that they are kings, because they say that they have the spiritual sword pertaining to their priesthood, and the temporal sword which agrees to a king's state. So it is plain, that really, and in very deed, they say, that they are Christs, although they are not expressly called Christs. Now that they come in the name of Christ is manifest, because they say that they are his vicars in this world, ordained of Christ for the government of the christian church. Therefore, seeing they say, that really and in very deed they are Christs, and the chief friends of Christ; if they make and justify many laws contrary to the gospel of Jesus Christ, then is it plain that they themselves in earth are antichrists, because there is no worse plague and pestilence than a familiar enemy. And if in secret they be against Christ, and yet in open appearance they say that they are his friends, they are so much the more meet to seduce and deceive the christian people, because that a manifest enemy will have much trouble to deceive a man, because men trust him not: but a hidden enemy, pretending outward friendship, may easily seduce."

"Paul to the Romans declareth in a godly discourse, and to the Galatians likewise, 'That none shall be justified by the works of the law, but by grace in the faith of Jesus Christ.' As for the morals and ceremonies of the law, as circumcision, sacrifices for offences, and for sins, first-fruits, tithes, vows, divers sorts of washings, the sprinkling of blood, the sprinkling of ashes, abstaining from unclean meats, which are ordained for the sanctifying and cleansing of the people from sin, no nor yet the prayers of the priests, neither the preachings of the prophets could cleanse a man from his sin. For death reigned even from Adam to Moses, and sin from Moses to Christ, as Paul declareth to the Romans in the fifth chapter. But Christ, willing to have mercy and not sacrifice, being a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, and an high priest of good things to come, did neither by the blood of goats or calves, but by his own blood, enter in once into the holy place, when an everlasting redemption is found: neither did Jesus enter into the holy places that were made with hands, which are the examples of true things, but unto the very heaven, that now he may appear before the face of God for us. Nor yet he did so, that he should offer up himself oftentimes, as the high bishop entered into the holy place every year with strange blood, (for otherwise he must needs have suffered oftentimes since the beginning of the world), but now, in the latter end of the world, hath he once appeared by his own sacrifice, for the destruction of sin. And like as it is decreed for men once to die, and after that cometh judgment; even so was Christ once offered up to consume away the sins of many. The second time shall he appear without sin to the salvation of such as look for him. For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image or substance itself of the things, can never by those sacrifices which they offer (of one selfsame sort continually year by year) make them perfect that come unto her. Otherwise, men would leave off offering, because that those worshippers being once cleansed, should have no more prick of conscience for sin afterwards. But in them is there remembrance made of sins every year. For it is impossible, that by the blood of goats and bulls sins should be taken away. Wherefore he entering into the world doth say, As for sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not have, but a body hast thou framed unto me. And sacrifices for sin have not pleased thee: then said I, behold I come; in the head, or principal part of the book it is written of me, that I should do thy will O God. Wherefore he said before, that sacrifices, oblations, and burnt-offerings, and that for sin thou wouldst not have: neither were those things pleasant to thee which are offered according to the law: then said I, behold I come, that I may do thy will, O God: he taketh away the first that he may establish that that followed. In which will we are sanctified and made holy by the offering up of the body of Jesus Christ once. And verily every priest is ready every day ministering, and oftentimes offering the selfsame sacrifices, which never can take away sins. But this man, offering one sacrifice for sins, doth for ever and ever sit at God's right hand, looking for the rest to come, till that his enemies be placed to be his footstool. For with one offering hath he for ever made perfect those that be sanctified. By which things it plainly appeareth, that Christ by once offering hath cleansed from their sins, they who could not be cleansed from the same by all the ceremonies of the law, and so did fulfil that which the priesthood of the law could not. Wherefore the moral and judicial law, he fulfilled by the law of charity, and by grace; and the ceremonial, by one offering up of his body on the altar of the cross. And so it is plain that Christ fulfilled the whole law.

"They say that the bishop of Rome (who is the chief priest and judge among them) hath full power and authority to remit sins. Whereupon they say, that he is able fully and wholly, to absolve a man a pena et culpa, so that if a man at the time of his death, had this remission, he should straightway fly to heaven without any pain of purgatory. The other bishops (as they say) have not so great authority. The priests constituted under every bishop, have power, say they, to absolve the sins of them that are confessed, but not all kind of sins; because there are some grievous sins reserved to the absolution of the bishops; and some again, to the absolution only of the chief and high bishop. They say also, that it behoves the offenders, for the necessity of their soul's health, to call to their remembrance their offences, and to declare them with all the circumstances to the priest in auricular confession, supplying the place of God, after the manner of a judge; and afterward humbly to fulfil the penance enjoined by the priest, except the penance so enjoined, or any part thereof, be released by the superior power. All these things (say they) are manifestly determined. And although these things have not expressly their foundation in the plain and manifest doctrine of Christ, nor any of the apostles; yet the authors of the decrees and decretals concerning this matter, have grounded the same upon divers places of the scriptures, as in the words of Christ in the gospel of St. Matthew the sixteenth chapter, whereupon they ground the pope's power judicial to surmount the powers of other priests, as where Christ said unto his disciples, 'Whom do men say that I am? And they answered, Some say that thou art John Baptist, some Elias, and some Jeremias, or one of the prophets. He said, But whom say ye that I am? Simon Peter, answered, and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou Simon Bar-Jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee; but my Father which is in heaven. And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And to thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, shall also be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth, shall be loosed also in heaven.'

"Out of this text of Christ, divers expositors have drawn divers errors. As first when Christ said, 'And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church;' some affirm, that Christ meant he would build his church upon Peter. This exposition is ascribed to Pope Leo; the error whereof is manifestly known. For the church of Christ is not builded upon Peter, but upon the rock of Peter's confession, for he said, 'Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God.' And again when Christ said singularly to Peter, 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind,' &c. By this saying they affirm, that Christ gave to Peter specially, as chief of the rest of the apostles, a larger power to bind and to loose, than he did to the rest of the apostles and disciples. And because Peter answered for himself and all the apostles, not only confessing the faith which he had chiefly above the rest, but also the faith which the rest of the apostles had even as himself, by the revelation of the heavenly Father; it appears that as the faith of all the apostles was declared by the answer of one, so by this that Christ said, 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind,' &c., is given unto the rest of the apostles, the same power and equality to bind and to loose, as unto Peter. Which Christ himself declares in the gospel of St. Matthew, the eighteenth chapter, in these words, 'Verily I say unto you, what things soever you shall bind upon earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever you shall loose upon earth, shall be also loosed in heaven.' And further he adds, 'And again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree upon earth, touching anything ye shall ask, it shall be given unto you of my Father which is in heaven. For where two or three be gathered together in my name, I am there in the midst of them.' And in John, the twentieth chapter, he saith generally to them, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained.'

By this it appears, that the power to bind and to loose is not specially granted to Peter, as chief and head of the rest, and that by him the rest had their power to bind and to loose; for the head of the body of the church is one, which is Christ. and the head of Christ is

God. Peter and the rest of the apostles are the good members of the body of Christ; receiving power and virtue from Christ, whereby they confirm and glue together the other members (as well the strong and noble, as the weak and unable) to a perfect composition and scemliness of the body of Christ: that all honour from all parts and members may be given to Christ as head and chief, by whom as head all the members are governed. And therefore Paul says, 1 Cor. iii. 4., 'For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal? Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man? I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.' And to the Galatians he says (ii. 6—10.) 'But of those who seemed to be somewhat, whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's person: for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me: but contrariwise, when they saw that the Gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, as the Gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter; (for he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me toward the Gentiles;) and when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision. Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do.' Hereby it appears that Paul had not his authority of Peter to convert the Gentiles, to baptize them, and to remit their sins, but of him who said unto him, 'Saul, why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.' Here is Paul of the head of the church, and not of Peter: by which head they say, that all the members are sustained and made lively.

'The third error which the authors of the canons conceive in the text, 'Unto thee will I give the keys,' &c. is this, they say that in this sentence which was said to Peter of the authority to bind and to loose, was meant that as Christ gave to Peter above all the rest of the apostles a special, and as it were an excellent power above all the apostles; even so, say they, he gave power to the bishops of Rome (whom they call Peter's chief successors) the same special power and authority, exceeding the power of all other bishops of the world.

'The first part of this parallel and comparison, doth appear manifestly by the premises to be erroneous; wherein is plainly shewed that the other apostles had equal power with Peter to bind and loose. Wherefore consequently it follows that the second part of the parallel, grounded upon the same text is also erroneous. But if the first part of the parallel were truth, as it is not, yet the second part must needs be an error, wherein is said, that the bishops of Rome are Peter's chief successors. For although there is but one catholic christian church, of all the faithful sort converted; yet the first part of the church, and the first converted, was of the Jews, the second of the Greeks, and the third part was of the Romans or Latins. Whereof the first part was most perfectly converted to the faith, for they faithfully observed the perfection of charity, as appeareth in the acts of the apostles, by the multitude of the believers. They were of one heart, and one soul, neither called they any thing that they possessed their own, but all was common among them.

'Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, says, the gospel is 'salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.' The Greeks were after the Jews the next converted, and after them the Romans, taking their information of the Greeks, as appears by the chronicles, although indeed some Romans were converted to the faith, by Peter and Paul. And as Christ said thrice to Peter, feed my sheep, so Peter ruled these three churches, as the chronicles witness. But first he reformed the church of the Jews in Jerusalem and Judea, as appears by the testimony of the acts of the apostles. For it is manifest how Peter standing up amongst his brethren, spake unto them concerning the election of an apostle in the place of Judas the traitor, alleging places to them out of the scripture, that another should take upon him his apostleship. And so by lot was Matthias constituted in the place of Judas. After that the Holy Ghost was come upon the apostles, and that they spake with the tongues of all men, the hearers were astonished at the miracle. And some mocked them, saying, these men are full of new wine; but Peter stood up and spake to them, saying, that it was fulfilled in them that was prophesied by Joel the prophet. And he preached unto the people Christ, whom they in their ignorance had put to death. To whom was a Saviour promised by the testimony of the prophets. And when they heard the words of Peter, they were pricked at the heart, saying unto him and the rest of the apostles, what shall we then do? And Peter said unto them, Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the Holy Ghost. And there were joined unto them the same day about three thousand souls. And by Acts iii. 4, 5, it appears that Peter above the rest did those things which belonged to the ministry of the apostleship, as well in preaching as in answering. Whereupon some chronicles say, that Peter governed the church of the Jews at Jerusalem, four years before he governed Antioch. And by the testimony of Paul to the Galatians, the gospel of the uncircumcision is committed to Paul, even as the circumcision to Peter. And he that wrought with Peter in the apostleship of circumcision, wrought with Paul amongst the Gentiles. Whereby it appears that the church of the Jews was committed to the government of Peter. And in the process of the acts of the apostles it appears, that Peter believed that the faith of Christ was not to be preached to those Gentiles, who always lived in uncleanness of idolatry. But when Peter was at Joppa, Cornelius a Gentile sent to him that he would come and shew him the way of life; but Peter (a little before the coming of the messengers of Cornelius) being in his chamber, after he had prayed, fell in a trance, and saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending even as a great sheet, let down by four corners from heaven to earth. In which were all manner of four-footed beasts, serpents of the earth, and fowls of the air. And a voice spake unto him, saying, Arise Peter, kill and eat; and Peter said, Not so, Lord, because I have never eaten any common or unclean thing. This was done thrice. And Peter descended (not knowing what the vision did signify) and found the messengers of Cornelius.

'As concerning the judicial authority of the clergy, many things are written in the canons of decrees, greatly to be marvelled at, and far from the truth of the scripture. The authors of the canons say, that Christ gave unto the priests judicial power over sinners that confessed their sins unto them. And this they ground upon the text of Christ: 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou loosest,' &c. And these keys of the kingdom of heaven, they call the knowledge to discern, and the power to judge, which they say only belongeth to the priests, except in case of necessity; then they say a lay-man may absolve a man from sin. And as touching absolution, they say there are three things to be required on the sinner's part: first, hearty contrition, whereby the sinners ought to bewail their offending of God through sins; the second is, auricular confession, whereby the sinner ought to shew unto the priest his sins, and the circumstances of them; the third is satisfaction through penance enjoined to him by the priest for his sins committed. And of his part that gives absolution there are two things (say they) to be required: that is to say, knowledge to discern one sin from another, whereby he ought to make a difference of sins, and appoint a convenient penance, according to the quantity of the sins. The second is, authority to judge, whereby he ought to enjoin penance to the offender. And further, they say, that he that is confessed ought with all humility to submit himself to this authority, and wholly and voluntarily to do those penances which are commanded him by the priest, except the penance be released by a superior power; for all priests (as they say) have not equal authority to absolve sins. The chief priest whom they call Peter's successor, has power fully and wholly to absolve. But the inferior priests have power, some more, some less: the more as they are near him in dignity, the less as they are farther from the degree of his dignity. All this is declared by process in the decrees, but not by the express doctrine of Christ, or any of his apostles. For although Christ absolved men from their sins, I do not find that he did it after the manner of a judge, but of a Saviour. For Christ saith, 'God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved,' John iii. 17. Whereupon he spake unto him whom he healed of the palsy, 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee.' And to the woman taken in adultery, Christ said, 'Woman, where are thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee?' Who said, 'No man, Lord.' To whom then Jesus thus said, 'Neither will I condemn thee, go and sin no more.'

"By which words and deeds of Christ, and many other places of the scripture, it appears he was not as a judge at his first coming, to punish sinners according to their offences; but that day shall come hereafter, wherein he shall judge all men according to their works, as in Matt. xxv., where he saith, 'When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all his angels with him; then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and all nations shall be gathered before him, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats,' &c. Neither shall he judge alone, but his saints also with him. For he saith, 'You that have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.' If then Christ came not as a judge, why do the priests say that they supply the room of Christ on earth, to judge sinners according to the quantity of their offences? And yet not only this, but it is more to be wondered at, how the bishop of Rome dares to take upon him to be a judge before the day of judgment, and to prevent the time, judging some to be saints in heaven, and to be honoured of men, and some again to be tormented in hell eternally with the devils! Would to God these men would weigh the saying of St. Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 5. 'Judge nothing before the time the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts, and then every one shall have praise of God.' Let the bishop of Rome take heed, lest that in Ezekiel be spoken him, 'Because thy heart is lifted up, and thou hast said I am a God, I sit in the seat of God, and in the midst of the seas, yet thou art a man, and not God.' It is manifest that the remission of sins principally belongs to God, who through grace washes away our sins. For it is said, 'The Lamb of God taketh away the sins of the world.' And to christians it belongs as the ministers of God. For in the twentieth chapter of John, Christ saith, 'Receive unto you the Holy Ghost: whose sins you remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained.' Seeing therefore that all christians that are baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, receive the Holy Ghost; it appears that they have power given to them of Christ, to remit sins ministerially. Has not every christian authority to baptize? and in the baptism all the sins of the baptized are remitted. Ergo, they that do baptize do remit sins.

"Who is he therefore who so rashly takes upon him to judge the infants begotten of faithful parents, dying without baptism, to be tormented with eternal fire? Now let us consider the three things which the canons of decrees affirm to be requisite for the remission of the sins of those that sin after baptism, that is to say, contrition of heart, auricular confession, and satisfaction of the deed through penance enjoined by the priest for the sins committed. I cannot find in any place in the gospel where Christ commanded that this kind of confession should be done unto the priest; nor can I find that Christ assigned any penance to sinners for their sins, but that he desired them to sin no more. If a sinner confess that he has offended God through sin, and sorrows heartily for his offences, minding hereafter to sin no more, then is he truly repentant for his sin, and then he is converted unto the Lord. If he shall then humbly, and with good hope, crave mercy from God, and remission of his sins: who is he that can prevent God from absolving that sinner from his sin? And as God absolves a sinner from his sins, so has Christ absolved many, although they confessed not their sins to the priests, and although they received not due penance for their sins. And if Christ could after that manner once absolve sinners; how is he become now not able to absolve? Except some man will say that he is above Christ, and that his power is diminished by the ordinances of his own laws. How were sinners absolved by God in the time of the apostles, and always heretofore, to the time that these canons were made? I speak not these things as though confession to priests were wicked, but that it is not of necessity requisite to salvation. I believe verily that the confession of sins to good priests, and likewise to other faithful christians, is good, as witnesseth St. James the apostle: 'Confess your sins one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed; for the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.' This kind of confession is good, profitable, and expedient; for if God peradventure hears not a man's own prayer, he is helped with the intercession of others. Yet nevertheless the prayers of the priests seem too much to be extolled in the decrees, where they treat of penitence, saying as is ascribed to Pope Leo (multiplex misericordia Dei, &c.), that it is ordained by the Providence of God's divine will, that the mercy of God cannot be obtained but by the prayer of the priests, &c. The prayer of a good priest much avails a sinner, confessing his faults to him. The counsel of a discreet priest is very profitable for a sinner, to give the sinner counsel to beware of sin hereafter, and to instruct him.

"After this manner I esteem confession to priests very expedient and profitable to a sinner. But to confess sins to the priest as to a judge, and to receive of him corporal penance for a satisfaction to God for his sins committed; I see not how this can be founded upon the truth of scripture. For before the coming of Christ, no man was sufficient or able to make satisfaction to God for his sins, although he suffered never so much penance for his sins. And therefore it was needful that he that was without sin, should be punished for sins, as witnesseth Isaiah liii. 4. where he saith, 'He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows.' And again, 'He was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities.' And again, 'The Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all.' And again, 'For the transgression of my people was he stricken.' If therefore Christ through his passion has made satisfaction for our sins, whereas we ourselves were unable to do it: then through him have we grace and remission of sins. How can we say now that we are sufficient to make satisfaction to God by any penance enjoined to us by man's authority, seeing that our sins are more grievous after baptism, than they were before the coming of Christ? Therefore as in baptism the pain of Christ in his passion was a full satisfaction for our sins; even so is it also after baptism, if we confess that we have offended, and be heartily sorry for our sins, and mind not to sin again afterwards.

"Hereupon John writeth in his first epistle, ch. i. 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just, to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say we have not sinned we make him a liar, and his word is not in us. My little children, these things I write unto you that ye sin not; but if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.' Therefore we ought to confess ourselves chiefly to God even from the heart, for that he chiefly remits sins, without whose absolution little avails the absolution of man. This kind of confession is profitable and good. The authors of the canons say, that although auricular confession made to the priest, be not expressly taught by Christ, yet say they it is taught in that saying which Christ said to the diseased of the leprosy, whom he commanded, 'Go your ways and shew yourselves unto the priests:' because they say the law of cleansing lepers, which was given by Moses, signified the confessions of sins to the priest. And whereas Christ commanded the lepers to shew themselves to the priests, they say, that Christ meant that those that were unclean with the leprosy of sin, should shew their sins to the priests by auricular confession. I marvel much at the authors of the canons; for even from the beginning of their decrees to the end, they ground their sayings upon the old law, which was the law of sin, and death, and not (as witnesses Paul) upon the words of Christ, which are spirit and life. Christ saith, 'The words which I speak unto you, they are the spirit, and they are life.' They ground their sayings in the shadow of the law, and not in the light of Christ, for every evil doer hateth the light, and cometh not unto it, lest his deeds should be reprov'd; but he that doth the truth cometh into the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God, John iii. 20.

"Now let us pass to the words that Christ spake to the leper; the leper said, 'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.' And Jesus stretching forth his hand touched him, saying, 'I will, be thou clean; and straightways he was cleansed of his leprosy.' And Jesus said unto him, 'See thou tell no man, but go and shew thyself to the priests, and offer the gifts that Moses commanded for a testimony unto them.' This gospel witnesses plainly, that the leper was cleansed only by Christ, and not by the priests, neither did Christ command the leper to shew himself to the priests, for any help of cleansing that he should receive of the priests; but to fulfil the law of Moses, in offering a sacrifice for his cleansing, and for a testimony to the priests, who always of envy accused Christ as a transgressor of the law. For if Christ after he had cleansed the leprosy, had licensed him to communicate with others that were clean, before he had shewed himself cleansed to the priests, then might the priests have accused Christ as a transgressor of the law; because it was a precept of the law, that the leper after he was cleansed, should shew himself to the priests. And they had signs in the book of the law, whereby they might judge whether he were truly cleansed or not. And if he were cleansed, then would the priests offer a gift for his cleansing; and if he were not cleansed, then would they separate him from the company of others that were clean. Seeing every figure ought to be assimilated unto the thing that is figured, I pray you then what agreement is there between the cleansing of lepers by the law, and the confession of sins? By the law the priest knew whether the man were leprosy better than he that had the leprosy. In confession the priest knew not the sins of him that confessed, but by his own confession. In the law the priest did not cleanse the leprosy. How now therefore ought the priests to cleanse sinners from their sin, and that without them they cannot be cleansed? In the law the priest had certain signs, by the which he could certainly know whether a man were cleansed from his leprosy or not. In confession the priest is not certain of the cleansing of sins, because he is ignorant of his contrition. He knows not also whether he will not sin any more; without which contrition and resolving to sin no more, God has not absolved any sinner. And if God has not absolved a man, without doubt then is he not made clean. And how then is confession figured under the law? Doubtless so it seems to me (under the correction of them that can judge better in the matter) that this law bears rather a figure of excommunication, and reconciliation of him that hath been obstinate in his sin, and is reconciled again. For so it appears by the process of the gospel, that when as the sinner doth not amend for the private correction of his brother, nor for the correction of two or three, neither yet for the public correction of the whole church; then is he to be counted as an heathen man and publican, and as a certain leper to be voided out of the company of all men. Which sinner, notwithstanding, if he shall yet repent, is then to be reconciled, because he is then cleansed from his obstinacy.

"But he who pretends himself to be the chief vicar of Christ, and the high priest, saith that he has power to absolve a pœna et culpa. I do not find how it is founded in the scripture, but of his own authority he enjoins to sinners penance for their sins. And grant that he may absolve them from their sins, yet from the pain (which they call a pœna) he does not simply absolve, as in his indulgences he promises. But if he were charitable, and had such power as he pretends, he would suffer none to lie in purgatory for sin, forasmuch as that pain far exceeds all other pain which we suffer here. What man is there, but if he sees his brother tormented in this world, will not help him and deliver him? Much more ought the pope then to deliver out of pains of purgatory, as well rich as poor alike. And if he sell to the rich his indulgences, doublewise, yea triplewise he seduces them. First, in promising them to deliver them out of the pain from whence he does not, and cannot deliver them, and so makes them falsely to believe that which they ought not to believe. Secondly, he deceives them of their money, which he takes for his indulgences. Thirdly, he seduces them in this, that he promising to deliver them from pain, induces them into grievous punishment indeed, for the heresy of simony, which both of them commit, and therefore are worthy both of great pain to fall upon them; for so we read that Jesus cast out buyers and sellers out of his temple. Also Peter said unto Simon the first author of this heresy, 'Thy money,' said he, 'perish with thee, because thou thoughtest the gift of God could be purchased for money.' Moreover, whereas Christ saith, 'Freely you have received, freely give.' And whereas on the contrary the pope sells that thing which he has taken, what doubt is there, but that he grievously deserves to be punished, both he that sells and he that buys, for the crime of simony which they commit? Over and besides, by many reasons and authorities of the scripture it may be proved, that he does not absolve a man contrite for his sins, although he absolves him from the guilt.

"But this surprises me, that in his indulgences he promises to absolve men from all manner of deadly sins, and yet cannot absolve a man from debt; for as the debt which we owe to God is of much greater importance than the debt of our brother, if he be able to remit the debt due to God, much more it should seem that he is able to forgive the debt of our brother.

"Another thing there is that I wonder at: the pope shows himself more strict in absolving a priest for not saying, or negligently saying his matins, than for transgressing the commandment of God; considering that the transgression of the commandment of God is much more grievous than the breach of man's commandment.

"For these and many other errors concurring in this matter of the pope's absolutions, blessed be God, and honour be to him for the remission of our sins. And let us firmly believe and know, that he does and will absolve us from our sins, if we be sorry from the bottom of our hearts that we have offended him, having a good purpose and will to offend him no more. And let us be bold to resort to good and discreet priests, who with wholesome discretion and sound counsel can instruct us how to avoid the corruption of sin hereafter; and which, because they are better than we, may pray to God for us; whereby we may both obtain sooner the remission of our sins past, and also may learn better how to avoid the danger of sin to come." (Ex Registro Latino Episc. Hereford.)

And thus much concerning the judgment and doctrine of this Walter for Christian patience, charity, and mercy, which as they are true and infallible notes and marks of true Christianity, so Walter Brute, making comparison herein between Christ and the pope, goes about purposely to declare and manifest, whereby all men may see what contrariety there is between the rule of Christ's teaching, and the proceedings of the pope, between the example and life of the one, and the example of the other. Of which two, as one is altogether given to peace, so is the other on the contrary side as much disposed to war, murder, and bloodshed, as is easy to be seen. Whoso looks not upon the outward shows and pretended words of these Romish popes, but advises and considers their inward practices and secret works, shall easily perceive under the mask of peace what discord and debate they work, who bearing outwardly the meek horns of the lamb mentioned in the Revelations, do bear within the bowels of a wolf, full of cruelty, murder, and bloodshed; which if any do think to be spoken of me contumeliously, would God that man could prove as well the same to be spoken of me not truly. But truth it is, I speak it sincerely, without affection of blind partiality, according to the truth of histories both old and new. Thus under the phrase 'In the name of God, Amen,' how unmercifully does the pope condemn his brother! and while he pretended it was not lawful for him to kill any man; what thousands of men has he killed? And likewise in this sentence, 'in the bowels of Jesus Christ,' pretending as though he would be a mediator to the magistrate for the party, yet indeed will he be sure to excommunicate the magistrate if he execute not the sentence given, who are the true heretics the Lord when he comes shall judge. But grant them to be heretics whom he condemns as heretics, yet what bowels of mercy are here, where there is nothing but burning, fagotting, drowning, prisoning, chaining, famishing, racking, hanging, tormenting, threatening, reviling, cursing, and oppressing, and no instructing, nor yet impartial hearing of them, what they can say? The like cruelty also may appear in their wars, if we consider how Pope Urban V., besides the racking and murdering of seven or eight cardinals, set up Henry Spencer, bishop of Norwich, to fight against the French pope, Innocent IV. was in war himself against the Apulians. Likewise Alexander IV., his successor, stirred up the son of King Henry III. to fight against the son of the emperor, Frederick II., for Apulia. Boniface VIII. moved Albert (who stood to be emperor) to drive Philip the French king out of his realm. Gregory IX. excited Lewis the French king three sundry times to mortal war against the Earl Raymond and the city of Toulouse, and Avignon where Lewis the French king died. Honorius III. by strength of war many ways resisted Frederick II. and set out thirty-five galleys against the coasts of the emperor's dominions. The same pope also besieged Ferrara, to pass over the war at Ticinum, with many other battles and conflicts of popes against the Romans, Venetians, and divers other nations. Innocent III. set up Philip the French king to war against King John. What stir Pope Gregory VII., otherwise named Hildebrand, kept against the Emperor Henry IV. is not unknown. And who is able to recite all the wars, battles, and fields, fought by the stirring-up of the pope? These, with many other like examples, considered, caused this Walter Brute to write in this matter, making yet no universal proposition, but that christian magistrates in case of necessity might make resistance in defence of public right. Now he proceeds further to the matter of the sacrament.

"Touching the matter (saith he) of the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, divers men have divers opinions, as the learned do know. As concerning my judgment upon the same, I firmly believe whatever the Lord Jesus taught implicitly or expressly to his disciples, and faithful people to be believed. For he is, as I believe and know, the true bread of God which descended from heaven, and giveth life to the world, of which bread whosoever eateth shall live for ever; as it is in the sixth of John declared. Before the coming of Christ in the flesh, although men did live in body, yet in spirit they did not live, because all men were then under sin, whose souls thereby were dead, from the which death no man by the law, nor with the law, was justified: 'For by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.' Gal. ii. 16. And again in the same epistle, chap. iii. 11. 'But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God it is evident: for the just shall live by faith; the law is not of faith; but the man that doeth them shall live in them.' And again in the same chapter, ver. 21, 'If the law had been given, which might have justified, then our righteousness had come by the law. But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise might be sure by the faith of Jesus Christ to all believers. Moreover, before that faith came, they were kept and concluded all under the law, until the coming of that faith which was to be revealed. For the law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we should be justified by faith.' Also the said Paul, Rom. v. 20, saith, 'The law entered that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death, so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord.' Whereby it is manifest that by the faith which we have in Christ, believing him to be the true Son of God which came down from heaven to redeem us from sin, we are justified from sin, and so live by him which is the true bread and meat of the soul. And the bread which Christ gave is his flesh, given for the life of the world. For he being God, came down from heaven, and being truly carnal man, did suffer in the flesh for our sins, which in his divinity he could not suffer. Wherefore like as we believe by our faith that he is true God, so must we also believe that he is a true man, and then do we eat the bread of heaven, and the flesh of Christ. And if we believe that he did voluntarily shed his blood for our redemption, then do we drink his blood.

"And thus except we eat the flesh of the Son of man, and shall drink his blood, we have not eternal life in us, because the flesh of Christ is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed; and whosoever eateth the flesh of Christ, and drinketh his blood, abideth in Christ, and Christ in him. John vi. And as in this world the souls of the faithful live, and are refreshed spiritually with this heavenly bread, and with the flesh and blood of Christ; so in the world to come, the same shall live eternally in heaven, refreshed with the deity of Jesus Christ. And in the memory of this refreshment, present in this world, and in the world to come, Christ hath given to us (for eternal blessedness) the sacrament of his body and blood in the substance of bread and wine, as it appears in Matt. xxvi. 'As they were eating, Jesus took bread and blessed it, brake it, and gave it unto his disciples, and said, Take, eat, this is my body: And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it them, saying, Drink ye all of this, this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many for the remission of sins.' And Luke in his gospel, chap. xxii. of this matter thus writeth, 'And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you, do this in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you.' That Christ said, this is my body, in shewing to them the bread, I firmly believe, and know that it is true: for Christ (forasmuch as he is God) is the very truth itself, and by consequence all that he saith is true. And I believe that the very same was his body, in such wise as he willed it to be his body; for in that he is Almighty, he hath done whatsoever pleased him. And as in Cana of Galilee he changed the water into wine really, so that after the transubstantiation it was wine and not water, so when he said, this is my body, if he would have had the bread really to be transubstantiated into his very body, so that after this changing it should have been his natural body, and not bread as it was before, I know that it must needs have been so; but I find not in the scripture that his will was to have any such real transubstantiation or mutation.

"And as the Lord God Omnipotent, in his perfection essential being the Son of God, exceeds the most pure creature, and yet when it pleased him he took upon him our nature, remaining really God as he was before, and was really made man; so that after this assuming of our substance, he was really very God, and very man; even so, if he would, when he said, this is my body, he could make this to be his body really, the bread still really remaining as it was before. Wherefore he that could make one man to be very God, and very man, could, if he would, make one thing to be really very bread, and his very body. But I do not find it expressed in the scripture, that he wished any such identity or conjunction to be made. And as Christ said, 'I am the true bread,' not changing his essence or being in the essence or substance of bread, but was the same Christ which he was before really, and yet bread by a similitude or figurative speech; so if he would, it might be, when he said, this is my body, that this should really have been the bread as it was before, and sacramentally or memorially to be his body. And this seems to me most nearly to agree to the meaning of Christ, forasmuch as he said, 'Do this in remembrance of me.' Then forasmuch as in the supper it is manifest that Christ gave to his disciples the bread of his body which he brake, to eat with their mouths; in which bread he gave himself also to them, as one in whom they should believe (as to be the food of the soul) and that by faith they should believe him to be their Saviour who took his body, wherein also he wished it to be manifest that he would redeem them from death; so was the bread eaten with the disciples' mouths, that he, being the true bread of the soul, might be in spirit received and eaten spiritually by their faith which believed in him.

"The bread which in the disciples' mouths was chewed, from the mouth passed to the stomach. For, as Christ saith, 'Whatsoever cometh to the mouth, goeth into the belly, and is cast out into the draught.' But that true and very bread of the soul was eaten of the spirit of the disciples, and by faith entered their minds, and abode in their hearts through love. And so the bread broken seemeth unto me to be really the meat of the body, and the bread which it was before, but sacramentally to be the body of Christ; as Paul, 1 Cor. x. 'The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?' So the bread which we break is the communion of the Lord's body. And it is manifest that the heavenly bread is not broken, neither yet is subject to such breaking; therefore Paul calls the material bread which is broken, the body of Christ which the faithful are partakers of. The bread, therefore, changes not its essence, but is bread really, and is the body of Christ sacramentally. Even as Christ is the very vine, abiding really and figuratively the vine: so the temple of Jerusalem was really the material temple, and figuratively it was the body of Christ; because he said, 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will build it again.' And this spake he of the temple of his body; whereas others understood it to be the material temple, as appeared by their answer. For, said they, 'Forty and seven years was this temple in building, and wilt thou raise it up in three days?'

"The writers of this time and age affirm, that if by the negligence of the priest, the sacrament be so negligently left, that a mouse, or any other beast or vermin eat the same; then they say, that the sacrament returneth again into the nature and substance of bread. Whereby they must needs confess, that a miracle is as well wrought by the negligence of the priest, as there was made by the consecration of the priest in making the sacrament. For either by the eating of the mouse the body of Christ is transubstantiated into the nature of bread, which is a transubstantiation supernatural; or else this bread is produced by creation out of nothing; and therefore either of these operations is miraculous. Now, considering the varying opinions of the doctors, and the absurdities which follow, I believe with Paul, that the bread which we break, is the communion of the body of Christ: and as Christ saith, that the bread is the body of Christ for a memorial and remembrance of him. And in such sort as Christ willed the same to be his body, in the same manner and sort do I believe it to be his body.

"But whether we can make the body of Christ, and minister it to the people: or whether priests are divided from the lay people by their knowledge, pre-eminence, and sanctity of life, or else by external signs only. Also, whether the signs of tonsure and other external signs of holiness in priests, are signs of antichrist, or else taught by our Lord Jesus Christ; it remains for me next to speak. And first of the three kinds of the priests. I remember that I have read, the first of them to be Aaronical, legal, and temporal; the second to be eternal and regal according to the order of Melchisedec; the third to be christian. The first of these ceased at the coming of Christ; for St. Paul to the Hebrews saith, The priesthood of Aaron was translated to the priesthood of the order of Melchisedec. The legal sort of priests of Aaron, were separated from the rest of the people by kindred, office, and inheritance. By kindred, for the children of Aaron only were priests. By office, for it only pertained to them to offer sacrifice for the sins of the people, and to instruct the people in the precepts and ceremonies of the law. By inheritance, because the Lord was their portion of inheritance; neither had they any other inheritance amongst their brethren, but those things which were offered to the Lord, as the first-fruits, parts of the sacrifices, and vows; except places for their houses for them and theirs, as appears by Moses' law. The priesthood of Christ much differed from this priesthood, as Paul witnesses to the Hebrews.

"First in kindred, because that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, came of the stock and tribe of Judah; of which tribe none had to do with the altar, and in which tribe nothing at all was spoken of the priests of Moses.

"Secondly, Others were made priests without their oath taken: but he, by an oath, by him which said, 'The Lord sware and will not repent, thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec.'

"Thirdly, by duration, for many of them were made priests but during the term of their lives: but he, because he remaineth for ever, hath an eternal priesthood. Wherefore he is able to save us for ever, having by himself access unto God, who ever liveth to make intercession for us.

"The law made also such men priests as had infirmities; but 'Sermo,' (that is the word, which according to the law is the eternal Son and perfect) by an oath.

"The priesthood of Christ also differed from the priesthood of Aaron and the law, in the matter of the sacrifice, and in the place of sacrificing. In the matter of their sacrifices, because they used in their sacrifices strange bodies for their sacrifices, and shed strange blood for the expiation of sins: but he offering himself to God his Father for us, shed his own blood for the remission of our sins. In the place of sacrificing, because that they did offer their sacrifice in the tabernacle, or temple: but Christ suffering death without the gates of the city, offered himself upon the altar of the cross to God his Father, and thence shed his precious blood. In his supping chamber also he blessed the bread, and consecrated the same for his body, and the wine which was in the cup he also consecrated for his blood; delivering the same to his apostles to be done for a commemoration and remembrance of his incarnation and passion. Neither did Jesus enter into the sanatu-

(1) The following is still part and parcel of the Rubric or Canon of the Missal:—"If the host when consecrated shall disappear, either by some accident, as by the wind, or by a miracle, or taken away by a mouse or any animal, and cannot be found, then let another be consecrated." Such is the rule of the Missal, or Mass-Book: and thus, after teaching that the host is Jesus Christ, it supposes the gross absurdity of his disappearing by an accident—by wind—eaten up by a mouse or other animal! There is nothing in Egyptian idolatry more absurd than this, for it supposes God not able to take care of himself.

They have lately become so ashamed of this, that in the later editions of the Missal they have surreptitiously omitted all mention of the mouse, though they retain the rest of the rule. (2p.)

ary made with man's hands, which be examples and figures of true things, but he entered into heaven itself, that he might appear before the majesty of God for us. Neither doth he offer himself oftentimes, as the chief priest in the sanctuary did with strange blood, (for then should he oftentimes have suffered from the beginning) but now once for all, in the latter end of the world, to destroy sin by his peace-offering hath he appeared. And even as it is decreed, that man once shall die, and then cometh the judgment; so Christ hath been once offered, to take away the sins of many. The second time he shall appear without sin, to those that look for him, to their salvation. For the law having a shadow of good things to come, can never by the image itself of things, (which every year without ceasing they offer by such sacrifices) make those perfect that come thereunto: for otherwise that offering should have ceased; because that such worshippers, being once cleansed from their sins, should have no more conscience of sin. But in these, commemoration is made every year of sin; for it is impossible that by the blood of goats and calves, sins should be purged and taken away. Therefore Christ coming into the world said; sacrifice and oblation thou wouldst not have, but a body hast thou given me; peace-offerings for sins have not pleased thee: then said I, behold I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, that I should do thy will, O God: saying as above; because thou wouldst have no sacrifices nor burnt offerings for sin, neither dost thou take pleasure in those things that are offered according to the law. Then said I, Behold I come, that I may do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first to establish that which followeth. In which will we are sanctified by the oblation of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. And every priest is ready daily ministering, and oftentimes offering like sacrifices, which can never take away sins. But this Jesus, offering one sacrifice for sin, sitteth for evermore on the right hand of God, expecting the time till his enemies be made his footstool. For by his own only oblation, hath he perfected for evermore those that are sanctified. All these places have I recited which Paul writeth, for the better understanding and declaration of those things I mean to speak. By all which it appears manifestly, how the priesthood of Christ differs from the legal priesthood of Aaron: and by the same it also appears, how the same differs from all other christian priesthood, that imitates Christ. For the properties of the priesthood of Christ, above recited, are found in no other priest, but in Christ alone. Of the third priesthood, that is, the christian priesthood, Christ by his express words, speaks but little, to make any difference between the priest and the rest of the people, nor does he use the name of 'sacerdos' or 'presbyter,' in the gospel. But some he calls disciples, some apostles, whom he sent to baptize and to preach, and in his name to do miracles. He calls them the salt of the earth, in which name wisdom is meant; and he calls them the light of the world, by which good living is signified. For he saith, 'Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.' And Paul, speaking of the priests to Timothy and Titus, seems not to me to make any difference between the priests and the other people, but that he would have them to surpass others in knowledge and perfection of life.

"But the fourth priesthood is the Roman priesthood, brought in by the church of Rome; which church makes a distinction between the clergy and the lay-people: and after that the clergy is divided into sundry degrees, as appears in the decretals. This distinction of the clergy from the laity, with the tonsure of clerks, began in the time of Anacletus, as it appears in the chronicles. The decrees of the clergy were afterward invented and distinguished by their officers, and there was no ascension to the degree of the priesthood but by inferior orders and degrees. But in the primitive church it was not so: for immediately after the conversion of some of them to faith and baptism received; they were made priests and bishops; as appears by Anianus, who was a tailor or shoemaker, whom Marcus made to be a bishop. And of many others it was in like case done, according to the traditions of the church of Rome. Priests are ordained to offer sacrifices, to make supplication and prayers, and to bless and sanctify. The oblation of the priesthood only to priests (as they say) is congruent: whose duties are upon the altar to offer for the sins of the people the Lord's body, which is consecrated of bread. Of which saying I have great marvel, considering St. Paul's words to the Hebrews before recited. If Christ, offering for our sins one oblation for evermore, sits at the right hand of God, and with that one oblation has perfected for evermore those that are sanctified. If Christ evermore sitteth at the right hand of God, to make intercession for us, what need he to leave here any sacrifice for our sins to be daily offered by the priests? I do not find in the scriptures of God, nor of the apostles, that the body of Christ ought to be made a sacrifice for sin; but only as a sacrament and commemoration of the sacrifice passed, which Christ offered upon the altar of the cross for our sins. For it is an absurdity to say that Christ is now every day really offered as a sacrifice upon the altar by the priests; for then the priests should really crucify him upon the altar, which is a thing to be believed by no christian. But even as in his supper, he delivered his body and his blood to his disciples, in memorial of his body that should be crucified on the morrow for our sins: so after his ascension, his apostles used the same (when they brake bread in every house) for a sacrament, and not for a sacrifice, of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. And by this means were they put in remembrance of the great love of Christ, who so entirely loved us, that he willingly suffered the death for us, and for the remission of our sins. And thus did they offer themselves to God by love, being ready to suffer death for the confession of his name, and for the saving health of his brethren, fulfilling the new commandment of Christ, which said to them, 'A new commandment do I give unto you, that you love one another, as I have loved you.' But when love began to wax cold, or rather to be frozen for cold, through the anguish and anxiety of persecution for the name of Christ, then priests did use the flesh and blood of Christ, instead of a sacrifice. And because many of them feared death, some of them fled into solitary places, not daring to give themselves a sacrifice by death unto God through the confession of his name, and saving health of their brethren: some others worshipped idols, fearing death, as did also the chief bishop of Rome, and many others in different parts of the world. And thus it came to pass, that that which was ordained and constituted for a memorial of the one and only sacrifice, was altered (for want of love) into the reality of the sacrifice itself."

After these things thus discussed, he enters upon another brief treatise concerning women and laymen; whether in defect of the clergy, they may exercise the action of prayer, and administration of sacraments belonging to priests, where he declares the custom received in the pope's church for women to baptize, which, saith he, cannot be without remission of sins; wherefore seeing that women have power by the pope to remit sin, and to baptize, why may not they as well be admitted to minister the Lord's supper, in like cases of necessity? Wherein also he makes relation of Pope Joan the Eighth, a woman pope, proposing certain questions concerning her. All which, for brevity, I omit, proceeding to the ministration of prayer, and blessing of sanctification, appropriate to the office of priests, as follows.

"Furthermore, as touching the function and office of praying and blessing, whereto priests seem to be ordained (to omit here the question whether women may pray in churches, in lack of other meet persons) it remained now also to prosecute. Christ, being desired of his disciples to teach them to pray, gave them the common prayer both to men and women, to which prayer in my estimation, no other is to be compared. For in that, first, the whole honour due unto the Deity is comprehended. Secondly, whatsoever is necessary for us, both for the time present, or past, or for time to come, is there desired and prayed for. He informs us besides to pray secretly, and also briefly: secretly to enter into our close chamber, and there in secret he wills us to pray unto his Father. And saith moreover, 'When ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do, for they think they will be heard for their much speaking. Be ye not therefore like to them.' By which doctrine he calls us away from the errors of the heathen gentiles; from whom proceed these superstitious manner of arts, (or rather of ignorances) as necromancy, the art of divination, and other species of conjuration, not unknown to them that are learned: for these necromancers believe one place to be of greater virtue than another; there to be heard sooner than in another. Like as Balaam, being hired to curse the people of God by his art of soothsaying or charming, when he could not accomplish his purpose in one place, he removed to another; but he in the end was deceived of his desire. For he, intending first to curse them, was not able to curse them whom the Lord blessed, so that his curse could not hurt any of all that people. After like sort, the necromancers turn their face to the East, as to a place more apt for their prayers. Also the necromancers believe that the virtue of the words of the prayer, and the curiosity thereof, causes them to bring to effect that which they seek after; which is also another point of infidelity, used much of charmers, sorcerers, enchanters, soothsayers, and such like. Out of the same art (I fear) proceedeth the practice of exorcising, whereby devils and spirits be conjured to do that whereunto they are enforced by the exorcist. Also whereby other creatures likewise are exorcised or conjured, so that by the virtue of their exorcism they may have their power and strength exceeding all natural operation.

"In the church of Rome many such exorcisms and conjurations are practised, and are called of them benedictions, or hallowings. But here I ask of these exorcisers, whether they believe the things and creatures so exorcised and hallowed, have that operation and efficacy given them which they pretend? If they so believe, every child may see that they are deceived. For holy water being of them exorcised or conjured, hath no such power in it, neither can have, which they in their exorcism do command. For there they enjoin and command, that wherever that water is sprinkled, all vexation or infestation of the unclean spirit should avoid, and not that no pestilent spirit there should abide, &c. But it is most plain that no water, be it never so holy, can have any such power so to do, as it is commanded, to wit, to be an universal remedy to expel all diseases.

"I would ask this of these exorcists; whether in their commanding, they do conjure or adjure the things conjured to be of an higher virtue and operation, than their own nature gives; or else whether they in their prayers desire of God, that he will infuse into them that virtue, which they require? If they in their commanding do so believe, then do they believe that they have that power in them to which the inferior power of the thing exorcised must obey, in receiving that which is commanded. And so doing they are much more deceived, forasmuch as they see themselves, that they who are so authorised to the office of exorcising, say to the devil being conjured, 'Go, and he goeth not; and to another, Come, and he cometh not; and many things else they command the inferior spirit their subject to do, and he does it not. So in like case, when they pray to God to make the water to be of such virtue, that it may be to them health of mind and body, and that it may be able to expel every unclean spirit, and to chase away all manner of distemper and pestilence of the air (being an unreasonable petition asked, and displeasing to God) it is to be feared lest their benediction, their hallowing and blessing is changed into cursing, according to that saying that follows: 'and now, O ye priests, this commandment is for you; If ye will not hear, and if ye will not lay it to heart, to give glory to my name, saith the Lord of Hosts, I will send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings.' Mal. ii. 1, 2.

How many things are blessed, or hallowed in the church, that in hallowing thereof displease God, and are accursed? And therefore according to the saying of St. James, 'they ask and receive not, because they ask amiss, that they may consume it on their lusts.' Let a man behold the blessing or hallowing of their fire, water, incense, wax, bread, wine, the church, the altar, the churchyard, ashes, bells, copes, palms, oil, candles, salt, the hallowing of the ring, the bed, the staff, and of many such like things; and I believe that a man shall find out many errors of the heathen magicians, witches, soothsayers and charmers. And notwithstanding the ancient magicians in their books command those that are conjurers, that they in any wise live devoutly (for otherwise, as they say, the spirits will not obey their commandments, and conjurations) yet the Roman conjurers impute it to the virtue of the holy words, because it is they that work, and not the holiness of the conjurers: how comes it to pass that they say, the things consecrated by a cursed and vicious priest, should have as great virtue in pronouncing (as they say) the holy and mystical words, as if they were pronounced by a priest never so holy? But I marvel that they say so, reading this saying in the acts of the apostles: because the charmers pronouncing the name of Jesus (that is above all names) would have healed those that were possessed with devils, and said; 'We adjure you by Jesus, whom Paul preacheth.' And the possessed with devils answered, 'Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are ye?' And he beat the exorcists.

"And now considering this and many such like things, I marvel wherefore the vicious priests do sell their prayers and blessings dearer (as also their masses and trentals of masses) than those that be devout laymen, and holy women: who with all their heart desire to flee from vice, and take hold of virtue. Forasmuch as God in divers places of the scripture doth promise that he will not hear sinners and wicked persons. Neither should he seem to be just, if he should sooner hear the prayers of his enemies, than of his faithful friends. How, I pray you, shall a sinful priest deliver another man from sin by his prayers, or else from the punishment of sin, when he is not able to deliver himself by his prayer from sin? What then doth God so much accept in the mass of a vicious priest, that for his mass, his prayer or oblation, he might deliver any man either from sin, or from the pain due for sin? No, but because Christ once offered himself for our sins, and now sitteth on the right hand of God the Father, always shewing unto him what and how great things he hath suffered for us. And every priest always makes mention in his mass of this oblation. Neither do we this that we might bring the same oblation into the remembrance of God, because that he always in his presence sees the same; but that we should have in remembrance this so great love of God, that he would give his own Son to die for our sins, that he might cleanse and purify us from all our sins. What, doth it please God, that the remembrance of so great love is made by a priest, who loves sin more than God? Or how can any prayer of such a priest please God, in what holy place soever he be, or what holy vestments soever he put on, or what holy prayers soever he makes? And whereas Christ and his apostles do command the preaching of the word of God; the priests be now more bound to celebrate the mass, and more straightly bound to say the canonical hours; whereat I cannot but greatly marvel. For why? To obey the precepts of men more than the commandments of God, is in effect to honour man as God, and to bestow the sacrifice upon man which is due unto God, and this is also spiritual fornication. How therefore are priests bound at the commandment of man to leave the preaching of the word of God, at whose commandment they are not bound to leave the celebration of the mass, or singing of matins? Therefore, priests ought not at the commandment of any man to leave the preaching of the word of God, which they are bound both by divine and apostolical precepts.

"Do priests therefore sin or not, who bargain for money to pray for the soul of any dead man? It is well known that Jesus did whip those that were buyers and sellers out of the temple, saying; 'My house shall be called the house of prayer, but you have made it a den of thieves.' Truly he cast out such merchants from out of the church, because of their sins. Whereupon Jerome upon this text saith: Let the priest be diligent and take good heed in this church, that they turn not the house of God into a den of thieves. He doubtless is a thief who seeks gain by religion, and by a shew of holiness studies to find occasion of merchandise. Peter the apostle said to Simon Magus, 'Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gifts of God may be bought for money.' Therefore the spiritual gifts of God ought not to be sold.

'Verily, prayer is the spiritual gift of God, as is also the preaching of the word of God, or the laying on of hands, or the administration of other the sacraments. Christ, sending forth his disciples to preach, said unto them; 'Heal ye the sick, cast out devils, raise the dead, freely ye have received, freely give.' If the priest have power to deliver souls in purgatory from grievous pains, without doubt he has received that power freely from God. How therefore can he sell his act, unless he resist the commandments of God, of whom he has received that authority? This truly cannot be done without sin, as it is against the commandment of God. How plainly spake Christ to the pharisees and priests, saying; 'Woe unto you scribes and pharisees, hypocrites, because ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers, therefore shall ye receive greater damnation.' Wherein I pray you do our pharisees and priests differ from them? Do not our priests devour widows' houses and possessions, that by their long prayers they might deliver the souls of their husbands from the grievous pains of purgatory? How many lordships I pray you have been bestowed upon the monastic men and women to pray for the dead, that they might deliver those dead men from the pain (as they said) that they suffer in purgatory, grievously tormented and vexed? If their prayers and speaking of holy words shall not be able to deliver themselves from pain, unless they have good works; how shall other men be delivered from pain by their prayers, who while they lived, gave themselves over to sin? Yea, peradventure those lordships or lands, which they gave to the priests to pray for them, they themselves have gotten by might from other faithful men, unjustly, and violently: and the canons do say, that sin is not forgiven, till the thing taken away wrongfully be restored: how then shall they be able (who unjustly possess such lordships or lands) to deliver them by their prayers from pain, who have given to them these lordships or lands, seeing God from the beginning has hated all extortion in his burnt sacrifices? 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven: but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven.' And again, 'not the bearers of the law, but the doers of the law shall be justified.'

'If therefore the words of him that prays do not deliver himself from sin, nor from the pain of sin, how do they deliver other men from sin or from the pain of sin, when no man prays more earnestly for another man, than for himself? Therefore many are deceived in buying or selling of prayers, as in the buying of pardons, that they might be delivered from pain; when commonly they pay dearer for the prayers of the proud and vicious prelates, than for the prayers of devout women and devout men of the lay people. But out of doubt, God does not regard the person of him that prays, nor the place in which he prays, nor his apparel, nor the curiousness of his prayer, but the humility and godly affection of him that prays. Did not the pharisee and the publican go up into the temple to pray? The publican's prayer for his humility and godly affection is heard. But the pharisee's prayer for his pride and arrogancy is condemned. Consider that neither the person, nor the place, nor the state, nor the curiousness of his prayer helps the pharisee: because the publican not thinking himself worthy to lift up his eyes to Heaven, for the multitude of his sins (saying, O God, be merciful unto me a sinner) is justified in his humility, and his prayer is heard. But the pharisee boasting in his righteousness is despised, because God thrusts down the proud, and exalteth the humble and those that be meek. The rich glutton also that was clothed with purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day, prayed unto Abraham, and is not heard, but it is buried in pains and torments of Hell fire. But Lazarus, who lay begging at his gate, (being full of sores) is placed in the bosom of Abraham. Behold that neither the richness of his apparel, nor the deliciousness of his banquets, nor the gorgeousness of his estate, neither the abundance of his riches, helps any thing to prefer the prayers or petitions of the rich glutton, nor yet diminish his torments, because that mighty men in their mightiness shall suffer torments mightily. How dare any man by composition demand or receive any thing of another man for his prayers? If he believe that he can by his prayer deliver his brother from grievous pain, he is bound by charity to relieve his brother with his prayers although he be not hired: but if he will not pray unless he be hired, then has he no love at all. What therefore helps the prayer of him who abides not in charity? Therefore let him first take compassion on himself by prayer, that he may come into charity, and then he shall be the better able to help others. If he believe not, or if he stands in doubt whether he shall be able to deliver his brother by his prayer, wherefore does he make with him an assured bargain, and take his money, and yet knows not whether he shall relieve him ever a whit the more, or not, from his pain? I fear lest the words of the prophet are fulfilled, saying, From the least to the most, all men apply themselves to covetousness; and from the prophet to the priest, all work deceitfully. For the poor priests excuse themselves concerning this selling of their prayers, saying, the young cock learns to crow from the old cock. For, he saith, that the pope himself, in stalling of bishops and abbots, takes the first-fruits: in the placing or bestowing of benefices he always taketh somewhat, especially if the benefices be great. And he selleth pardons or bulls, and to speak more plain, he takes money for them. Bishops in giving orders, in hallowing churches and churchyards, do take money: in ecclesiastical correction they take money for the mitigation of penance: in the grievous offences of convicted persons, money is required, and caused to be paid. Abbots, monks, and other religions men that have possession, will receive no man into their fraternity, or make them partakers of their spiritual suffrages, unless he bestow somewhat upon them, or promise them somewhat. Curates and vicars having sufficient livings by the tithes of their parishioners, yet in dirges and years' minds, in hearing confessions, in weddings and beryings, require and have money. The friars also of the four orders of beggars, who think themselves to be the most perfect men of the church, take money for their prayers, confessions, and beryings of the dead; and when they preach, they believe that they shall have either money or some other thing worth money. Wherefore then are the poor priests blamed? ought not they to be held excused, although they take money for their prayers by composition? Truly (me thinketh) that this excuse by other men's sins does not excuse them, forasmuch as to heap one mischief upon another's head, is no sufficient discharge. I would to God all the buyers and sellers of spiritual suffrages would with the eyes of their heart behold the ruin of the great city, and the fall of Babylon, and that which they shall say after that fall. Does not the prophet say, 'And the merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn for her, for no man buyeth their merchandise, any more, the merchandise of gold and silver, and precious stone, and of pearl, and fine linen, and purple and silk.' Rev. xviii. 1. And again, he saith; 'The merchants of these things which were made rich by her, shall stand afar off for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, and saying, alas! alas! that great city, that was clothed in fine linen and purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, for in one hour so great riches are come to nought.' Rev. xviii. 15. And again; 'And they cast dust upon their heads, and cried out, weeping and wailing, and saying; alas! alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate.' Rev. xviii. 19.

'This Babylon, this great city, is the city of Rome.

Because the angel which shewed to St. John the destruction of the mighty harlot sitting upon many waters, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and all they which dwell upon the earth, are made drunk with the wine of her fornication, said unto him, 'And the woman which thou sawest, is the great city that reigneth over the kings,' &c. And indeed in the days of St. John the whole world was subject to the temporal empire of the city of Rome, and afterwards it was subject to the spiritual empire or dominion of the same. But touching the temporal government of the city of Rome, it is fallen already: and so the other also, for the multitude of her spiritual fornication, shall fall. The emperors of the city gave themselves to idolatry, and would have men honour them as gods, and put all those to death that refused such idolatry, and by the cruelty of their torments all infidels got the upper hand.

"Hereupon by the image of Nabuchadnezzar, the empire of the Romans is likened to iron, which beats together, and has the mastery of all metals. And in the vision of Daniel, wherein he saw the four winds of heaven to fight in the main sea; and four very great beasts coming out of the sea; the kingdom of the Romans is likened to the fourth terrible and marvellous beast, which had great iron teeth; eating and destroying, and treading the rest under his feet: and this beast had ten horns, and as Daniel saith, he shall speak words against the most high, and shall tear with his teeth the saints of the most high: and he shall think that he may be able to change times and laws, and they shall be delivered into his power, until a time, times, and half a time. In the Revelations, St. John saw a beast coming out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and power was given to him to continue forty-two months. So long time endured the empire of the Romans; that is to say, from the beginning of Julius Cesar, which was the first emperor of the Romans, unto the end of Fredericus, which was the last emperor of the Romans. Under this empire Christ suffered, and other martyrs also suffered for his name's sake. And here is fallen Rome as Babylon (which is all one) according to the manner of speaking in the Revelation, as touching the temporal power of governing. And thus shall she fall also touching the spiritual power of governing, for the multitude of iniquities and spiritual fornication, and merchandise that are committed by her in the church.

"The feet of the image which Nebuchadnezzar saw, betoken the empire of Rome, and part of them were of iron, and part of clay and earth. The part that was of iron fell, and the power thereof vanished away, because the power thereof was at an end after certain months. That part of clay and earth yet endures, but it shall vanish away by the testimony of the prophets: whereupon St. John says in the Revelation; after that, he saw the part made of iron rising out of the sea, to which each people, tribe, and tongue submitted themselves. And he saw another beast coming out of the earth, which had two horns, like to the horns of a lamb, and he spake like a dragon, and he vanquished the first beast in his sight.

This beast as seems to me, betokens the clay and earthen part of the feet and image, because he came out of the earth. For that by earthly help he is made the high and chief priest of the Romans in the church of Christ, and so from below he ascended on high. But Christ descended from heaven, because he who was God, and author of every creature, became man; and he that was Lord of Lords, was made in the shape of a servant. And although in the heavens the company of angels minister unto him, he himself ministered or served in earth, that he might teach us humility, by which a man ascends into heaven, even as by pride a man goes down into the bottomless pit. This beast has two horns most like a lamb, because he challenges to himself both the priestly and kingly power above all other here in earth. The Lamb, that is, Christ, is king for ever upon the kingly seat of David, and he is a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec; but his kingdom is not of this world: but the kingdom of this beast is of this world, because those that be under him fight for him. And as Jesus is Christ two manner of ways, because that 'Christ' is as much as to say

'anointed'; he verily was anointed king and anointed priest: so this beast saith, that he is chief king and priest. Wherefore does he call himself Christ? Because that Christ, knowing that afore, said, 'Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many.' And thus because he is both king and priest, he challenges to himself the double sword, that is, the temporal sword and spiritual sword. The temporal sword is in his right hand, and his spiritual sword is in his right eye, by the testimony of Zechariah. But he speaks subtilly like a dragon, because that by the testimony of Christ he shall deceive many, as the book of Revelations witnesses. He did great wonders that he might make more fire to come from heaven to the earth in the sight of men, that he might deceive those that dwell upon the earth, because of the wonders, that are permitted him to do in the sight of the beast, and he overcame the first beast which ascended out of the sea. For that beast challenged to himself authority of government of the whole world. He has put to death and tormented those that resist his commandments, and would be honoured as a god upon the earth. The bishop of Rome says that the whole world ought to be in subjection to him; those that are disobedient to his commandments he puts in prison, and to death if he can: if he cannot, he excommunicates them, and commands them to be cast into the devil's dungeon. But he has no power over the body, much less has he power over the soul. And truly his excommunication, or the excommunication of any priest under him, shall at that time little hurt him that is excommunicated, so that the person of him that is excommunicated be not first excommunicated of God through sin.

"This one thing is certain, that none in the church ought to sell spiritual merchandize (of which things we have spoken before) unless he have the mark of the beast. My counsel is, let the buyer beware of those marks; because that after the fall of Babylon, 'If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation, and he shall be tormented in fire and brimstone in the sight of the holy angels, and in the sight of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torments ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name.' The beast doubtless recompenses his friends with his small reward; that is, with great temporal gifts and benefices; with a mean reward, that is, with great spiritual gifts, in authority of blessing, loosing, binding, praying, and exercising other spiritual works; and with his greatest reward, which after that they be dead, makes them to be honoured in earth among the saints. The number of his name, according to the opinion of some men, is, Dax Clari, the 'captain of the clergy,' because by that name he is named, and makes his name known, and that name is 666. Rev. xiii. 18.

"This is my opinion of the beast ascending out of the earth, and shall be until such time as I shall be of the same beast better instructed. And although this beast signifies the Roman bishops; yet the other cruel beast ascending out of the sea, signifies the Roman emperors. And although the dragon being a cruel beast, and the false prophet giving the mark, must be thrown into the lake of fire and brimstone to be tormented for ever; I would have no man to judge, but I leave such things altogether to the final judgment of Christ to be determined. But Martin the Pope's confessor, who makes the chronicle of the emperors and the popes, recites many errors of the popes, more horrible and abominable than of the emperors. For he speaks of the idolatrous, heretical, simoniacal popes, and popes that were murderers, that used necromancy and witchcraft, that were evil livers, and defiled with all kind of vice. But I have partly declared how the pope's law is contrary to Christ's law, and how he saith, 'That he is the chief vicar of Christ in earth;' and in his deeds is contrary to Christ, and forsakes both his doctrine and life. I cannot see who else may be so well antichrist, and a seducer of the people. For there is not a greater pestilence than a familiar enemy.

"As concerning idols, and the worshipping of them, I think of them, as Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the rest of the prophets did, who speak against the making of images, as also the worshipping of images. And faithful David, full of the Spirit of God, saith, 'Let all them be confounded that worship images, and that rejoice in idols.' And again he saith, 'Let them be made like unto them that make them, and all such as put their trust in them' Wherefore I pray God that this evil come not upon me, which is the curse of God pronounced by David the prophet. Nor will I be, by God's grace, either a maker, or a worshipper of images."

After all the aforesaid things were exhibited and given by Walter Brute, to the bishop of Hereford; he farther appointed to Walter, the 3d day of October, at Hereford, to hear his opinion. Which third day now at hand, being Friday, (A. D. 1393), Walter Brute appeared before him, sitting in commission in the cathedral church of Hereford, about six o'clock; having for his assistants in the same place, divers prelates and abbots, and twenty bachelors of divinity, whereof twelve were monks, and two doctors of the law. Amongst these was Nicholas Hereford accompanied with many other prelates and worshipful men, and wise graduates in sundry faculties, charged Walter about his writings, and the contents therein: they were earnest in picking out of those writings his heresies, and in shewing his schisms, sundry errors, and other things. Now, after that they continued all that day, and the two days following in their informations and examinations; Walter Brute submitted himself to the church, as appears in a scroll written in the English tongue, as follows:

"I, Walter Brute, submit myself principally to the gospel of Jesus Christ, and to the determination of holy Kirk, and to the general councils of holy Kirk. And to the sentence and determination of the four doctors of holy writ; that is, Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, and Gregory. And I meekly submit me to your correction, as a subject ought to his bishop."

Which scroll Walter Brute read with a loud and intelligible voice, at the cross in the church-yard on Monday, the sixth day of October, before the sermon, in presence of the bishop of Hereford and others, as also barons, knights, and noblemen, and clergy, and also a great multitude of people. After which Thomas Crawlay made a sermon, and took for his text the words of the apostle to the Romans, xi. 20.

Out of these declarations and writings of Walter Brute, the bishops, with the monks and doctors above rehearsed, gathered certain articles, to the number of thirty-seven, which they sent to the university of Cambridge to be confuted, to two learned men, Master Colwill and Master Newton, bachelors of divinity. Masters Colwill and Newton both laboured in the matter, to the utmost of their cunning, in replying to the said thirty-seven articles.

Besides them also, William Woodford a friar (who wrote likewise against the articles of Wickliff) labouring in the same cause, made a solemn and a long treatise, compiling the articles of Brute, to the number of nine-and-twenty.

I do not find what afterwards became of this Walter Brute: but it is probable that he for this time escaped. I here add certain writings and documents connected with his history.

The bull of Pope Boniface IX., against the Lollards.

"Boniface, bishop, servant of the servants of God, to the reverend brother, John, bishop of Hereford, sendeth greeting, and apostolical benediction. We mean to write unto our well-beloved son in Christ (Richard, the renowned king of England) in form inclosed within these presents. Therefore we will and command your brotherhood, that as much as ye may ye study and endeavour yourself to exhort and induce the same king to do those things which we have written unto him as it is said before. And notwithstanding that now many a day you ought to have done it of yourself, and not to look that we should persuade you to that effect by us written; you may proceed as well by our authority, as by your own, forasmuch as it was given you before; that hereafter we may know effectually by your diligence, what zeal your devotion beareth unto the catholic faith, and to the conserving of the ecclesiastical honour, and also to the execution of your pastoral office.

"Given at Rome at St. Peter's, the 15th kalends of October, the sixth year of our bishop-like dignity."

The bull to the renowned prince, Richard, by the grace of God, king of England and of France, which was inclosed in the above, and there mentioned.

"To our well beloved son in Christ, Richard, the noble king of England, we send greeting, &c. It grieveth us from the bottom of our hearts, and our holy mother the church in all places through Christendom lamenteth. We understand that there be certain heresies sprung, and do without any condign restraint range at their own liberty, to the seducing of the faithful people, and do every day with overmuch liberty enlarge their undiscereet bounds. But how much the more carefully we labour for the preservation both of you and your famous kingdom, and also the purity of the faith, and do with much more ardent desire long that the prosperous state of the same should be preserved and enlarged; the sting of greater sorrow so much the more penetrates and molests us, as we see (alas the while!) in our time, and under the regal presidency of your most christian government, a certain crafty and hare-brain sect of false christians grow and increase in your kingdom, who call themselves the poor men of the treasury of Christ and his disciples, and whom the common people by a more sound name call Lollards, (as a man would say, 'withered darnel'), according as their sins require; and perceive that they may wax strong, and as it were prevail against the diocessans of some places, and other governors, as they meet together, not courageously addressing themselves against them as they ought to do (whereof chiefly and not undeservedly I give them admonition) for that they take thereby the more bolder presumption and courage among the unlearned people. And forasmuch as those whom we cannot call men, but the damnable shadows or ghosts of men, do rise up against the sound faith, and holy universal church of Rome; and that very many of them being indifferently learned, which little learning (to the confusion and eternal damnation of some of them) they got sitting upon their mother's lap the said church of Rome, do rise up or inveigh against the determination of the holy fathers, with too much presumptuous boldness, to the subversion of the whole ecclesiastical order and estate; and have not been afraid, nor are yet afraid, publicly to preach very many erroneous, detestable, and heretical articles, because they are not put to silence, reprov'd, driven out, rooted out, or otherwise punished by any that has authority and the fear and love of God. And also they are not afraid openly to write the same articles, and so being written to deliver them to your kingly parliament, and obstinately to affirm the same. The venomous and disdainful recital of which articles, upon good advise, at this present we pass over, lest the sufferance of such sensuality might chance to renew the wound that reason may heal. Yet notwithstanding, lest so great and contagious an evil should escape unpunished, and that without deserved vexation; and also that it might not get more heart, and wax more strong, we therefore (according to our office and duty, where there is such negligence and sluggishness of our prelates who are present where this thing is) do commit and give in commandment to our reverend brethren the archbishops of Canterbury and York by our letters; that they stand up in the power of God against this pestilent and contagious sect, and that they promptly persecute the same in form of law; root out and destroy those, that advisedly and obstinately refuse to withdraw their foot from the same stumbling-block, any restraint to the contrary notwithstanding. But because the assistance, counsel, favour, and aid of your kingly estate and highness are requisite to the execution of the premises; we require, exhort, and beseech the same your princely highness by the bowels of the mercy of Jesus Christ, by his holy faith, by your own salvation, by the benefit that to all men is common, and by the prosperity assured to every man and woman, that not only your kingly severity may readily shew, and cause to be shewed to our archbishops and their commissaries, convenient aid and favour, as otherwise also to cause them to be assisted; but that also you will enjoin your magistrates and justices of assize and peace, more straightly, that of their own good wills they execute the authority committed to them, with all severity against such damned men, according as they are bound by the office which they are put in trust with; against those, I mean, which have determined obstinately to defile themselves in their malice and sins, to expel, banish, and imprison, and there to keep them, till condign sentence shall pronounce them worthy to suffer punishment. For your kingly wisdom sees that such as they not only deceive poor simple souls (or at the least do what they can to deceive them) but also bring their bodies to destruction, and further prepare confusion and ruinous fall to their temporal lords. Go too, therefore, my sweet son, and endeavour yourself to work so in this matter, as undoubtedly we trust you will: that as this firebrand (burning and flaming overmuch) began under your presidency or government: so under your severe judgment and virtuous diligence, might, favour, and aid, there may not remain one spark hid under the ashes, but that it be utterly extinguished, and speedily put out.

"Given at our palace of St. Peter's at Rome, the 15th of the kalends of October, in the sixth year of our pontificality."

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of England, and of France, and lord of Ireland, to all those unto whom these present letters shall come, greeting. Know ye, that whereas lately at the instance of the reverend father, William, archbishop of Canterbury, metropolitan of all England, and legate of the apostolical see, we for the redress and amendment of all those who would obstinately preach or maintain, publicly or privily, any conclusions of the holy scripture, repugnant to the determination of our holy mother the church, and notoriously redounding to the subversion of the catholic faith, or containing any heresy or error, within the province or bishoprick of Canterbury, have by our special letters patent, in the seal of the faith, given authority and licence unto the foresaid archbishop, and to all and singular his suffragans, to arrest all and every of them that will preach or maintain any such conclusions, wherever they may be found, and to commit them either to their own prisons, or any other at their own pleasure, and to keep them in the same, until they repent them of the errors and depravities of those heresies, or till by us or by our council it should be otherwise determined, that is to say, to every one of them and their ministers throughout their cities and diocese. And now the reverend father in God, John, bishop of Hereford, hath for a certainty informed us, that although the same bishop hath according to justice convinced a certain fellow, named William Swinderby, pretending himself to be chaplain, and one Stephen Bell, a learned man, and hath pronounced them heretics, and excommunicate, and false informers among the common people, and hath declared the same by the definitive sentence of the foresaid bishop, they have presumed to affirm and preach openly, in divers places within the diocese of Hereford, many conclusions or naughty opinions notoriously redounding to the subversion of the catholic sound faith, and tranquillity of our kingdom: the same bishop, notwithstanding, neither by the ecclesiastical censures, neither by the force and strength of our commission, was able to revoke the foresaid William and Stephen, nor yet to bridle the malice and indurate contumacy of them; for that they, after that they were convicted of such heretical pravity by the same bishop (to the intent they might delude his judgment and justice) conveyed themselves into the borders of Wales, with such as were their favourers and accomplices, keeping themselves hid, to whom the force of our letters does in nowise extend. Whereupon the said bishop has made supplication to us, that we will vouchsafe to provide a sufficient remedy in that behalf. We, therefore, who always, by the help of Almighty God, are defenders of the faith, willing to withstand such presumptuous and perverse enterprises by the most safe way and means, give and commit full power and authority to the foresaid bishop, and to his ministers, by the tenor of these presents, to arrest or take, or cause to be arrested or taken, the foresaid William and Stephen, in any place within the city and diocese of Hereford, and our dominion of Wales, with all the speed that may be, and to commit them either to our prison, or else to the prison of the same bishop, or any other prison at their pleasure, if such need be, and there to keep them safe. And afterwards, unless they will obey the commandments of the church, with diligence to bring them before us and our council, or else cause them to be brought, that we may determine for their farther punishment, as we shall think it requisite and convenient to be done by the advice of our council, for the defence and preservation of the catholic faith. And that the foresaid William and Stephen, being succoured by the aid of their favourers, should not be able to fly or escape to their accustomed starting holes, and that the sharpness of their pains so aggravated, may give them sufficient cause to return to the lap again of their holy mother, the church; we straightly charge and command all and singular our sheriffs, bailiffs, barons, and all other our officers in the city and diocese of Hereford, and in any other places being within our dominion of Wales, by the tenor of these presents, that from time to time (where they think it most meet) they cause it openly to be proclaimed in our name, that none of what state, degree, pre-eminence, kind, or other condition he shall be, do cherish openly or secretly the foresaid William and Stephen, until the time that they repent them of their heresies and errors, and shall be reconciled unto the holy church of God; neither that any person or persons, be believers, favourers, or receivers, defenders, or in any case wittingly instructors of the said William or Stephen, or any other of the residue of the heretics that are to be convinced, upon the forfeiture of all that ever they have. And that also they giving their attendance be obedient and answerable to the foresaid bishop and his deputies in this behalf, for the execution of the premises; and that they certify us and our council distinctly and plainly, from time to time, of the names of all and singular persons, who shall be found culpable in this behalf, under their seals. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters patent to be made.

"Witness ourself at Westminster, the ninth day of March, in the fifteenth year of our reign.
Farrington."

Another letter of the King against Walter Brute.

"Richard, by the grace of God king of England, and of France, and Lord of Ireland, to his beloved and faithful John Chaundos, knight; John Eynfore, knight; Renold de la Bere, knight; Walter Deveros, knight; Thomas de la Bere, knight; William Lucy, knight; Leonard Hakeluke, knight; and to the mayor of the city of Hereford, to Thomas Oldcastle, Richard Nash, Roger Wygmore, Thomas Wylwayne, John Skydmore, John Up-Harry, Henry Morton, and to the sheriff of Hereford, sendeth salutations.

"Forasmuch as it is advertised us, that one Walter Brute, and other such children of iniquity, have damnably holden, affirmed, and preached, certain articles and conclusions, being notoriously repugnant against the holy scripture (of the which some of them as heresies, and the rest as errors are finally by the church condemned), and that in divers places within the diocese of Hereford, and parts near adjoining, both privately, openly, and obstinately, which thing we perceive not only to redound to the subversion, in a manner, of the catholic faith, which as well we as other catholic princes ought of duty to maintain, but also to forewarn us of the subversion of our faithful diocesans; and that the said bishop, upon the good deliberation and advice of a great number of doctors in divinity, and other learned and skilful men in the scriptures, of special devotion, according to his bounden duty, purposed to begin and make divers and sundry processes by law to be sent unto the aforesaid Walter and his accomplices to appear personally before him and other the doctors aforesaid in the cathedral church of Hereford, the morrow after the translation of St. Thomas of Hereford next ensuing, and to proceed in the same place against the same Walter, in the aforesaid articles and conclusions, for the amendment of his soul; and that they now afresh (because that the said Walter and others of their retinue, cleaving and confederating with him, might not suffer condign pains according to their demerits) endeavour themselves to make void and frustrate the said godly purpose of the same bishop, in such correction and execution as should have been done, and with force do resist, and prevent the same with all the power they may, to the great contempt of us and of our crown, and to the breaking and hurting of our peace, and perdition of others: we do appoint you, and every one of you, immediately as soon as this our commission shall be delivered unto you, in our behalf and name, to make open proclamation in the diocese and parts aforesaid, where ye shall think it most meet and convenient: that no man be so hardy henceforth, of what state or condition soever he shall be, within the diocese and parts aforesaid, upon pain of forfeiture of all that ever he hath, to make or levy any conventicles, assemblies, or confederacies, by any colour, or that they presume to attempt or procure any other thing, whereby our peace may be hurt or broken, or that the same bishops and doctors aforesaid may be by any means molested or hindered in the execution of such correction as is to be done, according to the canonical sanctions, and to arrest all those whom ye shall find, or take offending in this behalf, or that keep themselves in any such conventicles; and that they, being committed to prison, be there kept, till you shall have other commandment from us and from our council for their deliverance; and that ye distinctly and plainly certify us, and our said council, of all your doing in this behalf under your seals, or else the seals of some of you. And therefore we straightly charge and command you, and every one of you, that ye diligently attend upon the premises, and that in your deeds ye execute the same with all diligence and careful endeavour in the form and manner aforesaid. And further we give straight charge and commandment to all and singular sheriffs, majors, bailiffs, constables, and other our faithful subjects, by the tenor of these presents, that they attend upon you, counsel and aid you and every one of you, as is meet and convenient in the doing and execution of the premises. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters patents to be made. Witness myself at Westminster, the twenty-second day of September, in the seventeenth year of our reign.

"By the same king and council."

Thus King Richard, by the setting on of William Courtney, archbishop of Canterbury, and his fellows, taking part with the pope and Romish prelates, became strict and hard against the poor christians of the other side who followed Wickliffe. Yet during the life of this king I find none expressly by name that suffered burning. Some, however, there were, who, by the archbishop and other bishops, had been condemned, and some also abjured, and did penance as well in other places, as chiefly about the town of Leicester, as is declared in the archbishop's register and records as follows:

"At the time the said archbishop William Courtney was in his visitation at the town of Leicester, certain there were accused and detected to him, by the monks and other priests in the said town. The names of which persons there detected were Roger Dexter, Nicholas Taylor, Richard Wagstaff, Michael Scrivener, William Smith, John Henry, William Parchmentar, and Roger Goldsmith, inhabitants of the town of Leicester. These, with others, were denounced to the archbishop for holding the opinion of the sacrament of the altar, of auricular confession, and other sacraments, contrary to that which the church of Rome preaches and observes. All which parties above named, and many others whose names are not known, held these heresies and errors here underwritten, and are of the church of Rome condemned.

"1. That in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration, there remains the body of Christ with the material bread.

"2. That images ought not to be worshipped in any case, and that no man ought to set any candle before them.

"3. That no cross ought to be worshipped.

"4. The masses and matters ought not with an high and loud voice to be said in the church.

"5. That no curate or priest, taken in any crime, can consecrate, hear confessions, or minister any of the sacraments of the church.

"6. That the pope and all prelates of the church cannot bind any man with the sentence of excommunication, unless they know him to be first excommunicated of God.

"7. That no prelate of the church can grant any pardons.

"8. That every layman may in every place preach and teach the gospel.

"9. That it is sin to give any alms or charity to the friars, preachers, Minorites, Augustinians, or Carmelites.

"10. That no oblation ought to be used at the funerals of the dead.

"11. That it is not necessary to make confession of our sins to the priest.

"12. That every good man, although he be unlearned, is a priest."

These articles they taught, preached, and affirmed manifestly in the town of Leicester, and other places adjoining. Whereupon the said archbishop admonished the said Roger and Nicholas, with the rest, on the next day to make answer unto him in the said monastery to the aforesaid articles. But the aforesaid Roger and Nicholas, with the rest, hid themselves out of the way, and appeared not. Whereupon the archbishop upon All-hallow day, being the first day of November, celebrating the high mass at the high altar, in the said monastery, being attired in his pontifical robes, denounced the said parties with all their adherents, favourers, and counsellors, excommunicate and accursed, who either held, taught, or maintained the aforesaid heretical and erroneous conclusions, and that in solemn wise, by ringing the bells, lighting the candles, and putting out the same again, and throwing them down to the ground, with other circumstances thereunto belonging. Upon the morrow after, being All-Souls day, he sent for all the curates and some laymen of the town of Leicester, to inquire more diligently of the verity of such matter as they knew, and were able to say against any persons whatever concerning the aforesaid articles, as also against the parties before named and specified upon their oaths, denouncing every one of them severally by their names to be excommunicated and accursed; and caused them also to be excommunicated in divers parish churches in Leicester. And further the said archbishop interdicted the whole town of Leicester, and all the churches in the same, so long as any of the aforesaid excommunicate persons should remain, or be within the same, and till all the Lollards of the town should return and amend from such heresies and errors, obtaining at the said archbishop's hands the benefit of absolution.

At length it was declared and shewed to the said archbishop, that there was a certain anchoress, whose name was Matilda, enclosed within the church-yard of St. Peter's church of the town of Leicester, infected with the pestiferous contagion of the aforesaid heretics and Lollards: whereupon, after the said archbishop had examined the aforesaid Matilda, touching the aforesaid conclusions, heresies, and errors, and found her not to answer plainly and directly to the same, but sophistically and subtly; he peremptorily gave and assigned unto her a day, personally to appear before him in the monastery of St. James at Northampton, more fully to answer to the said articles, heresies, and errors, which was the sixth day of the said month of November; commanding the abbot of the monastery of Pratis, that the door of the recluse, in which the said Matilda was, should be opened, and that till his return he should cause her to be put in safe custody. That done, he sent forth his mandate against the Lollards, under this form:—

"William, by the permission of God, &c. To his well-beloved sons, the mayor and bailiffs of the town of Leicester diocese, greeting. We have lately received the king's letters, graciously granted us for the defence of the catholic faith, in these words following: Richard, by the grace of God, king of England and of France, &c. We, on the behalf of our holy mother, the church, by the king's authority aforesaid, do require you, that you cause the same Richard, William, Roger, and the rest, to be arrested, and sent unto us; that they with their pernicious doctrine do not infect the people of God, &c. Given under our seal," &c.

By another instrument also in the same register mention is made of one Margaret Caily, a nun, who, forsaking her order, was by the said archbishop constrained, against her will, again to enter the same, as by this instrument here-under ensuing may appear.

"William, by the grace of God, &c. To our reverend brother of God, John, by the grace of God, bishop of Ely, greeting, &c. In the visitation of our diocese of Lincoln according to our office amongst other enormities worthy reformation, we found one sheep strayed out of our fold, and entangled amongst the briars; to wit, Margaret Caily, nun professed, in the monastery of St. Radegond, within your diocese, who, casting off the habit of her religion, was found in secular attire, many years being an apostate, and leading a dissolute life. And lest her blood should be required at our hands, we have caused her to be taken and brought unto you, being her pastor; and straightly enjoining you, by these presents we do command, that you admit the same Margaret again into her aforesaid monastery (although returned against her will), or else into some other place, where for her soul's health you shall think most convenient; and that from henceforth she be safely kept, as in the straight examination of the same you will yield an account. Given under our seal," &c.

By sundry other instruments also in the same register I find, that Matilda, the anchoress, upon the straight examination and handling of the archbishop, before whom she was peremptorily enjoined to appear, and till that day of appearance taken out of the recluse, and committed to safe custody, as you heard, retracted and recanted her aforesaid articles and opinions. For which she being enjoined forty days' penance, was again admitted into her recluse in Leicester.

Also, by another letter of the archbishop to the dean of the cathedral church of our lady of Leicester, I find that of the number of those eight persons before recited, whom the archbishop himself at high mass, in his pontifical robes so solemnly cursed with hook, bell, and candle: after process against them, or else in the meantime they being apprehended and taken, two of them recanted their opinions; to wit, William Smith and Roger Dexter. But in the meantime Alice, the wife of Roger Dexter, abjured the same. However, whether they presented themselves willingly, or else were brought against their wills (as most like it was) hard penance was enjoined them before they were absolved. The words of the instrument are as follows:—

"Seeing our holy mother the church denies not her lap to any penitent child returning to her unity, but rather proffers to them the same: we therefore receive again William, Roger, and Alice, to grace. And further have caused them to abjure all and singular the foresaid articles and opinions, before they received of us the benefit of absolution, and were loosed from the sentence of excommunication, wherein they were snarled, enjoining to them penance, according to the quantity of the crime, in form as follows, that is to say, that the Sunday next after their returning to their proper goods, they, the said William, Roger, and Alice, holding every of them an image of the crucifix in their hands, and in their left hands every one of them a taper of wax, weighing half a pound weight, in their shirts (having none other apparel upon them) do go before the cross three times, during the procession of the cathedral church of our lady of Leicester; that is to say, in the beginning of the procession, in the middle of the procession, and in the latter end of the procession; to the honour of him that was crucified, in the memorial of his passion, and to the honour of the Virgin his mother; who also devoutly bowing their knees and kneeling, shall kiss the same crucifix, so held in their hands. And so with the same procession they entering again into the church, shall stand during all the time of the holy mass, before the image of the cross, with their tapers and crosses in their hands. And when the mass is ended, the said William, Roger, and Alice, shall offer to him that celebrated that day the mass. Then upon the Saturday next ensuing, the said William, Roger, and Alice, shall in the full and public market, within the town of Leicester, stand in like manner in their shirts, without any more clothes upon their bodies, holding the foresaid crosses in their right hands; which crosses they shall devoutly kiss three times, (during the market) reverently kneeling upon their knees; that is, in the beginning of the market, in the middle of the market, and in the end of the market. And the said William (because he somewhat understands the Latin tongue) shall say this anthem, with the collect, "Holy Catherine," &c.; and the foresaid Roger and Alice, being unlearned, shall say devoutly a Pater Noster, and an Ave Maria. And, thirdly, the Sunday next immediately after the same, the said William, Roger, and Alice, in their parish church of the said town of Leicester shall stand and do, as upon the Sunday before they stood and did in the cathedral church of our lady aforesaid in all things. Which done, the foresaid William, Roger, and Alice, after mass, shall offer to the priest or chaplain that celebrated the same, with all humility and reverence the wax tapers, which they shall carry in their hands. And because of the cold weather that now is, lest the foresaid penitents might peradventure take some bodily hurt standing so long naked (being mindful to moderate partly our rigour) we give leave, that after their entrance into the churches above said, whilst they shall be in hearing the foresaid masses, they may put on necessary garments to keep them from cold, so that their heads and feet notwithstanding be bare and uncovered. We therefore will and command you, together and apart, that you pronounce the said William, Roger, and Alice to be absolved and restored again to the unity of our holy mother the church, and that you call them forth to do their penance in manner and form aforesaid. Given at Dorchester the 17th day of November, in the year 1389, and the ninth year of our translation."

To the above narration we will adjoin the history of Peter Pateshol, an Augustinian friar, who, obtaining by the pope's privilege (through the means of Walter Dis, confessor to the duke of Lancaster) liberty to change his coat and order, and hearing the doctrine of John Wickliff, and others of the same kind, began at length to preach openly, and expose the vices of his order, in such a way that all men wondered to hear the horrible recital. This being brought to the ears of his order, they to the number of twelve (coming out of their houses to the place where he was preaching) thought to have withstood him by force. Among whom one especially for the zeal of his religion, stood up openly, during his preaching, and contradicted what he said, as he was preaching in the church of St. Christopher in London. When the faithful Londoners saw this, taking grief hereat, they were very angry against the friar, thrusting him with his other brethren out of the church, whom they not only had beaten and sore wounded, but also followed them home to their house, intending to have destroyed their mansion with fire also; and would have so done, had not one of the sheriffs of London, with two of the friars of the house, well known and reported amongst the Londoners, with gentle words mitigated their rage and violence. After this, Peter Patessul thus disturbed, was desired by the Londoners (forasmuch as he could not well preach amongst them) to put in writing what he had said, and other things besides that he knew about the friars. He at their request writing the same, accused the friars of murder committed against several of their brethren. And to make the matter more apparent and credible, he declared the names of them that were murdered, with the names also of their tormentors: and named moreover time and place, where and when they were murdered, and where they were buried. He affirmed further that they were guilty of other horrible sins, and were traitors both to the king and the realm: with many other crimes, which mine author for tediousness leaves off to recite. And for the more confutation of the friars, the Londoners caused the accounts to be openly set up at St. Paul's church-door in London, which was there read, and they were copied by many. This was done A. D. 1387, and in the tenth year of King Richard II.

Thus it may appear how the gospel of Christ, preached by John Wickliff and others, began to spread and fructify abroad in London, and other places of the realm: and more would have done no doubt, had not William Courtney the archbishop, and other prelates with the king, set them so forcibly with might and main to withstand the course thereof. However, as is said before, I find none who were put to death during the reign of this King Richard II. Whereby it appears of this king, that although he cannot utterly be excused for molesting the godly and innocent preachers of that time, (as by his briefs and letters afore mentioned may appear) yet was he not so cruel against them, as others that came after him: and that which he did, seemed to proceed by the instigation of the pope and other bishops, rather than by the consent of his parliament, or advice of his council about him, or else by his own nature. But however the doings of this king are to be excused, or not, it is undoubted, that Queen Anne his wife, most rightly deserves singular commendation; who at the same time, living with the king, had the gospels of Christ in English, with the writings of four doctors upon the same. This Anne was a Bohemian born, and sister to Wencelaus, king of Bohemia: she was married to King Richard about the fifth (some say the sixth) year of his reign, and continued with him the space of eleven years. By the occasion whereof it may seem not improbable, that the Bohemians coming in with her, or resorting into this realm after her, perused and received here the books of John Wickliff, which afterward they conveyed into Bohemia.

The said virtuous Queen Anne, after she had lived with King Richard about eleven years, in the seventeenth year of his reign changed this mortal life, and was buried at Westminster. At whose funeral Thomas Arundel, then archbishop of York, and Lord Chancellor, made the sermon. In which sermon (as remains in the library of Worcester) he, treating of the commendation of her, said these words, That it was more joy of her than of any woman that ever he knew; for notwithstanding that she was born an alien, she had in English all the four gospels, with the doctors upon them: affirming, moreover, and testifying, that she had sent the same to him to examine; and he said they were good and true. And, further, with many words of praise he greatly commended her, in that she being so great a lady, and also a foreigner, would humbly study such virtuous books. And in that sermon he blamed sharply the negligence of the prelates and other men. Inasmuch that some said, he would on the morrow give up the office of chancellor, and forsake the world, and fulfil his pastoral office, for what he had seen and read in those books; and then it had been the best sermon that ever they heard. In which sermon of Thomas Arundel, three points are to be considered: first, the laudable custom of those old times, to have the scripture and doctors in our vulgar English tongue. Secondly, the virtuous exercise and example of this godly lady, who had these books not for a shew hanging at her girdle; but also seemed by this sermon to be a studious reader of the same. The third thing to be noted is, what fruit the archbishop declared also himself to have received at the hearing and reading of the same books in the English tongue. However, the same Thomas Arundel, after this sermon and promise made, became the most cruel enemy that might be against English books, and the authors thereof, as follows afterwards in his history.

For shortly after the death of Queen Anne, in the same year (the king being then in Ireland) this Thomas Arundel, archbishop of York, and Robert Braybrocke the bishop of London, (whether sent by the archbishop of Canterbury and the clergy, or whether going of their own accord) crossed the seas to Ireland, to desire the king with all speed to return and help the faith and church of Christ, against such as holding Wickliff's doctrine, went about (as they said) to subvert all their proceedings, and to destroy the canonical sanctions of their holy mother church. At this complaint the king hearing the one party speak, and not hearing the other, was so incensed, that immediately leaving all his affairs incomplete, he hastened his return to England. In the beginning of the following year, (which was A. D. 1395,) a parliament was called at Westminster. In which certain articles or conclusions were put up by those of the gospel's side, to the number of twelve. Which conclusions were fastened upon the church-door of St. Paul in London, and also at Westminster: the copy of which conclusions, with the words and contents thereof here follow:—

The Book of Conclusions or Reformations, exhibited to the Parliament at London, and set up at the door of St. Paul's, and other places, in the eighteenth year of the reign of King Richard II., and in the year 1395.

The first conclusion: When the church of England began first to date in temporalities after her stepmother the great church of Rome, and the churches were authorised by appropriations; then faith, hope, and charity began in divers places to vanish and fly away from our church, for pride with her most lamentable and dolorous genealogy of mortal and deadly sins, challenged that place by title of heritage. And this conclusion is general, and approved by experience, custom, and manner, as ye shall after hear.

The second conclusion: That our usual priesthood, which took its original at Rome, and is feigned to be a power higher than angels, is not that priesthood which Christ ordained to his disciples. This conclusion is thus proved, Forasmuch as the Romish priesthood is done with signs and pontifical rites and ceremonies, and benedictions, of no force and effect, neither having any ground in scripture, forasmuch as the bishop's ordinal and the New Testament do not at all agree; neither do we see that the Holy Ghost gives any good gift through any such signs or ceremonies; because he, together with all noble and good gifts, cannot co-exist in any person with deadly sin. It is a lamentable and dolorous mockery to wise men, to see the bishops mock and play with the Holy Ghost in the giving of their orders.

The third conclusion:—

The fourth conclusion that most harms the innocent people, is this: That the feigned miracle of the sacrament of bread induces all men, except it be a very few, to idolatry: for they think that the body which shall never be out of heaven, is by the virtue of the priest's words essentially included in the little bread, which they shew to the people. But would to God they would believe that which the evangelical doctor<sup>2</sup> teaches us in his dialogue, "That the bread of the altar is the body of Christ accidentally:" forasmuch as we suppose that by that means every faithful man and woman in the law of God may make the sacrament of that bread without any such miracle. The corollary of this conclusion is, That as the body of Christ be endowed with eternal joy, the service of Corpus Christi, made by friar Thomas, is not true, but painted full of false miracles.

The fifth conclusion is this: That the exorcisms and hallowings, consecrations, and blessings over the wine, bread, wax, water, oil, salt, incense, the altar-stone, and about the church walls, over the vestment, chalice, mitre, cross, and pilgrim-staves, are the very practices of necromancy, rather than of sacred divinity. This conclusion is thus proved: because that by such exorcisms the creatures are honoured as of more force and power than of their own proper nature; for we do not see any alteration or change in any creature so exorcised, except it be by false faith, which is the principal point of the devilish art: The corollary of this is, that if the book of exorcisation or conjuring of holy water, which is sprinkled in the church, were altogether faithful and true; we think certainly that holy water used in the church, were the best medicine for all kind of sickness and sores; daily experience teaches us the contrary.

The sixth conclusion is, that a king and bishop both in one person, a prelate and justice in temporal causes, a curate and officer in worldly office makes every kingdom out of good order. This conclusion is manifest, because the temporality and the spirituality are two parts of the holy universal church; and therefore he who addict himself to the one part, let him not intermeddle with the other, for no man can serve two masters. The corollary of this conclusion is, that we the proctors of God in this case do sue to the parliament, that it may be enacted, that all the clergy (as well of the highest degree as of the lowest) should be fully excused from any temporal office, and occupy themselves with their own charge, and not with others.

The seventh conclusion, what we mightily affirm is, that spiritual prayers made in the church for the souls of the dead (preferring any one by name more than another) is a false foundation of alms, whereupon all the houses of alms in England are falsely founded. This conclusion is proved by two reasons: the one is, that a meritorious prayer (of any force or effect) ought to be a work proceeding from mere charity: and perfect charity excepts no person, because thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Whereby it appears that the benefit of any temporal gift, bestowed and given to priests, and houses of alms, is the principal cause of any special prayers, which is not far different from simony. The other reason is, that every special prayer, made for men condemned to eternal punishment, is very displeasing to God. And although it be doubtful, yet it is very probable to faithful christians that the founders of every such house of alms, for their wicked endowing the same, are for the most part passed by "the broad-way." The corollary is, that every prayer of force and effect, proceeding from perfect charity, would comprehend generally all such as God would have saved. The merchandize of special prayers now used for the dead makes mendicant possessioners and other hireling priests, who otherwise were strong enough to work and to serve the whole realm, and maintains them in idleness, to the great charge of the realm, because it was proved in a certain book which the king has, that a hundred houses of alms are sufficient for the whole realm. And thereby might peradventure greater increase and profit come to the temporality.

The eighth conclusion, needful to tell to the beguiled people is, that pilgrimages, prayers, and oblations made to blind crosses or roods, or to deaf images made either of wood or stone, are very near a kin to idolatry, and far different from alms. And although these things which are forbidden, are the book of errors to the common people; yet the usual and common image of the Trinity is most especially abominable. This conclusion God himself openly manifests, commanding alms to be given to the poor and needy, for he is the image of God in a more perfect similitude and likeness than any block or stone. For God did not say, let us make a block or stone unto our likeness and image, but let us make man; the supreme and highest honour, which the clergy call 'Latria,' pertains only to the godhead, and the inferior honour which the clergy call 'Dulia,' pertains to men and angels, and to no other inferior creature. The corollary is, that the service of the cross, celebrated twice every year in our church is full of idolatry; for if rood, tree, nails, and spear ought so profoundly to be honoured and worshipped, then were Judas' lips (if any man could get them) a marvellous goodly relic! But, thou pilgrim, we pray thee tell us when thou dost offer to the bones of the saints, and holy men which are laid up in any place, whether thou relievest the holy man who is already in joy, or the alms house which is so well endowed, whereas the saints are canonized (the Lord knows how) and to speak more plain, every faithful christian may well suppose that the strokes of that same man, whom they call St. Thomas, were no cause of martyrdom.

The ninth conclusion, that keeps the people down, is, that auricular confession, which is said to be so necessary for salvation, and the feigned power of absolution, exalts and sets up the pride of priests, and gives them opportunity of other secret talks, which we will not at this time talk of; for as both lords and ladies do witness, that for fear of their confessors they dare not speak the truth; and in time of confession is good opportunity ministered of wooing, or to play the villain, or to make other secret arrangements to deadly sin. They affirm and say, that they are commissaries sent of God to judge and discern of all manner of sin, to pardon and cleanse whatever pleases them. They say also, that they have the keys of heaven and hell, and that they can excommunicate, curse, and bless, bind and loose at their own will and pleasure; so that for a small reward, or for twelve pence, they will sell the blessing of heaven by charter and clause of warranty, sealed by their common seal. This conclusion is so common in use, that it needs not any proof. The corollary is, that the pope of Rome who feigned himself to be the profound treasurer of the whole church, having that same worthy jewel, the treasure of the passion of Christ, in his own keeping and custody, together with the merits of all the saints in heaven, by which he gives feigned indulgences and pardons, is a treasurer out of charity, who pretends he may deliver all captives in purgatory at his pleasure. But here every faithful christian may easily perceive that there is much falsehood hid in our church.

The tenth conclusion is, that manslaughter (either by war or by any pretended law of justice for any temporal cause or spiritual revelation) is expressly contrary to the New Testament, which is the law of grace, full of mercy. This conclusion is evidently proved by the examples of the preaching of Christ here in earth, who chiefly teaches every man to love his enemies, and have compassion upon them, and not to kill and murder them. The reason is this, that for the most part when men do fight, after the first stroke, charity is broken; and whoever dies without charity goes the right way to hell. And we know, that none of the clergy can deliver any from the punishment of death for one deadly sin, and not for another; but the law of mercy, which is the New Testament, forbids all manner of murder. For in the gospel it is spoken to our forefathers, "Thou shalt not kill." The corollary is, it is a robbing of the people, when lords purchase indulgences and pardon for such as help their armies to kill and murder the christian people in foreign countries, for temporal gain; as we see certain soldiers who run among the heathen people, to get themselves fame and renown by the murder and slaughter of men. Much more do they deserve evil thanks at the hands of the king of peace, forsooth as by humility and peace, our faith is multiplied and increased; for murderers and manslaughterers Christ hates and menaces, "He that killeth with the sword shall perish with the sword."

The eleventh conclusion.<sup>1</sup>

(1) This conclusion reflects on the morals of nunneries, and though most true, it is also omitted for the same reason as the third.—[Ed.]

The twelfth conclusion is, that the multitude of arts not necessary (used in this our church) causes much sin and offence in waste, curiosity, and disguising in curious apparel; experience and reason partly shew the same, for nature, with a few arts, is sufficient for man's use and necessity.

This is the whole tenor of our ambassage, which Christ hath commanded us to prosecute at this time, most fit and convenient for many causes. And although these matters are here only briefly noted and touched: yet they are more at large declared in another book, with many others beside in our own proper tongue, which we wish should be common to all christian people. Wherefore we earnestly desire and beseech God for his great goodness sake, that he will wholly reform our church (now altogether out of frame) to the perfection of her first beginning and original. (Ex Archivis Regius.)

After these conclusions were thus proposed in the parliament, the king not long after returned home from Dublin into England, toward the latter end of the parliament. At his return he called certain of his nobles to him, Richard Stury, Lewis Clifford, Thomas Latimer, John Mountacute, &c., whom he sharply rebuked, and terribly threatened, for he heard they were favourers of that side; charging them straightly never to hold, maintain, nor favour any more those opinions and conclusions. And he took an oath of Richard Stury, that he should never from that day favour or defend any such opinions; which oath being taken, the king then answered, And I swear (saith he) again to thee, if thou dost ever break this oath, thou shalt die for it a shameful death, &c.

All this while William Courtenay archbishop of Canterbury was yet alive, who was a great stirrer in these matters. But yet Pope Urban the great master of the catholic sect was dead and buried six years before. After whom succeeded in the schismatical see of Rome, Pope Boniface IX., who nothing inferior to his predecessor in all kind of cruelties, left no diligence unfriended to set forward what Urban had begun, in suppressing those that were setting forth the light of the gospel: and he had written several times to King Richard, as well for the repealing of the acts of parliament against his provisions, 'Quare impedit,' and 'Premunire facies:' as also that he should assist the prelates of England in the cause of God (as he pretended) against those, whom he falsely suggested to be Lollards and traitors to the church, to the king, and the realm, &c. Thus the courteous pope with the cruel slander of his malicious tongue sought to work his poison against those whom he could not reach with his sword; which letter he wrote to the king, A. D. 1396, the year before the death of William Courtenay Archbishop of Canterbury. After whom succeeded in that see, Thomas Arundel, brother to the earl of Arundel, being first bishop of Ely, afterwards archbishop of York, and lord chancellor of England, and at last made archbishop of Canterbury, about A. D. 1397. The next year following, which was A. D. 1398, and the ninth year of the pope, I find in certain records of the bishop of Durham, a letter of King Richard II., written to Pope Boniface, rebuking the schism in the popedom, which I judged worthy of being seen here, and therefore annex the same, as follows:—

To the most holy father in Christ, and Lord, Lord Boniface IX., by the grace of God, high pope of the most holy Romish and universal church, his humble and devout son Richard, by the grace of God, king of England, and France, lord of Ireland, greeting and desiring to help the miseries of the afflicted church, and kissing of those his blessed feet.

"Who will give my head water, and mine eyes streaming tears, that I may bewail the decay, and manifold troubles of our mother, which have chanced to her by her own children in the distress of this present schism and division? For the sheep have forgotten the proper voice of their shepherds, and hirelings have thrust in themselves to feed the Lord's flock, who are clothed with the apparel of the true shepherd, challenging the name of honour and dignity, resembling so the true shepherd, that the poor sheep can scarce know whom they ought to follow, or what pastor as a stranger they ought to flee, and whom they should shun as an hireling. Wherefore we are afraid lest the holy standard of the Lord be forsaken of his host, and so that city, being full of riches, become solitary and desolate, and lest the land or people which was wont to say (flourishing in her prosperities) I sat as a queen, and am not a widow, be destitute of the presence of her husband, and as it were so bewitched that she shall not be able to discern his face, and so wrapped in amazement, that she shall not know where to turn her, that she might more easily find him, and that she shall with weeping speak that saying of the spouse, 'I sought him whom my soul loveth, I sought him and found him not.' For now we are compelled so to wander, that if any man say, behold here is Christ, or there, we may not believe him so saying; and so many shepherds have destroyed the Lord's vineyard, and made his pleasant portion a vast wilderness.

This multitude of shepherds is become very burdensome to the Lord's flock. For when two strive to be chief, the state of both their dignities stands in doubt, and in so doing they give occasion to all the faithful of Christ, for a schism and division of the church. And although both parties go about to subdue to their power the whole church militant, yet contrary to both their purpose, by working this way, there begins to rise now a division in the body of the church, as when the division of the living innocent body was asked, when the two women did strive before Solomon; like as the ten tribes of Israel followed Jeroboam the intruder, and were withdrawn from the kingdom for Solomon's sin: even so of old time the desire of ruling has drawn the great power of the world from the unity of the church. Let yourselves remember, we beseech you, how that all Greece fell from the obedience of the Romish church in the time of the faction of the primarch of Constantinople; and how Mahomet with his fellows, by occasion of supremacy in ecclesiastical dignity, deceived a great part of Christians, and withdrew them from the empire and ruling of Christ. And how in these days, where the same supremacy has withdrawn itself from the obedience of it, inasmuch that now in very few realms the candle that burns before the Lord remains, and that for his servant David's sake. And although now few countries remain professing the obedience of Christ's true vicar: yet peradventure if every man were left to his own liberty, he would doubt of the preferring of your dignity, or what is worse, would utterly refuse it by such doubtful evidence alleged on both sides; and this is the subtle craft of the crooked serpent, that is to say, under the pretence of unity to procure schisms, as the spider of a wholesome flower gathers poison, and Judas learned of peace to make war. Wherefore it is believed by wise men, that except this pestilent schism be withstood by and by, the keys of the church will be despised, and they shall bind the conscience but of a few: and when either none dare be bold to correct this fault, or to reform things contrary to God's law, so by this means at length temporal lords will take away the liberties of the church, and peradventure the Romans will come and take away their place, people, and lands: they will spoil their possessions, and bring the men of the church into bondage, and they shall be contemned, reviled, and despised, because the obedience of the people, and devotions towards them will almost be taken away, when the greater part of the church, left to their own liberty, shall wax prouder than they are wont, leaving a wicked example to them that see it. For when they see the prelates study more for covetousness than they were wont, to hoard up money, to oppress the subjects, in their punishings to seek for gain, to confound laws, to stir up strife, to suppress truth, to vex poor subjects with wrong corrections, intemperate in meat and drink, past shame in feasting: what marvel is it if the people despise them as the foulest forsakers of God's law? but all these things do follow if the church should be left long in this doubtfulness of a schism, and then should that old saying be verified; 'In those days there was no king in Israel, but every one did that which was right in his own eyes.' Micah did see the people of the Lord scattered in the mountains, as they had been sheep without a shepherd: for when the shepherd is smitten, the sheep of the flock shall be scattered, the great stroke of the shepherd is the diminishing of his jurisdiction, by which the subjects are drawn from his obedience. When Jason had the office of the highest priest, he changed the ordinance of God, and brought in the customs of the heathen, the priests leaving the service of the holy altar, and applying themselves to wrestling, and other exercises of the Grecians, and despising those things that belonged to the priests, did labour with all their might to learn such things of the Grecians; and by that means the place, people, and holy anointing of priests, which in times past were had in great reverence of kings, were trodden under foot of all men, and robbed by the king's power, and profaned by being thrust in for money. Therefore let the highest vicar of Christ look to this with a diligent eye, and let him be the follower of him by whom he has got authority above others.

"If you mark well, most holy father, you shall find that Christ rebuked sharply two brethren, coveting the seat of honour: he taught them not to play the lords over the people, but the more grace they were filled with, to be so much more humble than others, and more lowly to serve their brethren. To him that asked his coat, to give the cloak, to him that smote him on the one cheek, to turn the other to him. For the sake of the sheep that are given to his keeping, he must forsake all earthly things, and shed his own blood, yea, and if need required, to die. These things, I say, are those that adorn the highest bishop, if they be in him,—not his white horse, not his imperial crown, because he among all men is most bound to all the sheep of Christ. For the fear of God therefore, and for the love of the flock which ye guide, consider these things diligently, and do them wisely, and suffer us no longer to waver betwixt two: although not for your own cause, to whom peradventure the fulness of your own power is known; yet in pitying our weakness, if thou be he, tell us openly, and shew thyself to the world, that all we may follow one. Be not to us a bloody bishop, lest by your occasion, man's blood be shed; lest hell swallow a number of souls, and lest the name of Christ be evil spoken of by infidels, through such a worthy personage. But peradventure ye will say, our right is manifest enough, and we will not put it to other men's decision. If this answer should be admitted, the schism will continue still: seeing neither part is willing to agree to the other, and where the world is as it were equally divided between them, neither part can be compelled to give place to the other without much bloodshed. The incarnation of Christ, and his resurrection, was well enough known to himself and his disciples; yet he asked of his Father to be made known to the world. He made also the gospel to be written, and the doctrine of the apostles, and sent his apostles into all the world, to do the office of preaching, that the same thing might be known to all men. The aforesaid reason is the subtlety of Mahomet, who knowing himself guilty of his sect, utterly forbad disputations. If ye have so full trust of your right, put it to the examination of worthy persons in a general council, to which it belongs by right to define such doubts, or else commit it to able persons, and give them full power to determine all things concerning that matter, or at least, by both parties forsaking the office, leave the church of God free, speedily to provide a new shepherd.

"We find kings have forsaken their temporal kingdoms only for devotion, and have taken the apparel of monk's profession. Therefore let Christ's vicar, (being a professor of most high holiness) be ashamed to continue in his seat, of honour to the offence of all people, and to the prejudice and hurt of the Romish church, and the devotion of it, and cutting away kingdoms from it.

"But if you say, it is not requisite that the cause of God's church should be called in controversy, and therefore we cannot so easily go from it, seeing our conscience forbids us.

"To this we answer, if it be the cause of God and the church, let the general council judge of it: but if it be a personal cause (as almost all the world probably thinks) if ye were the followers of Christ, ye would rather choose a temporal death, than to suffer such a schism and division. I say not, to the hurt of so many, but to the endless destruction of souls, to the offence of the whole world, and to an everlasting shame of the apostolical dignity. Did not Clement, named, or (that I may more truly speak) ordained of St. Peter to the apostolical dignity, and to be bishop, resign his right, that his deed might be taken of his successors for an example? Also Pope Siricius gave over his popedom to be a comfort of the eleven thousand virgins. Therefore much more ought you (if need require) give over your popedom, that you might gather together the children of God who are scattered abroad. For as it is thought a glorious thing to defend the common right, even to bloodshed, so it is sometimes necessary for a man to wink at his own cause, and to forsake it for a greater profit, and by that means better to procure peace. Should not he be thought a devil, and Christ's enemy who would agree to an election of himself for the apostolical dignity and popedom, if it should be to the destruction of christians, division of the church, the offence and loss of all faithful people? If such mischief should be known to all the world by God's revelation, to come to pass by such a person receiving the popedom and apostolical dignity: then by the like reason why should he not be judged of all men an apostate, and forsaker of his faith, who chooses dignity, or worldly honour, rather than the unity of the church? Christ died that he might gather together the children of God, which are scattered abroad: but such an enemy of God and the church wishes his subjects bodily to die in battle, and the greater part of the world to perish in soul, rather than forsake his popedom. If the fear of God, the desire of the heavenly kingdom, and the earnest love of the unity of the church move your heart, shew indeed that your works may bear witness to the truth. Clement and Siricius, most holy popes, not only are not reproved, but rather are revered by all men, because they gave over their right for profitable causes, and for the same cause all the church of holy men shew forth their praise. Likewise, your name should live for ever and ever, if ye would do the like for a necessary cause, that is to say, for the unity of God's church. Give no heed to the unmeasurable cry of them that say, that the right choosing of popes is lost, except ye defend your part manfully: but be afraid, lest such stirrers up of mischief look for their own advantage or honour, that is to say, that under your wing they might be promoted to riches and honour. After this sort Abithophel was joined with Absalom in persecuting his own father, and falsely usurping his kingdom.

"Furthermore, there should be no jeopardy to that election, because both parties stick stiffly to the old fashion of election, and both of them covet the pre-eminence of the Romish church, counselling all christians to obey them. And although, through their resignation, the fashion of choosing the pope should be changed for a time, that might be borne, rather than to suffer any longer this division in God's church. For that fashion in choosing is not so necessarily required to the state of a pope, but that the successor of the apostle might come in at the door by another fashion of election, and that canonical enough. And this we are taught manifestly by examples of the fathers; for Peter the apostle appointed after him Clement, and that not by falsely usurping the power. And it was thought that that fashion of appointing popes was lawful to the time of Pope Hilary, who first decreed that no pope should appoint his successor.

"Afterwards the election of the pope went by the clergy and people of Rome, and the consent of the emperor's council, as appears in the election of the blessed

Gregory. But Pope Martin, with the consent of the holy synod, granted Charles the power to choose the pope. But of late Nicholas II. was the first whom Martin makes mention of in his councils, as chosen by the cardinals. But all the bishops of Lombardy (for the most part) withstood this election, and chose Cadulus to be pope, saying, That the pope ought not to be chosen but within the precinct of Italy. Wherefore we think it not a safe way so earnestly to stick to the traditions of men, in the fashion of choosing the pope, and so often to change, lest we be thought to break God's traditions concerning the unity of the church. Yea rather, it were better yet to ordain a new fashion of his election, and meeter for him as it has been before. But all things concerning the same election might be kept safe, if God's honour were looked for before your own, and the peace of the church were uprightly sought: for such a dishonouring should be most honour to you, and that giving place should be the getting of a greater dignity, and the willing deposing of your honour should obtain you the entry of everlasting honour, and should procure the love of the whole world toward you, and you should deserve to be exalted continually, as David was in humbling himself. O how monstrous a sight, and how foul a monster is a man's body disfigured with two heads! So if it were possible, the spouse of Christ should be made so monstrous, if she were ruled with two such heads: but that is not possible, she is ever altogether fair, in whom no spot is found; therefore we must cast away that rotten member and trust in of his second head. We cannot suffer any longer so great a wickedness in God's house, that we should suffer God's coat, that is without seam, by any means to be torn by the hands of two, that violently draw it in sunder. For if these two should be suffered to reign together, they would between them so tear in pieces that coat of the Lord, that scarce one piece would hang to another. They pass the wickedness of the soldiers that crucified Christ: for they, willing to have the coat whole, said, 'Let us not rend it, but let us cast lots for it, whose it shall be.' But these two popes suffering their right and title to be tried by no lot nor way (although not in words yet in deeds) they pronounce this sentence, 'It shall neither be thine nor mine, but let it be divided;' for they choose rather as it appears, to be lords, (though it be but in a little part, and that to the confusion of the unity of the church) than, in leaving that lordship, to seek for the peace of the church. We do not affirm this, but we shew almost the whole judgment of the world. We looked for amendment of this intolerable confusion during the time that these two inventors of this mischief lived. But we looked for peace, and behold trouble: for neither in their lives nor in their deaths have they procured any comfort, but rather dying as it were in a doubt betwixt two ways, left to their successors matter of continual contention. But now for the space of seven years, we desired and looked that they should bear good grapes, and they bring forth wild grapes, in this matter we fall into a deep despair. But inasmuch as we hear the comfort of the Lord, who promised that miserably he would destroy those wicked men, and let his vineyard to other husbandmen who will bring him fruit at their appointed times, and hath promised faithfully that he will help his spouse in her need to the end of the world: we, leaning on the sure hope of this promise, and in hope believing against hope, by God's grace will put our helping hands to the easing of this misery, when a convenient time shall serve, as much as our kingly power is able, and although our wit does not perceive how these things may be amended, yet we being encouraged to this by the hope of God's promise, will do our endeavour: like as Abraham believed that even if his son were slain by sacrifice, that the multitude of his seed should increase to the number of the stars, according to God's promise. Now, therefore, the times draw near to make an end of this schism, lest a third election of a schismatic against the apostle's successor, make a custom of the thing, and so the pope of Avignon shall be besides the Romish pope, and he shall say with his partakers, as the patriarch of Constantinople said unto Christ's vicar, when he forsook him, 'The Lord be with thee, for the Lord is with us:' and this is much to be feared of all christian men: for that Pharisee begins now to be called the pope of Avignon among the people. But, perhaps, it would be thought by some men that it belongs not to secular princes to bridle outrages of the pope. To whom we answer, that naturally the members put themselves in jeopardy to save the head, and the parts labour to save the whole. Christ so decked his spouse, that her sides should cleave together, and should uphold themselves, and by course of time and occasion of things they should correct one another, and cleave together in harmony. Did not Moses put down Aaron, because he was unfaithful? Solomon put down Abiathar, who came by lineal descent from Anathoth, and removed his priesthood from his kindred to the stock of Eleazar, in the person of Zadok, who had his beginning from Eli the priest? Emperor Otho deposed Pope John XII. because he was immoral. The Emperor Henry put down Gratian, because he used simony in buying and selling spiritual livings. And Otho deposed Pope Benedict I. because he thrust himself in. Therefore, by like reason, why may not kings and princes bridle the Romish pope in default of the church; if the quality of his fault require it, or the necessity of the church compel to help the church oppressed by tyranny? In old time schisms, which rose about making the pope, were determined by the power of secular princes, as the schism betwixt Symmachus and Laurence was ended in a council before Theodoric, king of Italy. The Emperor Henry, when two strove to be pope, deposed them both, and received the third being chosen at Rome to be pope, that is to say, Clement II., who crowned him with the imperial crown. And the Romans promised him that from thenceforth they would promote none to be pope without his consent. Alexander also overcame four popes, schismatics, all of whom the Emperor Frederick corrected.

'Thus look on the register of popes and their deeds, and ye shall find that schisms most commonly have been decided by the power of secular princes, the schismatics cast out, and sometimes new popes made, and sometimes the old ones cast out of their dignities, and restored to their old dignities again. If it were not lawful for secular princes to bridle the outrages of such a pope lawfully made, and afterwards becoming a tyrant; in such a case, he might oppress the church; he might change Christendom into heathens, and make the labour of Christ crucified to be in vain: or else truly, God would not have provided for his spouse in earth by all means as much as is possible by service of men to withstand dangers. Therefore we counsel you, with such a loving affection as becomes children, that ye consider in your heart well, lest in working by this means ye prepare a way to antichrist through your desire to bear rule, and so by this means as we fear, the one of these two things shall happen: either ye shall cause all the princes of the world to rise against you to bring in a true follower of Christ to have the state of the apostolical dignity, or what is worse, the whole world despising the ruling of one shepherd, shall leave the Romish church desolate. But God keep this from the world, that the desire of honour of two men should bring such a desolation into the church of God: for then, that departing away, which the apostle prophesied, should come before the coming of antichrist were at hand: which should be the last disposition of the world, to receive antichrist with honour. Consider, therefore, the state of your most excellent holiness, how ye received the power from God to the building of the church, and not to the destruction of it; that Christ has given you wine and oil to heal the wounded; and has appointed you his vicar in these things which pertain to gentleness, and has given us these things which serve to rigour. For we bear not the sword without a cause to the punishment of evil-doers, which power ordained of God we have received, ourselves being witness: beseeching you to receive our counsel effectually, that in doing thus, the waters may return to the places from whence they came, and so the waters may begin to be made sweet with salt: lest the axe swim on the water, and the wood sink, and lest the fruitful olive degenerate into a wild olive, and the leprosy of Naaman cleave continually to the house of Gehazi, and lest the pope and the Pharisees crucify Christ again. Christ, the spouse of the church, which was wont to bring the chief bishop into the holiest place, increase your holiness, or rather restore it being lost."

This epistle of King Richard II., written to Pope Boniface IX. in the time of the schism, (A.D. 1397,) as it contained much good matter of wholesome counsel to be followed, so how little it wrought with the pope the sequel afterwards declared. For the schism continued long after, in which neither of the popes would give over their hold.

We come now to the 22d year of King Richard's reign, which is A. D. 1399. In which year happened the strange and lamentable deposing of King Richard from his kingly sceptre, the cause of which was briefly as follows.

Several acts on the part of the king led to the estrangement of the people, and certain of the nobles appeared in arms against him. As this was going on in England, the report reached the king's ears, who was then in Ireland, he therefore left the business he had in Ireland, and returning, landed at Milford Haven, not daring, as it seemed, to come to London.

Henry duke of Hereford having returned from France, and taken up arms against the king, had now landed in the north, and was joined by the earl of Northumberland, lord Henry Percy, and Henry his son, the earl of Westmorland, lord Radulph Nevil, and other lords, with a great number of men, so that the multitude rose to sixty thousand able soldiers. Who first making toward the castle of Bristol, where the members of the council who held with the king, had shut themselves in, and having gained the castle they took the chief of them prisoners, namely; John Bushy, Henry Grene, William Scrope and William Bagot; of whom three were immediately beheaded, but Bagot escaped and fled away to Ireland.

The king lying about Wales, destitute and desolate, without comfort or counsel, neither durst come to London, nor would any man come to him; and perceiving that the commons, had a great force against him, and would rather die, than give over what they had begun, and being compassed on every side with miseries, he moved from place to place, the duke still following him; till at length, at the castle of Conway, the king desired to talk with Thomas Arundel archbishop, and the earl of Northumberland; to whom he declared, that he would resign his crown, on condition that an honourable living might be provided for him, and life promised to eight persons, such as he would name. Which being granted and ratified, but not performed, he came to the castle of Flint, where he was brought the same night by the duke of Lancaster and his army to Chester, and thence conveyed secretly to the Tower, there to be kept till the next parliament. As he came near to London, several evil disposed men of the city gathered themselves, thinking to have slain him, for the great cruelty he had used toward the city; but by the mayor and rulers of the city, the madness of the people was checked. Not long after the duke followed, and the parliament assembled. In which parliament the earl of Northumberland, with many other earls and lords were sent to the king in the Tower, to receive his full resignation, according to his promise. This done, certain accusations and articles were laid against the king. And the next year after he was removed to Pomfret castle, and there starved to death.

KING HENRY THE FOURTH.

And thus King Richard being deposed from his rightful crown, the duke of Lancaster was led by Thomas Arundel the archbishop to the royal seat; who there standing up, and crossing himself on the forehead and the breast, spake as follows:

"In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaster, claim the realm of England and the Crown, with all the appurtenances, as descended by right line of the blood, coming from that good Lord King Henry III. And through the right that God of his grace has sent to me, with the help of my kin and of my friends to recover the same, which was in danger of ruin by default of good government, and due justice," &c.

After which words the archbishop, asking the assent of the people, took the duke by the hand, and placed him on the throne, and shortly after he was crowned by the archbishop, king of England.

The next year, a parliament was held at Westminster; in which parliament one Sir William Sautre, a good man and a faithful priest, inflamed with zeal for true religion, required that he might be heard for the advantage of the whole realm. But the matter being suspected by the bishops, they obtained that the matter should be referred to the convocation; where William Sautre being brought before the bishops and notaries, the convocation was deferred to the Saturday next ensuing.

When Saturday was come, that is to say, the 12th day of February, A. D. 1400, Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of his provincial council, being assembled in the chapter-house, objected against one Sir William Sautre, personally then and there appearing by the command of the archbishop of Canterbury; that the said Sir William had once renounced and abjured before the bishop of Norwich, divers and sundry conclusions heretical and erroneous; and that after such abjuration, he publicly and privately held, taught and preached the same conclusions, or such like, contrary to the catholic faith, and to the great peril, and pernicious example of others. And after this he caused such conclusions, held and preached, by Sir William, then and there to be read to the archbishop, in a certain scroll written, in tenor of words as follows:

"Sir William Sautre, otherwise called Chaftris, parish priest of the church St. Scithe the Virgin in London, publicly and privately doth hold these conclusions under written.

1. That he will not worship the cross on which Christ suffered, but only Christ that suffered on the cross.
2. That he would sooner worship a temporal king than the wooden cross.
3. That he would rather worship the bodies of the saints, than the very cross of Christ on which he hung, if it were before him.
4. That he would rather worship a man truly contrite than the cross of Christ.
5. That he is bound rather to worship a man that is predestinate than an angel of God.
6. That if any man would visit the monuments of Peter and Paul, or go on pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Thomas a Becket, or anywhere else, for obtaining of any temporal benefit, he is not bound to keep his vow, but he may distribute the expenses of his vow upon the alms of the poor.
7. That every priest and deacon is more bound to preach the word of God than to say the canonical hours.
8. That after the pronouncing of the sacramental words of the body of Christ, the bread remains of the same nature that it was before, neither does it cease to be bread."

To which conclusions, or articles, the archbishop of Canterbury required Sir William to answer. And he then asked for a copy, and required a competent time to answer. On which the archbishop appointed the following Thursday to make answer. When the day was come the convocation was adjourned until the morrow. When the morrow came, Sir William Sautre, in the chapter-house, before the bishop and his provincial council, exhibited a certain scroll, containing the answers to the articles or conclusions given to him, and said that he delivered the same to the archbishop as his answer in that behalf, which answer was as follows:—

"I, William Sautre, unworthy priest, say and answer, that I will not, and intend not to worship the cross whereon Christ was crucified, but only Christ that suffered upon the cross; so understand me, that I will not worship the material cross, or the gross corporeal matter: yet notwithstanding I will worship the same as a sign, token, and memorial of the passion of Christ. And that I will rather worship a temporal king, than the wooden cross, and the material substance. And that I will rather worship the bodies of saints than the very cross of Christ whereon he hung, with this addition, even if the very same cross were before me, as touching the material substance. And also that I will rather worship a man truly confessed and penitent, than the cross on which Christ hung, as touching the material substance.

"And that also I am bound, and will rather worship him whom I know to be predestinate, truly confessed and contrite, than an angel of God; for that the one is a man of the same nature with the humanity of Christ, and so is not a blessed angel. Notwithstanding I will worship both of them, according as the will of God is I should.

"Also, that if any man has made a vow to visit the shrines of the apostles Peter and Paul, or to go on pilgrimage unto St. Thomas's tomb, or anywhere else, to obtain any temporal benefit or advantage, he is not bound simply to keep his vow upon the necessity of salvation; but he may give the expenses of his vow in alms amongst the poor, by the prudent counsel of his superior, as I suppose.

"And also I say, that every deacon and priest is more bound to preach the word of God, than to say the canonical hours, according to the primitive order of the church.

"Also, touching the sacrament of the altar, I say, that after the pronouncing of the sacramental words of the body of Christ, there ceases not to be very bread simply, but remains bread, holy, true, and the bread of life; and I believe the said sacrament to be the very body of Christ, after the pronouncing of the sacramental words."

When all these answers were publicly read, the archbishop inquired of Sir William whether he had abjured the heresies and errors objected against him, or else had revoked and renounced the conclusions or articles, or not? To which he answered and affirmed that he had not. And then the archbishop examined Sir William Sautre, especially upon the sacrament of the altar.

First, whether in the sacrament of the altar, after the pronouncing of the sacramental words, remains very material bread or not? To which interrogation Sir William somewhat waveringly answered, that he knew not. He said, however, that there was very bread, because it was the bread of life which came down from heaven.

After that the archbishop demanded of him, whether in the sacrament after the sacramental words, rightly pronounced of the priests, the same bread remains which did before the words pronounced, or not? And to this question William answered as before, saying, that there was bread, holy, true, and the bread of life.

After that, the archbishop asked him, whether the same material bread before consecration, by the sacramental words of the priest rightly pronounced, be transubstantiated from the nature of bread into the very body of Christ? Sir William said, that he knew not what that meant.

And then the archbishop assigned Sir William time to deliberate, and more fully to make his answer, till the next day, and continued this convocation then and there till the morrow. Which morrow, to wit, the 19th day of February, being come, the archbishop of Canterbury, before his provincial council then and there assembled, especially examined Sir William Sautre upon the sacrament of the altar, as before; and Sir William again answered as before.

Then the archbishop demanded, whether he would stand to the determination of the holy church or not, which affirms, that in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration being rightly pronounced of the priest, the same bread, which before in nature was bread, ceases any more to be bread? To this interrogation Sir William said, that he would stand to the determination of the church, where such determination was not contrary to the will of God.

He then demanded of him again, what his judgment was concerning the sacrament of the altar? who said and affirmed, that after the words of consecration, by the priest duly pronounced, remained very bread, and the same bread which was before the words spoken. Wherefore the said archbishop of Canterbury, by the counsel and assent of the whole convocation then and there present, gave sentence against Sir William Sautre (being personally present, and refusing to revoke his heresies, that is to say, his true doctrine, but constantly defending the same) under the tenour of words as follows:—

"In the name of God, Amen. We, Thomas, by the grace of God archbishop of Canterbury, primate of England, and legate of the see apostolical, by the authority of God Almighty, and blessed St. Peter and Paul, and of holy church, and by our own authority, sitting for tribunal or chief judge, having God alone before our eyes, by the counsel and consent of the whole clergy our fellow brethren and suffragans, assistants to us in this present provincial council, by this our sentence definitive do pronounce, decree, and declare by these presents, thee, William Sautre, otherwise called Chatris, parish priest pretended, personally appearing before us, in and upon the crime of heresy, judicially and lawfully convicted, as an heretic, and as an heretic to be punished."

The bishop of Norwich, according to the commandment of the said archbishop of Canterbury, presented to William Sautre a certain process, inclosed and sealed with his seal, giving the names of credible witnesses sealed with their seals, the tenour whereof follows thus:—

"That upon the last day of April, A.D. 1399, Sir William Sautre, parish priest of the church of St. Margaret in the town of Lynn, appeared before the bishop of Norwich, and there publicly affirmed and held the conclusions before specified.

"And afterwards, to wit, the 19th day of May, Sir William revoked and renounced all his conclusions, abjuring and correcting all such heresies and errors, taking his oath upon a book before the bishop of Norwich, that from that time forward he would never preach, affirm, nor hold, privily nor openly, the conclusions; and that he would pronounce, according to the appointment of the bishop, the aforesaid conclusions to be erroneous and heresies, in the parish churches of Lynn and Tlney, and in other places at the assignment of the said bishop."

This being done, the archbishop of Canterbury, in the convocation of his prelates and clergy, and such like men, caused the process of the bishop of Norwich to be read openly and publicly to Sir William Sautre. And after that demanded and objected against the said Sir William, that after he had before the said bishop of Norwich revoked and abjured divers errors and heresies, he affirmed, that in the same sacrament of the altar, after the consecration made by the priest, as he taught, there remained material bread; which heresy, amongst others as errors also, he abjured before the foresaid bishop of Norwich. Hereto William answered smiling, or in mocking wise, saying, and denying that he knew of the premises. Then finally it was demanded of Sir William, why he ought not to be pronounced as a man fallen into heresy, and why they should not further proceed to this degradation according to the canonical sanctions: to which he answered nothing, neither could he allege any cause to the contrary.

Whereupon the archbishop of Canterbury by the counsel and assent of the whole council, and especially by the counsel and assent of the reverend fathers and bishops, as also priors, deans, archdeacons, and other worshipful lectors and clerks then and there present in the council, fully determined to proceed to the degradation, and actual deposing of William Sautre, as relapsed into heresy and as incorrigible, according to the sentence in writing, as follows.

"In the name of God, Amen. We Thomas, by the grace of God archbishop of Canterbury, legate of the see apostolical, and metropolitan of all England, do find and declare, that thou William Sautre, otherwise called Chatris, priest, by us with the counsel and assent as all and singular our fellow brethren and whole clergy, by this our sentence definitive declared in writing, hast been for heresy convicted and condemned, and art (being again fallen into heresy) to be deposed and degraded by these presents."

Upon the 26th of February, the archbishop of Canterbury sat in the bishop's seat of the foresaid church of St. Paul in London, and solemnly apparelled in his pontifical attire, with six other bishops, commanded and caused Sir William Sautre, apparelled in priestly vestments, to be brought before him. That done, he declared and expounded in English to all the clergy and people assembled there in great multitude; that all process was finished against Sir William Sautre. Which thing finished, he recited and read the above-mentioned sentence of relapse against Sir William. And as he saw William nothing abashed, he proceeded to his degradation and actual deposition in form as follows.

"In the name of the Father, and the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. We Thomas by God's permission archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolic see, do denounce thee William Sautre, otherwise called Chatris, a pretended chaplain, in the habit and apparel of a priest, as an heretic, and re-fallen into heresy, by this our sentence, by counsel, assent, and authority to be condemned; and by conclusion of all our fellow brethren, fellow bishops, prelates, council provincial, and of the whole clergy, do degrade and deprive thee of thy priestly order. And in sign of degradation and actual deposition from thy priestly dignity, for thine incorrigibility and want of amendment, we take from thee the paten and chalice, and do deprive thee of all power and authority of celebrating the mass, and also we pull from thy back the casule, and take from thee the vestment, and deprive thee of all manner of priestly honour.

"Also, we Thomas archbishop by authority, counsel, and assent, which upon the foresaid William we have, being a pretended deacon, in the habit and apparel of a deacon, having the New Testament in thy hands, being an heretic, and twice fallen, condemned by sentence as is aforesaid, do degrade and put thee from the order of a deacon. And in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, we take from thee the book of the New Testament, and the stole, and do deprive thee of all authority in reading of the gospel, and of all and all manner of dignity of a deacon.

"Also, we Thomas archbishop, by authority, counsel, and assent, which over thee the foresaid William we have, being a pretended sub-deacon, in the habit and vestment of a sub-deacon, an heretic, and twice fallen condemned by sentence, as is aforesaid, do degrade and put thee from the order of a sub-deacon; and in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, we take from thee the surplice and maniple, and do deprive thee of all manner of sub-deaconical dignity.

"Also we Thomas archbishop aforesaid, by counsel assent, and authority which we have over thee, the foresaid William, a pretended acolyte, wearing the habit of an acolyte, and heretic, twice fallen, by our sentence condemned, do degrade and put from thee all order of an acolyte; and in sign and token of this thy degradation, and actual deposition, we take from thee the candlestick and taper, and also urceolum, and do deprive thee of all and all manner of dignity of an acolyte.

"Also we Thomas archbishop, by assent, counsel, and authority, which upon thee the aforesaid William we have, a pretended exorcist, in the habit of an exorcist or holy-water clerk, being an heretic, twice fallen, and by our sentence as is aforesaid, condemned, do degrade and depose thee from the order of an exorcist; and in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, we take from thee the book of conjurations, and do deprive thee of all and singular dignity of an exorcist.

"Also, we Thomas archbishop, by assent, counsel, and authority, as is aforesaid, do degrade and depose thee the aforesaid William, a pretended reader, clothed in the habit of a reader, an heretic, twice fallen, and by our sentence as is aforesaid, condemned from the order of a reader; and in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, we take from thee the book of the divine lections (that is, the book of the church legend) and do deprive thee of all and singular manner of dignity of such a reader.

"Also, we Thomas archbishop of Canterbury aforesaid, by authority, counsel and assent, the which we have, as is aforesaid, do degrade and put thee the foresaid William Sautre, a pretended sexton, in the habit of a sexton, and wearing a surplice, being an heretic twice fallen, by our sentence definitive condemned, as aforesaid from the order of a sexton; and in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, for the causes aforesaid, we take from thee the keys of the church-door, and thy surplice, and do deprive thee of all and singular manner of commodities of a door-keeper.

"And also, by the authority of omnipotent God the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost, and by the authority, counsel, and assent, of our whole council provincial above written, we do degrade thee, and depose thee, being here personally present before us, from orders, benefices, privileges and habit in the church; and for thy pertinency incorrigible we do degrade thee before the secular court of the high constable and marshal of England, being personally present; and do depose thee from all and singular clerical honours and dignities whatsoever, by these writings. Also, in token of thy degradation and deposition, here actually we have caused thy crown and ecclesiastical tonsure in our presence to be rased away, and utterly to be abolished, like to the form of a secular layman; and here we do put upon the head of thee the aforesaid William the cap of a lay secular person; beseeching the court aforesaid, that they will receive favorably the said William to them thus recommitted."

Thus William Sautre the servant of Christ being utterly thrust out of the pope's kingdom, and metamorphosed from a clerk to a secular layman, was committed to the secular power. Which so done, the bishops, not yet contented, cease not to call upon the king, to cause him to be brought forth to speedy execution. Whereupon the king, too ready to gratify the clergy, and to retain their favours, directs out a terrible decree against William Sautre, and sent it to the major and sheriffs of London to be put in execution; as follows:

The Decree of the King against William Sautre.

"The decree of our sovereign lord the king and his council in the parliament, against a certain new sprung up heretic. To the major and sheriffs of London, &c. Whereas the reverend father Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolic see, by the assent, consent, and counsel of other bishops, and his brethren suffragans, and also of all the whole clergy within his province or diocese, gathered together in his provincial council, the due order of the law being observed in all points in this behalf, hath pronounced and declared, by his definitive sentence, William Sautre sometime chaplain fallen again into his most damnable heresy, the which before time the said William had abjured, thereupon to be a most manifest heretic, and therefore hath decreed that he should be degraded, and hath for the same cause really degraded him from all prerogative and privilege of the clergy, decreeing to leave him to the secular power; and hath really so left him, according to the laws and canonical sanctions set forth in this behalf, and also that our holy mother the church hath no farther to do in the premises: we therefore being zealous in religion, and reverend lovers of the catholic faith, willing and minding to maintain and defend the holy church, and the laws and the liberties of the same, to root out all such errors and heresies out of our kingdom of England, and with condign punishment to correct and punish all heretics or such as be convicted; provided always that both according to the law of God and man, and the canonical institutions in this behalf accustomed, such heretics convicted and condemned in form aforesaid ought to be burned with fire: we command you, as straightly as we may, or can, firmly enjoining you that you do cause the said William, being in your custody, in some public or open place within the liberties of your city aforesaid (the cause aforesaid being published unto the people) to be put into the fire, and there in the same fire really to be burned, to the great horror of his offence, and the manifest example of other christians. Fail not in the execution thereof, upon the peril that will fall thereupon."

Thus it may appear how kings and princes have been blinded and abused by the false prelates of the church, inasmuch that they have been their slaves and butchers, to slay Christ's poor innocent members. See therefore what danger it is for princes not to have knowledge and understanding themselves, but to be led by other men's eyes, and specially trusting to such guides, who through hypocrisy deceive them, and through cruelty devour the people.

As King Henry IV., who was the deposer of King Richard, was the first of all English kings that began the unmerciful burning of Christ's saints for standing against the pope: so was this William Sautre, the true and faithful martyr of Christ, the first of all them in Wickliff's time, who I find to be burned in the reign of this king, which was A. D. 1400.

After the martyrdom of this godly man, the rest of the same company began to conceal themselves for fear of the king, who was altogether bent to hold with the pope's prelacy. Such was the reign of this prince, that he was ever terrible to the godly, immeasurable in his actions, and really beloved by very few men; but princes never lack flatterers about them. Neither was the time of his reign quiet, but full of trouble, of blood and misery. Such was their desire of King Richard again in the reign of this king, that he was many years after rumoured to be alive (by those who desired that to be true which they knew to be false) for which several were executed. For the space of six or seven years together, scarcely a year passed without some conspiracy against the king.

Many of the nobles joined in these rebellions, and many of them were beheaded, or otherwise slain, but still the rebellions continued.

This civil rebellion of so many nobles and others, against the king, declared what hostile feelings the people then bore towards this King Henry. Among whom I cannot omit here the archbishop of York named Richard Scrope, who with the Lord Mowbray, marshal of England, gathered a great company in the north country against the king, to whom also was joined the forces of Lord Bardolf, and Henry Percy earl of Northumberland. And to stir up the people more willingly to take their parts, they collected certain articles against the said king, to the number of ten, and fastened them upon the doors of the churches and monasteries, to be read of all men in England. Which articles, as they contain a great part of the doings between King Henry and King Richard, I thought, for the better opening of the matter to insert the same, in such form as I found them:

Articles set upon the Church Doors against King Henry the Fourth.

"In the name of God, Amen. Before the Lord Jesus Christ, judge of the quick and dead, &c. We A. B. C. D. &c., not long since became bound by oath upon the sacred evangelical book, to our sovereign lord Richard, late king of England and France, in the presence of many prelates, potentates and nobility of the realm; that we, so long as we lived, should bear true allegiance and fidelity toward him and his heirs succeeding him in the kingdom by just title, right, and line, according to the statutes and custom of this realm of England. By virtue whereof we are bound to see that no vices, or heinous offences arising in the commonwealth, take effect, and we ought to give ourselves and our goods to withstand the same, without fear of the sword or death, upon pain of perjury, which pain is everlasting damnation. Wherefore we seeing and perceiving divers horrible crimes, and great enormities daily without ceasing committed by the children of the Devil and Satan's soldiers against the supremacy of the church of Rome, the liberty of the church of England, and the laws of the realm, against the person of King Richard and his heirs, against the prelates, noblemen, religion, and commonalty, and finally against the whole public weal of the realm of England, to the great offence of the majesty of Almighty God, and to the provocation of his just wrath and vengeance toward the realm and people. And fearing also the destruction both of the church of Rome and England, and the ruin of our country to be at hand, having before our eyes the justice and the kingdom of God, calling always on the name of Jesus, having an assured confidence in his clemency, mercy and power; have here taken certain articles, subscribed in the following form to be propounded, tried, and heard before the just judge, Jesus Christ, and the whole world, to his honour, the delivery of the church, the clergy, and commonalty, and to the utility and profit of the public weal. But if (which God forbid) by force, fear, or violence of wicked persons we shall be cast in prison, or by violent death prevented, so as in this world we shall not be able to prove the articles as we would wish, then do we appeal to the high celestial judge, that he may judge and discern the same, in the day of his supreme judgment.

"I. We depose, say, except, and intend to prove against the Lord Henry Darby, son of the Lord John of Gaunt, late duke of Lancaster, and commonly called king of England (himself pretending the same, although without all right and title thereunto) and against his adherents, favours, and accomplices; that they ever have been, are, and will be traitors, invaders, and destroyers of God's church in Rome, England, Wales, and Ireland, and of our sovereign lord Richard late king of England, his heirs, his kingdom, and commonwealth, as shall hereafter manifestly appear.

"II. We depose, &c. against the said Lord Henry, for that he had conceived, devised, and conspired certain heinous crimes and traitorous offences against his sovereign lord Richard's state and dignity, as manifestly appeared in the contention between the said Lord Henry, and the Lord Thomas duke of Norfolk begun at Coventry, but not finished thoroughly. Afterwards he was sent into exile by sentence of the King Richard, by the agreement of his father the Lord John duke of Lancaster, by the voice of many of the lords temporal, and nobility of the realm, and also by his own consent; there to remain for a certain time appointed unto him by the said lords, and withal he was bound by oath not to return into England before he had obtained favour and grace of the king. Not long after, when the king was departed into Ireland for reformation of that country appertaining to the crown of England, but as then rebelling against the same; the said Lord Henry in the meantime contrary to his oath and fidelity, and long before the time limited unto him was expired, with all his favours and invaders secretly entered into the realm, swearing and protesting before the face of the people, that his coming into the realm in the absence of the king was for no other cause, but that he might in humble sort with the love and favour of the king, and all the lords spiritual and temporal, have and enjoy his lawful inheritance descending unto him of right after the death of his father: which thing as it pleased all men, so they cried, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' But how this blessing afterwards turned into cursing, shall appear in that which followed: and also ye shall understand his horrible and wicked conspiracy against his sovereign lord King Richard, and divers other lords as well spiritual as temporal; besides that his manifest perjury shall well be known, and that he remains not only foresworn and perjured, but also excommunicate, for he conspired against his sovereign lord our king. Wherefore we pronounce him by these presents as well perjured as excommunicate.

"III. We depose, &c. against the Lord Henry, that he, immediately after his entry into England, by crafty and subtle policy caused to be proclaimed openly throughout the realm, that no tenths of the clergy, fifteenths of the people, sealing up of cloth, diminution of wool, impost of wine, nor other extortions or exactions whatsoever, should hereafter be required or exacted; hoping by this means to purchase unto him the voice and favour of the prelates spiritual, the lords temporal, the merchants, and commonalty of the whole realm. After this he took by force the king's castles and fortresses, spoiled and devoured his goods wheresoever he found them, crying, Havock! Havock! The king's majesty's subjects as well spiritual as temporal, he spoiled and robbed, some he took captive and imprisoned them, and some he slew and put to miserable death, whereof many were bishops, prelates, priests, and religious men. Whereby it is manifest, that the said Lord Henry is not only perjured, in promising and swearing that there should be hereafter no more exactions, payments, or extortions within the realm, but also excommunicate for the violence and injury done to prelates and priests. Wherefore by these presents we pronounce him, as before, as well perjured as excommunicate.

"IV. We depose, &c. against the said Lord Henry, That he hearing of the king's return from Ireland into Wales, rose up against his sovereign lord the king with many thousands of armed men, marching forward with all his power towards the castle of Flint in Wales, where he took the king and held him prisoner, and so led him captive as a traitor unto Leicester: from whence he took his journey towards London, misusing the king by the way, both he and his, with many injuries and opprobrious contumelies and scoffs. And in the end committed him to the Tower of London, and held a parliament, the king being absent and in prison: wherein for fear of death he compelled the king to yield and resign to him all his right and title of the kingdom and crown of England. After which resignation being made, the said Lord Henry standing up in the parliament house, stoutly and proudly before them all, said and affirmed, that the kingdom of England and crown of the same, with all thereunto belonging, did pertain to him at that present, as of very right, and to no other; for that the said King Richard by his own deed was deprived for ever of all the right, title, and interest that ever he had, hath, or may have in the same. And thus at length by right and wrong he exalted himself unto the throne of the kingdom: since which time, our commonwealth never flourished nor prospered, but has been altogether void of virtue, for the spirituality is oppressed, exercise and war-like practices have not been maintained, charity is waxed cold, and covetousness and misery have taken place, and finally mercy is taken away and vengeance supplies the room. Whereby it doth appear (as before is said,) that the said Lord Henry is not only perjured and false by usurping the kingdom and dominion belonging to another, but also excommunicate for the apprehending, unjust imprisoning, and depriving his sovereign lord the king of his royal crown and dignity. Wherefore, as in the articles before, we pronounce the said Lord Henry to be excommunicate.

"V. We depose, &c. against the said Lord Henry, that he the same Lord Henry with the rest of his favourers and accomplices, heaping mischief upon mischief, have committed and brought to pass a most wicked and mischievous fact, yea, such as has not been heard of at any time before. For after that they had taken and imprisoned the king, and deposed him by open injury against all human nature; yet, not content with this, they brought him to Pomfret castle, and there imprisoned him, where fifteen days and nights they vexed him with continual hunger, thirst, and cold, and finally bereft him of life with such a kind of death as never before that time was known in England, but by God's Providence it is come to light. Who ever heard of such a deed, or who ever saw the like of him? Wherefore, O England! arise, stand up, avenge the cause, the death and injury of thy king and prince: which if thou do not, take this for certain, that the righteous God will destroy thee by strange invasions and foreign power, and avenge himself on thee for this so horrible an act. Whereby doth appear not only his perjury, but also his excommunication most execrable; so that, as before, we pronounce the said Henry not only perjured, but also excommunicate.

"VI. We depose, &c. against the said Lord Henry, that after he had attained to the crown and sceptre of the kingdom, he caused forthwith to be apprehended divers lords spiritual, bishops, abbots, priors, and religious men of all orders, whom he arrested, imprisoned, and bound, and against all order brought them before the secular judges to be examined; not sparing the bishops whose bodies were anointed with sacred oil, nor priests nor religious men, but commanded them to be condemned, hanged, and beheaded by the temporal law and judgment, notwithstanding the privilege of the church and holy orders, which he ought to have revered and worshipped, if he had been a true and lawful king: for the first and chief oath in the coronation of a lawful king is, to defend and keep inviolate the liberties and rights of the church, and not to deliver any priest or religious man into the hands of the secular power, except for heresy only, and that after his degradation, according to the order of the church. He has done contrary unto all this; so that it is manifest by this article as before in the rest, that he is both perjured and excommunicate.

"VII. We depose, &c. against the said Lord Henry, that he not only caused to be put to death the lords spiritual and other religious men, but also divers of the lords temporal and nobility of the realm, and chiefly those that studied for the preservation of the commonwealth, not ceasing as yet to continue his mischievous enterprise, if by God's Providence it be not prevented, and that with speed: amongst all other of the nobility, these first he put to death; the earl of Salisbury, the earl of Huntingdon, the earl of Gloucester, the Lord Roger Clarendon the king's brother, with several other knights and esquires, and afterwards, the Lord Thomas Percy earl of Worcester, and the Lord Henry Percy son and heir to the earl of Northumberland; which Lord Henry he not only slew, but to the utmost of his power again and again he endeavoured to have him slain. For after he was once put to death, and delivered to the lord of Furness to be buried (who committed his body to holy sepulture, with as much honor as might be, commending his soul to Almighty God with the suffrages of blessed mass and other prayers) the said Lord Henry, most like a cruel beast still thirsting for his blood, caused his body to be exhumed and brought forth again, and to be placed between two millstones in the town of Shrewsbury, there to be kept with armed men; and afterwards to be beheaded and quartered, commanding his head and quarters to be carried into divers cities of the kingdom. Wherefore, for so detestable an act never heard of in any age before, we pronounce him, as in the former articles, excommunicate.

"VIII. We depose, &c. against the said Lord Henry, that after his attaining to the crown he willingly ratified, allowed, and approved a most wicked statute set forth and renewed in the parliament holden at Winchester. The which statute is directly against the church of Rome, and the power, and principality thereof given by our Lord Jesus Christ unto blessed St. Peter and his successors bishops of Rome; unto whom belongs by full authority the free disposing of all spiritual promotions as well superior as inferior: which wicked statute is the cause of many mischiefs, viz. of simony, perjury, adultery, disorder, and disobedience; for many bishops, abbots, priors, and prelates (we will not say by virtue, but rather by error of this statute) have bestowed the benefices vacant upon young men, rude and unworthy persons, who have bargained with them for the same, so that scarcely one prelate is found that has not conversed with the party promoted for the half yearly, or, at the least, the third part of the said benefice so bestowed. And by this means the said statute is the destruction of the right of St. Peter, the church of Rome and England, the clergy and universities, the whole commonwealth, and maintenance of wars, &c.

"IX. We say and depose, &c. against the said Lord

Henry, that after he had tyrannously taken upon him the government of the realm, England never flourished since, nor prospered, by reason of his continual exactions of money, and yearly oppressions of the clergy and commonalty: neither is it known how this money so extorted is bestowed, when neither his soldiers, nor his gentlemen are paid as yet their wages and fees for their charges, and wonderful toil and labour, neither yet are the poor country people satisfied for the victuals taken of them: and nevertheless the miserable clergy, and more miserable commonalty, are forced still to pay by menaces and sharp threatenings. Notwithstanding he swears, when he first usurped the crown, that hereafter there should be no such exactions nor vexations, neither of the clergy nor laity. Wherefore, as before, we pronounce him perjured, &c.

"X. In the tenth and last article we depose, say, and openly protest by these presents, for ourselves, and all our assistants in the cause of the church of Rome and England, and in the cause of King Richard, his heirs, the clergy and commonalty of the whole realm: that our intention neither is, was, nor shall be, in word or deed to offend any state either of the prelates spiritual, lords temporal, or commons of the realm; but rather, foreseeing the perdition and destruction of this realm to approach, we have here brought before you certain articles concerning the destruction of the same, to be circumspectly considered by the whole assembly, as well of the lords spiritual as temporal, and the faithful commons of England: beseeching you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ the righteous judge, and for the merits of our blessed lady the mother of God, and of St. George our defender, under whose displayed banner we wish to live and die, and under pain of damnation, that ye will be favourable to us, and to our causes which are three in number. Whereof the first is, that we exalt unto the kingdom the true and lawful heir, and crown him in the kingly throne with the diadem of England. And secondly, that we recall the Welshmen, the Irishmen, and all other our enemies to perpetual peace and amity. Thirdly, and finally, that we deliver and make free our native country from all exactions, extortions, and unjust payment; beseeching our Lord Jesus Christ to grant his blessing, the remission of their sins, and life everlasting to all that assist us to their power in this godly and meritorious work; and to all those that are against us we threaten the curse of Almighty God, by the authority committed unto us by Christ and his holy church, and by these presents we pronounce them excommunicate."

These articles being seen and read, a great concourse of people daily resorted more and more to the archbishop. The Earl of Westmoreland hearing of this, mustered his soldiers with all the force he was able to make, and went against the archbishop; but seeing his party too weak to encounter with him, he used policy, and under colour of friendship, he laboured to seek out the causes of that great stir. The archbishop shewed him the articles, which, when the earl had read, he seemed highly to commend the purpose and doings of the bishop: promising that he would help in that quarrel to the utmost of his power. The archbishop, easily persuaded, was content, although much against the counsel of the earl marshal, and came to hold further conference. The articles being opened, published, and read, the earl of Westmoreland pretended to like them, and exhorted the archbishop that he would discharge the needless multitude of his soldiers, and dismiss them home to their works and business, and they would together drink and join hands in the sight of the whole company. Thus they shaking hands together, the archbishop sends away his soldiers in peace, not knowing himself to be circumvented, until he was arrested by the hands of the earl of Westmoreland; and shortly after, the king coming with his army to York, he was there beheaded; and with him also Lord Thomas Mowbray, marshal, with divers others. After whose slaughter, the king proceeds farther to pursue the earl of Northumberland, and Lord Thomas Bardolph. At length, within two years after, fighting against the king, they were slain in the field, (A. D. 1408.)

The king, after the shedding of so much blood, seeing himself so disliked by his subjects, thought to keep in with the clergy, and with the bishop of Rome. And therefore he was compelled in all things to serve their humour, as appeared as well in condemning William Sautre, as also in others whom we have now to treat of. In the number of whom comes now John Badby, who, by the cruelty of Thomas Arundel, archbishop, and other prelates, was brought to his condemnation in this king's reign, (A. D. 1409), as appears by their own registers.

JOHN BADBY, ARTIFICER.

In A. D. 1409, March 1st, the following examination of John Badby, a layman, was made upon the crime of heresy, before Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, and the archbishop of York, bishops of London, of Winchester, of Oxford, of Norwich, of Salisbury, of Bath, of Bangor, and a great number of other lords both spiritual and temporal. Master Morgan read the articles of his opinions to the hearers, as follows:

"In the name of God, Amen. Be it manifest to all men by this present public instrument, that in the year after the incarnation of our Lord, according to the course and computation of the church of England, in the year 1409, John Badby, a layman, of the diocese of Worcester, appearing personally before the reverend father in Christ and Lord, Lord Thomas, by the grace of God bishop of Worcester, was detected of heresy, having heretically taught, and openly maintained, that the sacrament of the body of Christ, consecrated by the priest upon the altar, is not the true body of Christ by the virtue of the words of the sacrament. But that after the sacramental words spoken by the priests to make the body of Christ, the material bread remains upon the altar as in the beginning, neither is it turned into the very body of Christ after the sacramental words spoken of the priests. Which John Badby being examined, and diligently demanded by the reverend father, did answer that it was impossible that any priest should make the body of Christ, and that he believed firmly that no priest could make the body of Christ by such words sacramentally spoken in such sort. And also he said expressly that he would never while he lived believe that any priest could make the body of Christ sacramentally, unless that first he saw manifestly the like body of Christ to be handled in the hands of the priest upon the altar, in his corporal form. And, furthermore, he said that John Raker of Bristol had as much power and authority to make the like body of Christ, as any priest had. Moreover, he said that when Christ sat at supper with his disciples, he had not his body in his hand, to the intent to distribute it to his disciples; and he said expressly, that he did not this thing. And he also spake many other words teaching and defending the heresy, both grievous, and also out of order, and horrible to the ears of the hearers, sounding against the catholic faith.

"Upon which occasion the reverend father admonished and requested John Badby oftentimes and very instantly to charity; forasmuch as he would willingly that he should have forsaken such heresy and opinion holden, taught, and maintained by him, in such sort against the sacrament, to renounce, and utterly abjure them, and to believe other things which the holy mother church doth believe. And he informed the said John on that behalf, both gently, and yet laudably. Yet the said John Badby, although he were admonished and requested both often and instantly by the said reverend father, said and answered expressly, that he would never believe otherwise than he had before said, taught, and answered. Whereupon, the aforesaid reverend father, bishop of Worcester, seeing, understanding, and perceiving John Badby to maintain and fortify the heresy, being stubborn, and proceeding in the same stubbornness, pronounced the said John to be before this time convicted of such an heresy, and that he hath been and is an heretic, and in the end declared it in these words:

"In the name of God, Amen. We, Thomas, bishop of Worcester, do accuse thee, John Badby, being a layman, of our diocese, of and upon the crime of heresy, being oftentimes confessed and convicted before us sitting for chief judge, that thou hast taught, and openly affirmed, as hitherto thou dost teach, boldly affirm, and defend; that the sacrament of the body of Christ, consecrated upon the altar by the priest, is not the true body of Christ; but after the sacramental words, to make the body of Christ, by virtue of the said sacramental words pronounced, to have been in the crime of heresy: and we do pronounce thee both to have been and to be an heretic, and do declare it finally by these writings."

When these things were thus finished, and all the conclusions were read in the vulgar tongue, the archbishop demanded of him, whether he would renounce and forsake his opinions and such conclusions or not, and adhere to the doctrine of Christ and the catholic faith? He answered, that according to what he had said before, he would adhere and stand to those words which before he had made answer unto. Then the archbishop oftentimes required him by the bowels of Jesus Christ, that he would forsake those opinions and conclusions, and that henceforth he would cleave to the christian faith, which, in the audience of all the lords and others that were present, he expressly denied and refused.

After all this, when the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London had consulted, to what safe keeping John Badby might be committed; it was concluded that he should be put into a certain chamber, or safe house within the mansion of the friars preachers; and then the archbishop of Canterbury said that he himself would keep the key thereof in the meantime. And when the day was expired, being the fifteenth day of March, and that the archbishop of Canterbury, with his fellow brethren and suffragans, were assembled in the church of St. Paul in London; the archbishop of Canterbury, taking the episcopal seat, called unto him the archbishop of York, and the following bishops: Richard of London; Henry of Winchester; Robert of Chichester; Alexander of Norwich; and the noble Prince Edmund; the duke of York; Ralph, earl of Westmoreland; Thomas Beaufort, knight; lord chancellor of England; and the Lord Beaumont, with other noble men, as well spiritual as temporal, that stood and sat by, whom it would be long to name: Before whom John Badby was called personally to answer to the articles. The articles were read by the official of the court of Canterbury, and by the archbishop (in the vulgar tongue) expounded publicly and expressly; and as he had before spoken and deposed, he still held and defended his opinions, and said that while he lived, he would never retract the same. And, furthermore, he said especially to be noted, that the lord duke of York, personally there present, and every man else for the time being, is of more estimation and reputation, than the sacrament of the altar, by the priest in due form consecrated. And whilst they were thus in his examination, the archbishop considering and weighing that he would in nowise be altered, and seeing moreover his countenance stout, and heart confirmed, so that he began to persuade others as it appeared: these things considered, the archbishop, when he saw that it was not in his power either by exhortations, reasons, or arguments, to bring John Badby from his constant truth to his catholic faith (executing and doing the office of his great master) proceeded to confirm and ratify the former sentence given by the bishop of Worcester against John Badby, pronouncing him for an open and public heretic. And thus they delivered him to the secular power; and desired the temporal lords then and there present, that they would not put John Badby to death for that his offence, nor deliver him to be punished or put to death in the presence of all the lords.

These things thus done and concluded by the bishops in the forenoon: in the afternoon, the king's writ was not far behind. John Badby, still persevering in his constancy unto the death, was brought into Smithfield, and there being put in an empty barrel, was bound with iron chains fastened to a stake having dry wood put about him.

And as he was thus standing in the barrel, it happened that the prince, the king's eldest son, was present; who, shewing some part of the good Samaritan, began to endeavour to save the life of him, whom the hypocritical Levites and pharisees sought to put to death. He admonished and counselled him, that he should speedily withdraw himself out of these dangerous labyrinths of opinions, adding oftentimes threatenings, which might have daunted any man's courage.

In the mean time the prior of St. Bartholemew's, in Smithfield, brought with all solemnity the sacrament of God's body, with twelve torches borne before, and so shewed the sacrament to the poor man at the stake. And then they demanding of him how he believed in it, he answered, That he knew well it was hallowed bread, and not God's body. And then was the barrel put over him, and fire put to him. And when he felt the fire, he cried, mercy, calling upon the Lord, and so the prince immediately commanded to take away the barrel, and quench the fire. The prince's commandment being obeyed, he asked him if he would forsake heresy and take to the faith of holy church? which, if he would do, he should have goods enough, promising also a yearly stipend out of the king's treasury.

But this valiant champion of Christ, neglecting the prince's fair words, refused the offer of worldly promises, being no doubt more vehemently inflamed with the Spirit of God, than with any earthly desire. Wherefore, when he continued unmoveable in his former mind, the prince commanded him straight to be put again into the barrel, and that he should not afterward look for any grace or favour. But as he could be allured by no rewards, even so was he nothing at all abashed at their torments, but, as a valiant champion of Christ, he persevered invincible to the end. Not without a great and most cruel battle, but with much greater triumph of victory; the Spirit of Christ having always the upper hand in his members, notwithstanding the fury, rage, and power of the whole world.

This godly martyr, John Badby, having thus perfected his testimony and martyrdom in fire, the persecuting bishops not yet contented, and thinking themselves as yet either not strong enough, or else not sharp enough against the poor innocent flock of Christ, to make all things sure and substantial on their side, so that this doctrine of the gospel now springing should be suppressed for ever, laid their conspiring heads together; and having now a king for their own purpose, ready to serve their turn, the bishops and clergy of the realm exhibited a bill to the king's majesty; subtly declaring, what quietness had been maintained within this realm by his most noble progenitors, who always defended the ancient rites and customs of the church, and enriched the same with large gifts, to the honour of God and the realm: and contrariwise, what trouble and disquietness was now risen by wicked and perverse men, teaching and preaching openly and privily a certain new, wicked, and heretical kind of doctrine, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of holy church. The king, always oppressed with blind ignorance, by the crafty means and subtle pretences of the clergy, granted in the parliament (by consent of the nobility assembled) a statute to be observed, called ex-officio, as follows:—

The Statute Ex-Officio.

"That is to say, That no man within this realm, or other the king's majesty's dominions, presume to take upon him to preach privily or openly, without special license first obtained of the ordinary of the same place (curates in their own parish churches, and persons heretofore privileged, and others admitted by the canon law, only excepted). Nor that any hereafter do preach, maintain, teach, inform openly or in secret, or make or write any book contrary to the catholic faith, and determination of the holy church. Nor that any hereafter make any conventicles or assemblies, or keep and exercise any manner of schools touching this sect, wicked doctrine and opinion. And further, That no man hereafter shall by any means favour any such preacher, any such maker of unlawful assemblies, or any such book-maker or writer; and, finally, any such teacher, informer, or stirrer up of the people. And that all and singular persons having any of the said books, writings, or schedules, containing the said wicked doctrines and opinions, shall within forty days after this present proclamation and statute, really and effectually deliver, or cause to be delivered, all and singular the said books and writings unto the ordinary of the same place. And if it shall happen that any person or persons, of what kind, state or condition soever he or they be, to do or attempt any manner of thing contrary to this present proclamation and statute, or not to deliver the same books in form aforesaid: That then the ordinary of the same place in his own diocese, by authority of the said proclamation and statute shall cause to be arrested and detained under safe custody the said person or persons in this case defamed and evidently suspected, or any of them, until he or they so offending have by order of law purged him or themselves as touching the articles laid to his or their charge in this behalf; or until he or they have denied and recanted (according to the laws ecclesiastical) the said wicked sect, preachings, teachings, and heretical and erroneous opinions. And that the said ordinary by himself or his commissaries proceed openly and judicially to all the effect of law against the said persons so arrested and remaining under safe custody, and that he end and determine the matter within three months after the said arrest (all delays and excuses set apart) according to the order and custom of the canon law. And if any person, in any cause above-mentioned, shall be lawfully convicted before the ordinary of the diocese or his commissaries; that then the said ordinary may lawfully cause the said person so convicted (according to the manner and quality of his offence, to be laid in any of his own prisons, and there to be kept so long as in his discretion shall be thought expedient.

"And further, The said ordinary (except in cases by the which according to the canon law the party offending ought to be delivered unto the secular power) shall charge the said person with such a fine of money to be paid unto the king's majesty, as he shall think competent for the manner and quality of his offence. And the said diocesan shall be bound to give notice of the said fine, into the king's majesty's exchequer, by his letters patent under his seal; to the intent that the said fine may be levied to the king's majesty's use of the goods of the person so convicted.

"And further, If any person within this realm and other the king's majesty's dominions, shall be convicted before the ordinary of the place, or his commissaries, of the said wicked preachings, doctrines, opinions, schools, and heretical and erroneous informations, or any of them; and will refuse to abjure and recant the said wicked sect, preachings, teachings, opinions, schools, and informations; or if, after his abjuration once made, the relapse be pronounced against him by the diocesan of the place, or his commissaries (for so by the canon law he ought to be left to the secular power, upon credit given to the ordinary or his commissaries) that then the sheriff of the same county, the mayor, sheriffs, or sheriff, or the mayor, or bailiffs of the same city, village, or borough of the same county, and nearest inhabiting to the said ordinary, or his said commissaries, shall personally be present, as often as they shall be required, to confer with the said ordinary or his commissaries in giving sentence against the said persons offending, or any of them: and, after the said sentence so pronounced, shall take unto them the said persons so offending, and any of them, and cause them openly to be burned in the sight of all the people; to the intent that this kind of punishment may be a terror unto others, that the like wicked doctrines and heretical opinions, or authors and favourers thereof be no more maintained within this realm and dominions, to the great hurt (which God forbid) of christian religion, and decrees of holy church. In all which and singular the premises, concerning the statute aforesaid, let the sheriff, mayors, and bailiffs of the said counties, cities, villages, and boroughs be attendant, aiding and favouring the said ordinaries and their commissaries."

By this bloody statute so severely and sharply enacted against these simple men, the reader may well consider the nature and condition of this present world, how it has been set and bent ever from the beginning, by all might, counsel, and ways possible to strive against the ways of God, and to overthrow that which he will have set up. And although the world may see by infinite histories and examples, that it is but in vain to strive against him; yet such is the nature of this world (all set in malignity) that it will not cease still to be like itself.

After this was issued the terrible constitution of the archbishop of Canterbury against the followers of God's truth, full of cruelty and persecution unto blood, but which is too long for insertion here.

Who would have thought by these laws and constitutions, but that the name and memory of this persecuted sort should utterly have been rooted up, and never could have stood? And yet such be the works of the Lord, passing all men's admiration, that notwithstanding all this, so far was the number and courage of these good men from being vanquished, that rather they multiplied daily and increased. For so I find in registers recorded, that these foresaid persons, whom the king and the catholic fathers did so greatly detest for heretics, were in divers counties of this realm increased, especially at London, in Lincolnshire, in Norfolk, in Herefordshire, in Shrewsbury, in Calais, and other quarters. However there were some that did shrink, many did revolt and renounce, for danger of the law. Among whom was John Purvey, who recanted at Paul's Cross, of whom more follows (the Lord willing) to be said in the year 1421. Also John Edward, priest of the diocese of Lincoln, who revoked in the Greenyard at Norwich; Richard Herbert, and Emmot Willy, of London; also John Becket, who recanted at London; John Seymons, of Lincolnshire, who was caused to revoke at Canterbury.

WILLIAM THORPE.

Thus much being signified briefly, touching those who have been forced in the time of this king, to open abjuration. Next comes the history of Master William Thorpe, a valiant warrior, under the triumphant banner of Christ, with the process of his examinations before Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, written by Thorpe, and recorded by his own pen, at the request of his friends. In his examination (A.D. 1407) thou shalt have, good reader, both to learn and to marvel. To learn, in that thou shalt hear truth discoursed and discussed, with the contrary reasons of the adversary dissolved. To marvel, for thou shalt behold here in this man the marvellous force and strength of the Lord's might, spirit, and grace, working and fighting in his soldiers, and also speaking in their mouths, according to the word of his promise. Master Thorpe, in his preface to the account of his examination, says, that he was moved to write it, not only by the desire of his friends, but also that other christian people might profit by seeing truth opposed to error, and that they might be prepared to forsake all the things of this life, not knowing how soon they may be called to a like trial.

The Examination of William Thorpe, penned with his own hand.

"Be it known to all men, that read or hear this writing, that on the Sunday next after the feast of St. Peter, that we call Lammas (A. D. 1407), I, William Thorpe, being in prison in the castle of Saltwood, was brought before Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, and chancellor then of England. And when I came to him he stood in a great chamber, and many people about him; and when he saw me he went into a closet, bidding all secular men that followed him to leave him soon, so that no man was left in that closet but the archbishop himself, and a physician that was called Masveren, parson of St. Dunstan's in London, and two other persons unknown to me, who were ministers of the law. By and by the archbishop said to me, 'William, I know well that thou hast this twenty winters or more travelled in the north country, and in divers other countries of England, sowing false doctrine, labouring with untrue teaching to infect and poison all this land. But through the grace of God thou art now withstood and brought into my ward, so that I shall now sequester thee from thine evil purpose, and prevent thee from poisoning the sheep of my province. Nevertheless, St. Paul saith, If it may be, as much as in us lies, we ought to live peaceably with all men. Therefore, William, if thou wilt now meekly and of good heart without any feigning, kneel down and lay thy hand upon a book and kiss it, promising faithfully as I shall here charge thee, that thou wilt submit thee to my correction, and stand to mine ordinance, and fulfil it duly by all thy skill and power, thou shalt yet find me gracious to thee.' Then said I to the archbishop, 'Sir, since ye deem me an heretic, and out of the faith, will you give me here audience to tell you my belief?' And he said, 'Yea, tell on.' And I said, 'I believe that there is but one God Almighty, and in this Godhead, and of this Godhead are three Persons, that is, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. And I believe that all these three Persons are equal in power and in knowledge, and in might, full of grace of all goodness. For whatsoever that the Father doth, or can, or will do, that thing also the Son doth, and can, and will do; and in all their power, knowledge, and will, the Holy Ghost is equal to the Father, and to the Son.

"Besides this, I believe, that through the counsel of this most blessed Trinity, in the time before appointed for the salvation of mankind, the second person of this Trinity was ordained to take the form of man, that is, the nature of man. And I believe, that this second person, our Lord Jesus Christ, was miraculously conceived through the Holy Ghost in the womb of the blessed Virgin Mary. And I believe that in due time Christ was born of this most blessed virgin.

"And I believe, that Christ our Saviour was circumcised in the eighth day after his birth, in fulfilling of the law, and his name was called Jesus, which was so called of the angel, before that he was conceived in the womb of Mary his mother.

"And I believe that Christ, as he was about thirty years old, was baptized in the Jordan by John the baptist; and the Holy Ghost descended like a dove upon him, and a voice was heard from heaven, saying, 'Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.'

"And I believe that Christ was moved then by the Holy Ghost to go into the desert, and there he fasted forty days and forty nights without bodily meat and drink. And I believe that by and by after this fasting, when the manhood of God hungered, the devil came to him, and tempted him in gluttony, in vain glory, and in coveting; but in all those temptations Christ confuted the devil, and withstood him. And then without tarrying Jesus began to preach, and to say to the people, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'

"I believe that Christ lived here most holily, and taught the will of his Father most truly. And I believe that he suffered most wrongfully the greatest reproofs and despisings.

"And after this, when Christ would make an end here of this temporal life, I believe that in the day next before he was to suffer passion, he ordained the sacrament of his flesh and his blood in form of bread and of wine; that is, his own precious body, and gave it to his apostles to eat; commanding them, and by them all their after-comers, that they should do it in this form that he shewed to them, use themselves, and teach and administer to other men and women this most worshipful and holiest sacrament, in remembrance of his holiest living, and of his most true preaching, and of his willing and patient suffering of the most painful passion.

"And I believe that this Christ our Saviour, after that he had ordained this most worthy sacrament of his own precious body, went forth willingly against his enemies, and he suffered them most patiently to lay their hands most violently upon him, and to bind him, and to lead him forth as a thief, and to scorn him and buffet him, and to defile him with their spittings. Besides this, I believe that Christ suffered most meekly and patiently his enemies to extract with sharp scourges the blood that was between his skin and his flesh; yea, without resisting, Christ suffered the cruel Jews to crown him with sharp thorns, and to strike him with a reed. And after, Christ suffered wicked Jews to draw him out upon the cross, and to nail him thereupon; and so Christ shed out willingly for man's blood the blood that was in the veins. And then Christ gave willingly his spirit into the hands or power of his Father, and so, as he would, and when he would, Christ died willingly for man's sake upon the cross. And notwithstanding that Christ was wilfully, painfully, and most shamefully put to death, as to the world, there was left blood and water in his heart, as before ordained, that he would shed out this blood and this water for man's salvation; and therefore he suffered the Jews to make a blind knight to thrust him in the heart with a spear, and this blood and water that was in his heart, Christ would shed out for man's love. And after this, I believe that Christ was taken down from the cross and buried. And I believe that on the third day by the power of his Godhead Christ rose again from death to life. And the fortieth day thereafter, I believe that Christ ascended up into heaven, and that he there sitteth on the right hand of the Father Almighty. And the fiftieth day after his ascension he sent to his apostles the Holy Ghost, that he had promised them before; and I believe that Christ shall come and judge all mankind, some to everlasting peace, and some to everlasting pains.

"And as I believe in the Father, and in the Son, that they are one God Almighty, so I believe in the Holy Ghost that he is also with them the same God Almighty.

"And I believe an holy church, that is, all they that have been, and that now are, and always to the end of the world shall be, a people who shall endeavour to know and to keep the commandments of God, dreading over all things to offend God, and loving and seeking to please him; and I believe, that all they that have had, and yet have, and all they that yet shall have the afore-said virtues, surely standing in the belief of God, hoping steadfastly in his merciful doings, continuing to their end in perfect charity, willingly, patiently, and gladly suffering persecutions, by the example of Christ chiefly, and his apostles, all these have their names written in the book of life.

"Therefore I believe, that the gathering together of this people, living now here in this life, is the holy church of God, fighting here on earth against the devil, the prosperity of the world, and their own lusts. Wherefore, seeing that all the gathering together of this church, and every part thereof, neither covets, nor wills, nor loves, nor seeks any thing but to eschew the offence of God, and to do his pleasing will; meekly, gladly, and willingly, with all mine heart, I submit myself unto this holy church of Christ, to be ever ready and obedient to the ordinance of it, and of every member thereof, after my knowledge and power by the help of God. Therefore I acknowledge now, and evermore shall, if God will, that with all my heart, and with all my might, I will submit me only to the rule and governance of them, whom after my knowledge I may perceive to be members of the holy church. Wherefore these articles of belief and all other (both of the old law, and of the new, which after the commandment of God any man ought to believe) I believe verily in my soul, as a sinful deadly wretch, of my knowledge and power, ought to believe: praying the Lord God for his holy name to increase my belief, and to help my unbelief.

"And because to the praising of God's name, I desire above all things to be a faithful member of holy church,

I make this protestation before you all four that are now here present, desiring that all men and women who are now absent knew the same: that is, whatsoever before this time I have said or done, or whatever I shall do or say at any time hereafter, I believe, that all the old law, and new law, given and ordained by the council of the three persons of the Trinity, were given and written for the salvation of mankind. And I believe, that these laws are sufficient for man's salvation. And I believe every article of these laws, to the intent that these articles ordained and commanded by these three persons of the most blessed Trinity are to be believed.

"And therefore to the rule and the ordinance of these laws of God, meekly, gladly, and willingly, I submit me with all mine heart; that whoever can or will by authority of God's law, or by open reason, tell me that I have erred or now err, or in any time hereafter shall err in any article of belief (from which misfortune God keep me by his goodness) I submit to be reconciled, and to be ready and obedient to those laws of God, and to every article of them. For by authority specially of these laws I will, through the grace of God, be united charitably to these laws. Yea, sir, and besides this; I believe and admit all the sentences, authorities and reasons of the saints and doctors according to the holy scripture, and declaring it truly.

"I submit me willingly and meekly to be ever obedient, after my knowledge and power, to all these saints and doctors, as they are obedient in work and in word to God and to his law, and further not (to my knowledge) for any earthly power, dignity or state, through the help of God. But sir, I pray you tell me, if after your bidding I shall lay my hand upon the book, is it to the intent to swear thereby?" And the archbishop said to me, 'Yea wherefore else?' And I said to him: 'Sir, a book is nothing else but a thing coupled together of divers creatures, and to swear by any creature, both God's law and man's law is against it.

"But sir, this thing I say here to you before these your clerks, with my protestation, that how, where, when, and to whom men are bound to swear or to obey in any wise after God's law, and saints, and true doctors, according with God's law; I will through God's grace be ever ready thereto, with all my skill and power. But I pray you sir, for the charity of God, that ye will before I swear, tell me how or to whom I shall submit me: and shew me that whereof ye will correct me, and what is the ordinance that ye will thus oblige me to fulfil.'

"And the archbishop said to me: 'I require that thou swear to me, that thou wilt forsake all the opinions which the sect of Lollards hold; so that, neither privily nor openly, wilt thou hold any opinion which I shall rehearse to thee. And that thou wilt not favour any man or woman, young or old, that holds these opinions; but after thy knowledge and power thou shalt exert thyself to withstand all such disturbers of holy church in every diocese that thou comest into, and them that will not leave their false and damnable opinions, thou wilt put them up, publishing them and their names, and make them known to the bishop of the diocese, or to the bishop's ministers. And besides this I will that thou preach no more until I know by good witness and true, that thy conversation be such, that thy heart and thy mouth accord truly in one, contradicting all the secular learning that thou hast taught here before.'

"And I hearing these words, thought in my heart that this was an unlawful demand; and I deemed myself accursed of God, if I consented to it. And because I stood still and spake not, the archbishop said to me: 'Answer one way or the other;' and I said, 'Sir, if I consented to swear to you thus as ye require, I should become an appealer, or every bishop's spy in all England. For if I should thus put up and publish the names of men and women, I should herein deceive many persons: yea, sir, by the doom of my conscience, I should be the cause of the death both of men and women, yea, both bodily and spiritually. But I find in no place in holy scripture, that this office of common informer and spy with which ye would now infeof me, accords to any priest of Christ's sect, nor to any other christian man: if I should do as you require, full many men and women would (as they might full truly) say that I had falsely and cowardly forsaken the truth, and slandered shamefully the word of God. For if I consented to your will for any fear of man, or of worldly consideration, I deem in my conscience, that I were worthy to be cursed of God and also of all his saints; from which misfortune keep me and all christian people, Almighty God, now and forever for his holy name.' And then the archbishop said to me: 'Oh, thine heart is full hardened, as was the heart of Pharaoh, and the devil hath overcome thee, and perverted thee, and he hath so blinded thee, that thou hast no grace to know the truth, nor the measure of mercy that I have offered to thee. Therefore, as I perceive now by thy foolish answer, thou hast no will to leave thine old errors. But I say to thee, either quickly consent to mine ordinance, and submit to my decrees, or by St. Thomas thou shalt be degraded, and follow thy companion to Smithfield.' And at this saying I stood still and spake not, but I thought in mine heart, that God did to me great grace, if he would of his great mercy bring me to such an end. And in mine heart I was nothing afraid with this menacing of the archbishop. And I considered two things in him. One, that he was not yet sorrowful that he had caused William Sautre wrongfully to be burnt; and as I considered that the archbishop thirsted yet after more shedding of innocent blood, I was moved in my mind, to hold him neither for prelate nor for priest of God: and because mine inward man was thus altogether departed from the archbishop, methought I should not have any dread of him. But I was right heavy and sorrowful, because there were no secular men present to hear: but in my heart I prayed the Lord God to comfort me and strengthen me: I prayed God for his goodness to give me then and always grace to speak with a meek and a quiet spirit: and whatever I should speak, that I might have true authorities of the scriptures or open reason for it. As I stood thus still and spake nothing, one of the archbishop's clerks said to me, 'What thing musest thou? Do as my lord hath commanded thee.'

"And yet I stood still and answered him not; and then soon after the archbishop said to me, 'Art thou not yet determined whether thou wilt do as I have said to thee?' And I said then to him, 'Sir, my father and my mother spent much money about my learning, to have made me a priest to God. But when I came to years of discretion, I had no will to be priest, and therefore my friends were very harsh towards me, and then methought their grudging against me was so painful, that I purposed to have left their company. They spake to me oftentimes very grievous words, and menaced me in divers manners. And thus they were a long time busy about me, ere I consented to be a priest. At last, I prayed them that they would give me licence to go to wise priests, and of virtuous conversation, to have their counsel, and to know of them the office and charge of priesthood. My father and my mother consented gladly, and gave me their blessing and leave, and also money to spend in this journey. And so I went to those priests whom I heard to be of best name, and of most holy living, and best learned, and most wise of heavenly wisdom; and so I communed with them to the time that I perceived by their virtuous and continual occupations, that their honest and charitable works passed their fame which I had heard before of them.'

"And the archbishop said, 'I say to thee, who are these holy and wise men, of whom thou hast taken thine information?'

"And I said, sir, Master John Wickliff was held by many men the greatest clerk that they knew then living, and he was named an able, a good, and an innocent man in his living; and therefore great men communed often with him, and they loved so his learning, that they wrote it, and endeavoured to rule themselves after it. Therefore, sir, this learning of Master John Wickliff is yet held by many men and women, the learning most in accordance with the living and teaching of Christ and his apostles, and most openly shewing and declaring how the church of Christ has been and yet should be ruled and governed. Therefore it is that so many men and women desire his learning, and purpose through God's grace to conform their lives like to this learning of Wickliff. Master John Asbton taught and writ accordingly, and full zealously, where, and when, and to whom he might, and he used it himself right perfectly to his life's end. And also Philip of Rampington, while he was a canon of Leicester, Nicholas Herford, Davey Gotray of Pakring, monk of Byland, and a master of divinity, and John Purvey, and many others who were held right wise men and prudent, taught and writ busily this learning, and conformed to it. And with all these men I was very familiar, and communed with them long time and often, and before all other men I chose willingly to be informed of them and by them, and especially of Wickliff himself, as of the most virtuous and godly wise man that I ever heard of or knew. And therefore of him especially, and of these men I took the learning that I have taught; and purpose to live thereafter (if God will) to my life's end."

"And the archbishop said, 'That learning, that thou callest truth and soothfastness, is open slander to holy church, as is proved by holy church. For although Wickliff was a great clerk, and though many held him to be a perfect liver; yet his doctrine is not approved of holy church, but many sentences of his learning are damned as they well deserve. But as to Philip of Rampington, he neither holds now, nor will hold what he then taught, when he was a canon of Leicester. For no bishop in this land pursues now more sharply those that hold those doctrines than he.'

"And I said, 'Sir, many men and women wonder at him, and speak of him much to his shame, and hold him as a cursed enemy of the truth.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'Wherefore dost thou delay me with such fables, wilt thou submit thee to me or no?'

"And I said; 'Sir, I tell you at one word; I dare not for fear of God submit me to you, according to the sentence ye have read to me.'

"And thus as if he had been wroth, he said to one of his clerks; 'Fetch hither quickly the certificate that came to me from Shrewsbury under the bailiff's seal witnessing the errors and heresies, which this fellow has venomously sown there.'

"Then the clerk hastily took out, and laid forth on a table, some rolls and writings, among which there was a little one, which the clerk delivered to the archbishop. And by and by the archbishop read this roll containing this sentence:

"The third Sunday after Easter, the year of our Lord 1407, William Thorpe came unto the town of Shrewsbury, and through leave granted unto him to preach, he said openly in St. Chad's church, in his sermon, that the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, was material bread. And that images should in nowise be worshipped. And that men should not go on pilgrimages. And that priests have no title to tithes. And that it is not lawful to swear in any wise."

"And when the archbishop had read thus this roll, he rolled it up again, and said to me; 'Is this wholesome teaching to be among the people?'

"And said; 'Sir, I am both ashamed on their behalf, and sorrowful for them that have certified you these things thus untruly; for I never preached, nor taught thus privily or openly.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'I will give credence to these worshipful men who have written to me, and witnessed under their seals among them. Though now thou deniest this, thinkest thou that I will give credence to thee? Thou hast troubled the worshipful commonalty of Shrewsbury, so that the bailiffs and commonalty of that town have written to me, praying me that am archbishop of Canterbury, primate and chancellor of England, that I will vouchsafe to grant them, that if thou shalt be made (as thou art worthy) to suffer for thine heresies, that thou may suffer openly there among them; so that all they whom thou and such others have there perverted, may through fear of thy deed be reconciled again to the unity of holy church. And also they that stand in true faith of holy church, may be more established therein.'

"But certainly neither the prayer of the men of Shrewsbury, nor the menacing of the archbishop made me afraid, but my heart greatly rejoiced. I thank God for the grace that I then thought, and yet think shall come to all the church of God in this matter, by the special mercy of the Lord. And as having no dread of the malice of tyrants, by trusting steadfastly in the help of the Lord. I said to the archbishop,—'Sir, if the truth of God's word might now be accepted as it should be, I doubt not to prove by likely evidence, that they that are feigned to be out of the faith of holy church in Shrewsbury, and in other places also, are in the true faith of holy church. For as their words sound, and their works shew to man's judgment (dreading and loving faithfully God) their desire, their will, their love, and their business, are most set to dread to offend God, and to love, and please him in true and faithful keeping of his commandments. And again, they that are said to be in the faith of holy church in Shrewsbury and in other places, by open evidence of their proud, envious, malicious, covetous, and other foul words and works, neither know, nor have will to know, truly and effectually the right faith of holy church.'

"And where, sir, ye say that I have troubled the commonalty of Shrewsbury, and many other men and women with my teaching: if it thus be, it is not to be wondered at, since all the commonalty of the city of Jerusalem was troubled by Christ's own person, that was very God and man, and the most prudent preacher that ever was or shall be. And also all the synagogue of Nazareth was moved against Christ, and so filled with ire towards him for his preaching, that the men of the synagogue rose up and cast Christ out of their city, and led him up to the top of a mountain to cast him down headlong."

"And the archbishop said to me, 'It followeth of these thy words, that thou and such other thinkest, that ye do right well to preach and teach as ye do, without authority of any bishop. For you presume that the Lord hath chosen you only to preach, as faithful disciples and special followers of Christ.'

"And I said, 'Sir, by authority of God's law, and also of saints and doctors I am learned to deem, that it is every priest's office and duty to preach busily, freely, and truly the word of God.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'Fellow, why makest thou such vain reasons to me? Asks not St. Paul, How should priests preach except they be sent? But I never sent thee to preach. For thy venomous doctrine is known throughout England, that no bishop will admit thee to preach. Why then wilt thou presume to preach, since thou art not sent, nor licensed of thy superior to preach? St. Paul saith, that subjects ought to obey their sovereigns, and not only good and virtuous, but also tyrants that are vicious.'

"And I said, 'Samuel the prophet said to Saul, the wicked king, that God was more pleased with the obedience of his commandments, than with any sacrifice of beasts. But David saith, and St. Paul, and St. Gregory say together, that not only they that do evil, are worthy of death and damnation, but also they that consent to evil doers. And, sir, the law of the holy church teaches in the decree, that no servant to his lord, nor child to the father or mother, nor wife to her husband, nor monk to his abbot ought to obey, except in lawful things.'

"And the archbishop said to the three clerks that stood before him, 'Sirs, this is the business of this fellow, and such others, to pick out such sharp sentences of holy scripture and doctors, to maintain their sect, against the ordinance of holy church. And therefore, it is that thou wishest to have again the psalter that I had taken from thee at Canterbury, to recite sharp verses against us. But thou shalt never have that psalter, nor any other book, till I know that thy heart and thy mouth agree fully to be governed by holy church.'

"And I said, 'Sir, all my will and power is, and ever shall be (I trust to God) to be governed by holy church.'

"And the archbishop asked me, 'What was holy church?'

"And I said, 'Sir, I told you before what was holy church. But since ye ask me this question again, I call Christ and his saints, holy church.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'I know well that Christ and his saints are holy church in heaven, but what is holy church in earth?'

"And I said, 'Sir, holy church has two parts. The first and principal part has overcome perfectly all the wretchedness of this life, and reigns joyfully in heaven with Christ. And the other part is here yet in earth, busily and continually fighting day and night against the temptations of the devil; forsaking and hating the prosperity of this world, despising and withstanding their fleshly lusts, who only are the pilgrims of Christ, wandering towards heaven by steadfast faith, and grounded hope, and by perfect charity. For these heavenly pilgrims may not, nor will not be hindered of their good purpose by reason of any doctors disagreeing from holy scripture, nor by the floods of any temporal tribulation, nor by the wind of any pride, of boast, or of menacing of any creature: for they are all fast grounded upon the sure rock, Christ, hearing his word, and loving it, exercising them faithfully and continually in all their wits to do thereafter.'

"And the archbishop said to his clerks, 'See ye not how his heart is hardened, and how he has travelled with the devil, bringing in such sentences to maintain his errors and heresies. Certainly, he will occupy us here all day, if we suffer him.'

"One of the clerks answered, 'Sir, he said just now, that this certificate that came to you from Shrewsbury, is untruly forged against him. Therefore, sir, question him now in the points which are certified against him, and we shall hear his answers of his own mouth, and witness them.'

"And the archbishop took the certificate in his hand, and looked thereon a while, and then he said to me:

"Lo, here it is certified by worthy and faithful men of Shrewsbury, that thou didst preach there openly, that the sacrament of the altar was material bread after the consecration; what sayest thou? Was this truly preached?'

"And I said, 'Sir, I tell you truly that I touched nothing there of the sacrament of the altar, but in this wise as I will, with God's grace, tell you here. As I stood there in the pulpit, busying me to teach the commandment of God, a sacred bell began ringing, and therefore many people turned away hastily, and with noise ran towards it; and I seeing this, said to them thus, 'Good men, ye were better to stand here still, and to hear God's word. For the virtue of the most holy sacrament of the altar stands much more in the faith that you ought to have in your soul, than in the outward sight of it, and therefore ye were better to stand still quietly to hear God's word, because that through the hearing of it, men come to true belief. And I am certain I spake not more than this of the worthy sacrament of the altar.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'I believe thee not whatsoever thou sayest, since so worshipful men have witnessed thus against thee. But since thou deniest what thou saidst thus, what sayest thou now? After the consecration, does there remain in the host, material bread or no?'

"And I said, 'Sir, I know in no place in holy scripture, where this term material bread is written: and therefore sir, when I speak of this matter, I use not to speak of material bread.'

"Then the archbishop said to me, 'How teachest thou men to believe in this sacrament?'

"And I said, 'Sir, as I believe myself, so I teach other men.'

"He said, 'Tell out plainly thy belief thereof.'

"And I said with my protestation, 'Sir, I believe that the night before Christ Jesus suffered for mankind, he took bread in his holy hands, lifting up his eyes, and giving thanks to God his Father, blessed this bread, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying to them, take and eat of this all you, this is my body. And that this is, and ought to be, all men's belief, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Paul witness. Other belief, sir, I have none, nor will have, nor teach: for I believe that this is sufficient in this matter. For in this belief, with God's grace, I purpose to live and die, knowing as I believe and teach other men to believe, that the holy sacrament of the altar is the sacrament of Christ's flesh and blood in the form of bread and wine.'

"And I said, 'Sir, by clear evidence, a thousand years after the incarnation of Christ, the determination, which I have here before you rehearsed, was accepted of holy church as sufficient to the salvation of all them that would believe it faithfully.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'Well, well, thou shalt say otherwise before that I leave thee. But what say you to this second point that is recorded against thee by worthy men of Shrewsbury, saying, that thou preachedst there, that images ought not to be worshipped in anywise?'

"And I said, 'Sir, I preached never thus, nor through God's grace will I at any time consent to think, or to say thus. For lo, the Lord witnesseth by Moses, that the things which he had made were very good; and so they were, and are and shall be good and worshipful in their kind, and therefore to the end for which God made them, they are all praiseworthy and worshipful, and especially man, who was made after the image and likeness of God, is worshipful in his kind. And also I say, wood, tin, gold, silver, or any other matter that images are made of, are worshipful in their kind, and to the end that God made them for. But the carving, casting, and painting of an imagery ought not to be worshipped in form, nor in the likeness of man's craft.'

"Then the archbishop said to me, 'I grant that no body ought to worship any images for themselves; but a crucifix ought to be worshipped for the passion of Christ that is painted therein, and thus the images of the blessed Trinity, and of the Virgin Mary, Christ's Mother, and other images of saints ought to be worshipped. For as earthly kings and lords who send their letters sealed with their arms, or with their private signet to those that are with them, are worshipped by these men. For when these men receive their lord's letters, in which they see and know the wills of the lords, they doff their caps to these letters. Why not then, since in images made with man's hands, we may read and know many things of God, and of his saints, shall we not worship their images?'

"And I said 'That these worldly usages of temporal laws that ye speak now of, may be done without sin. But this is no similitude to worship images, made by man's hand, since Moses, David, Solomon, Baruch, and other saints in the bible forbid so plainly the worshipping of such images.'

"Then the archbishop said to me, 'In the old law before Christ took human nature, there was no likeness of any person of the Trinity; but now since Christ became man, it is lawful to have images to shew his manhood, yes, though many men held it an error to paint the Trinity; I say, it is well done to make and to paint the Trinity in images. For it is a great moving of devotion to men, to have and behold the Trinity and other images of saints carved, cast, and painted. For beyond the sea are the best painters that ever I saw. And sir, I tell you, this is their manner, and it is a good manner: when an image-maker shall carve, cast in mould, or paint any images, he shall go to a priest, and confess himself as clean, as if he should then die; and take penance, and make some certain vow of fasting or of praying, or of pilgrimages, praying the priest specially to pray for him, that he may have grace to make a fair and devout image.'

"And I said, 'Sir, I doubt not if these painters that ye speak of, or any other painters, understood truly the text of Moses, of David, of the Wise Man, of Baruch, and of other saints and doctors, these painters should be moved to confess to God with inward sorrow of heart, taking upon them penance for the sinful and vain craft of painting, carving, or casting; promising God faithfully never to do so again.

"Then the archbishop said unto me, 'I hold thee a vicious priest and accursed, and all they sect; for all priests of holy church, and all images that move men to devotion, thou and such others go about to destroy. Would it be a right thing to come into the church, and see no image in it?'

"And I said, 'Sir, they that come to the church, to pray devoutly to the Lord God, may in their inward parts be the more fervent, that all their outward senses be closed from all outward seeing and hearing, and from all disturbance and lettings. And since Christ blessed them that saw him not bodily, and have believed faithfully in him; it is sufficient to all men to believe in God, though they never see images made with man's hand after any person of the Trinity, or of any other saint.'

"And the archbishop said to me with a fervent spirit, 'I say to thee, that it is right well done to make and to have an image of the Trinity; yea, what sayest thou? Is it not a stirring thing to behold such an image?'

"And I said, 'Sir, ye said just now that in the old law, before Christ took mankind, no likeness of any person of the Trinity was shewed to men: wherefore, sir, ye said it was not then lawful to have images, but now ye say, since Christ is become man, it is lawful to have an image of the Trinity, and also of other saints. But sir, this would I learn of you: since the Father of heaven, yea and every person of Trinity was without beginning, God Almighty; and many holy prophets, were martyred violently in the old law, and also many men and women then died confessors; why was it not then as lawful and necessary as now, to have an image of the Father of heaven, and to have other images of martyrs, prophets, and holy confessors, to move men to devotion, as ye say that images now do?'

"And the archbishop said, 'The synagogue of the Jews had not authority to do those things as the church of Christ has now.'

"And I said, 'Sir, St. Gregory was a great man, and of great dignity, and he commended greatly a bishop, and he forbade utterly the images made with man's hand to be worshipped.'

"And the archbishop said, 'Ungracious fellow, thou savourest no more truth than an hound. Since at the rood at the north door at London, at our lady at Walsingham, and many other places in England, are many great and admirable miracles done; should not the images of such holy saints and places, to the reverence of God, and of our lady, and other saints, be more worshipped than other places and images, where no miracles are done?'

"And I said, 'Sir, there is no such virtue in any imagery, that any image should be worshipped; wherefore I am certain that there is no miracle done of God in any place in earth, in order that any images made with man's hand should be worshipped. And therefore, sir, as I preached openly at Shrewsbury and other places, I say now here before you, that nobody should trust that there is any virtue in images made with man's hand; and therefore nobody should vow to them, nor seek them, nor kneel to them, nor bow to them, nor pray to them, nor offer any thing to them, nor kiss them, nor offer incense to them. For even the most worthy of such images, the brazen serpent (by Moses made, at God's bidding) the good King Hezekiah destroyed worthily and thankfully, and all because it was worshipped. Therefore sir, if men take good heed to the writing and the learning of St. Augustine, of St. Gregory, and of St. John Chrysostome, and of other saints and doctors, how they spake and wrote of miracles, that shall now be done in the latest end of the world: it is to be feared that for the unfaithfulness of men and women, the devil hath great power to work many of the miracles that now are done in such places. For both men and women delight now more to hear and know miracles, than they do to know God's word, or to hear it effectually.'

"And the archbishop said, 'As holy church hath suffered the images of the Trinity, and all other images to be painted and shewed; it is enough to them that are members of holy church. But since thou art a rotten member, cut away from holy church, thou savourest not the ordinance thereof. But since the day passes, we leave this matter.'

"And then he said to me, 'What sayest thou to the third point that is certified against thee, preaching openly in Shrewsbury, that pilgrimage is not lawful? And over this thou saidst that those men and women that go on pilgrimages to Canterbury, to Beverley, to Karlington, to Walsingham, and to any other such places, are accursed and made foolish, spending their goods for nothing.'

"And I said, 'Sir, I am accused to you that I taught that no pilgrimage is lawful. But I never said thus. For I know that there are true pilgrimages and lawful, and acceptable to God: and therefore, sir, however mine enemies have certified you of me, I told at Shrewsbury of two manner of pilgrimages.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'Whom callest thou true pilgrims?'

"And I said, 'Sir, with my protestation I call them true pilgrims travelling toward the bliss of heaven, who in the state, degree, or order that God calls them to, do busy them faithfully to occupy all their mind bodily and spiritually, to know truly, and to keep faithfully the biddings of God, hating and fleeing all the seven deadly sins, and every branch of them; ruling themselves virtuously, doing discreetly, willingly, and gladly, all the works of mercy, seeking the gifts of the Holy Ghost, disposing themselves to receive them in their souls and to hold the right blessings of Christ. And then they shall be moved with the good Spirit of God, to examine their conscience often and diligently, that neither wilfully nor wittingly they err in any article of belief, having continually (as frailty will suffer) all their business, to dread and to fly the offence of God, to love him over all, and to seek ever to do his pleasant will. Of these pilgrimages I said, whatever good thought they at any time think, whatever virtuous word they speak, and whatever fruitful work they accomplish; every such thought, word, and work is a step numbered of God toward him into heaven. These pilgrims of God delight when they hear of saints or of virtuous men and women, how they willingly forsook the prosperity of this life, how they withstood the suggestion of the devil, how they restrained their fleshly lusts, how discreet they were in their penance doing, how patient they were in all their adversities, how prudent they were in counselling men and women, moving them to hate all sins, and to fly them, and to love all virtues, and to draw to them, imagining how Christ, and his followers by this example, suffered scorns and slanders, and how patiently they took the wrongful menacing of tyrants: how homely they were, and serviceable to poor men to relieve and comfort them bodily and spiritually, and how devout they were in prayers, how fervent they were in heavenly desires, and how they absented themselves from spectacles of vain sayings and hearings, and how constant they were to prevent and destroy all vices, and how laborious and joyful they were to sow and to plant virtues? These heavenly conditions, true pilgrims have, or endeavour to have, whose pilgrimage God accepteth.'

"And again I said, 'As their works shew, the most part of men and women, that now go on pilgrimages, have not these conditions, nor love to have them. For as I well know, since I have full often tried, examine whoever will, twenty of these pilgrims, and he shall not find three men or women that know surely a commandment of God, nor can say their Paternoster and Ave Maria, nor their creed readily in any manner of language. And as I have learned and also know somewhat by experience of these same pilgrims, telling the cause why many men and women go hither and thither now on pilgrimage, it is more for the health of their bodies, than of their souls: more to have riches and prosperity of this world, than to be enriched with virtues in their souls: more to have here worldly and fleshly friendship, than to have friendship of God and of his saints in heaven; for whatsoever thing man or woman does, the friendship of God, or of any other saint, cannot be had, without keeping of God's commandments. Further with my protestation, I say now, as I said in Shrewsbury, though they that have fleshly wills, travel far their bodies, and spend much money, to seek and to visit the bones or images (as they say they do) of this saint or of that; such pilgrimage going is neither praiseworthy nor thankful to God nor to any saint of God, since in effect all such pilgrims despise God and all his commandments and saints. For the commandments of God they will neither know, nor keep, nor conform them to the example of Christ and of his saints. Wherefore, sir, I have preached and taught openly, and so I purpose all my life time to do with God's help, saying, that such fond people waste blamefully God's goods in their vain pilgrimages. Also, sir, I know that when several men and women go thus after their own wills, and fixing on the same pilgrimage; they will arrange beforehand to have with them both men and women that can sing wanton songs, and other pilgrims will have with them bagpipes: so that every town that they come through, what with the noise of their singing, and with the sound of their piping, and with the tangling of their Canterbury bells, and with the barking of dogs after them, they make more noise than if the king came there with all his clarions and minstrels.

"And the archbishop said to me, 'Thou seest not far enough in this matter, for thou considerest not the great labour of pilgrims, therefore thou blamest a thing that is praiseworthy. I say, that it is right well done, that pilgrims have with them both singers and also pipers; that when one of them that goes barefoot strikes his toe upon a stone, and hurts himself sorely, and makes him to bleed, it is well done that he or his fellow begin then a song, or else take out of his bosom a bagpipe, to drive away with such mirth the hurt of his fellow. For with such solace the labour and weariness of pilgrims is lightly and merrily borne out.'

"And I said, 'Sir, St. Paul teaches men to weep with them that weep.'

"And the archbishop said, 'What janglest thou against men's devotion? Whatever thou or such other say, I say that the pilgrimage that now is used, is to them that do it a praiseworthy and a good mean to come to grace.'

"And (as if he had been displeased with my answer) he said to his clerks, 'What think ye that this idiot will speak there, where he has no dread; since he speaks thus here in my presence? Well, well, by God thou shalt be ordained for.' And then he spake to me angrily.

"Then the archbishop said, 'Well, well. By God, the king doth not his duty, unless he suffer thee to be condemned.'

"And then another clerk said to me, 'Why counsellest thou a man of my lord's, that he should not confess himself to man, but only to God?'

"And with this question I was abashed; and then I knew that I was betrayed by a man that came to me in prison, communing with me in this matter of confession. And certainly, by his words I thought that this man came to me of full fervent and charitable will; but now I know he came to tempt me and to accuse me; God forgive him, if such was his will. And with all my heart when I had thought thus, I said to this clerk, 'sir, I pray you that you would fetch this man hither; and all the words, as near as I can, repeat them, which I spake to him in the prison, I will rehearse here before you all, and before him.'

"And the archbishop said then to me, 'They who are now here will repeat them. How saidst thou to him?'

"And I said, 'Sir, that man came and asked me in divers things, and after his asking, I answered him.

And as he shewed to me by his words, how he was sorry of his living in court, and right heavy for his own vicious living, and also for the viciousness of other men, and specially of priests' evil living; and therefore he said to me with a sorrowful heart (as I imagined) that he purposed within a short time to leave the court and to apply himself to know God's law, and to conform all his life after it. And when he had said to me these words and others, which I would rehearse if he were present, he prayed me to hear his confession. And I said to him, sir, wherefore come ye to me, to be confessed of me? Ye know well that the archbishop holds me here, as one unworthy either to give or to take any sacrament of holy church.

"And he said to me, 'Brother, I know well, and so do many others, that you and such others are wrongfully vexed, and therefore I commune with you the more gladly.' And I said to him, certainly I know well, that many men of this court, and specially the priests of this household will be full evil against both you and me, if they were aware that ye were confessed of me. And he said, 'that he cared not, for he had little affection for them.' And as methought, he spake these words and many others, of a good will and of a high desire, to have known and done the pleasant will of God. And I said to him, as I say to you now here, sir, I counsel you to absent you from all evil company, and to draw you to them that love and busy them to know and to keep the precepts of God; and then the good Spirit of God will move you to occupy all your wits in gathering together of all your sins, as far as he can bethink you, shaming greatly of them, and sorrowing heartily for them: yea, sir, the Holy Ghost will then put in your heart a good will and a fervent desire to take and to hold a good purpose, to hate ever and to fly all occasion of sin; and so then wisdom shall come to you from above, lightening (with divers beams of grace and of heavenly desire) all your wits, informing you how ye shall trust steadfastly in the mercy of the Lord, acknowledging to him only all your vicious living, praying to him devoutly for charitable counsel and continuance, hoping without doubt, that if ye continue thus, busying you faithfully to know and to keep his biddings, he will (for he only may) forgive you all your sins. And this man said to me, 'Though God forgive men their sins, yet it behoveth men to be absolved of priests, and to do the penance that they enjoin them.' And I said to him, 'Sir, it is all one to absolve men of their sins, and to forgive men their sins. Wherefore, since it pertains only to God to forgive sin; it suffices to counsel men and women to leave their sin, and to comfort them that do thus, to hope in the mercy of God. And again, priests ought to tell sharply to sinners, that if they will not make an end of their sin, but continue in sins, all such deserve pain without any end. And therefore priests should ever busy themselves to live well and holily, and to teach the people busily and truly the word of God, shewing to all in open preaching, and in privy counselling, 'That the Lord God only forgiveth sin.' And, therefore, those priests that take upon them to absolve men of their sins, blaspheme God; since it pertains only to the Lord to absolve men of all their sins. For, no doubt, for a thousand years after that Christ was man, no priest of Christ durst take upon him to teach the people, either privily or openly, that they must come to be absolved by them as priests now do. But by authority of Christ's word priests used to bind indurate, customary sinners to everlasting pains, who would never have busied themselves faithfully to know the biddings of God, nor to keep them. And sir, accordingly to this sentence, upon Mid-lent Sunday (two years ago) I heard a monk of Feversham, (called Morden,) preach at Canterbury at the cross within Christchurch abbey, saying thus of confession: 'Since the Lord God is more ready to forgive sin than the devil is or may be powerful to move any body to sin, then whoever will shame and sorrow heartily for their sins, knowing them faithfully to God, amending them after their power and cunning, without counsel of any other body than of God and of himself (through the grace of God) all such men and women may find sufficient means to come to God's mercy, and so to be clean absolved of all their sins.' This sentence I said, sir, to this man of yours, and the words as near as I can guess.'

"And the archbishop said, 'Holy church approveth not this learning.'

"And I said, 'Sir, holy church, of which Christ is head in heaven and in earth, must needs approve this sentence. For lo, hereby all men and women may, if they will, be sufficiently taught to know and keep the commandments of God, and to hate and to fly continually all occasion of sin, and to love and to seek virtues zealously, and to believe in God steadfastly; and to trust in his mercy steadfastly, and so to come to perfect love, and continue therein persevering. And more the Lord asketh not of any man in this life. And certainly, since Jesus Christ died upon the cross, to make men free; men of the church are too bold and too ready to make men captives, binding them under the pain of endless curses, to do many observances and ordinances, which neither the living nor teaching of Christ nor of his apostles approve.'

"And a clerk said then to me, 'Thou shewest plainly here thy deceit, which thou hast learned of them that travelled to sow the tares among the wheat. But I counsel thee to go away clean from this learning, and submit thee to my Lord, and thou shalt find him yet to be gracious to thee.'

"Then a clerk said to the archbishop, 'Sir, it is late in the day, and ye have far to ride to-night; therefore make an end with him, for he will make none: but the more, sir, that ye busy you to draw him toward you, the more contumacious he is made.'

"And then Malveren said to me, 'William, kneel down, and pray my lord's grace, and leave all thy fancies, and become a child of holy church.'

"And I said, 'Sir, I have prayed the archbishop often, and yet I pray him for the love of Christ, that he will cease his indignation against me: and that he will suffer me to do mine office of priesthood, as I am charged of God to do it. For I desire nought else but to serve my God to his pleasing in the state that I stand in.'

"And the archbishop said to me, 'If of good heart thou wilt submit thee now here meekly, to be ruled from this time forth by my counsel, obeying meekly and willingly my ordinance, thou shalt find it most profitable and best to thee to do thus. Therefore delay thou me no longer, do this I have said to thee now here shortly, or deny it utterly.'

"And I said, 'Sir, as I have before rehearsed, I will be ready gladly to obey Christ the head of the holy church, and the learnings and biddings, and counsels of every pleasing member of him.'

"Then the archbishop, striking with his hand fiercely upon a table, spake to me with a great spirit, saying, 'By Jesus, but if thou leave not such additions, obliging thyself without any exception to submit to mine ordinance (before I go out of this place) I shall make thee as sure as any thief that is in prison; advise thee now what thou wilt do.' And then as if he had been angered, he went from the table where he stood, to a window.

"And then Malveren and another clerk came nearer me, and spake to me many words pleasantly; and another time they menaced me, and counselled me to submit, or else, they said, I should not escape punishment; for they said I should be degraded, cursed, and burned, and then damned. But now they said, 'Thou mayst eschew all these mischiefs, if thou wilt submit thee willingly and meekly to this worthy prelate, that hath cure of thy soul. And for the pity of Christ bethink thee, how great clerks the bishop of Lincoln, Herford and Purvey were, and yet are. Who also have forsaken and revoked all the learning and opinions that thou and such others hold. Wherefore since each of them is much wiser than thou art, we counsel thee for the best; that by the example of these four clerks, thou follow them, submitting thyself as they did.'

"And I said to the clerks, that thus counselled me to follow these men; 'Sirs, if these men, had forsaken benefices of temporal profit, and of worldly worship, so that they had absented them, and eschewed from all occasions of covetousness and of fleshly lust, and had taken upon them simple living, and wilful poverty; they had given good example to me and to many other, to have followed them. But now, since all these four men have slanderously and shamefully done the contrary, consenting to receive, and to hold temporal benefices, living now more worldly and more fleshly than they did before, conforming them to the manners of this world: I forsake them herein, and in all their doings. For I purpose, with the help of God to flee these men, teaching and counselling whomsoever I may, to flee and to eschew the way that they have chosen. Wherefore sirs, I pray you that you busy not to move me to follow these men in revoking and forsaking the truth.'

"Then the archbishop said to his clerks, 'Busy you no longer about him, for he, and other such as he is, are confederate together, that they will not swear to be obedient, and to submit them to the prelates of holy church. For now since I stood here, his fellow also sent me word that he will not swear, and that this fellow counselled him that he should not swear to me. But blessed be God, he shall not have his purpose of him. For he has forsaken all thy learning, submitting him to be ready and obedient to the ordinance of holy church, and weeps bitterly, and curses thee heartily for the venomous teaching which thou hadst shewed to him.'

"And for thy false counsel to thy fellow thou hast great cause to be right sorry. For a long time thou hast busied thee in perverting whomever thou mightest. Therefore as many deaths thou art worthy of, as thou hast given evil counsels. And therefore, by Jesus, thou shalt go thither, where Nicholas Herford and Thomas Purvey were harboured. And I undertake, ere this day eight days, thou shalt be right glad to do whatever I bid thee. And I shall try, if I can make thee there as sorrowful as thou wast glad at my last going out of England. By St. Thomas, I shall turn thy joy into sorrow.'

"And I said, 'Sir, no body can prove lawfully that I ever joyed at the manner of your going out of this land. But sir, to say the truth, I was joyful when ye were gone; for the bishop of London, in whose prison ye left me, found in me no cause to hold me longer in his prison, but at the request of my friends, he delivered me to them, asking of me no submission.'

"Then the archbishop said to me, 'Why I went out of England is unknown to thee: but be this thing well known to thee, that God has called me again, and brought me into this land, to destroy thee and the false sect that thou art of: as, by God, I shall pursue you so narrowly, that I shall not leave a slip of you in this land.'

"And I said to the archbishop, 'Sir, the holy prophet Jeremiah said to the false prophet, When the word of the prophet shall come to pass, then shall the prophet be known that the Lord hath truly sent him.' Jer. xxviii. 9.

"And the archbishop (as if he had not been pleased with my saying) turned him awayward hither and thither, and said, 'By God, I shall set upon thy shins a pair of pearls, that thou shalt be glad to change thy voice.'

"These and many more words were spoken to me, menacing me and all others of the same sect with punishment and destruction to the utmost.

"And then the archbishop called to him a clerk, and conferred with him; and that clerk went forth, and soon he brought in the constable of Saltwood castle, and the archbishop conferred a good while with him; and then the constable went forth, and then came in divers seculars, and they scorned me on every side, and menaced me greatly, and some counselled the archbishop to burn me by and by, and some other counselled him to drown me in the sea, for it is near hand there.

"And a clerk standing beside me, there kneeled down to the archbishop, praying him, that he would deliver me to him to say matins with him, and he would undertake, that within three days I should not resist anything that were commanded me to do of my prelate.

"And the archbishop said that he would settle for me himself.

"And then came again the constable and spake privily to the archbishop; and the archbishop commanded the constable to lead me forth with him, and he did so. And when we were gone forth we were sent for again. And when I came in again before the archbishop, a clerk bade me kneel down and ask grace, and submit myself, and I should find it for the best.

"And I said then to the archbishop, 'Sir, as I have said to you several times to-day, I will willingly and humbly obey and submit to God and to his law, and to every member of holy church, as far as I can perceive that these members accord with their head Christ, and will teach me, rule me, or chastise me by authority, specially of God's law.'

"And the archbishop said, 'I knew well he would not without such additions submit.'

"And then I was rebuked, scorned, and menaced on every side; and yet after this divers persons cried upon me to kneel down and submit me; but I stood still, and spake no word. And then there was spoken of me, and to me, many words, and I stood and heard them menace, curse, and scorn me, but I said nothing.

"Then awhile after the archbishop said to me, 'Wilt thou not submit thee to the ordinance of holy church?'

"And I said, 'Sir, I will full gladly submit me, as I have showed you before.'

"And then the archbishop bade the constable to have me forth thence in haste.

"And so then I was led forth, and brought into a foul prison, where I never was before. But thanked be God, when all men were gone forth then from me, and had barred fast the prison-door after them, I, by myself, busied me to think on God, and to thank him for his goodness. And I was then greatly comforted, not only because I was then delivered for a time from the sight, from the hearing, from the presence, from the scolding, and from the menacing of mine enemies; but much more I rejoiced in the Lord, because that through his grace he so kept me, both among the flattering and among the menacing of mine adversaries, that without heaviness and anguish of my conscience I passed away from them. For as a tree laid upon another tree, overthwart or crosswise, so was the archbishop and his three clerks always contrary to me, and I to them.

"Now good God for thine holy name, and to the praising of thy most blessed name, make us one together, if it be thy will. And that it may thus be, let all who read or hear this writing, pray heartily to the Lord God, that he for his great goodness, that cannot be with tongue expressed, grant to us, and to all other who in the same wise, and for the cause specially, or for any other cause are separated, may be knit and made one in true faith, in steadfast hope, and in perfect charity. Amen."

What was the end of this good man, and blessed servant of God, William Thorpe, I find as yet specified in no history. It is thought that the archbishop, Thomas Arundel, being so hard an adversary against those men, would not let him go. Much less is it to be supposed, that he would ever retract his sentence and opinion, which he so valiantly maintained before the bishop, neither does it seem that he had any such recanting spirit. Again, neither is it found that he was burned, wherefore it remains most like to be true, that he being committed to some straight prison (according as the archbishop in his examination threatened him), there (as Thorpe himself confesses) was so straightly kept, that either he was secretly made away, or else died by sickness.

The like end also I find to happen to John Ashton, another good follower of Wickliff, who for the same doctrine of the sacrament was condemned by the bishops, and because he would not recant he was committed to perpetual prison, wherein the good man continued till his death. (A.D. 1382.)

JOHN PURVEY.

In the examination of William Thorpe, mention is made of John Purvey, of whom we said something before, promising to treat more particularly afterwards. Of this Purvey, Thomas Walden writes thus:—"John Purvey," saith he, "was the library of Lollards, and glossary upon Wickliff. He said that the worshipping of Abraham was but a salutation; and that this John Purvey, with Herford a doctor of divinity, were grievously tormented and punished in the prison of Saltwood, and at the length recanted at Paul's Cross at London, Thomas Arundel being then archbishop of Canterbury. Afterwards he was again imprisoned under Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1421." Thus much writes Walden. As touching the sacrament of the last supper, the sacrament of penance, the sacrament of orders, the power of the keys, the preaching of the gospel, of marriages, of vows, of possessions, of the punishing and correcting of the clergy, of the laws and decrees of the church, of the state and condition of the pope and the clergy; of all these generally he left several treatises, gravely and exactly written.

The articles which he taught, and afterward was forced to recant at Paul's Cross, were these:

I. That in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, there is not, neither can be any accident without the subject; but there verily remains the same substance, and the very visible and corruptible bread, and likewise the very same wine which before the consecration were set upon the altar to be consecrated by the priest; as when a pagan or infidel is baptized, he is spiritually converted into a member of Christ through grace, and yet remains the very same man which he before was in his proper nature and substance.

II. Auricular confession, or private penance, is a certain whispering, destroying the liberty of the gospel, and newly brought in by the pope and the clergy, to entangle the consciences of men in sin, and to draw their souls into Hell.

III. Every layman being holy and predestinate unto everlasting life, is a true priest before God.

IV. That many prelates and other of the clergy live wickedly, contrary to the doctrine and example of Christ and his apostles. Therefore they who so live, have not the keys either of the kingdom of Heaven, or yet of Hell; neither ought any christian to esteem the incensure any more than as a thing of no force. Yea, although the pope should peradventure, interdict the realm, yet could he not hurt, but rather profit us, forso much as thereby we should be dismissed from the observance of his laws, and from saying service according to the custom of the church.

V. If any man make an oath or vow, to keep perpetual celibacy, or do anything else whereto God has not appointed him, giving him grace to perform his purpose; the same vow or oath is unreasonable and indiscreet, neither can any prelate compel him to keep the same, except he will do contrary to God's ordinance. But he ought to commit him to the governance of the Holy Ghost and of his own conscience; forso much as every man, who will not fulfil his vow or oath, cannot do it for that cause.

VI. Whoever takes upon him the office of priesthood, although he have not the charge of souls committed unto him, according to the custom of the church, not only may, but ought to preach the gospel freely to the people; otherwise he is a thief, excommunicated of God, and of the holy church.

VII. That Pope Innocent III. and six hundred bishops, and a thousand other prelates, with all the rest of the clergy, who together with the pope agreed and determined, that in the sacrament of the altar, after the conversion of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, the accidents of the said bread and wine do remain there without any proper subject of the same; who also ordained, that all christians ought to confess their sins once a year to a proper priest, and to receive the reverend sacrament at Easter, and made certain other laws at the same time: all they, saith he, in so doing, were fools and blockheads, heretics, blasphemers, and seducers of christian people. Wherefore we ought not to believe the determinations of them, or of their successors, neither ought we to obey their laws or ordinances, except they are plainly grounded upon the holy scripture, or upon some reason which cannot be impugned.

Other Articles drawn out of Purvey's Books more at large by Richard Levingham.

"As to the sacrament of thanksgiving, he saith, That that chapter of repentance and remission, (omnis utriusque sexus;) wherein it is ordained, that every faithful man ought once every year at the least, that is to say at Easter, to receive the sacrament of the Eucharist, is a beastly chiong, heretical and blasphemous.

"That Innocent III., was the head of anti-christ, who after the letting loose of Satan, invented a new article of our faith, and a certain feigned doctrine touching the sacrament of the altar, that is to say, that the sacrament of the altar is an accident without a substance, or else an heap of accidents without a substance. But Christ and his apostles do teach manifestly, that the sacrament of the altar is bread and the body of Christ together, after the manner that he spake. And in that he calleth it bread, he would have the people to understand, as they ought with reason, that it is very and substantial bread, and no false nor feigned bread.

"And although Innocent, that anti-christ, doth allege that in the council at Lyons, where this matter was decided, were six hundred bishops with him, and one thousand prelates, who agreed in this determination; All those notwithstanding, he calls fools, according to that saying of Eccles. i. 'Of fools there are an infinite number.' And so in like manner he calleth them false christ and false prophets, of whom Christ speaketh in the 24th of Matthew, 'Many false christ and false prophets shall arise, and deceive many.' And therefore every christian man ought to believe firmly, that the sacrament of the altar is very bread indeed, and no false nor feigned bread. And although it be very bread indeed, yet notwithstanding, it is the very body of Christ in that way which he spake, and called it his body; and so it is very bread, and the very body of Christ. And as Christ concerning his humanity was both visible and passible, and by his divinity was invisible and impassible: so likewise this sacrament in that it is very bread, may be seen with the corporal eye, and may also abide corruption. But although a man may see that sacrament, yet notwithstanding cannot the body of Christ in that sacrament be seen with the corporal eye, although it be the body of Christ in that manner he spake it; for that notwithstanding, the body of Christ is now incorruptible in Heaven. So the sacrament of the cup is very wine, and the very blood of Christ, according as his manner of speaking was. Also Innocent III., with a great multitude of his secular priests, made a certain new determination, that the sacrament of the altar is an accident without a substance, whereas neither Jesus Christ, nor any of his apostles taught this faith (but openly and manifestly to the contrary, neither yet the holy doctors, for the space of a thousand years and more, taught this faith openly.

"Therefore when anti-christ or any of his shavelings doth ask of thee that art a simple christian, whether that this sacrament be the very body of Christ or not? affirm thou it manifestly to be so. And if he ask of thee whether it be material bread, or what other bread else? say thou, that it is such bread as Christ understood and meant by his proper word; and such bread as the Holy Ghost meant in St. Paul, when he called that to be very bread which he brake; and wade thou no further therein. If he ask thee how this bread is the body of Christ? say thou, as Christ understood the same to be his body, which is both omnipotent and true, and in whom is no untruth; say thou also as the holy doctors do say. 'That the terrestrial matter or substance may be converted into Christ, as the pagan or infidel may be baptized, and hereby spiritually be converted, and be a member of Christ, and so after a certain manner become Christ, and yet the same man remain still in his proper nature. Forso doth St. Augustine grant, that a sinner forsaking his sin, and being made one spirit with God by faith, grace and charity, may be converted into God, and be after a manner God, as both David and St. John do testify, and yet be the same person in substance and nature, and in soul and virtue be altered and changed. But yet men of more knowledge and reason may more plainly prove the falsity of anti-christ both in this matter and in others, by the gift of the Holy Ghost working in them. Notwithstanding, if men will humbly hold and keep the manifest and apparent words of the holy scripture, and the plain sense and meaning of the Holy Ghost, and proceed no further, but humbly commit to the Spirit of God, that which passes their understanding; then may they safely offer themselves to death, as true martyrs of Jesus Christ.

"As to the sacrament of penance; that chapter (omnis utriusque sexus) by which a certain new-found auricular confession was ordained, is full of hypocrisy, heresy, covetousness, pride, and blasphemy, he reproves that chapter verbatim. Also he says that the penance and pains limited by the canons are unreasonable and unjust, for their austerity and rigour. And further shews how Innocent III. brought in a new-found confession, whereby the priests oppress the laymen compelling them to confess themselves to blind and ignorant priests, in whom there is nothing else but pride and covetousness, holding those in contempt who are learned and wise. Also that the decretal of Innocent III., touching the auricular or vocal confession, was brought in and invented to entangle men's consciences with sin, and to draw them down to hell. And further, that such manner of confession destroys the evangelical liberty, and prevents men from inquiring after, and retaining the wise counsel and doctrine of such as are good priests, who would willingly teach the people the right way to heaven. For which abuse all christian men, and specially all Englishmen ought to exclaim against such wicked laws.

"As to the authority of the keys and censures, no christian man ought to esteem Satan (whom men call the pope) and his unjust censures, more than the hissing of a serpent, or the blast of Lucifer. Also, that no man ought to trust or put confidence in the false indulgences of covetous priests, which indulgences do draw away the hope, which men ought to repose in God, to a sort of sinful men, and do rob the poor of such alms as are given to them. Such priests are manifest betrayers of Christ and of the whole church, and are Satan's own stewards to beguile christian souls by their hypocrisy and feigned pardons. Also, forasmuch as those prelates and clergymen live so execrable a life, contrary to the gospel of Christ and examples of his apostles, and teach not truly the gospel, but only lies and the traditions of sinful wicked men; it appears most manifestly, that they have not the keys of the kingdom of heaven, but rather the keys of hell. And they may be well assured, that God never gave to them authority to make and establish so many ceremonies and traditions contrary to the liberty of the gospel, and blocks in christian men's ways, that they can neither know nor observe his gospel in liberty of conscience, and so attain a ready way to heaven.

"As touching the preaching of the gospel, 'whosoever receiveth or taketh upon him the office of a priest, or of a bishop, and dischargeth not the same by the example of his good conversation and faithful preaching of the gospel, is a thief, excommunicate of God and of holy church.' And further, 'If the curates preach not the word of God, they shall be damned, and if they know not how to preach, they ought to resign their benefices.' So that those prelates who preach not the gospel of Christ (although they could excuse themselves from the doing of any other evil) are dead in themselves, are anti-christs, and satans, transfigured into angels of light, and betrayers of Christ's people.

"Now as to the correction of the clergy. By the law of God, and by reason, the king and all other christians may punish Italy, and all the false priests and clerks within the same, and reduce them to the humble ordinance of Jesus Christ. Also that the law of Sylvester the pope is contrary to the law of Christ; and that proud and ambitious Sylvester by his law so defended two cardinals which were not to be defended by the law of Christ, that by no means they might be convicted, although they were both vicious and evil. And although Christ sustained and suffered the judgment of unjust temporal judges, our mitred prelates in these days so magnify themselves beyond Christ and his apostles, that they refuse such judgments. Also that those decretals of accusations which prohibit that any clerks should be brought before a secular judge to receive judgment, contain both heresy, blasphemy, and error, and bring great gain and commodity to antichrist's coffers.

"Furthermore, that all christian kings and lords ought to exclaim against the pope, and those that be his favourers, and banish them out of their lands, till such time as they will obey God and his gospel, kings, and other ministers of God's justice. Also that bishops and their favourers, that say it appertains not to kings and secular lords (but unto them and their officials) to punish adultery and fornication, do fall into manifest treason against the king, and heresy against the scripture. Also that it appertains to the king to have the order both of priests and bishops, as these kings Solomon and Jehoshaphat had.

"Furthermore that chapter (Nullus iudicium de foro competentis), by which secular judges are forbidden, without the bishop's commandment, to condemn any clerk to death, is manifestly against the holy scripture, declaring that kings have power over clerks and priests, to punish them for their deserved crimes. Also that the decree of Boniface, made against the prosecutors, strikers, and imprisoners of cardinals, is contrary both to the holy scripture, and to all reason. Also that by the law of God and reason, a secular lord may lawfully take a cardinal and put him in prison for committing the crime of open simony, adultery, and manifest blasphemy. Also that the chapter (Si Papa, Dist. 40.), which saith that the pope ought to be judged of none, unless he be Dei ius a fide, is contrary to the gospel, which saith, If thy brother sin against thee, correct him. Also whereas St. Gregory and St. Augustine called themselves the servants of God's servants, this proud bishop of Rome, which will not be judged by his subjects (which be in very deed his lords, if they be just and good men) destroys the order of God's law, and all humility, and extols himself above God and his apostles. Also that christian kings ought not only to judge this proud bishop of Rome, but also to depose him by the example that Cestrensis, (lib. 6. cap. 8.) declares of Otho the emperor, who deposed John XII., and instituted Leo in his place. And further he makes an exhortation to the princes to judge the church of Rome, which he calleth the great and cursed whore, of which St. John writes in Rev. xvii.

"Lastly, touching the laws and determinations of the church; christians have reasonable excuses and causes to repel the statutes of the pope and of his shavelings, which are not expressly grounded on the holy scripture, or else upon reason inevitable. Also that simple men do reverently receive the sentences of the doctors, and other laws, so far forth as they are expressly grounded upon the holy scripture or good reason. Also that whereas the pope's laws, and laws of his ministers and clerks are contrary to themselves, and have not their foundation either upon scripture, or yet upon reason, simple men ought to bid them farewell. Also that that proud priest of Rome, with all his rabble, might easily err in the faith; and yet the christian faith be preserved whole and safe in the faithful members of Christ, which are his true church; while the pope and all his rabblement cannot prove that they be any part of his church. Also that the pope with all his favourers, may as well be deceived by a lying spirit, as was Ahab and all his prophets; and that one true prophet, as was Michaiah, may have the truth shewed to him. Also that all good christians ought to cast from them the pope's laws, saying, let us break their bands in sunder, and let us cast from our necks those heavy yokes of theirs. Also that where these prelates do burn one good book for one error perhaps contained in the same, they ought to burn all the books of the canon-law, for the manifold heresies contained in them."

And thus much out of a certain old written book in parchment, which book containing divers ancient records of the university, seems to belong sometime to the library of the university, bearing the year of the compiling thereof, A.D. 1396. If this date be correct, then it was written before Purvey recanted before Thomas Arundel, archbishop, at Saltwood, where he was imprisoned.

Here is to be considered, at least to be admonished, that all this while the schism in the church of Rome did yet continue, and so endured till the council of Constance, which was in whole, the space of twenty and nine years. The origin whereof (as was said before) first began at Urban V., which Urban being dead, (A.D. 1389), next followed Pope Boniface IX., who sat fourteen years. He, in selling his pardons, was so impudent and so past shame, that he brought the keys of Peter (as saith Platina) into contempt. After him succeeded Innocent VII. and sat two years: who being dead, the cardinals consulting together, and seeing the enormity and inconvenience growing upon this schism in their church of Rome (minding to provide some remedy after the best device they could) in their conclave where they were assembled for a new election for the pope, took this order, promising among themselves with solemn vow made to God, to Mary the Blessed Virgin, to Peter and Paul, and to all the blessed company of saints; that if any of them, within the college or without the college, should be called to the high place of apostolical pre-eminence; he should immediately renounce the jurisdiction and title of his popedom, when the rival pope, for the time being, would in like manner, renounce his place and title, and his cardinals in the like manner condescend to the other cardinals of Rome. So that both these two colleges of cardinals agreeing together, one chief bishop was to be chosen and taken out of them both, to be made the true pope. Provided, moreover, that none should seek any release or absolution from the promise, vow and bond once passed among them; all which things every one subscribed with his hand. These things thus prefixed and ratified, they proceeded to the election. In which was chosen Gregory XII., who the same day of his election, in the presence of all the cardinals, confirmed the vow, sacrament, and promise made, subscribing the same with his hand, in form as follows: "And I, Gregory, this day being the last of November, A.D. 1407, chosen and elected for bishop of Rome, do swear, vow, and promise, and confirm all the premises above contained," &c. This being done, shortly after he was crowned, being of the age of eighty years. As the time thus passed, the people and cardinals were in great expectation, waiting when the pope, according to his oath, would give over, with the other pope also. And not long after, the matter began indeed between the two popes to be attempted, by letters from one to another; assigning both day and place, where and when they should meet together; but yet nothing followed.

This so passing on, there was great murmuring among the cardinals, to see their holy perjured father so neglect his oath and vow. Insomuch that at length, several of them forsook the pope, as being perjured (as no less he was) sending moreover to kings and princes of other lands, for their counsel and assistance, to appease the schism. Among the rest, Cardinal Bituricensis was sent to the king of England; who published propositions and conclusions (remaining in the registers of Thomas Arundel), proving that the pope ought to be subject to laws and councils. Then King Henry (moved to write to Gregory the pope) directs his letter, A.D. 1409.

The Letter of King Henry the Fourth to Pope Gregory the Twelfth.

"Most blessed father, if the discreet providence of the apostolical see would call to mind with what great perils the universal world has been dammed hitherto, under pretence of this present schism; and especially would consider, what slaughter of christian people, to the number of two hundred thousand (as they say) hath been through the occasion of war raised up in divers quarters of the world; and now of late, to the number of thirty thousand soldiers, who have been slain through the dissension moved about the bishoprick of Leodium, between two set up, one by the authority of one pope, the other by the authority of the other pope, fighting in camp for the title of that bishopric; certainly, ye would lament in spirit and be sore grieved in mind for the same. So that with good conscience ye would rather relinquish the honour of the apostolic see, than suffer such horrible bloodshed to ensue, under the cloke of dissimulation, following herein the example of the true mother in the book of Kings: who pleading before Solomon for the right of her child, rather would part from the child, than the child should be parted by the sword. And although it may be vehemently suspected by the new creation of nine cardinals by you lately made, contrary to your oath (as other men say), that you but little heed or care for ceasing the schism; yet far be it from the hearing and noting of the world, that your circumspect seat should ever be noted and distained with such an inconstancy of mind; whereby the last error may be worst than the first."

And to the cardinals likewise, the said king directed another letter with these contents here following:

King Henry the Fourth to the Cardinals.

"We, desiring to shew what zeal we have had and have, to the reformation of peace of the church, by the consent of the states of the realm, have directed to the bishop of Rome our letters, after the tenour of the copy herewith in these presents inclosed to be executed effectually: wherefore we seriously beseech your reverend college, that if it chance the said Gregory to be present at the council of Pisa, and to render up his popedom, according to your desire, and his own oath, you then so ordain for his state totally, that chiefly God may be pleased thereby, and that both the said Gregory, and also we who entirely love his honour and advantage, may have cause to give you worthily condign thanks for the same."

This being done in the year A.D. 1409, afterwards in the year next following, A.D. 1410, the cardinals of both the popes, to wit, of Gregory and Benedict, by common advice assembled together at the city of Pisa, for the reformation of unity and peace in the church. To which assembly, a great multitude of prelates and bishops being come, a new pope was chosen, named Alexander V. But to this election neither Gregory nor Benedict would fully agree. Whereby there were three popes together in the Roman church (that is, to understand) not three crowns upon one pope's head, but three heads in one popish church together! This Alexander, being newly made pope, scarcely had well warmed his triple crown, but straight gives out full remission, not of a few, but all manner of sins whatever, to all that conferred anything to the monastery of St. Bartholomew by Smithfield, resorting to the said church any of these days following; to wit, on Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, Easter even, the feast of the Annunciation, from the first even-song to the later. But this pope, who was so liberal in giving remission of many years to other, was not able to give one year of life to himself, for within the same year he died. In whose stead came in Pope John XXIII.

In the time of this Alexander great stir began in the country of Bohemia, by the occasion of the books of John Wickliff, which then coming to the hands of John Huss, and of others, both men and women, especially of the lay sort, and artificers, began there to do much good, so that many of them, not only men, but women also, partly by the reading of their books translated into their language, partly by the setting forward of John Huss, a remarkably learned man and a singular preacher at that time in the university of Prague, were in a short time so ripe in judgment, and prompt in the scriptures, that they began to move questions, yea and to reason with the priests, touching matters of the holy scriptures.

By reason of this, complaint was brought to Pope Alexander, who soon caused John Huss to be cited to Rome. But when he came not at the pope's citation, then Pope Alexander addressed his letters to the archbishop of Swinco. Wherein he straightly charged him to prohibit and forbid, by the authority apostolical, all manner of preachings or sermons to be made to the people, except only in cathedral churches or colleges, or parish churches, or in monasteries, or else in their churchyards; and that the articles of Wickliff should, in no case by any person, of what state, condition, or degree, be suffered to be held, taught, or defended, either privily or openly. Commanding, moreover, and charging the archbishop, that with four bachelors of divinity, and two doctors of the canon law, he would proceed upon the same, and so provide that no person in churches, schools, or any other place, should teach, defend, or approve any of the aforesaid articles. So that whosoever should attempt the contrary, should be accounted an heretic, and unless he shall revoke solemnly and publicly the said articles, and shall for ever abjure the books in which the articles are contained, so that they may be utterly abolished out from the eyes of the faithful, he should be apprehended and imprisoned, without appeal, the help also of the secular arm being called in, if need shall require, &c. These were the contents of this mighty and fierce bull of Pope Alexander.

Against which bull John Huss, justly complaining, objecteth many things, as appears in his book, entitled De Ecclesia, cap. 18, where he declares this mandate of the pope to stand directly against the doings and sayings both of Christ and of his apostles; considering how Christ himself preached to the people, both in the sea, in the desert, in fields, in houses, in synagogues, in villages; and the apostles also in all places did the same, the Lord mightily working with them. He declared, moreover, the mandate or bull of the pope to redound to the great detriment of the church, in binding the word of God, that it might not have free course; also to be prejudicial to chapels newly erected for the word to be preached in them. Wherefore (saith he) from this commandment or mandate of Pope Alexander I appeal unto Alexander, being better informed and advised. And as I was prosecuting my appeal, the lord pope (saith John Huss) immediately died.

Then the archbishop of Swinco, to whom this present bull was directed, when he saw the process, bulls, and mandates of the bishop of Rome to be thus despised by John Huss and his fellows, and having no hope of redress in Wenceslaus the king, who seemed to neglect the matter, went to Hungary, to complain to Sigismund king of Hungary, and brother to Wenceslaus. But this archbishop, as soon as he arrived in Hungary (by the just judgment of God) died, as the history saith, for sorrow. Whereby a little more liberty and quiet was given by the Lord to his gospel, beginning to take root among the Bohemians. This tranquillity, however, did not continue long without trouble and persecution, nor could it in those furious days and reign of antichrist. For after this Alexander, Pope John XXIII. succeeded. Who, likewise playing his part in this tragedy, bent all his might and main to disturb the Bohemians, as (Christ willing) shall be declared hereafter in the course of our history.

Thus the poor christians, like the simple Israelites under the tyranny of Pharaoh, were oppressed in every place, but especially here in England, because the English king, unlike Wenceslaus, entirely held with the pope and his prelates against the gospellers.

By reason of which the kingdom of the pope and his members began to be so strong in this realm, that none durst stir or move against them. The bishops having the king so entirely on their side, armed, moreover, with laws, statutes, punishments, sword, fire, and faggot, reigned and ruled as they pleased, as kings and princes within themselves. So strong were they that no human force was able to stand against them: so exalted in pride, and puffed up in glory, that they thought all things to be subject to their reverend majesties. What ever they set forth or decreed, it must by all men be received and obeyed.

And such was their superstitious blindness and curious vanity, that whatever toy came once in their fancy, it was at once determined and established for a law to be observed by all men, were it never so frivolous or superstitious; as well appears by Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury and others, who having now a little leisure from slaying and killing the innocent people, martyrs and confessors of the Lord, and having now brought their enemies (as they thought) under their feet; began to set up themselves, and to invent some new custom, as the habit is of the pope's church, ever to intrude into the church of God some ceremony or custom of their own making, whereby the church of Christ has been hitherto exceedingly pestered. So likewise this Thomas Arundel, thinking the church not yet sufficiently filled with ceremonies and vain traditions of men, brought in a new-found gaud, commonly called "The tolling of Aves," in honour of our lady, with certain Aves to be said, and days of pardon to be given for the same. For the ratification of which, under the pretence of the king's request, he directed the following mandate to the bishop of London, well filled with words of idolatry, as by reading it will plainly appear.

A Mandate of Thomas Arundel, directed to the Bishop of London, to warn men to say certain Prayers at the tolling of the Aves, or ringing of the Curfew.

"Thomas, &c. To the right reverend brother, the Lord Robert, by the grace of God, bishop of London, greeting, &c. While we lift our eyes round about us, and behold attentively with circumspect consideration, how the most high Word that was in the beginning with God, chose to him a holy and immaculate virgin of the kingly stock, in whose womb he took true flesh by inspi-ral inspiration, that the merciful goodness of the Son of God, that was uncreate, might abolish the sentence of condemnation, which all the posterity of mankind, that was created, had by sin incurred: amongst other labours in the vine of the Lord of Sabbath, we sung to God our Saviour with great joy, thinking, that though all the people of the christian religion did extol with voices of praise so worthy a virgin, by whom we received the beginnings of our redemption, by whom the holy day first shined to us, which gave us hope of salvation; and although all the same people were drawn to reverence her, who being a happy virgin, conceived the Son of God, the King of heaven, the Redeemer and Saviour of all nations, ministering light to the people that were miserably drowned in the darkness of death: we truly, as the servants of her own inheritance, and such as are written of, to be of her peculiar dower, as we are by every man's confession acknowledged to be, we, I say, ought more watchfully than any others to shew our devotion in praising her. Who being hitherto merciful to us, willed that our power, being as it were spread abroad every where through all the coasts of the world, should with a victorious arm be feared among all foreign nations; that our power, being on all sides so defended with the buckler of her protection, did subdue unto our victorious standards, and make subject unto us, nations both near at hand and far off.

"Likewise our happy estate, all the time that we have passed since the beginning of our lives, may be well attributed only to the help of her medicine; to whom also we may worthily ascribe now of late in these our times, under the mighty government of our most christian king, our deliverance from the ravening wolves, and the mouths of cruel beasts, who had prepared against our banquets a mess of meat mingled full of gall, and who hated us unjustly, secretly lying in wait for us, in recompence of the good will that we shewed to them. Wherefore, that she being on high sitting before the throne of the heavenly Majesty, the defendress and patroness of us all, being magnified with all men's praises, may more plentifully exhibit to us the sons of adoption the breasts of her grace, in all those things that we shall have to do; at the request of the special devotion of our Lord the king himself, we command your brotherhood, straightly enjoining you, that you command the subjects of your city and diocese, and of all other suffragans, to worship our Lady Mary the mother of God, and our patroness and protectress, evermore in all adversity, with such like kind of prayer and accustomed manner of ringing, as the devotion of Christ's faithful people is wont to worship her at the ringing of cour le feu. And when before day in the morning ye shall cause them to ring, that with like manner of prayer and ringing she may be every where honoured devoutly by our and your suffragans, and their subjects as well regular as secular, in your and their monasteries and collegiate-churches: that we so humbly calling upon the mercy of the heavenly Father, the right hand of the heavenly piety may mercifully come to the help, the protection and defence of the same our lord the king, who for the happy remedy of quietness, and for our succour from tempestuous floods, is ready to apply his hands to work, and his eyes with all his whole desire to watching. We therefore desiring more earnestly to stir up the minds of all faithful people to so devout an exercise of God, &c.; we grant by these presents, to all and every man, &c. that shall say the Lord's Prayer and the Salutation of the Angel five times at the morning-peal with a devout mind, toties quoties forty days' pardon by these presents.

"Given under our seal in our manor of Lambeth the 10th day of February." (Ex Regist. Thomas Arundel).

By this frivolous and barbarous constitution, with many other of the same kind, heaped into the church by the papists, appear the proper natures and condition of this generation, whose priests were more solicitous about worldly honour than christian humility.

As, for example, what can be more suitable for a true ecclesiastical pastor, than humility of heart and spirit, according to the example of the Head Bishop himself? So what greater shew of arrogancy and pride could there be, than in this Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury? who, passing by the High-street of London, did not only look and wait for the ringing of the bells, in honour of his coming, but took great offence, and suspended all such churches in London (not only from the use of the steeple and bells, but also from the organs) as did not receive his coming with the ringing of bells, according as appears by his own registers, where is the following commission addressed to his own somner.

A Commission directed to the Somner, to suspend certain Churches of London, because they rung not their Bells at the presence of my Lord the Archbishop of Canterbury.

"Thomas, by the permission of God, &c. To our well-beloved Thomas Wilton, our somner sworn, health, grace, and blessing. The comeliness of our holy church of Canterbury, over which we bear rule, deserveth and requireth, that while we pass through the province of the same (having our cross carried before us) every parish church in their turns ought and are bounden, in token of special reverence that they bear to us, to ring their bells. Notwithstanding which, on Tuesday last, when we, between eight and nine of the clock before dinner, passed openly on foot as it were through the midst of the city of London, with our cross carried before us; several churches, whose names are here beneath noted, shewed towards us willingly (though they certainly knew of our coming) unreverence rather than reverence, and the duty that they owe to our church of Canterbury, ringing not at all at our coming. Wherefore, we being willing to revenge this injury, for the honour of our spouse, as we are bounden, command you, that by our authority you put all those churches under our indictment, suspending God's holy organs and instruments in the same. Which we also suspend by the tenor of these presents, till the ministers of the aforesaid churches be able hereafter to attain of us the benefit of more plentiful grace. Given," &c.

What reason was there in this, why this archbishop should thus look for the ringing of the bells, or why he should be thus displeased with not ringing, I do not see. Perhaps his mind in the mean time was greatly occupied with some great subject, as a sense of God's fear, with repentance and remembrance of his sins, with zealous care and solicitude for his flock, with the earnest meditation of the passion and life of our Saviour, who in this world was so despised: or else was set upon some grave study, while he waited for the ringing of the bells, which were wont to be so noisome to all students. And why were not the trumpeters also punished as well, because they did not sound before his person? But though the bells did not clatter in the steeples, why should the body of the church be suspended? At least, the poor organs (methinks) suffered some wrong in being put to silence in the quire, because the bells rang not in the tower.

To show the glorious pomp of these prince-like prelates, in these blind days of popish religion, I add another example not much unlike, nor differing much in time, concerning certain poor men cited up, and enjoined strict penance by, William Courtney, predecessor of Thomas Arundel, for bringing litter to his horse, not in carts as they should do, but in little sacks, in a secret manner under their cloaks or coats. For which heinous and horrible sin the archbishop, sitting in his tribunal seat, called and cited before him the persons (pro littera, i. e. for litter, after his own Latin), and after their submission enjoined them penance. Which penance here follows out of the said archbishop's registers.

"Ignorance, the mother of error, hath so blinded and deceived certain persons, to wit, Hugh Pennie, John Forstall, John Boy, John Wanderton, William Hayward, and John White, tenants of the lord of Wingham, that against the coming of the archbishop to his palace of Canterbury, on Palm Sunday evening, A.D. 1390, where they being warned by the bailiff to convey and carry hay, straw, and other litter, to the palace, as they were bound by the tenour of their lands, which they hold of the see of Canterbury; refusing and disdaining to do their service, as they were accustomed, brought their straw and other litter, not in carts and waggons openly and sufficiently, but by piecemeal, and closely in bags or sacks, in contempt of their lord and derogation of the right and title of the see of Canterbury. Whereupon they being cited and presented before the archbishop, sitting in judgment at his manor of Statewood, yielded and submitted themselves to his lordship's pleasure, humbly craving pardon of their trespass. Then the aforesaid archbishop absolved the above-named Hugh Pennie, &c., they swearing to obey the laws and ordinances of holy church, and to do the punishment that should be appointed them for their deserts; that is, that they going leisurely before the procession, every one of them should carry openly on his shoulder his bag stuffed with hay and straw, so that the hay and straw should appear hanging out, the mouths of the sacks being open."

To proceed now in the reign of this king, and to treat something of his parliaments as we have done of others. First, we will begin with the parliament held in the first year of his reign.

As our papists will not believe the contrary, but that the jurisdiction of their father the pope has ever extended throughout all the world, as well here in England as in other places, therefore speaking of the parliaments holden in this king's days concerning this matter, I refer them to the parliament of King Henry in his first year, and to the twenty-seventh article. Where they may read in the tenth objection laid against King Richard, in plain words, how that as the crown of this realm of England, and the jurisdiction belonging to the same; as also the whole realm itself, at all times lately past, has been at such liberty, and enjoyed such prerogative, that neither the pope, nor any other out of the same kingdom, ought to intrude himself nor intermeddle therein, it was therefore objected to King

Richard II. that he procured the letters apostolical from the pope, to confirm and corroborate certain statutes, which seemed then to the parliament to tend against the crown and regal dignity, as also against the statutes and liberties of this our realm of England. (Act Parl. An. 1. Reg. Hen. 4. Act 27.)

Further, in the second year of the said king, it was required in the parliament that all such persons as shall be arrested under the statute made against the Lollards, in the second year of Henry IV. may be bailed, and freely make their purgation, that they be arrested by none other than by the sheriffs, or such officers.

In the eighth year, moreover, of this king's reign it was propounded in parliament, that all such persons as shall procure, or sue in the court of Rome any process touching any benefice, collation, or presentation of the same, shall incur the pain of the statute of provisors, made in the thirteenth year of Richard II., whereunto the king granted, that the statutes heretofore provided should be observed.

In the same parliament there was presented a petition, that the king might enjoy half the profits of every parson's benefice who is not resident thereon. The king answered, that the ordinaries should do their duties therein, or else he would provide further remedy to stay their pluralities.

In the same parliament it was required, that none do sue to the court of Rome for any benefice, but only to the king's courts.

Besides, in the parliament held the eleventh year of this king, the commons of the land put up a bill to the king to take the temporal lands out from spiritual men's hands or possession. The effect of which bill was, that the temporalities disorderly wasted by men of the church, might suffice to find to the king fifteen earls, fifteen hundred knights, six thousand two hundred esquires, and a hundred houses of alms to the relief of the poor people; and over all these aforesaid charges, the king might put yearly in his coffers twenty thousand pounds.

Provided, that every earl should have of yearly rent three thousand marks; and every knight a hundred marks and four plough-lands; every esquire forty marks by year, with two plough-lands; and every house of alms a hundred marks, with oversight of two true seculars to every house, and also with provision that every township should keep all their own poor people, which could not labour for their living; with a condition that if more fell in a town than the town might maintain, then the said almshouses should relieve such townships.

To which bill no answer was made, but that the king would deliberate and advise on the matter.

These things thus narrated, touching such acts and matters as occurred in the lifetime of this king, next follows the thirteenth year of his reign. In which year the king, after he had sent a little before a company of captains and soldiers to aid the duke of Burgundy in France (among whom was the Lord Cobham), keeping his Christmas at Eltham, fell grievously sick. From thence he was conveyed to London, where he began to call a parliament. In the meantime the infirmity of the king increasing more and more, he was taken and brought to a bed in a beautiful chamber at Westminster. And as he lay in his bed, he asked what they called the chamber he was in; and they answered Jerusalem. And then he said it was his prophesy, that he should die in Jerusalem. And so disposing himself toward his end in his chamber, he died on the twentieth of March, A.D. 1413.

KING HENRY V.

After the death of Henry IV., his son Henry V. began to reign. Henry was born at Monmouth in Wales, of whose other virtues, and great victories in France, I shall not much intermeddle, especially as the memory of his prowess, being sufficiently described in other writers, may both content the reader, and unburden my labour, especially as these later troubles of the church offer me so much, that little leisure will be left to intermeddle with secular matters.

After the coronation of this new king, which was on the ninth day of April, called then Passion Sunday, which was an exceeding stormy day, and so tempestuous, that many wondered at the omen: not long after a parliament began to be called, and held at Westminster, (A. D. 1413.) At which time Thomas Arundel, the archbishop of Canterbury, collected in St. Paul's church at London, an universal synod of all the bishops and clergy of England.

The Trouble and Persecution of Lord Cobham.

The chief and principal cause of the assembling of this synod, as the chronicle of St. Albans reports, was to repress the growing and spreading of the gospel, and especially to withstand the noble and worthy Lord Cobham, who was then noted to be a principal favourer, receiver, and maintainer of them, whom the bishop misnamed to be Lollards, especially in the dioceses of London, Rochester, and Hereford, setting those up to preach whom the bishops had not licensed, and sending them about to preach, which was against the provincial constitutions, holding also and teaching opinions of the sacraments, of images, of pilgrimage, of the keys and church of Rome, contrary and repugnant to the received determination of the Romish church, &c.

In the meantime, as the commotion was in debate concerning the good Lord Cobham, there resorted to them the twelve inquisitors of heresies (whom they had appointed at Oxford the year before, to search out heresies,) with all Wickliff's books, who brought two hundred and forty-six conclusions, which they had collected as heresies out of the books.

The articles being brought in, they proceeded in their communication, concluding that it was not possible for them to make whole Christ's coat without seam, unless certain great men were taken out of the way, who seemed to be the chief maintainers of the said disciples of Wickliff. Among whom this noble knight Sir John Oldcastle, the Lord Cobham, was complained of by the general proctors to be the principal. They accused him first for a mighty maintainer of suspected preachers in the dioceses of London, Rochester, and Hereford, contrary to the minds of the ordinaries. They not only affirmed him to have sent there the preachers, but also to have assisted them there by force of arms, notwithstanding their synodal constitution made to the contrary. Last of all, they accused him that he was far otherwise in belief of the sacrament of the altar, of penance, of pilgrimage, of image worshipping, and of the ecclesiastical power, than the holy church of Rome had taught many years before.

In the end it was concluded among them, that without any further delay, process should be awarded out against him, as against a most pernicious heretic.

Some of them who were of more crafty experience than the others, thought it best not to have the matter so rashly handled; but considering Lord Cobham was a man of great birth, and in favour at that time with the king, their counsel was to know first the king's mind. This counsel was well accepted, and the archbishop, with his other bishops, and a great part of the clergy, went directly to the king, and laid most grievous complaints against Lord Cobham, to his great infamy and blemish, being a right godly man. The king gently heard those blood-thirsty prelates, and far otherwise than became his princely dignity: notwithstanding, requiring, and desiring them, that in respect of his noble stock and knight-hood, they should deal favourably with him. And that they would, if it were possible, without rigor or extreme handling, reduce him again to the church's unity. He promised them also, that if they were contented to take some deliberation, he himself would seriously commune the matter with him.

Soon after the king sent for Lord Cobham; and when he was come, he called him secretly, admonishing him to submit himself to his mother, the holy church, and as an obedient child to acknowledge himself culpable. The christian knight made this answer: "You, most worthy prince, I am always prompt and willing to obey, inasmuch as I know you are a christian king, and the appointed minister of God, bearing the sword to the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well. Unto you (next to my eternal God) I owe my whole obedience, and submit thereunto, as I have ever done, all that I have, either of fortune or nature, ready at all times to fulfil whatsoever ye shall in the Lord command me. But as touching the pope and his spirituality, I owe them neither suit nor service, inasmuch as I know him by the scriptures to be the great antichrist, the son of perdition, the open adversary of God, and the abomination standing in the holy place." When the king had heard this, he would talk no longer with him, but left him.

And as the archbishop resorted again to him for an answer, he gave him his full authority to cite him, examine him, and punish him according to their devilish decree, which they called the laws of holy church. Then the archbishop, by the counsel of his other bishops and clergy, appointed to call before him Sir John Oldcastle, the Lord Cobham, and to cause him personally to appear, to answer to such articles as they should lay against him.

This most constant servant of the Lord, and worthy knight, Sir John Oldcastle, beholding the fury of antichrist thus kindled against him, perceiving himself also compassed on every side with deadly dangers, took paper and pen in hand, and wrote a christian confession of his faith, both signing and sealing it with his own hand. Wherein he also answered to the four chief articles that the archbishop laid against him. That done, he took the copy with him, and went therewith to the king, trusting to find mercy and favour at his hand. This confession of his was none other than the common belief or sum of the church's faith, called The Apostles' Creed, then used by all christian men, with a brief declaration upon the same, as follows:—

The Christian Belief of the Lord Cobham.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth: and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buried. He descended into hell, the third day He rose again from the dead, He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty; and from thence shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy catholic church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. Amen.

"And for a more large declaration (said he) of this my faith in the catholic church, I steadfastly believe, that there is but one God Almighty, in and of whose Godhead are these three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and that those three persons are the self-same God Almighty. I believe also, that the second person in this most blessed Trinity, in most convenient time appointed thereunto before, took flesh and blood of the most blessed virgin Mary, for the safeguard and redemption of the universal kind of man, which was before lost in Adam's offence.

"Moreover I believe, that the same Jesus Christ our Lord, thus being both God and man, is the only head of the whole christian church, and that all those that have been or shall be saved, are members of this most holy church. And this holy church I think to be divided into three sorts of companies.

"The first sort are now in heaven, and they are the departed saints. These as they were here conversant, conformed always their lives to the most holy laws and pure examples of Christ, renouncing Satan, the world, and the flesh and all their lusts and evils.

"The second sort are in purgatory (if any such place be in the scriptures) abiding the mercy of God, and a full deliverance of pain.

"The third sort are here upon the earth, and are called the church militant. For day and night they contend against the crafty assaults of the devil, the flattering prosperities of this world, and the rebellious lusts of the flesh.

"This last company by the just ordinance of God is also divided into three several estates, that is to say, into the priesthood, the knighthood, and the commons. Among whom the will of God is, that the one should aid the other, but not destroy the other. The priests first of all, secluded from all worldliness, should conform their lives to the examples of Christ and the apostles. They should be occupied in preaching and teaching the scriptures purely, and in giving wholesome examples of good living to the other two degrees of men. They should be more modest also, more loving, gentle, and lowly in spirit, than any sort of people.

"In the knighthood are all they who bear the sword by law of office; these should defend God's laws, and see that the gospel is purely taught, conforming their lives to the same, and excluding all false preachers: yea these ought rather to hazard their lives, than to suffer such wicked decrees as either blemish the eternal testament of God, or prevent the free passage thereof, whereby heresies and schisms might spring in the church. For they arise principally from erroneous constitutions, first creeping craftily in under hypocritical lies, for advantage. They ought also to preserve God's people from oppressors, tyrants, and thieves, and to see the clergy supported so long as they teach purely, pray rightly, and administer the sacraments freely. And if they see them do otherwise, they are bound by the law or office to compel them to change their doings; and to see all things performed according to God's prescribed ordinance.

"The last fellowship of this church, are the common people; whose duty is to bear their good minds and true obedience to the aforesaid ministers of God, their kings, civil governors and priests. The right office of these, is for every man justly to occupy his faculty, be it merchandise, handicraft or cultivating the ground. And so one of them be as an helper to another, following always the just commandments of the Lord God.

"Over and besides all this, I most faithfully believe, that the sacraments of Christ's church are necessary to all christian believers; so that they be truly ministered according to Christ's first institution and ordinance. And as I am maliciously and most falsely accused of misbelief in the sacrament of the altar, to the hurtful slander of many; I signify here to all men, that this is my faith concerning it. I believe in that sacrament Christ's very body and blood are contained, under the similitude of bread and wine, yea the same body that was conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, crucified on the cross, died and was buried, arose the third day from the death; and is now glorified in heaven. I also believe the universal law of God to be most true and perfect, and they who do not follow it in their faith and works (at one time or another) can never be saved. Whereas he that seeks it in faith, accepts it, learns it, delights therein, and performs it in love, shall taste the felicity of everlasting innocence.

"Finally, this is my faith also, that God will ask no more of a christian believer in this life, but only to obey the precepts of that most blessed law. If any prelate of church require more, or any other kind of obedience, than this; he contemns Christ, exalting himself above God, and so becomes an open antichrist. All the premises I believe particularly, and generally all that God has left in his holy scripture, that I should believe; instantly desiring you my leige lord and most worthy king, that this confession of mine may be justly examined by the most godly wise, and learned men of your realm. And if it be found in all points agreeing to the truth, then let it be allowed; and I acknowledged as none other than a true christian. If it be proved otherwise, then let it be utterly condemned; provided always, that I be taught a better belief by the word of God; and I shall most reverently at all times obey it."

This brief confession of his faith the Lord Cobham took to the court, offering it with all meekness to the king to read it over. The king would not receive it, but commanded it to be delivered to them that should be his judges. Then he desired in the king's presence, that an hundred knights and esquires might be suffered to come in upon his purgation, who he knew would clear him of all heresies. Moreover, he offered himself, after the law of arms, to fight for life or death with any man living, christian or heathen, in the quarrel of his faith, the king and the lords of his council excepted. Finally, with all gentleness he protested before all that were present, that he would refuse no manner of correction that should alter the laws of God be ministered to him, but that he would at all times with all meekness obey it. Notwithstanding all this the king suffered him to be summoned personally in his own privy chamber. There was nothing allowed that the Lord Cobham had required. But as he would not be sworn to submit himself to the church, and take what penance the archbishop would enjoin him; he was arrested again at the king's commandment, and led to the Tower of London.

As the day of examination was come, which was the 23d day of September, Thomas Arundel the archbishop, sitting in Caiaphas' room in the chapter-house of St. Paul's, with Richard Clifford bishop of London, and Henry Bolingbrook bishop of Winchester; Sir Robert Morely, knight and lieutenant of the Tower, brought Lord Cobham before them, to whom the archbishop thus spoke.

"Sir John, in the last general convocation of the clergy of this our province, you were detected of certain heresies, and by sufficient witnesses found culpable. Whereupon you were cited by form of spiritual law, and would in no case appear. In conclusion, upon your rebellious contumacy, you were both privately and openly excommunicated. Notwithstanding we neither shewed ourselves unready to have given you absolution (nor yet do to this hour) would ye have meekly asked it." To this the Lord Cobham seemed, as if he had not heard it, having his mind otherwise occupied, and so desired no absolution. But said, "He would gladly before him and his brethren make rehearsal of that faith which he held and intended always to stand to, if it would please them to license him thereto." And then he took out of his bosom a certain writing, concerning the articles whereof he was accused, and read it before them, giving it the archbishop as he concluded it.

Then the archbishop counselled with the other two bishops and with the doctors, what was to be done in this matter; commanding him to stand aside for the time. In conclusion by their common assent the archbishop thus addressed him; "Come hither, Sir John: in this your writing many good things are contained, and right catholic also, we deny it not: but you must consider that this day was appointed you to answer to other points concerning articles of which no mention is made in this your writing. And therefore you must declare to us your mind more plainly: "Whether you hold, affirm and believe that in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration rightly done by a priest, material bread remains, or not? Moreover, whether you do hold, affirm, and believe, that as concerning the sacrament of penance, every christian man is necessarily bound to confess his sins to a priest ordained by the church or not?"

After certain other communications, this was the answer of the good Lord Cobham. "That he would not declare his mind, nor yet answer to these articles in any other way, than was expressly contained in his writing." Then said the archbishop to him; "Sir John, beware what ye do. For if you answer not clearly to those things that are here objected against you, the law of the holy church is, That compelled once by a judge we may openly proclaim you an heretic." To whom he gave this answer: "Do as ye shall think best, for I am determined." Whatever he or the other bishops asked him, he bade them refer to his bill; for by it he would stand to the very death. He would not give them any other answer that day; at which the bishops and prelates were much amazed and disquieted.

The day following, the archbishop sent to him into the Tower, this foolish and blasphemous writing, made by him and by his unlearned clergy.

The Determination of the Archbishop and Clergy.

"The faith and determination of the holy church touching the blissful sacrament of the altar, is this: That after the sacramental words are once spoken by a priest in his mass, the material bread, that was before bread, is turned into Christ's very body. And the material wine, that was before wine, is turned into Christ's very blood. And so there remains in the sacrament of the altar, from thenceforth, no material bread, nor material wine, which were there before the sacramental words were spoken; how believe ye this article?"

"Holy church has determined that every christian man, living here bodily upon the earth, ought to confess to a priest ordained by the church, if he may come to him. How feel ye this article?"

"Christ ordained St. Peter the apostle to be his vicar here in earth, whose see is the holy church of Rome; and he granted, that the same power which he gave to Peter should succeed to all Peter's successors, whom we now call popes of Rome; by whose power in particular churches, are ordained prelates, as archbishops, bishops, parsons, curates, and other degrees; whom christian men ought to obey after the laws of the church of Rome. This is the determination of holy church. How feel ye this article?"

"Holy church has determined, that it is meritorious to a christian man to go on pilgrimage to holy places; and there especially to worship holy relics and images of saints, apostles, and martyrs, confessors, and all other saints beside, approved by the church of Rome. How feel ye this article?"

When Lord Cobham had read over this most wretched writing, he marvelled greatly at their mad ignorance. But he considered again, that God had given them over, for their unbelief's sake, into most deep errors and blindness of soul. He perceived by this, that their utmost malice was resolved against him, however he should answer. And therefore he put his life into the hands of God, desiring only his Spirit to assist him in his next answer. When the twenty-fifth day of September was come, Thomas Arundel, the archbishop of Canterbury, commanded his judicial seat to be removed from the chapter-house of St. Paul's, to the dominion friars within Ludgate, at London. And as he was there set with Richard, bishop of London; Henry, the bishop of Winchester; and Bennet, the bishop of Bangor: he called in unto him his council of his officers, with other doctors and friars. All these, with a great many more of priests, monks, canons, friars, parish clerks, bell-ringers, and pardoners, disdained Lord Cobham, with innumerable mocks and scorn, reckoning him to be an horrible heretic, and a man accursed before God.

Soon the archbishop called for a mass book, and caused all the prelates and doctors to swear that every man should faithfully do his office and duty that day. And that neither for favour nor fear, love nor hate, of the one party nor the other, should any thing be witnessed, spoken, or done, but according to the truth, as they would answer before God and all the world at the day of doom. Then were the two notaries sworn also to witness and to write the process that should be uttered by both parties, and to say their minds (if they otherwise knew) before they should register it. And all this dissimulation was but to colour their mischiefs, before the ignorant multitude.

After all this, Sir Robert Morley, knight, and lieutenant of the Tower, came before them, and brought with him the good Lord Cobham, leaving him there among them, as a lamb among wolves, to his examination and answer.

Then the archbishop said to him, "Lord Cobham, you are aware of the words and process which we had on Saturday last in the chapter-house of St. Paul's. I said to you then, that you were accursed for your contumacy and disobedience to the holy church."

Then Lord Cobham, with a cheerful countenance, answered: "God said by his holy prophet, 'I will curse your blessings,' Mal. ii. 2."

The archbishop continued. "Sir, at that time I gently offered to have absolved you if you would have asked it. And I still do the same if you will humbly desire it in due form and manner as holy church has ordained."

Then said the Lord Cobham; "Nay, I will not; for I never yet trespassed against you; and therefore I will not do it." And with that he kneeled down on the pavement, holding up his hands towards heaven, and said: "I confess myself here unto thee, my eternal living God, that in my frail youth I offended thee, O Lord, most grievously in pride, wrath, gluttony, and covetousness. Many men have I hurt in mine anger, and done many other horrible sins: good Lord, I ask thee mercy." And then weeping, he stood up again and said with a loud voice; "Lo! good people, lo! for the breaking of God's law, and his great commandments, they never yet cursed me; but for their own laws and traditions they most cruelly handle both me and other men. And therefore both they and their laws, by the promise of God, shall be utterly destroyed."

At this the archbishop and his company were not a little hurt. However, he took courage, and examined the Lord Cobham of his christian belief.

To which the Lord Cobham made this godly answer: "I believe fully and faithfully in the universal laws of God. I believe that all is true which is contained in the holy sacred scriptures of the bible. Finally, I believe all that my Lord God would I should believe." Then the archbishop demanded an answer to the bill which he and the clergy had sent to him to the Tower the day before, concerning the four articles whereof he was accused, especially concerning the sacrament of the altar, how he believed therein.

The Lord Cobham said, "That with that bill he had nothing to do. But this was his belief concerning the sacrament. That his Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, sitting at his last supper with his most dear disciples, the night before he suffered took bread in his hand; and giving thanks to his Eternal Father, blessed it, brake it, and so gave it to them, saying, 'Take, and eat this, for this is my body which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me.' This, (said he) do I believe, for this faith am I taught in the gospel of Matthew, in Mark, and Luke, and also in the first epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians."

Then the archbishop asked if he believed that it were bread after the consecration or sacramental words spoken over it.

Then Lord Cobham said; "I believe that in the sacrament of the altar is Christ's very body in form of bread, the same that was born of the Virgin Mary, crucified on the cross, dead, and buried, and that the third day arose from death to life, which now is glorified in heaven."

Then said one of the doctors of the law: "After the sacramental words be uttered, there remains no bread, but only the body of Christ."

The Lord Cobham said then to one Master John Whitehead: "You said once to me in the castle of Gwoling, that the sacred Host was not Christ's body. But I held then against you, and proved that therein was his body, though the seculars and friars could not therein agree, but held each one against the other in that opinion. These were my words then, if ye remember it."

Then a set of them shouted together, and cried with great noise: "We all say that it is God's body."

And many of them asked him, in great anger, whether it were material bread after the consecration or not?

Then the Lord Cobham looked earnestly upon the archbishop, and said: "I believe surely that it is Christ's body in form of bread: Sir, believe not you thus?"

And the archbishop said,—“Yes, do I.”

Then the doctors asked him whether it were only Christ's body after the consecration of a priest, and no bread, or not?

And he said to them: "It is both Christ's body and bread: I shall prove it thus: for like as Christ's dwelling here upon the earth had in him both godhead and manhood, and had the invisible godhead covered under that manhood, which was only visible and seen in him: so in the sacrament of the altar is Christ's very body and bread also, as I believe the bread is the thing that we see with our eyes, the body of Christ (which is his flesh and his blood) is thereunder hid, and not seen but in faith."

Then they smiled one upon another, that the people should judge him taken in a great heresy. And many of them said: "It is a foul heresy."

Then the archbishop asked what bread it was? And the doctors also inquired of him whether it were material or not?

Lord Cobham answered: "The scriptures make no mention of this word material, and therefore my faith hath nothing to do therewith. But this I say and believe, that it is Christ's body and bread. Therefore I say now again as I said before, as our Lord Jesus Christ is very God, and very man, so in the most blessed sacrament of the altar is Christ's very body and bread."

Then said they all with one voice: "It is an heresy."

One of the bishops stood up and said: "It is a manifest heresy, to say that it is bread after the sacramental words be once spoken."

Lord Cobham said: "St. Paul the apostle was, I am sure, as wise as you are now, and more godly learned, and he called it bread, writing to the Corinthians, 'The bread which we break,' saith he, 'is it not the communion of the body of Christ?' Lo, he called it bread and not Christ's body, but a means whereby we receive Christ's body."

Then they asked him if he believed not in the determination of the church?

And he said unto them,—"No; for it is no God. In all our creed the word is but thrice mentioned concerning belief: In God the Father, in God the Son, in God the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God. The birth, the death, the burial, the resurrection and ascent of Christ, hath no in for belief, but only in him. Neither yet hath the church the sacraments, the forgiveness of sin, the later resurrection, nor yet the life everlasting, nor any other in than in the Holy God."

Then said one of the lawyers: "But what is your belief concerning holy church?"

The Lord Cobham answered: "My belief is that all the scriptures of the sacred Bible are true. All that is grounded upon them I believe. But in your lordly laws and idle determinations I have no belief. For ye are no part of Christ's holy church, as your open deeds do shew: but ye are very antichrists, obstinately set against his holy law and will. The laws that ye have made are nothing to his glory, but only for your vain glory and abominable covetousness."

This, they said, was an exceeding heresy, not to believe the determination of holy church.

Then said the archbishop: "Can you tell me who is of the church?"

Then Lord Cobham answered: "Yes; truly I can. Christ saith, 'That like as the evil tree is known by its fruit, so is a false prophet by his works.'"

Then said Doctor Walden unto him: "Ye make here no difference of judgments: rash judgment and right judgment, all is one with you. So swift judges always are the learned scholars of Wickliff!"

To whom the Lord Cobham answered. "Preposterous are your judgments evermore. For as the prophet Isaiah saith: 'Ye call evil good and good evil;' and therefore the same prophet concludes; 'That your ways are not God's ways, nor God's ways your ways.' And as for the virtuous man Wickliff, whose judgments ye so highly disdain, I shall say here of my part, both before God and man, that before I knew that despised doctrine of his, I never abstained from sin. But since I learned therein to fear my Lord God, it has, I trust, been otherwise with me: I could never find so much grace in all your glorious instructions."

Then said Doctor Walden yet again unto him. "It were not well with me if I had no grace to amend my life, till I heard the devil preach."

The Lord Cobham said: "Your fathers, the old Pharisees, ascribed Christ's miracles to Beelzebub, and his doctrine to the devil. And you as their natural children have still the self-same judgment concerning his faithful followers. They that rebuke your vicious living must needs be heretics!" Then said he to them all: "To judge you as you are, we need go no further than to your own acts. Where do you find in all God's law, that ye should thus sit in judgment on any christian man, or give sentence upon any other man unto death, as ye do here daily? you have no ground in all the scripture so lordly to take it upon you, but in Annas and Caiaphas, who thus sat upon Christ, and upon his apostles after his ascension. Of them only have ye taken it to judge Christ's members as ye do, and neither of Peter nor John."

Then said some of the lawyers: "Yes, forsooth, sir, for Christ judged Judas."

The Lord Cobham said: "No; Christ judged him not, but he judged himself, and thereupon went forth and so did hang himself: since his venom was shed into the church ye never followed Christ."

Then the archbishop asked him, what he meant by the venom of Judas?

The Lord Cobham said, "Your possessions and lordships. Before that time all the bishops of Rome were martyrs in a manner. And since that time we read of very few. But since that time, one has put down another, one has poisoned another, one has cursed another, and one has slain another, and done much more mischief besides, as all the chronicles tell. And let all men consider this well, That Christ was meek and merciful; the pope is proud and a tyrant; Christ was poor and forgave, the pope is rich and a malicious manslayer, as his daily acts do prove him. Rome is the very nest of antichrist, and out of that nest come all his disciples. Of whom prelates, priests, and monks, are the body, these friars are the tail."

Then said he unto them all, "Christ saith in his gospel, 'Woe unto you, scribes and pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in;' but ye stop up the ways thereunto with your own traditions, and therefore are ye the household of antichrist; ye will not permit God's verity to have passage, nor yet to be taught of his true ministers, fearing to have your wickedness reprov'd. But by such flatterers as uphold you in your mischiefs, you suffer the common people most miserably to be seduced."

Then said the archbishop, "By our lady, sir, there shall none such preach within my diocese nor yet in my jurisdiction, as either make division or dissension among the poor commons."

The Lord Cobham said, "Both Christ and his apostles were accused of sedition making, yet were they most peaceable men. But Daniel and Christ prophesied, that such a troublous time should come, as hath not been yet since the world's beginning. And this prophecy is partly fulfilled in your days and doings; for many have ye slain already, and more will ye slay hereafter, if God fulfil not his promise."

Then a doctor of law, called Master John Kemp, plucked out of his bosom a copy of the bill which they had sent him into the Tower, thinking thereby to make shorter work with him. For they were so amazed with his answers (not all unlike to them who disputed with Stephen) that they knew not well how to occupy the time, their wits and sophistry so failed them that day.

"My Lord Cobham," said this doctor, "we must briefly know your mind concerning these four points here following. The first of them is this; (and then he read from the bill.) The faith and determination of holy church touching the blessed sacrament of the altar is this, That after the sacramental words be once spoken of a priest in his mass, the material bread, that was before bread, is turned into Christ's very body, and the material wine is turned into Christ's blood. And so there remaineth in the sacrament of the altar from thenceforth no material bread nor material wine, which were there before the sacramental words were spoken: sir, believe you not this?"

The Lord Cobham said, "This is not my belief. But my faith is, that in the worshipful sacrament of the altar is Christ's very body in form of bread."

Then said the archbishop, "Sir John, ye must say otherwise."

The Lord Cobham said, "Nay, that I will not, if God be upon my side (as I trust he is) but that there is Christ's body in form of bread, as the common belief is."

Then the doctor read again.

"The second point is this; holy church hath determined, that every christian man, living here bodily upon earth, ought to be confessed to a priest ordained by the church, if he may come to him. Sir, what say you to this?"

The Lord Cobham answered and said, "A diseased or sore wounded man hath need to have a wise surgeon. Most necessary were it therefore to be first confessed unto God, who only knoweth our diseases, and can help us. I deny not in this the going to a priest, if he be a man of good life and learning; for the laws of God are to be inquired of the priest, who is godly learned. But if he be an idiot, or a man of vicious living, that is my curate, I ought rather to fly from him than to seek to him."

Then the doctor read again.

"The third point is this; Christ ordained St. Peter the apostle to be his vicar here in earth, whose see is the church of Rome. And he granted that the same power which he gave unto Peter should succeed unto all Peter's successors, whom we call now popes of Rome. By whose special power in particular churches, he ordained prelates and archbishops, parsons, curates, and other degrees more, whom christian men ought to obey after the laws of the church of Rome. This is the determination of holy church. Sir, believe ye not this?"

To this he answered and said, "He that followeth Peter most nearly in pure living, is next unto him in succession. But your lordly order esteemeth not greatly the lowly behaviour of poor Peter whatsoever ye prate of him. Neither care ye greatly for the humble manners of them that succeeded him till the time of Sylvester, which for the more part were martyrs, as I told you before."

One of the other doctors asked him; "Then what do ye say of the pope?"

The Lord Cobham answered, "As I said before, so I say again; That he and you together make whole the great antichrist. Of whom he is the great head, you bishops, priests, prelates, and monks, are the body, and the begging friars are the tail, for they cover the filthiness of you both with their subtle sophistry: neither will I in conscience obey any of you all, till I see you with Peter follow Christ in conversation."

Then the doctor read again.

"The fourth point is this; holy church hath determined, that it is meritorious to a christian man, to go on pilgrimage to holy places, and there specially to worship the holy relics and images of saints, apostles, martyrs, confessors, and all other saints besides, approved by the church of Rome. Sir, what say you to this?"

He answered, "I owe them no service by any commandment of God. It were best ye sweep them far from cobwebs and dust, and so laid them, or else bury them, far in the ground, as ye do other aged people who are God's images."

"It is a wonderful thing that saints, now being dead, should become so covetous and needy, and thereupon so bitterly beg, who all their life time hated all covetousness and begging."

"Why, sir," said one of the clerks, "will ye not worship good images?"

"What worship should I give to them?" said the Lord Cobham.

Then said friar Palmer to him, "Sir, will ye worship the cross of Christ, that he died upon?"

"Where is it?" said the Lord Cobham.

The friar said, "I put you the case, sir, that it were here even now before you."

The Lord Cobham answered, "This is a wise man, to put me an earnest question of a thing, and yet he himself knows not where the thing itself is. Yet once again I ask you, what worship I should do to it?"

A clerk said unto him, "Such worship as Paul speaks of, and that is this; 'God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of Jesus Christ.'"

Then said the Lord Cobham, and spread his arms abroad; "Tis is the very cross, yea, and so much better than your cross of wood, in that it was created of God, yet will not I seek to have it worshipped."

Then said the bishop of London, "Sir, ye know well that he died on a material cross."

The Lord Cobham said, "Yea, and I know also, that our salvation came not in by that material cross, but alone by him who died thereon. And well I know, that holy St. Paul rejoiced in none other cross, but in Christ's passion and death only, and in his own sufferings of like persecution with him, for the self-same truth that he had suffered for before."

Another clerk asked him, "Will ye then do no honour to the holy cross?"

He answered him, "Yes, if it were mine own, I would lay him up honestly, and see unto him that he should take no more scathe abroad, nor be robbed of his goods, as he is now a-days."

Then said the archbishop unto him, "Sir John, much time have we spent here about you, and all in vain so far as I can see. We must now be at this short point with you, for the day passeth away: ye must either submit yourself to the ordinance of holy church, or else throw yourself into most deep danger. See to it in time, for it will be else too late."

The Lord Cobham said, "I know not to what purpose I should otherwise submit me. Much more have you offended me, than ever I offended you, in this troubling me before this multitude."

Then said the archbishop again unto him, "We once again require you to remember yourself well, and to have none other manner of opinion in these matters, than the universal faith and belief of the holy church of Rome is. And so like an obedient child return again to the unity of your mother. See to it, I say, in time, for yet ye may have remedy, whereas soon it will be too late."

The Lord Cobham said expressly before them all; "I will none otherwise believe in these points than that I have told you here before. Do with me what you will."

Finally, then the archbishop said; "Well, then I see none other but that we must needs do the law; we must proceed forth to the sentence definitive, and both judge you and condemn you for a heretic."

And with that the archbishop stood up and read a bill of his condemnation as follows:—

"In the name of God, so be it. We, Thomas, by the sufferance of God, archbishop of Canterbury, metropolitan and primate of all England, and legate from the apostolic see of Rome, will this to be known unto all men. In a certain cause of heresy, and upon diverse articles, whereupon Sir John Oldecastle, knight, Lord Cobham, after a diligent inquisition made for the same, was detected, accused, and presented before us in our last convocation of all our province of Canterbury, holden in the cathedral church of Paul's at London, at the lawful denouncement and request of our universal clergy of the said convocation, we proceeded against him according to the law (God to witness) with all the favour possible. And following Christ's example in all that we might, 'who willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he might be converted and live;' we took upon us to correct him, and sought all other ways possible to bring him again to the church's unity, declaring unto him what the holy and universal church of Rome hath said, holden, determined, and taught in that behalf. And though we found him in the catholic faith far wide, and so stiff-necked, that he would not confess his error, nor purge himself, nor yet repent him thereof; we yet pitying him of fatherly compassion, and entirely desiring the health of his soul, appointed him a competent time of deliberation, to see if he would repent and seek to be reformed: but since that time we have found him worse and worse. Considering, therefore, that he is not corrigible, we are driven to the very extremity of the law, and with great heaviness of heart we now proceed to the publication of the sentence definitive, against him."

Then he brought forth another bill, containing the sentence, and that he read also as follows:—

"We take Christ to witness, that we seek nothing else, in this our enterprise, but only his glory. Forasmuch as we have found by divers acts done, brought forth and exhibited, by sundry evidences, signs, and tokens, and also by many most manifest proofs, the said Sir John Oldcastle knight, Lord Cobham, not only to be an evident heretic in his own person, but also a mighty maintainer of other heretics against the faith and religion of the holy and universal church of Rome; namely, about the two sacraments (of the altar, and of penance) besides the pope's power and pilgrimages; and that he, as the child of iniquity and darkness, hath so hardened his heart, that he will in no case attend to the voice of his pastor; neither will he be allured by straight admonishments, nor yet be brought in by favourable words: the worthiness of the cause first weighed on the one side, and his unworthiness again considered on the other side, his faults also aggravated or made double through his damnable obstinacy (we being loath that he which is naught should be worse, and so with his contagiousness infect the multitude) by the sage counsel and assent of the very discreet fathers, our honourable brethren and lord bishops here present, Richard of London, Henry of Winchester, and Bennet of Bangor, and of other great learned and wise men here, both doctors of divinity, and of the laws canon and civil, secular and religious, with divers other expert men assisting us: we sentimentally and definitively by this present writing judge, declare and condemn the said Sir John Oldcastle knight, Lord Cobham, for a most pernicious detestable heretic, convicted upon the same, and refusing utterly to obey the church again, committing him here from henceforth as a condemned heretic, to the secular jurisdiction, power, and judgment, to do him thereupon to death. Furthermore, we excommunicate and denounce accursed, not only this heretic here present, but so many else besides, as shall hereafter in favour of his error either receive him or defend him, counsel him or help him, or any other way maintain him: as very favourers, receivers, defenders, counsellors, aiders, and maintainers of condemned heretics.

"And that these premises may be the better known of all faithful christian men, we commit it here unto your charges, and give you straight commandment thereupon by this writing also, that ye cause this condemnation and definitive sentence of excommunication concerning both this heretic and his favourers, to be published throughout all dioceses, in cities, towns, and villages, by your curates and parish priests, at such times as they shall have most recourse of people. And see that it be done after this sort: as the people are thus gathered devoutly together, let the curate every where go into the pulpit, and there open, declare, and expound this excess in the mother tongue, in an audible and intelligible voice, that it may be perceived of all men: and that upon the fear of this declaration also the people may fall from their evil opinions conceived now of late by seditious preachers. Moreover, we will, that after we have delivered unto each one of you bishops, which are here present, a copy hereof, that ye cause the same to be written out again into divers copies, and to be sent unto the other bishops and prelates, of our whole province, that they may also see the contents thereof solemnly published within their dioceses and cures. Finally, We will that both you and they signify again unto us seriously and distinctly by your writings as the matter is, without feigned colour, in every point performed; the day whereon ye received this process, the time when it was of us executed, and after what sort it was done in every condition, according to the tenor hereof, that we may know it to be justly the same."

After the archbishop had thus read the condemnation before the whole multitude, the Lord Cobham said with a most cheerful countenance, "Though ye judge my body, which is but a wretched thing, yet am I certain and sure that ye can do no harm to my soul, no more than could Satan unto the soul of Job. He that created that, will of his infinite mercy and promise save it. I have therein no manner of doubt. And as concerning these articles before rehearsed I will stand to them even to the very death, by the grace of my eternal God."

And therewith he turned him unto the people, casting his hands abroad, and saying with a very loud voice, "Good christian people, for God's love be well aware of these men, for they will else beguile you, and lead you blindfold into hell with themselves. For Christ saith plainly unto you, If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch."

After this, he fell down upon his knees, and thus before them all prayed for his enemies, holding both his hands and his eyes towards heaven, and saying, "Lord God eternal, I beseech thee of thy great mercy sake to forgive my persecutors, if it be thy blessed will." And then he was delivered to Sir Robert Morley, and led forth again to the Tower of London, and thus there was an end of that day's work.

While the Lord Cobham was thus in the Tower, he sent out privily to his friends, and they at his request wrote the following letter, causing it to be set up in divers quarters of London, that the people should not believe the slanders and lies that his enemies, the bishops' servants and priests, had made on him abroad.

"Forasmuch as Sir John Oldcastle, knight, and Lord Cobham, is untruly convicted and imprisoned, falsely reported and slandered among the common people by his adversaries, that he thinks and speaks of the sacraments of the church, and especially of the blessed sacrament of the altar, otherwise than was written in the confession of his belief, which was written and taken to the clergy, and so set up in several open places of the city of London, be it known here to all the world, that he never since varied from it, but this is plainly his belief, that all the sacraments of the church are profitable and expedient to all that shall be saved, taking them after the intent that Christ and his true church has ordained. Furthermore he believes, that the blessed sacrament of the altar is verily and truly Christ's body in form of bread."

After this, the bishops and priests were in great discredit both with the nobility and commons; partly because they had so cruelly handled the good Lord Cobham, and partly because his opinion, as they thought, was right concerning the sacrament. The prelates feared this would become a further inconvenience to them; they consulted, and consented to take a different course from what they had done before. They caused it to be spread abroad by their servants and friends, that Lord Cobham had submitted himself to holy church, utterly changing his opinion concerning the sacrament. And they counterfeited an abjuration in his name, that the people should take no hold of his opinion by anything they had heard of him before, and so should stand the more in awe of them, considering that he was so great a man, and yet was subdued by them.

This, say they, is the abjuration of Sir John Oldcastle, knight, sometime the Lord Cobham :—

An Abjuration counterfeited by the Bishops.

"In the name of God, Amen. I, John Oldcastle, denounced, detected, and convicted of and upon various articles, savouring both of heresy and error, before the reverend father in Christ and my good lord, Thomas, by the permission of God, lord archbishop of Canterbury, and my lawful and rightful judge in that behalf, expressly grant and confess, that as concerning the estate and power of the most holy father the pope of Rome, of his archbishops, his bishops, and his other prelates, the degrees of the church, and the holy sacraments of the same, specially of the sacraments of the altar, of penance, and other observances besides of our mother holy church, as pilgrimages and pardons; I affirm, (I say) before the said reverend father archbishop and elsewhere, that I being evilly seduced by divers seditious preachers, have grievously erred, and heretically persisted, blasphemously answered, and obstinately rebelled; and therefore I am by the said reverend father, before the reverend fathers in Christ also, the bishops of London, Winchester, and Bangor, lawfully condemned for an heretic.

"Yet, nevertheless, I now remembering myself, and desiring by this mean to avoid that temporal pain which I am worthy to suffer as an heretic, at the assignation of my most excellent Christian prince and liege lord, King Henry V., now by the grace of God most worthy king both of England and of France; minding also to prefer the wholesome determination, sentence, and doctrine of the holy universal church of Rome, before the unwholesome opinions of myself, my teachers, and my followers, I freely, willingly, deliberately, and thoroughly confess, grant, and affirm, that the most holy fathers in Christ, St. Peter the apostle, and his successors bishops of Rome, specially now at this time, my most blessed Lord Pope John, by the permission of God, the three and twentieth pope of that name, who now holdeth Peter's seat (and each of them in their succession) hath full strength and power to be Christ's vicar in earth, and the head of the church militant, and that by the strength of his office he hath full authority and power to rule and govern, bind and loose, save and destroy, accurse and absolve all other Christian men.

"And agreeably still unto this I confess, grant, and affirm all other archbishops, bishops, and prelates in their provinces, dioceses, and parishes (appointed by the said pope of Rome to assist him in his doings or business), by his decrees, canons, or virtue of his office, to have had in times past, to have now at this time, and that they ought to have in time to come, authority and power to rule and govern, bind and loose, accurse and absolve the subjects or people of their aforesaid provinces, dioceses, and parishes, and that their said subjects or people ought of right in all things to obey them. Furthermore, I confess, grant, and affirm, that the said spiritual fathers, as our most holy father the pope, archbishops, bishops, and prelates, have had, have now, and ought to have hereafter, authority and power for the state, order, and governance of their subjects or people, to make laws, decrees, statutes, and constitutions, yes, and to publish, command, and compel their said subjects and people to the observation of them.

"Moreover, I confess, grant, and affirm, that all these aforesaid laws, decrees, statutes, and constitutions, made, published, and commanded according to the form of the spiritual law, all christian people, and every man in himself is straightly bound to observe, and meekly to obey, according to the diversity of the aforesaid powers, as the laws, statutes, canons, and constitutions of our most holy father the pope, incorporated in his decrees, decretals, clementines, codes, charts, rescripts, sextiles, and extravagants over all the world; and as the provincial statutes of archbishops in their provinces, the synodal acts of bishops in their dioceses, and the commendable rules and customs of prelates in their colleges, and curates in their parishes, all christian people are both bound to observe, and also most meekly to obey. Over and besides all this, I, John Oldcastle, utterly forsaking and renouncing all the aforesaid errors and heresies, and all other errors and heresies like them, lay my hand here upon this book, or holy gospel of God, and swear, that I will never more from henceforth hold these heresies, nor yet any other like them wittingly. Neither will I give counsel, aid, help, or favour at any time, to them that shall hold, teach, affirm, and maintain the same, as God shall help me, and these holy evangelists.

"And that I will from henceforth faithfully obey and inviolably observe all the holy laws, statutes, canons, and constitutions, of all the popes of Rome, archbishops, bishops, and prelates, which are contained and determined in their holy decrees, decretals, clementines, codes, charts, rescripts, sextiles, sums, papal extravagants, statutes provincial, acts synodal, and other ordinary rules and customs constituted by them, or that shall chance hereafter directly to be determined or made. To these, and all such other, will I myself with all power possible apply. Besides all this, the penance which it shall please my said reverend father the lord archbishop of Canterbury hereafter to enjoin me for my sins, I will meekly obey and faithfully fulfil. Finally, all my seducers and false teachers, and all other beside, whom I shall hereafter know suspected of heresy or errors, I shall effectually present, send or cause to be presented unto my said reverend father lord archbishop, or to them who have his authority, so soon as I can conveniently do it, and see that they be corrected to my utmost power."

This abjuration never came to the hands of the Lord Cobham, neither was it compiled by them for that purpose, but only to bear the eyes of the unlearned multitude for a time.

After Lord Cobham had remained in the Tower a certain time, he escaped one night, it is not known by what means, and fled into Wales, where he continued four years.

Sir Roger Acton also was apprehended, condemned and put to death or martyrdom three years and more before the Lord Cobham died. Likewise master John Brown, and John Beverley, the preacher, suffered with him the same kind of death (as some say) in the field of St. Giles, with others, to the number of thirty-six, if the story be true. Which was in the month of January, A.D. 1414, after the computation of our English histories.

These men, as is said, suffered before Lord Cobham about three years. Some say they were hanged and burnt in St. Giles' field; others that only some of them were hanged and burnt. Polydore, speaking only of their burning, makes no mention of hanging. An English Chronicle records of Sir Roger Acton, that his sentence before the justice was to be drawn through London to Tyburn, and there to be hanged. And when certain days were past (saith the author) a trumpeter of the king's called Thomas Cliff, got grant of the king to take him down, and to bury him.

After the decease or martyrdom of these, who were executed in the month of January, A.D. 1414, in the next month, and in the same year, God took away the great enemy of his word, and rebel to his king, Thomas Arundel archbishop of Canterbury: whose death following after the execution of these good men, by the marvelous stroke of God so suddenly, may seem somewhat to declare their innocency, and that he was also some great procurer of their death, in that God would not suffer him longer to live, striking him immediately with death. But as I did the other before, so this also I refer to the secret judgment of the Lord, who once shall judge all secrets openly.

Henry Chicheley succeeded next in the see of Canterbury, A.D. 1414, and sat five-and-twenty years. Following the steps of his predecessor, he showed himself no small adversary against the favourers of the truth. In his time there was much trouble and great affliction in the church. For as the preaching and teaching of the word multiplied and spread abroad daily more and more, so on the contrary side, more vigilant care and straight inquisition increased against the people of God, by reason of which many suffered, and were burned; some for fear fled the country: many were brought for examination, and by infirmity constrained to abjure.

As true piety and sincere preaching of Christ's word began at this time to decay; so idle monkery and vain superstition in place thereof began to increase. For about the same year the king began the foundation of two monasteries, one of the one side of Thames, of Friars Observants, the other on the other side of Thames called Sheen and Zion, dedicated to charter-house-monks, with certain Bridget-nuns or recluses, to the number of sixty, dwelling within the precincts, so that the whole number of these with priests, monks, deacons, and nuns, should equal the number of twelve apostles, and seventy-two disciples. The order of these was according to the description of St. Paul the apostle, Col. i. 24, "Eat not, taste not, touch not," &c. was to eat no flesh, to wear no linen, to touch no money, &c.

About Michaelmas, the same year, the king began his parliament at Leicester. In which parliament the commons put up their bill again, which they had put up before in the eleventh year of Henry IV. that temporalities, disorderly wasted by the men of the church, might be converted and employed to the use of the king, of his earls and knights, and to the relief of the poor people, as is before recited. In fear of which bill lest the king would give thereto any audience (as testifies Robert Fabian and other writers) the prelates put the king in mind to claim his right in France. Whereupon Henry Chicheley archbishop of Canterbury made a long and solemn oration before the king to persuade him to the same, offering to the king in the behalf of the clergy great and noble sums. By which (saith Fabian) the bill was again put off, and the king set his mind for the recovery of the same.

I will now return to other matters of the church.

The History of the Bohemians.

I declared a little before how by the occasion of Queen Anne, who was a Bohemian, and married to King Richard II., the Bohemians coming thereby to the knowledge of Wickliff's books here in England, began first to taste and favour Christ's gospel, till at length by the preaching of John Huss, they increased more and more in knowledge. Inasmuch that Pope Alexander V. hearing of it, directs his bull to the archbishop of Swinco, requiring him to look to the matter, and to provide that no person in churches, schools, or other places, should maintain that doctrine, citing also John Huss to appear before him. John Huss in answer, declared that the mandate or bull of the pope was opposed to the manifest examples and doings both of Christ and of his apostles, and prejudicial to the liberty of the gospel, in binding the word of God so as not to have free course. And therefore from this mandate of the pope he appealed to the same pope better advised. But while he was prosecuting his appeal, Pope Alexander died, as is aforesaid.

After him succeeded Pope John XXIII., who sought by all means possible to suppress the Bohemians, beginning to work his malice upon John Huss their preacher, who preaching at Prague, seemed willing to teach the gospel of Christ, rather than the traditions of bishops, and was therefore accused to the pope as a heretic. The bishop committed the whole matter to Cardinal de Columna; who, when he had heard the accusation, appointed a day to John Huss, that he should appear in the court of Rome: which thing once done, Wenceslaus king of the Romans, and of Bohemia, at the request of his wife Sophia, and of the whole nobility of Bohemia, as also at the earnest suit and desire of the town and university of Prague, sent his ambassadors to Rome, to desire the bishop to deliver John Huss from that sentence and judgment: and that if the bishop suspected the kingdom of Bohemia to be infected with any heretical or false doctrine, he should send his ambassadors, who might correct and amend the same, if there were any error or fault in them. And that all this should be done at the costs and charges of the king of Bohemia; and to promise in his name that he would aid and assist the bishop's legates with all his power and authority, to punish all such as should be taken or found in any erroneous doctrine. John Huss, also, before his appointed day, sent his proctors to the court of Rome, and with most firm and strong reasons proved his innocence. But when the Cardinal de Columna, (to whose will and judgment the whole matter was committed) would not admit any defence or excuse, John Huss' proctors appealed to the high bishop: yet notwithstanding this last refuge did not so prevail with Cardinal de Columna, but that he openly excommunicated John Huss as an obstinate heretic, because he came not at his appointed day to Rome.

However, as his proctors had appealed to the high bishop, they had other judges appointed, as Cardinal Aquileianus and Cardinal Venetus, with others. The judges, after they had deferred the matter for the space of one year and a half, at last returned to the sentence and judgment of Cardinal de Columna, and confirming it, commanded John Huss' proctors that they should leave off defending him any more, for they would suffer it no longer. Upon which, when his proctors would not cease their urgent suit, some of them were cast into prison, and grievously punished, the others leaving their business undone, returned into Bohemia.

The Bohemians, however, little cared for all this, but continuing still, as they grew more in knowledge, so the less they regarded the pope, complaining daily against him and the archbishop for stopping the word of God, and the gospel of Christ to be preached, saying, "That by their indulgences and other practices of the court of Rome, and of the bishop's consistory, they sought their own profit, and not the glory of Jesus Christ; that they took from the sheep of Christ the wool and milk, and did not feed them, either with the word of God, or with good examples. Teaching moreover and affirming, that the commandments of the pope and prelates are not to be obeyed, but so far as they follow the doctrine and life of Christ and of his apostles; and that laymen ought to judge the works of prelates, as Paul judged the works of Peter in correcting him, Gal. ii. Furthermore, they had amongst them certain notes and observations, whereby they might discern how far and wherein they might obey their prelates; they derided also and scorned the pope's jurisdiction, because of the schism that was then in the church, when there were three popes together, one striving against another for the papacy.

After the death of the Archbishop Swinco, one Conrad was appointed by the pope as chief general, this Conrad conferring with the divines and doctors of the university of Prague, required their advice and counsel, what way they should best take to assuage the dissension and discord between the clergy and the people. So a council was devised and holden, where it was decided after this manner.

"1. That all doctors and masters of the university of Prague should be assembled in the court of the archbishop, and in his presence, that every doctor and master should swear, not to hold or maintain any of the forty-five articles of John Wickliff before condemned.

"2. Concerning the seven sacraments of the church, the keys and censures of the church, the manners, rites, ceremonies, customs, and liberties of the church, concerning also the worshipping of reliques and indulgences, the orders and religions of the church, that every one shall swear that he holds, believes, and maintains, and will maintain, as does the church of Rome, and no otherwise, of the which church of Rome the pope is the head, and the college of cardinals is the body: who are the true and manifest successors of blessed St. Peter prince of the apostles, and of the college of the other apostles of Christ.

"3. That every one shall swear, that in every catholic matter, belonging to the church, he will stand to the determination of the apostolical see, and that he will obey the prelates in all manner of things, wheresoever the thing, which is purely good, is not forbidden; or that which is mere ill, is not commanded; but is mean and indifferent between both. Which mean or indifferent thing, yet notwithstanding by circumstances of time, place or person, may be either good or evil.

"4. That every one shall swear and confess by his oath, that the opinions of Wickliff and others, touching the seven sacraments of the church, and other things above notified, being contrary to the church of Rome are false.

"5. That an oath be required of them all, that none of them shall hold, defend, or maintain any of the forty-five articles of John Wickliff aforesaid, or in any other matter catholic, and especially of the seven sacraments and other articles above specified, but only as the church of Rome does, and no otherwise.

"6. That every ordinary in his diocese shall cause the premises, contained in the first, second, third, and fourth articles, to be published in his synods, and by his preachers to the people in the kingdom of Bohemia.

"7. If any clerk, student, or layman shall withstand any of the premises, that the ordinary have authority, if he be convicted thereof, to correct him according to the old laws and canons, and that no man shall defend such a one by any means; for none but the ordinary has power to correct such a man, because the archbishop is chancellor both of the kingdom and university of Prague.

"8. That the songs lately forbidden, being odious, slanderous, and offensive to others' fame, be not sung either in streets, taverns, or any other place.

"9. That Master John Huss shall not preach so long as he shall have no absolution of the court, nor shall hinder the preaching in Prague by his presence; that by this, his obedience in the apostolical see may be known.

"10. That this council appears to be good and reasonable for the putting away of ill report and dissension that is in the kingdom of Bohemia.

"11. If Master John Huss with his accomplices will perform this, which is contained in the four former articles, then we will be ready to say as they would wish us and have us, whenever need shall require, that we do agree with them in matter of faith: otherwise if they will not so do, we in giving this testimony, should lie greatly unto our lord the king and the whole world. And moreover, we will be content to write for them to the court of Rome, and do the best we can for them."

This counsel and devise being considered amongst the heads of the university of Prague, the aforesaid administrator named Conrad, presented it to the king and to the barons of the realm, and also to the senate of Prague. As soon as information of it came to John Huss and his adherents, they likewise drew out other articles in manner and form of a council as follows:

"For the honour of God and the true preaching of his gospel, for the health of the people, and to avoid the sinister and false infamy of the kingdom of Bohemia, and of the marquis of Moravia, and of the city and university of Prague, and for the reforming of peace and unity between the clergy and the scholars of the university:

"1. Let the right and just decree of the princes, and of the king's council, be held in force, which between the Lord Archbishop Swinco on the one party, and between the rector and Master John Huss on the other party, was made, proclaimed, sealed, and solemnly on both parts received and allowed in the court of our sovereign lord the king.

"2. That the kingdom of Bohemia remain in its former rites, liberties, and common customs, as other kingdoms and lands; that is, in all approbations, condemnations, and other acts concerning the holy mother universal church.

"3. That Master John Huss (against whom the aforesaid Lord Swinco could object no crime before the council) may be present in the congregation of the clergy, and there whoever will object to him either heresy or error, let him object, binding himself to suffer the like pain, if he do not prove it.

"4. If no man will set himself on the contrary part against him, then let the command be made by our sovereign lord the king through all his cities, and likewise let it be ordained and proclaimed through all villages and towns, that Master John Huss is ready to render account of his faith, and therefore if any will object to him any heresy or error, let him write his name in the chancery of the lord archbishop, and bring forth his proofs openly before both the parties.

"5. If none such shall be found to object, or who will write his name, then let him be called for, who rumoured in the pope's court, that in the kingdom of Bohemia, in the city of Prague, and in the marquisdom of Moravia there were many whose hearts are infected with heresy and error, that they may prove who they are, and if they are not able to prove it, let them be punished.

"6. That commands be directed to doctors of divinity and of the canon law, and to the chapter of cathedral churches, and that it be required of them all and of every one particularly, that they will bring forth his name, if they know any such to be an heretic or erroneous, and if they deny to know any such, then let them make recognition thereof, before the public notary, confirming the same with their seals.

"7. These things thus done and premised, then that our sovereign lord the king, and also that the archbishop will give commandment under pain, that no man shall call one another heretic or erroneous, unless he will stand to the proof of that heresy or error.

"8. That our sovereign lord the king, with the consent of his barons, will then levy a subsidy, or collect of the clergy, and direct an honest embassy to the pope's court, with which ambassadors let those persons go at their own proper charges or expenses for their purgation, who have caused this kingdom to be falsely and grievously defamed in the apostolical court.

"9. In the mean time for the presence of Master John Huss, no interdict ought to be made, as it was made of late contrary to the order and determination of our holy mother church."

As this matter was thus in altercation between the two parties, the one objecting, the other answering, it happened by the occasion of Ladislaus king of Naples, who had besieged the pope's towns and territories, that Pope John raising up war against Ladislaus, gave full remission of sins to all them which would war on his side to defend the church. When this bull of the pope's indulgence was come to Prague, and there published, the King Wenceslaus, who then favoured that pope, gave command that no man should attempt anything against the pope's indulgences. But Huss with his followers, not able to abide the impiety of those pardons, began to speak against them; of which company were three certain artificers, who, hearing the priest preaching these indulgences, openly spoke against them, and called the pope antichrist, who would set up the cross to fight against his fellow christians. For this they were brought before the senate, and committed to prison; but the people joining together in arms, came to the magistrates, requiring them to be let loose. The magistrates with gentle words and fair promises satisfied the people, so that every man returning home to his own house, the tumult was assuaged; but the captains being in prison were there beheaded, whose names were John, Martin, and Stascon. The death and martyrdom of these three being known to the people, they took the bodies of them that were slain, and with great solemnity brought them to the church of Bethlehem. And so their bodies were sumptuously interred in the church of Bethlehem, John Huss, preaching at the funeral, much commending them for their constancy, and blessing God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who had hid the way of his truth from the prudent of this world, and had revealed it to the simple lay people and inferior priests, who chose rather to please God than men.

Thus the city of Prague was divided. The prelates with the greatest part of the clergy, and most of the barons, who had anything to lose, did hold with the pope, especially Steven Paletz, being the chiefest doer on that side. On the contrary part the commons with part of the clergy and students of the university, went with John Huss. Wenceslaus the king, fearing lest this would grow to a tumult, being moved by the doctors, and prelates, and council of his barons, thought best to remove John Huss out of the city, who had been excommunicated before by the pope. And further to end this dissension in the church, he committed the matter to the doctors and the clergy. They, consulting together among themselves, set forth a decree, ratified and confirmed by the sentence of the king, containing the sum of eighteen articles, for the maintenance of the pope and of the see of Rome, against the doctrine of Wickliff and John Huss. John Huss, thus departing out of Prague, went to his country, where, being protected by the lord of the soil, he continued preaching there, to whom resorted a great concourse of people, neither yet was he so expelled out of Prague, but that sometimes he resorted to his church at Bethlehem, and there also preached unto the people.

Against the decree of the doctors John Huss, with his company, replied, and answered to their articles with contrary articles, as follow :—

"1. The foundation of the doctors, upon which they found all their writings and counsels, is false, which foundation is, that part of the clergy in the kingdom of Bohemia is pestilent and erroneous, and holds falsely of the sacraments.

"2. The doctors hereby do defame the kingdom of Bohemia, and do raise up new discords.

"3. Let them show, therefore, those persons of the clergy, whom they call pestilent, and so let them verify their report, binding themselves to suffer the like pain if they be not able to prove it.

"4. It is false what they say of the pope and his cardinals as the true and manifest successors of Peter and of the apostles, and that no other successors of Peter and of the apostles can be found upon the earth besides them, when no man knows whether he is worthy of hatred or of favour, and all bishops and priests are successors of Peter and of the apostles.

"5. Not the pope, but Christ only is the head; and not the cardinals, but all Christ's faithful people are the body of the catholic church, as all holy scripture and decrees of the holy fathers testify and affirm.

"6. And as touching the pope, if he be a reprobate, it is plain that he is no head,—no, nor member even of the holy church of God, but of the devil, and of his synagogue.

"7. The clergy of the gossellers agreeing with the saying of St. Austin which they allege, and according to the sanctions of the fathers, and determinations of the holy mother church, say and affirm laudably, that the condemnation and prohibition of the forty-five articles is unlawful, and unjust, and rashly done; and that not only because the doctors, but also all bishops and archbishops, in such great causes, namely, touching faith, as these articles do, have no authority at all.

"8. The second cause of the discord, which they allege, also is most false; seeing the faith of all Christendom, concerning the church of Rome, is divided in three parts by reason of three popes, which now together do reign; and the fourth part is neutral. Neither is it true, that we ought to stand in all things to the determination of the pope, and of the cardinals, but so far as they agree with the holy scripture of the Old and New Testament.

"9. In the fourth article they run into dotage, and are contrary to themselves; because they dotishly reprehended the gossellers, who, in all their doings, receive the holy scripture (which is the law of God, the way of truth and life) for their judge and measure; and afterward they themselves allege the scripture, Deut. xvii. where all judges, both popes and cardinals, are taught to judge and discern between leper and leper, and in every ecclesiastical cause, only after the rule of God's law. And so are they contrary to their second article, wherein they say, that in every catholic matter we must run to the pope, which is contrary to the foolish condemnation of the articles aforesaid.

"10. Consequently, like idiots, they most falsely allege for their purpose the canon, under the name and authority of Jerome, where they do apply the words of Jerome most impertinently to the pope of Rome, which he writes to St. Austin, calling him a most blessed pope.

"11. By which place of Jerome it is manifest that the first article of those doctors is false. For by these words it appears that other besides the bishop of Rome and his cardinals are called blessed popes, holding the faith and seat of Peter, and are successors of the apostles, as was Austin and other holy bishops.

"12. It follows moreover, that the church of Rome is not that place where the Lord appointed the principal see of his whole church; for Christ, who was the head priest of all, first sat in Jerusalem, and Peter sat first in Antioch, and afterwards in Rome. Also other popes sat some in Bononia, some at Perusium, some at Avignon.

"13. The prelates are falsifiers of the holy scriptures and canons, and therefore are worthy to be punished, who affirm and say, that we must obey the pope in all things, because it is known that many popes have erred, and one pope was also a woman; to whom not only it was not lawful to give obedience, but also unlawful to communicate with them.

"14. Their sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh articles are grounded upon untrue and false persuasions, and therefore are to be rejected and detested, seeing they induce not to peace and verity, but to dissension and falsity.

"15. It is manifest also to the laity, that this dissension among the clergy rises for no other cause, but only for the preaching of the gospel, which reprehends such simoniacs and heretics in the church of God as haunt the court of Rome, spreading out their branches abroad into all the world, who deserved to be removed and extirpated, not only by the clergy gossellers, but also by the secular power. And so these three vices, to wit, simony, luxury, and avarice (which is idolatry), are the causes of all this dissension among the clergy in the kingdom of Bohemia. These three vices being removed, peace and unity would soon be restored in the clergy.

"16. Moreover, their last article is too gross, and not only is without all law, but also without all colour of law; whereas they fondly and childishly argue thus, that the processes made against Master John Huss ought to be obeyed, because forsooth the common sort of the clergy of Prague have received them. By the same reason they may argue also, that we must obey the devil, for our first parents Adam and Eve obeyed him. Also our ancestors before us were pagans, wherefore we must obey them, and be pagans also.

"17. But let this frivolous opinion go: this is certain truth, that the processes made against Master John Huss, are by law null and void; for they were obtained, drawn, wrought, and executed contrary to the commission of the pope, against the determination of the holy mother church.

"18. Finally, whoever wittingly and obstinately defends and executes the said process made, are all to be counted as blasphemers, excommunicate, and heretics."

To these objections of John Huss the doctors again answered in a long tedious process; the scope of which principally tended to defend the principality of the pope, and to maintain his obedience above all other potentates in the world, affirming and contending, that although Christ is the head alone of the whole multitude of them that are sleeping in purgatory, and which are labouring in the church militant, and which are resting in heaven, yet this hinders not, but the pope is head of the church here militant, that is, of all the faithful, which here in this world live under his office, &c.

Thus then Master John Huss being driven out of Prague by these doctors, and moreover being so excommunicated that no mass must be said where he was present, the people began mightily to grudge and to cry out against the prelates and other popish priests, who were the workers thereof, accusing them to be simoniacs, covetous, immoral, adulterers, proud; sparing not to lay open their vices to their great ignominy and shame, and greatly crying for a reformation amongst the clergy.

The king seeing the inclination of the people, and being not ignorant of the wickedness of the clergy, began, under pretence of reforming the church, to require greater exactions upon such priests and men of the clergy as were known and accused to be wicked livers. Upon which they that favoured John Huss, taking the occasion, complained of all, accused many, and spared none, whoever they knew to be of the popish faction, or enemies to John Huss. By reason of which the popish clergy were brought, such as were faulty into great distress, and such as were not faulty, into great fear, so that they were glad to fall in, at least not to fall out, with the protestants, being afraid to displease them. By this means Master Huss began to take some more liberty, and to preach in his church at Bethlehem; by the same means the people also received some comfort, and the king much gain and money.

And thus the popish clergy, while they went about to persecute John Huss, were entrapped themselves in great tribulation, and afflicted on every side, so that women and children were against them; and by the means with which they thought to entangle him, they were overthrown themselves.

As there was a council held at Rome four years before, against the articles and books of John Wickliff, it will not be impertinent nor out of purpose to repeat a certain merry history, and worthy otherwise to be noted, written by Nicholas Clemangis, of a certain spirit which ruled the popish councils; his words are these:—

“The pope called a council at Rome about four years before, at the earnest suit of several men, and a mass of the Holy Ghost being said at the opening of the council (according to the accustomed manner), the council being set, and Pope John sitting highest in a chair prepared for him for that purpose, behold, an ugly and dreadful owl, or as the common proverb is, the evil sign of some mischance of death, flew to and fro, with her evil favoured voice, and standing upon the middle beam of the church, cast her staring eyes upon the pope. The whole company began to marvel, to see the night-crow, which is wont to abide no light, how he should in the mid-day come in the face of such a multitude, and judged (not without cause) that it was an ill-favoured token. For behold, said they (whispering one in another's ear) the spirit appears in the shape of an owl. And as they stood beholding one another, and advising the pope, scarcely could they keep their countenance from laughter. John himself, upon whom the owl steadfastly looked, blushing at the matter, began to sweat, and to fret, and fume with himself, and not finding by what other means he might solve the matter, being so confused, dissolved the council, and rose up and departed. After that there followed another session, in which the owl again, after the manner sforesaid although, as I believe, not called, was present, looking steadfastly upon the bishop. He beholding it come again, was more ashamed than he was before, saying he could no longer abide the sight of her, and commanded that she should be driven away with bats and shoutings; but she being afraid neither with their noise, neither at anything else, would not go away, until with the strokes of the sticks, which were thrown down at her, she fell down dead before them all.”

The Council of Constance.

Here is to be noted, that during all this time of Pope John, there were three popes together for twenty-nine years, on account of which a general council was held at Constance, (A. D. 1414,) called by the emperor Sigismund, and Pope John XXIII., for healing the schism between the three popes striving for the popedom. The first was John whom the Italians set up. The second was Gregory, whom the French set up. The third was Benedict, whom the Spaniards set up. In this conflict every one defended his own pope, to the great disturbance of the christian nations. This council continued four years, and in it all matters were decided mostly by four nations, viz. the English, German, French, and Italian. Out of which four nations there were appointed four presidents, to determine the matters of the council. The names of which presidents were these: John the patriarch of Antioch for France, Anthony, archbishop of Reigen for Italy, Nicholas, archbishop of Geneva for Germany, and Nicholas bishop of Bath for England. First, this John XXIII. resigned his papacy, the emperor giving him thanks kissed his feet. This John afterward repenting that he had done so, sought means to flee; so changing his garments, he fled by night with a small company. The emperor pursuing, took him, and being thus deposed, he was carried to the castle of Manheim, where he was kept prisoner for the space of three years.

This Pope John was deposed by the decree of the council, more than three-and-forty most grievous and heinous crimes being objected and proved against him; as that he had hired a physician to poison Alexander his predecessor; that he was an heretic, a simoniac, a liar, an hypocrite, a murderer, a dice-player, an adulterer, and finally, what crime is it that he was not infected with?

And now to return to the council, first we will declare the order of their sessions, with the things therein concluded, in general; then we will (Christ willing) treat of such matters as pertain to the history of the Bolemans, and John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, who in the same ungodly council were condemned and burned.

This council therefore of Constance, which was summoned by the emperor Sigismund, and Pope John XXIII. (A. D. 1414), assembled about the latter end of the year. Which beginning, as the manner is, with a mass of the Holy Ghost, as they were singing according to their custom their hymn, “Come Holy Spirit,” &c., there was at the same time a certain paper set up in the church, wherein were contained these words following: “We (i. e. The Spirit) are otherwise occupied at this time, so we cannot come to you.” The council continued for the space of four years, and had five-and-forty sessions, wherein many things were concluded, which altogether were too long to be recited in this place; as the deposition of three several popes. Yet I mind to make some brief recapitulation of the principal matters.

In the first session chiefly was concluded,

1. That this council was lawfully assembled.

2. That the departure of the pope should be no hindrance, but the council might proceed.

3. This council should not be dissolved before the church were reformed, as well in the superiors as inferiors.

In the fourth session, this was first concluded; that a synod assembled in the Holy Ghost, making a general council, representing the whole catholic church here militant, has power from Christ immediately, to which power every person, of what state or dignity soever he be, yea, the pope himself, ought to be obedient in all such things as concern the general reformation of the church, as well in the heads, as in the members.

Also the pope should not translate the court of Rome, and the officers of the court, from the city of Constance. And that all his censures, doings and workings, to the prejudice of this council, should be of no effect.

In the fifth session the same articles were repeated and concluded again.

In the sixth session commissioners were appointed out of the four nations for the hearing of John Huss.

The memory of John Wickliff was condemned, and the sentence, given in the council held at Rome upon the condemnation and burning of Wickliff's books, was confirmed.

In the same session, citation was sent out against Jerome of Prague.

In the seventh session nothing was handled, but that the tenor of the citation against Pope John was recited.

In the eighth session, the sentence and condemnation of John Wickliff and his forty-five articles was recited, and sentence given against his memory, and bones to be burned.

In the ninth session the matter and cause of Pope

John was again treated, and commissioners appointed to inquire upon his cause, and judges for the same.

In the tenth session suspension was given out and read against the pope.

In the eleventh and twelfth sessions notaries were assigned and definitive sentence given against the pope: where also it was decreed that none of them, that sought for the papacy, should be chosen pope.

In the thirteenth session was decreed, that no priest, under pain of excommunication, shall communicate unto the people under both kinds of bread and wine.

In the fourteenth session came in the resignation of Pope Gregory XII., which was one of the three before mentioned, striving for the papacy, with certain other articles concerning the election of the bishop of Rome.

Then ensued the fifteenth session, in the which silence was commanded under pain of excommunication and the great curse, that no person or persons high or low, of what estate or degree soever he were, emperor, king, cardinal, or other, should disturb the said session with any manner of noise, either by hand, foot, or voice. This being done, the sentence and condemnation against John Huss was read and published.

In the sixteenth session ambassadors were assigned by the council to go into Arragon to Benedict XIII. to treat with him for the resignation of his papacy, as the other two had done before.

In the seventeenth session the emperor took upon him a journey to the king of Arragon, to treat with Pope Benedict. An excommunication denounced against all such as should go about to impeach the emperor's journey, about that matter, &c.

In the eighteenth session it was there also decreed, that such letters and bulls, as were written in the name of that council, should be received with no less credit and authority than the bulls proceeding from the see apostolical, and that the falsifiers of the same should incur no less penalty, than the falsifiers of the other. Legates also and ambassadors were sent into Italy.

In the nineteenth session Jerome of Prague was accused of heresy, and cast into prison by the council, and constrained to abjure.

It was decreed also, that notwithstanding the safe conduct given by the emperor and kings, &c., inquiry may be made against any man for heresy by a sufficient judge, and process to be made according to the law.

In the twentieth session there was nothing important.

In the year 1416, was the twenty-first session, beginning after their manner with a mass of the Holy Ghost, with procession and such other rites, in the time of which mass, James, bishop of Londy made a sermon, and Jerome of Prague being present, stood up, replying against the foresaid James and his sermon, whereupon Jerome was delivered to the secular power, and burned.

From the twenty-second to the thirty-first sessions there was nothing of particular importance.

In the thirty-second and thirty-third sessions the accusation of Pope Benedict was renewed, and his obstinacy accused, and witnesses brought in; at which the Emperor Sigismund was present.

In the thirty-fourth session the cause of the pope was heard, and process given out against him.

In the thirty-sixth session a citation was made and read against the pope, containing his deprivation, and the sentence against him. And whereas this pope had thundered out his curses, deprivations, and excommunications against them, the synod did annihilate all his doings.

The thirty-seventh session renewed again the accusation of the aforesaid pope, and the sentence definitive against him was published.

The thirty-eighth session referred to the king of Arragon.

Thus Pope Benedict being deposed and excommunicated, in the next sessions following they addressed themselves to the election of a new pope, beginning first in the thirty-ninth session, to give out decrees concerning general councils, and provision for the avoiding of such like schisms hereafter. Decreeing every tenth year to have a general council, after the two councils that should follow immediately after this; of which, the one should be kept within five years then next following, and the second within seven years after that.

In the same session was drawn out a form touching such things as the pope should profess and bind himself to observe at the time of his election, of which form the order and tenor is this:

"I, N. elected for pope, profess with heart and mouth unto Almighty God, whose church I take upon me to govern by his help, and to blessed St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, so long as I shall endure in this frail and brittle life, firmly to believe and hold the holy catholic faith after traditions of the apostles, of general councils, and of other holy fathers, and, namely, of the eight general councils; Nicene the first, the second of Constantinople, Ephesine the third, Chalcedon the fourth, the fifth and sixth of them in Constantinople, the seventh of Nice, the eighth of Constantinople. And also of the general councils of Lateran, Lyons, and Vienna, willing to observe the same faith inviolate even to the uttermost, and to preach and defend the same, even to the spending of my life and blood; and also by all means possible to prosecute and observe the rite of the sacraments canonically delivered to the catholic church. And this my profession and confession, by my commandment being written out by the notary of the arches of the holy church of Rome, I have subscribed with mine own hand, and sincerely with a pure mind and devout conscience I offer it unto the Almighty God upon such an altar, &c. In the presence of such witness, &c. Given," &c.

In the fortieth session, certain decrees were read, as to reformations to be made through the whole church by the pope, with the council, before this synod should break up.

Also, that they should proceed to the election of the bishop of Rome, notwithstanding the absence of those cardinals who were with Pope Benedict in Spain. This done, the order and manner was decreed for the election of the pope.

In the next session, which was forty-one, the constitution of Clement VI. was read, concerning the order and diet of the cardinals then in the conclave about the choosing of the pope, and oaths were ministered to the cardinals and other electors, binding them to observe and keep all such things as they should be bound to, during the time of the election.

1. That they should enter into the conclave within ten days after the fortieth session, which was this present day after sun-set.

2. That every cardinal should have but two servitors attending upon him, at the most, either of the laity or clergy, as they chose themselves.

3. That they should remain together in the conclave, without any wall between them, or any other cover, save only bare curtains, if any were disposed to sleep.

4. That the conclave should be so shut up, and the entry to the privy chamber be kept so straightly, that none of them should come in or out, nor any have recourse to them to talk with them privily or openly.

5. That no man should send to them either messenger or writings.

6. That a competent window should be assigned unto them to receive in their victuals, but that no person might come in thereat.

7. That no day after their first ingress into the conclave, beside bread, wine, and water, they should have any more dishes but one of one only kind, either of flesh or fish, eggs, pottage, made of fish or flesh, not after the daintiest sort, beside sallads, cheese, fruit, and conserves, whereof there shall be no principal mess made but for sauce and taste.

8. That not one should be compelled to go into the conclave; but if they did all refuse to go in, then they should be compelled.

9. That such as would go out might; but if they would all go out before the pope were elected, they should be compelled to go in again, except such whom infirmity excused; but without the excuse of infirmity, if any went out, he should no more be admitted, except they went all out together.

10. That such as went out by reason of infirmity, to be absent, and return before the election be determined, may be admitted again into the conclave in the same state wherein they shall find the election to stand.

Further, and besides, the keepers of the conclave should also be sworn to see all these premises observed and kept without fraud or guile, and that they should not straighten the cardinals and other electors above the order here taken.

These things thus prepared and set in order, the patriarch of Constantinople, with the cardinals and other archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, deans, archdeacons, doctors, with other electors, entering into the conclave upon Monday, on Thursday after they had hatched out a pope, being St. Martin's even, whereupon they named him Martin. This Martin thus being elected, was straightway brought in by the emperor and the council into the church of Constance, and there enthroned for pope, with great solemnity and triumph. The twenty-first day of the said month, this Martin, according to their accustomed pomp, was honourably brought in to be crowned with sumptuous procession from the high church of Constance, to the monastery of St. Austin; the emperor on foot leading his horse by the bridle on the right hand, and the marquess of Brandenburg prince elector likewise leading his horse on the left hand, the pope himself riding in the midst upon his palfrey.

And thus being brought to the monastery, and round about again from thence to the high church of Constance, he was there crowned with all magnificence.

In the forty-third session, certain other decrees and statutes were made by Pope Martin in the synod, annulling all the acts and proceedings of the other popes before, during the time of the schism from the time of Gregory II. As in matters concerning exemptions, unions, fruits, and profits of the church; benefices, simony, dispensations, tithes, and burthens of the church. Also concerning the apparel of the clergy, and such other things.

Now to finish our tedious rehearsal of this synod, the Cardinal Umbald, by the commandment of the pope and the council, with a high and loud voice pronounced these words: "Lord, depart in peace;" whereunto the standers by answered, "Amen."

The number of the foreigners resorting to this council, both spiritual and temporal, was sixty thousand five hundred, whereof the number of archbishops, and bishops, was three hundred and forty-six.

Abbots and doctors, five hundred and sixty-four.

Secular men (princes, dukes, earls, knights, esquires), sixteen thousand.

Besides women belonging to the same council, four hundred and fifty.

Barbers, six hundred.

Minstrels, cooks, and jesters, three hundred and twenty.

So that the whole multitude which were viewed to be in the town of Constance, between Easter and Whitsuntide, were numbered to be sixty thousand five hundred strangers and foreigners at that council.

Here is to be noted, that in this council of Constance nothing was decreed or enacted worthy of memory, but this only, that the pope's authority is under the council, and that the council ought to judge the pope.

And as touching the communion in both kinds, although the council did not deny, but that it was used by Christ and his apostles; yet notwithstanding it was decreed by the council to the contrary.

Hitherto we have comprehended the order and discourse of this council, with the acts and sessions concerning the same; which council, although it was principally thought to be assembled, for quieting of the schism between the three popes, yet notwithstanding a great part thereof was for the affair of the Bohemians, and especially for John Huss. For, before the council began, the Emperor Sigismund sent certain gentlemen of his own household, to bring John Huss to the council, under his safe conduct. The meaning of which was, that John Huss should purge and clear himself of the blame which they had laid against him; and for the better assurance, the Emperor not only promised him safe conduct, that he might come freely to Constance, but also that he should return again into Bohemia, without fraud or interruption; he promised also to receive him under his protection, and under safeguard of the whole empire.

The safe Conduct given to John Huss.

"Sigismund, by the grace of God, king of the Romans, of Hungary and Denmark, Croatia, &c. To all princes as well ecclesiastical as secular, dukes, marquesses, and earls, barons, captains, borough masters, judges, and governors, officers of towns, burgesses, and villages, and unto all rulers of the commonalty, and generally to all the subjects of our empire, to whom these letters shall come, grace and all goodness.

"We charge and command you all, that you respect John Huss, who is departed out of Bohemia, to come to the general council, which shall be celebrated and held very shortly at the town of Constance. Which John Huss we have received under our protection and safeguard of the whole empire, desiring you that you will cheerfully receive him when he shall come towards you, and that you treat and handle him gently, shewing him favour and good will, and shew him pleasure in all things, as touching the forwardness, ease, and assurance of his journey, as well by land as by water.

"Moreover, we will, that he and all his company, with his carriage and necessities, shall pass throughout all places, passages, ports, bridges, lands, governances, lordships, liberties, cities, towns, boroughs, castles, and villages, and all other your dominions, without paying of any manner of imposition or tribute, or any other manner of toll whatever. We will, also, that you suffer to pass, rest, tarry, and to sojourn at liberty, without doing unto him any manner of impeachment, or vexation, or trouble; and that if need shall so require, you do provide a faithful company to conduct him withal, for the honour and reverence which you owe unto our imperial majesty. Given at Spire the eighteenth of October, in the year of our Lord God, 1414."

By this it may appear, that this safe conduct was granted not in the time of the council by the bishop, but before the council by the emperor, who was, or ought to be the principal ordainer and director of the council under God. Now whether the bishops did well in breaking this promise of the emperor, I will defer to such time as may be more convenient to the full examination thereof.

John Huss seeing so many fair promises, and the assurance which the emperor had given, sent answer that he would come to the council. But before he departed out of the realm of Bohemia, and especially out of the town of Prague, he wrote certain letters, and caused them to be fastened upon the gates of the cathedral churches and parish churches, cloisters and abbays: the copy whereof here follows:

"Master John Huss, bachelor of divinity, will appear before the most reverend father, the Lord Conrad, archbishop of Prague, and legate of the apostolic seat, in their next convocation of all their prelates and clergy of the kingdom of Bohemia, being ready always to satisfy all men which shall require him to give a reason of his faith and hope that he holds, and to hear and see all such as will lay to his charge, either any stubbornness of error or heresy, that they should write in their names there, as is required both by God's law and man's. And if so be that they could not lawfully prove any stubbornness of error or heresy against him, that then they should suffer the like punishment that he should have had, to whom all together he will answer at the next general council of Constance, before the archbishop and the prelates, and according to the decrees and canons of the holy father, shew forth his innocency in the name of Christ. Dated the Sunday next after the feast of St. Bartholomew."

After this, as all the barons of Bohemia were assembled in the abbey of St. James, about the affairs of the realm, the archbishop of Prague was also present. There John Huss presented petitions, by which he most humbly desired the barons that they would shew him that favour towards the archbishop, that if the archbishop suspected him of any error or heresy, he should declare it openly, and that he was ready to endure and suffer correction for the same at his hands. And if he had found or perceived no such thing in him, that he would then give him a testimonial thereof. The archbishop confessed openly, before all the assembly of barons, that he knew not that John Huss was culpable or faulty in any crime or offence.

About the ides of October, A.D. 1414, John Huss, being accompanied with two noble gentlemen, Wancelat of Duba, and John of Clum, departed from Prague, and took his journey towards Constance.

In all cities as he passed by, and principally when he was departed out of Bohemia, and entered into Germany, a great number of people did come unto him, and he was very gently received and entertained through all the towns of Germany, and especially by the citizens and burgesses, and oftentimes by the curates. And if it happened that there were any information before of his coming, the streets were always full of people desirous to see and gratify him; and especially at Nuremberg, where certain merchants certified the citizens of his coming. There were many curates who came to him, desiring that they might talk with him secretly: to whom he answered, That he loved much rather to pronounce and shew forth his mind and opinion openly before all men, for he would keep nothing hidden. So, after dinner, till it was night, he spake before the priests and senators, and other citizens, so that they all had him in great estimation and reverence.

The twentieth day after that he departed out of the town of Prague, which was the 3d day of November, he came unto Constance, and lodged at an honest matron's house, being a widow named Raith, in St. Gallen Street.

The morrow after his arrival, Master John de Clum, and Master Henry Latzenboge, went to the pope, and certified him that John Huss was come, under the emperor's safe conduct; desiring also that he on his part would grant John Huss liberty to remain in Constance, without any trouble, vexation, or interruption. To whom the pope answered, That even if John Huss had killed his brother, yet he might go about, as much as in him lay, that no outrage or hurt should be done to him during his abode in the town of Constance.

The 26th day after the said Huss was come to Constance, during all which time he was occupied in reading, writing, and familiar talk with his friends; the cardinals sent two bishops; to wit, the bishops of Augusta, and of Trent, to the place where John Huss lodged, to report to him that they were sent by the pope and his cardinals, to advertise him that he should come to render some account of his doctrine before them, as he had oftentimes desired, and that they were ready to hear him.

John Huss answered, "I am not come for any such intent, as to defend my cause before the pope and his cardinals, protesting that I never desired any such thing; but I would willingly appear before the whole assembly of the council, and there answer for my defence openly, without any fear or doubt, unto all such things as shall be demanded or required of me. Notwithstanding," said he, "forasmuch as you require me so to do, I will not refuse to go with you before the cardinals. And if it happen that they evil entreat or handle me; yet nevertheless I trust in my Lord Jesus, that he will so comfort and strengthen me, that I shall desire much rather to die for his glory's sake, than to deny the verity and truth which I have learned by his holy scriptures." Wherefore, it came to pass, that the bishops being instant upon him, and not shewing any outward appearance that they bore any malice or hatred against him in their hearts, John Huss took his horse which he had at his lodging, and went to the court of the pope and the cardinals.

When he was come, and had saluted the cardinals, they began to speak to him in this sort: "We have heard many reports of you, which, if they be true, are in no case to be suffered: for men say, that you have taught great and manifest errors against the doctrine of the true church; and that you have sowed your errors abroad through all the realm of Bohemia for a long time; wherefore we have caused you to be called before us, that we might understand and know how the matter stands."

John Huss answered in few words, "Reverend fathers, you shall understand that I am thus minded, that I should rather choose to die, than I should be found culpable of one only error, much less of many and great errors. For this cause I am the more willingly come to the general council, to shew myself ready even with all my heart to receive correction, if any man can prove any errors in me." The cardinals answered him again, That his sayings pleased them very well, and upon that they went away, leaving John Huss, with Master John de Clum, under the guard and keeping of the armed men.

In the mean time, they suborned and furnished out a certain divine, a Franciscan friar, a subtle and crafty man, and a malicious hypocrite, to question John Huss, who was compassed round about with armed men. This man drawing near in his monkish gesture, said, "Reverend master, I a simple and ignorant man, am come to you to learn; for I have heard many strange and contrary things against the catholic faith ascribed to you. Wherefore I do desire you, even for the love which you bear to the truth, and to all good and godly men, that you would teach me, most simple and miserable man, some certainty and truth. And first, men say, that you hold opinion that after the consecration and pronouncement of the words in the sacrament of the altar, there remains only material bread." John Huss answered, "That it was falsely attributed and imputed unto him." Then said he, "I pray you, is not this your opinion?" "No verily," said John Huss, "I do not so think of it." When the monk asked this question the third time, Master John de Clum being moved somewhat with him, said, "Why art thou so importunate upon him? Verily, if any man had affirmed or denied any thing to me even once, I would have believed him. And thou, although he hath shewed thee his mind so often, yet ceasest not to trouble him." Then said the monk, "Gentle master, I pray you pardon me an ignorant and simple friar; surely I did it of a good mind and intent, being willing and desirous to learn." This friar put another question unto him, protesting his simplicity and ignorance, what manner of unity of the Godhead and manhood was in the person of Christ? When John Huss had heard this question, he turning himself to Master John de Clum, in the Bohemian language said, "Truly this friar is not simple as he pretends, for he hath propounded to me a very hard question." And afterward turning himself to the friar, he said to him, "Brother, you say that you are simple, but as I have heard you, I perceive very well that you are double and crafty, and not simple." "It is not so," said the friar. "Well," said John Huss, "I will cause you to understand that it is so. For as to the simplicity of a man, it is required in things that concern civility and manners that the spirit, the understanding, the heart, the words, and the mouth, should agree together: and I do not perceive that this is in you. There is in your mouth a certain semblance of simplicity, which would very well declare you to be an idiot and simple, but your deeds shew plainly and evidently a great subtlety and craft in you, with a great quickness and liveliness of wit, to propose to me so hard and difficult a question. Notwithstanding, I will not fear to shew you my mind in this question." And when he had made an end, the monk gave him great thanks for his gentleness, and so departed. After that, the pope's garrison which were about John Huss, told him, that this friar was called master Didace, who was esteemed and counted the greatest and most subtle divine in all Lombardy. "Oh," said John Huss, "if I had known that before, I would have handled him after another fashion; but I would to God they were all such, then through the help and aid of the holy scriptures I would fear none of them." In this manner Huss and master John de Clum, were left under the keeping of these men-at-arms, until four o'clock in the afternoon. After which time the cardinals assembled again in the pope's court, to devise and take counsel what they should do with John Huss.

A little before night, they sent the provost of the Roman court to master John de Clum, to shew him that he might return to his lodging; but as for John Huss, they had otherwise provided for him. When master John de Clum heard this news, he was wonderfully displeased, as through their crafts, subtleties, and glossing words, they had so drawn this good man into their snares, whereupon he went to the pope, declaring to him all that was done; most humbly beseeching him, that he would call to remembrance the promise which he had made unto him and master Henry Latzemboge, and that he would not so lightly falsify and break his faith and promise. The pope answered, that all these things were done without his consent or commandment, and said furether to master Clum apart, "What reason is it that you should impute this deed unto me, seeing that you know well enough that I myself am in the hands of these cardinals and bishops?"

So the said master Clum returned very pensive and sorrowful; he complained very sore, both privately and openly, of the injury and outrage that the pope had done, but all profited nothing. After this, John Huss was led by the officers to the charter-house of the great church of Constance, where he was kept prisoner for the space of eight days; from thence he was carried to the Jacobines, hard by the river of the Rhine, and was shut up in the prison of the abbey.

After he had been inclosed there a certain time, he fell sore sick of an ague, by means of the stench of the place, and became so weak, that they despaired of his life. And for fear lest this good man should die in prison, as others are wont to do, the pope sent to him certain of his physicians to cure and help him. In the midst of his sickness, his accusers made importunate suit to the principals of the council, that John Huss might be condemned; and presented to the pope these articles here under-written:

"First, he errs about the sacrament of the church, and specially about the sacrament of the body of Christ, forso much as he hath openly preached, that it ought to be ministered openly unto the people under both kinds, that is to say, the body and blood. This article is evident, forso much as his disciples at this instant in Prague do minister the same in both kinds. Moreover it is affirmed by several, that he has taught both in the schools and in the church, or at the least that he holds this opinion, that after the words of consecration pronounced upon the altar, there remains still material bread in the sacrament. This article shall be known by his examination.

"Secondly, he errs as to the ministers of the church, forso much as he saith, that they cannot consecrate or minister the sacraments when they are in mortal sin. This article shall likewise be known by his examination. Notwithstanding, all that which is here contained may be gathered by his writings on the church, which if he deny, let there then be some divines and others appointed, to peruse and look over his writings. Moreover he saith, that other men beside priests may minister the sacrament. This article is evident, forso much as his disciples do the same at Prague, who of themselves do violently take the sacrament out of the treasury, and communicate among themselves, when the holy communion is denied unto them. By this and other things also it is sufficiently evident, that he has taught that every man, being without mortal sin, has the power of orders or priesthood, forso much as such only as have taken orders ought to minister the sacrament to themselves. And because he proceedeth from small matters unto great and weightier, it does consequently appear and follow, that those which be in the state of grace can bind and loose.

"Thirdly, he errs as to the church, and specially because he does not allow and admit that the church signifies the pope, cardinals, archbishops, and the clergy underneath them; but saith, that this signification was drawn out from the school-men, and is in no case to be held or allowed. This article is manifest by his treatise upon the church.

"Moreover, he errs concerning the church, in that he saith, that the church ought not to have any temporal possessions. And that the temporal lords may take them away from the church and the clergy without any offence. This error is evident, forso much as through his doctrine and enticements many churches in the kingdom of Bohemia, and in the city of Prague, are already spoiled and robbed of a great part of their temporalities and goods. He saith also that Constantine and other secular princes erred by enriching and endowing churches and monasteries. This article is manifest by that which goes next before.

"Fourthly, he errs as touching the church, in that he saith, that all priests are of like power, and therefore affirms, that the reservations of the pope's casualties, the ordering of bishops, and the consecration of the priests, were invented only for covetousness. This article somewhat appears by those foregoing, but by his examination shall be more evident.

"Fifthly, he errs concerning the church, in that he saith, that the church being in sin, has no power of the keys, when the pope, cardinals, and all other of the priests and clergy are in deadly sin; which he saith is possible enough. This also appears in his treatise upon the church in his first error as touching the ministers of the church.

"Sixthly, he errs touching the church, forso much as through contempt he does not fear excommunication. This notoriously appears by his own doings, that he contemned and despised the apostolic and ordinary censure, and in all the apostolic excommunications and injunctions he has borne himself upon the divine commandments, and in contempt of the keys, to the setting out of his hypocrisy, he has said mass all the way between this and the city of Prague, and thereby has profaned the process and authority of the church.

"Seventhly, he errs again as touching the church, because he keeps not the institutions and investitures thereof, but holds opinion that every man has authority to invest and appoint any man to the cure of souls. This is evident by his own doings, forso much as many in the kingdom of Bohemia, by their defenders and favourers, or rather by himself, were appointed and put into parish churches, which they have long ruled and kept, not being appointed by the apostolic see, neither yet by the ordinary of the city of Prague.

"Eighthly, he errs as touching the church, in that he holds opinion, that a man, being once ordained a priest or deacon, cannot be forbidden or kept back from the office of preaching. This is likewise manifest by his own doings, forso much as he himself could never be hindered from preaching, neither by the apostolic see, neither yet by the archbishop of Prague.

"And to the intent that John Huss, who is clothed in sheep's clothing, and inwardly a ravening wolf, may be the better known by his fruits, for the better information of you most reverend fathers: I say, that from the first time that he took in hand, or went about to sow such errors and heresies, which afterward he did indeed, he understanding and perceiving himself to be withstood and gainsayed by the Germans, who were in the university of Prague, forso much as he could conclude nothing, because they had three voices, and he on his part had but one only voice; he went about and brought to pass, and that by the secular power, that the Germans should have but one voice, and he and his parts three voices: which thing, when the Germans once perceived, rather than they would lose or forsake any part of their right which they had in voices, or be in danger in their persons, which would then have ensued upon it, to save themselves, they wholly with one consent agreed together to depart out of Prague; and by this means this solemn and famous university of Prague was made desolate, that had brought forth so many notable men in divers sciences. Behold this his first fruits which divided that so famous university, forso much as grapes are not gathered of thorns, neither figs of brambles.

"Moreover, when there were questions moved amongst the divines of the university of Prague upon the forty-five articles of John Wickliff, and that they had called a convocation, and all the divines of Bohemia, (for the Germans were already departed), they concluded that every one of those articles were either heretical, seditious, or erroneous. He alone held the contrary opinion, that none of those articles were either heretical, seditious, or erroneous, as afterward he did dispute, hold, and teach, in the common schools of Prague, whereby it is evidently enough foreseen, that he holds and affirms those articles of Wickliff, which are not only condemned in England, but also by the whole church, because they were first invented and set forth by the members of antichrist.

"Moreover, he being complained of to the archbishop of Prague, that he preached and set forth certain articles which were heretical, false, and seditious, he was forbidden by the said archbishop to preach any more, who proceeded against him, according to the canonical sanctions, the which process is confirmed by the apostolic see, and published as well in the court of Rome, as without; which John Huss and his adherents have divers and manifold ways violated and profaned. And whoever did speak against him, they were deprived of their benefices, and others placed in, who have ruled and do yet rule the said churches, and the flocks pertaining to the same, not having any cure or charge of the souls committed unto them, neither by the apostolic see, neither yet by the ordinary of the place.

"Also all those, as well priests as laymen, in the city of Prague and kingdom of Bohemia, who have spoken against the doctrine of Huss, and the profanation of the process aforesaid, or at the least not allowed the same, have suffered most mortal hatred and persecutions, and yet to this day do suffer. But at this present it is dissembled until the end of the process against John Huss. Wherefore if he be now let go again, without doubt they shall suffer great persecution both in body and goods, and throughout all the realm of Bohemia, house shall be against house, and this mischief will creep, yea suddenly spring up throughout all Germany, and innumerable souls shall be infected, so that there shall be such persecution of the clergy and faithful, as has not been since the time of the emperor Constantine to this present day; for he ceases not to move and stir up the laity against the clergy and faithful christians. And when any of the clergy would draw him away, or call him from his heresy, and for that cause forbid him to preach, that he does not teach any heresies: then says he that the clergy do that of envy and malice, because he rebukes their vices and faults; that is to say, their simony, and pride, and covetousness.

"Moreover, he stirs up the secular princes against the prelates of churches, monasteries, and universities, and generally against the whole clergy. Going about by this means, he preaches and teaches that prelates and other men of the church ought not to have any temporal goods or possessions, but only to live upon alms. And by this means he has done already very much hurt, and annoyed divers and many prelates, clerks, and churches in the kingdom of Bohemia, and city of Prague, forso much as thereby they are already spoiled and robbed of their possessions. Yea, he teaches also that it is lawful for the lay-people without sin to withhold and keep back the tithes and oblations, or to give the church goods to any other minister; all the secular princes are greatly inclined hereunto, but especially the laity, who follow every man his own will.

"He has generally with him all those heretics who do but very small regard the ecclesiastical censures, and hate the authority of the Roman church, yea do utterly detest and abhor the same; which thing will more and more increase, except it be effectually and manfully withstood; and if he do by any means escape from the council, he and his favourers will say that his doctrine is just and true, and that it is allowed by the authority of the universal sacred council, and that all his adversaries are wicked and naughty men, so that he would do more mischief, than ever any heretic did since the time of Constantine the Great.

"Wherefore, most holy fathers, provide and take heed to yourselves, and to the whole flock amongst whom the Holy Ghost hath placed you, to rule the church of Christ, which he hath purchased with his own blood; and whilst the disease is new and fresh, help and remedy it, as well touching him who doth so infect and trouble the church of God, as also concerning the occasions, through the which he hath presumed, and might do the same, because the prelates do abuse the ecclesiastical censures, and they as well as those that are under them, do not keep and observe the order of the church which is appointed them by God, whereby it comes to pass, that whilst they themselves do walk the broken and unknown paths, their flock falls headlong into the ditch.

"Wherefore, let our sovereign lord the pope, and this most sacred council, ordain and depute commissioners, who may examine the said John Huss upon all before-written, and other things in the presence of them which know the matter. Let there be also certain doctors and masters appointed to read over and peruse his books which he hath written, whereof some are here present, that the church may be speedily purged and cleansed from these errors."

Upon this accusation, they ordained and appointed three commissioners or judges, that is to say, the patriarch of Constantinople, and the bishop of Castile, and the bishop of Lybuss,—which prelates being thus deputed, heard the accusation and the witness which was brought in by certain priests of Prague, confirmed by their oaths, and afterward recited the accusation to Huss in the prison, at such time as his ague was fervent and extreme upon him.

Upon this, John Huss required to have an advocate to answer for him; which was utterly denied him.

Thus John Huss remained in the prison of the convent of the Franciscans, until the Wednesday before Palm Sunday; and in the meantime to employ his time, he wrote certain books, concerning the ten commandments, of the love and knowledge of God, of matrimony, of penance, of the three enemies of mankind, of the prayer of our Lord, and of the supper of our Lord.

The same day Pope John XXIII. changed his apparel, and conveyed himself secretly out of Constance, fearing the judgment by which afterward he was deprived of his papal dignity, for the most execrable and abominable doings. This was the cause that John Huss was transported and carried unto another prison: for the pope's servants, who had the charge and keeping of John Huss, understanding that their master was fled and gone, delivered up the keys of the prison unto the Emperor Sigismund, and to the cardinals, and followed their master the pope. Then by the consent of the whole council, John Huss was put into the hands of the bishop of Constance, who sent him to a castle on the other side of the river of the Rhine, not very far from Constance, where he was shut up in a tower with fetters on his legs, that he could scarce walk in the day time, and at night he was fastened up to a rack against the wall hard by his bed.

In the meantime, certain noblemen and gentlemen of Poland and Bohemia did all their endeavour to procure his deliverance, having respect to the good renown of all the realm, which was wonderfully defamed and slandered by certain naughty persons. The matter was grown unto this point, that all they who were in the town of Constance, that seemed to bear any favour unto John Huss, were made as mocking stocks, and derided of all men, yea, even of the slaves and base people. Wherefore they took counsel and concluded together to present their request in writing to the whole council, or at the least to the four nations of Germany, Italy, France, and England; this request was presented the 14th day of May, A. D. 1415: the tenour here ensues.

The first Schedule or Bill, which the Nobles of Bohemia delivered up to the Council for the deliverance of John Huss, the 14th day of May, A. D. 1415.

"Most reverend fathers and lords, the nobles and lords of Bohemia and Poland here present, by this their present writing do shew and declare unto your fatherly reverences, how that the most noble king and lord, the Lord Sigismund, king of the Romans, always Augustus, king of Hungary, Croatia, Dalmatia, &c. hearing of the great dissension that was in the kingdom of Bohemia, as heir, king, and lord successor, willing to foresee and provide for his own honour, sent these noblemen, Master Wenceslate de Duba, and John de Chum here present, that they would bring and assure Master John Huss UNDER THE KING'S NAME AND SAFE CONDUCT. So that he would come to the sacred general council of Constance, under the safe conduct of the said king, and the protection of the sacred empire, openly given and granted unto the said Master John Huss, that he might purge himself and the kingdom of Bohemia, from the slander that was raised upon them, and there to make an open declaration of his faith to every man that would lay any thing to his charge. The which the said nobles, with the forenamed Master John Huss, have performed and done, according to the king's commandment.

"When the said Master John Huss was freely of his own accord come unto Constance, under the said safe conduct, he was grievously imprisoned before he was heard, and at this present time is tormented both with fetters, and also with hunger and thirst. Although that in times past at the council holden at Pisa in the year of our Lord 1410, the heretics who were condemned, were suffered to remain there at liberty, and to depart home freely; notwithstanding this, Master John Huss, neither being convicted nor condemned, no not so much as once heard, is taken and imprisoned, when as neither king nor any prince elector, neither any ambassador of any university was yet come or present. And albeit the lord the king, together with the nobles and lords here present, most instantly required and desired, that as touching his safe conduct they would foresee and have respect to his honour, and that the said Master John Huss might be openly heard, forso much as he would render and shew a reason of his faith; and if he were found and convicted obstinately to affirm or maintain any thing against the truth of holy scripture, that then he ought to correct and amend the same, according to the instruction and determination of the council; yet could he never obtain this. But the said Master John Huss, notwithstanding all this, is most grievously oppressed with fetters and irons, and so weakened with thin and slender diet, that it is to be feared, lest that his power and strength being hereby consumed and wasted, he should be put in danger of his wit or reason.

"And although the lords of Bohemia here present are greatly slandered, because they, seeing the said Master John Huss so to be tormented and troubled, contrary to the king's safe conduct, have not by their letters put the king in mind of his safe conduct, that the said lord and king should not any more suffer any such matters, forso much as they tend to the contempt and disregard of the kingdom of Bohemia, which, from the first original and beginning, since it received the catholic faith, never departed or went away from the obedience of the holy church of Rome; yet, notwithstanding, they have suffered and borne all these things patiently hitherto, lest by any means occasion of trouble or vexation of this sacred council might arise or spring thereof.

"Wherefore, most reverend fathers and lords, the nobles and lords before named, do wholly and most earnestly desire and require your reverences here present, that both for the honour of the safe conduct of our said lord the king, and also for the preservation and increase of the worthy fame and renown, both of the kingdom of Bohemia, and your own also, you will make a short end about the affairs of Master John Huss; forso much as by the means of his straight handling he is in great danger by any longer delay; even as they do most specially trust upon the most upright consciences and judgments of your fatherly reverences. But forso much as, most reverend fathers and lords, it is now come to the knowledge and understanding of the nobles and lords of Bohemia here present, how that certain backbiters and slanderers of the most famous kingdom of Bohemia aforesaid, have declared and told unto your reverences, how that the sacrament of the most precious blood of our Lord is carried up and down through Bohemia in vessels not consecrate or hallowed, and that coblers do now hear confessions, and minister the most blessed body of our Lord unto others. The nobles therefore of Bohemia here present, require and desire you, that you will give no credit unto false promoters and tale tellers, for that, as most wicked and naughty slanderers and backbiters of that kingdom aforesaid, they do report and tell untruths; requiring also your reverences, that such slanderous persons of the kingdom aforesaid may be named and known. And the lord the king, together with your reverences, shall well perceive and see that the lords of Bohemia will go about in such a manner to repel and put away the false and frivolous slanders of these naughty persons, that they shall be ashamed to appear hereafter before the lord the king and your reverences."

When the noblemen of Bohemia for a long time could obtain no answer to this, and a second supplication which they had already put up, they determined the last day of May, by another supplication to the principals of the council, to intreat that John Huss might be delivered out of prison, and defend his own cause openly, in which among other things they pray—

"Wherefore, most reverend fathers, his enemies, through the extreme hatred which they bear to him, have picked and taken out by piecemeal, certain articles out of the books of Master John Huss, rejecting and not looking upon the allegations and reasons, have compounded and made thereof certain false and feigned articles against him to this end, that all charity and love being set apart, they might the better overthrow him, and bring him unto death, contrary to the safe conduct, upon good and just occasion openly assigned, and given to the said Master John Huss, by the most noble prince the Lord Sigismund, king of the Romans, and of Hungary, for his just defence against all the frivolous accusations and assaults of the enemies, not only of the said Master John Huss, but also of the famous kingdom of Bohemia, and for the quiet appeasing of all such tumults and rumours rising and springing in the said kingdom of Bohemia, or elsewhere; the avoiding of which most perilous uproars, the said king of the Romans, doth greatly desire and wish, as the right heir and successor of the said kingdom.

"Wherefore it may please your fatherly reverences to command the said Master John Huss, neither convicted nor condemned, to be taken and brought out of his bonds and chains, in the which he is now most grievously detained and kept, and to put him into the hands of some reverend lord bishops, or commissioners, appointed, or to be appointed by this present council; that the said Master John Huss may somewhat be relieved, and recover again his health, and be the more diligently and commodiously examined by the commissioners. And for the more assurance, the barons and nobles aforesaid of the kingdom of Bohemia, will provide most sure and good sureties, the which will not break their fidelity and faith for any thing in the world. Which also shall promise in this behalf, that he shall not flee or depart out of their hands, until such time as the matter be fully determined by the said commissioners. In the execution of the which premises, we have determined to provide and foresee unto the fame and honour of the said kingdom of Bohemia, and also to the safe conduct of the most worthy prince, the king of the Romans, lest that the enemies and detractors of the honour and fame of the kingdom aforesaid, might not a little slander and reprove the said lords, pretending and shewing forth hereafter, that they had made unreasonable or unlawful requests; for the withstanding of which mischief we require your fatherly reverences, that you will decree, and most graciously consent, that this our petition and supplication may be drawn out again by your notary, and reduced into a public form and order."

The same day the said barons and lords presented a supplication to the emperor, embodying the foregoing supplication, and concluding thus:

"Wherefore we most humbly require and desire your princely majesty, that both for the love of justice, and also of the fame and renown of that most famous kingdom of Bohemia, whereof we acknowledge you undoubtedly the true lord, heir, and successor; and also foreseeing unto the liberty of your safe conduct, that you will with your favourable countenance, beholding these most reasonable and just supplications which we have put up to the lords aforesaid, put to your helping hand toward the said most reverend fathers and lords, that they will effectually bear us, in this our most just petition, which we have offered up to them, as is aforesaid, lest that the enemies of the renown and honour of the famous kingdom of Bohemia, and such be our slanderers also, hereafter may detract and slander us, that we should make unreasonable and unlawful requests unto the said reverend fathers and lords; and therefore we required and desired of them, that it would please them to decree by setting to their public hand and seal, to authorise our said publication. Likewise, we do most heartily require your highness, that you would vouchsafe in like manner, to give us your testimony of the premises."

But what answer the emperor made hereto, we could never understand or know, but by the process of the matter a man may easily judge, that this good emperor was brought, through the obstinate mischief of the cardinals and bishops, to break and falsify his promise and faith which he had made and promised; and this was their reason, that no defence could or might be given either by safe conduct, or by any other means to him, who was suspected or judged to be an heretic. But by the epistles and letters of John Huss, a man may easily judge what the king's mind was. Now we will proceed to the history.

The fifth day of June, the cardinals, bishops, and the rest of the priests, all that were in Constance, assembled to a great number, at the convent of the Franciscans in Constance, and there it was commanded, that before John Huss should be brought forth, in his absence they should rehearse the witnesses and articles which they had slanderously gathered out of his books. By chance there was then present a certain notary, named Mladonewitz, who bare great love and amity to Huss, who, as soon as he perceived that the bishops and cardinals were already determined and appointed to condemn the said articles in the absence of John Huss, went with all speed to Master Wencelate de Duba, and John de Clum, and told them all the matter, who immediately made report of it to the emperor, who, understanding their object, sent to signify to them that nothing should be resolved or done in the case of John Huss, before they should send him all such articles as were laid against the said John Huss, which were either false or heretical, and he would do so much, that the said articles should be examined by good and learned men. Then according to the emperor's will, the judgment of the principals of the council was suspended, until such time as John Huss were present.

In the meantime, these gentlemen, master of Duba and of Clum, gave to the two princes, whom the emperor had sent, certain small treatises which John Huss had made, out of which they had drawn certain articles to present to them who rule the council, under this condition, that they would render them again, when they should demand them. The intent and meaning of these barons was, that by this means the adversaries of John Huss might the more easily be reproved, who, of a naughty and corrupt conscience, had picked out corrupt sentences out of the books of John Huss. The books were delivered to the cardinals and bishops; and then John Huss was brought forth, and the princes who were sent by the emperor, departed. After they shewed the books to John Huss, and he confessed openly before the whole assembly that he had wrote them, and that he was ready, if there were any fault in them, to amend the same.

Now hearken a little to the holy proceedings of these reverend fathers, for here happened a strange and shameful matter. With much ado they had scarcely read one article, and brought forth a few witnesses upon the same against him, but as he was about to open his mouth to answer, all this mad herd or flock began so to cry out upon him, that he was not able to speak one word. The noise and trouble was so great and so vehement, that a man might well have called it an uproar or noise of wild beasts, and not of men; much less was it to be judged a congregation of men gathered together to judge and determine so grave and weighty matters. And if it happened that the noise and cry did ever so little cease, that he might answer any thing at all, out of the holy scriptures or ecclesiastical doctors, by and by he would hear such replies as were nothing to the purpose.

Besides all this, some did outrage in words against him, and others spitefully mocked him, so that seeing himself overwhelmed with these rude and barbarous noises and cries, and that it profited nothing to speak, he determined finally with himself to hold his peace and keep silence. From that time forward, all the whole rout of his adversaries thought that they had won the battle of him, and cried out all together "Now he is dumb, now he is dumb; this is a certain sign and token, that he doth consent and agree unto these his errors." Finally, the matter came to this point, that certain of the most moderate and honest among them, seeing this disorder, determined to proceed no further, but that all should be deferred and put off until another time. Through their advice, the prelates and others departed from the council for the present, and appointed to meet there again on the morrow to proceed in judgment.

The next day, which was the seventh of June, on which day the sun was almost wholly eclipsed, somewhat after, about seven of the clock, this same flock assembled again in the cloister of the friars minors, and by their appointment John Huss was brought before them, accompanied with a great number of armed men. Thither went also the emperor, whom the gentlemen, master of Duba and Clum, and the notary named Peter, which were great friends of the said Huss, did follow to see what the end would be. When they were come thither, they heard that in the accusation of Michael de Causis, they read these words following: John Huss hath taught the people divers and many errors both in the chapel of Bethlehem, and also in many other places of the city of Prague, of the which errors some of them he hath drawn out of Wickliff's books, and the rest he has forged and invented of his own head, and maintains the same very obstinately.

First, that after the consecration and pronounciation of the words in the supper of the Lord, there remains material bread. To this John Huss, taking a solemn oath, answered that he never spake any such word; but thus much he did grant, that at what time the archbishop of Prague forbade him to use any more that term or word bread, he could not allow the bishop's command, as Christ, in the sixth chapter of John, oftentimes names himself the bread of life, which came down from heaven, to give life unto the whole world. But as touching material bread, he never spake any thing at all.

Then they returned again unto the witnesses, who every man for himself affirmed with an oath that which he had said. Amongst whom John Protowy, when he should confirm his testimony, added that John Huss, said that St. Gregory was but a rhymier, when he alleged his authority against him. To whom John Huss answered, that in this point they did him great injury, as he always esteemed and reputed St. Gregory for a most holy doctor of the church.

Then was there read a certain article of accusation, in which it was alleged, that John Huss had taught, and obstinately defended certain erroneous articles of Wickliff's in Bohemia. Whereunto Huss answered, that he never taught any errors of John Wickliff's, or of any other man's. But to confirm their article, there was alleged, that John Huss did withstand the condemnation of Wickliff's articles. He answered that he durst not agree thereto, for offending his conscience, and especially for these articles, that Silvester the pope and Constantine did err in bestowing those great gifts and rewards upon the church. Also, that the pope or priest, being in mortal sin, cannot consecrate nor baptize. "This article," said he, "I have thus determined, as if I should say, that he unworthily consecrates or baptizes, when he is in deadly sin, and that he is an unworthy minister of the sacraments of God." Here his accusers, with their witnessses, were earnest and instant that the article of Wickliff was written in the very same words of the treatise of John Huss. "Verily," said John Huss; "I fear not to submit myself, even under the danger of death, if you shall not find it so as I have said." When the book was brought forth, they found it written as John Huss had said.

Then was there rehearsed another article of his accusation in this manner:—That John Huss to confirm the heresy which he had taught the common and simple people out of Wickliff's books, said openly these words, that at what time a great number of monks and friars, and other learned men were gathered together in England, in a certain church, to dispute against John Wickliff, and could by no means vanquish him, suddenly the church door was broken open with lightning, so that with much ado Wickliff's enemies hardly escaped without hurt. He added, moreover, that he wished his soul to be in the same place where John Wickliff's soul was. Whereunto John Huss answered, "That a dozen years before that any books of divinity of John Wickliff's were in Bohemia, he saw certain works of philosophy of his, which, he said, did marvellously delight and please him. And when he understood the good and godly life of Wickliff, he spake these words, I trust, said he, that Wickliff is saved; and although I doubt whether he be damned or no, yet with a good hope I wish that my soul were in the same place where John Wickliff's is." Then again did all the company jest and laugh at him.

It is also in his accusation, that John Huss did counsel the people, according to the example of Moses, to resist with the sword against all such as did gainsay his doctrine. And the next day after he had preached the same, there were found openly in divers places certain intimations, that every man, being armed with his sword about him, should stoutly proceed, and that brother should not spare brother, neither one neighbour another. John Huss answered, that "All these things were falsely laid unto his charge by his adversaries; for he at all times when he preached, did diligently admonish and warn the people, that they should all arm themselves to defend the truth of the gospel, according to the saying of the apostle, 'with the helmet and sword of salvation;' and that he never spake of any material sword, but of that which is the word of God. And as touching intimations, or Moses' sword, he never had anything to do withal."

When all the articles were in this way gone through, John Huss was committed to the custody of the bishop of Reggo, under whom Jerome of Prague was also prisoner. But before he was led away, the cardinal of Cambray calling him back again in the presence of the emperor, said, "John Huss, I have heard you say, that if you had not been willing of your own mind to come to Constance, neither the emperor himself, neither the king of Bohemia, could have compelled you to do it." John Huss answered, "Under your license, most reverend father, I never used any such kind of talk or words. But this I did say, that there was in Bohemia a great number of gentlemen and noblemen, who did favour and love me, who also might easily have kept me in some sure and secret place, that I should not have been constrained to come into this town of Constance, neither at the will of the emperor, neither of the king of Bohemia." With that the cardinal of Cambray, even for very anger, began to change his colour, and despitefully said, "Do you not see the unshamefacedness of the man here?" And as they were murmuring, and whispering on all parts, the Lord John de Clum, ratifying and confirming that which John Huss had spoken, said, "That John Huss had spoken very well; for on my part," said he, "who, in comparison of a great many others, am but of small force in the realm of Bohemia, yet if I would have taken it in hand, I could have defended him easily by the space of one year, even against all the force and power of both these great and mighty kings. How much better might they have done it who are of more force or puissance than I am, and have stronger castles and places than I have?" After that the Lord de Clum had spoken, the cardinal of Cambray said, "Let us leave this talk. And I tell you, John Huss, and counsel you, that you submit yourself to the sentence and mind of the council, as you did promise in the prison; and if you will do so, it shall be greatly both for your profit and honour."

And the emperor himself began to tell him the same tale, saying, "Although there be some who say, that the fifteenth day after you were committed to prison, you obtained of us our letters of safe conduct, notwithstanding I can well prove by the witness of many princes and noblemen, that the safe conduct was obtained and gotten of us by my Lords de Duba and de Clum, before you were departed out of Prague, under whose guard we have sent for you, to the end that none should do you any outrage or hurt, but that you should have full liberty to speak freely before all the council, and to answer as touching your faith and doctrine; and as you see, my lords the cardinals and bishops have so dealt with you, that we do very well perceive their good-will towards you, for the which we have great cause to thank them. And forasmuch, as divers have told us, that we may not, or ought not, or right to defend any man who is an heretic, or suspect of heresy; therefore now we give you even the same counsel which the cardinal of Cambray hath given you already, that you be not obstinate to maintain any opinion, but that you do submit yourself under such obedience as you owe unto the authority of the holy council, in all things that shall be laid against you, and confirmed by credible witnessses, which thing, if you do according to our counsel, we will give order that for the love of us, of our brother, and the whole realm of Bohemia, the council shall suffer you to depart in peace, with an easy and tolerable penance and satisfaction, which if you refuse to do, the presidents of the council shall have sufficient authority to proceed against you. And for our part be ye well assured, that we will sooner prepare and make the fire with our own hands, to burn you withal, than we will endure or suffer any longer that you shall maintain or use this stiffness of opinions, which you have hitherto maintained and used. Wherefore our advice and counsel is, that you submit yourself wholly unto the judgment of the council." John Huss answered, "O most noble emperor, I render unto your highness most immortal thanks for your letters of safe conduct." Upon this Lord John de Clum did break him of his purpose, and admonished him that he did not excuse himself of the blame of obstinacy.

Then said John Huss, "O most gentle Lord, I do take God to my witness, that I was never minded obstinately to maintain any opinion, and that for this same intent and purpose I came hither of mine own good will, that if any man could lay before me any better or more holy doctrine than mine, that then I would change mine opinion without any further doubt." After he had spoken and said these things, he was sent away with the sergeants.

The morrow after, which was the eighth day of June, the very same company which was assembled the day before, assembled now again at the convent of the Franciscans; and in this assembly were also John Huss' friends, Lord de Duba, Lord de Clum, and Peter the notary. Thither was John Huss also brought, and in his presence there were read about thirty-nine articles, which they said, were drawn out of his books. Huss acknowledged all those that were faithfully and truly collected and gathered, to be his, of which sort there were but very few; the residue were counterfeited and forged by his adversaries, for they could find no such thing in the books, out of the which they said they had drawn and gathered them.

These were the same articles in a manner which were shewed before in the prison to John Huss, and are rehearsed here in another order: although there were some more articles added to them, and others corrected and enlarged, mention is made in them of his appeal, which is as follows:—

"Forasmuch as the most mighty Lord, one in essence, three in person, is both the chief and first, and also the last, and utmost refuge of all those who are oppressed, and that he is the God who defendeth verity and truth throughout all generations, doing justice to such as be wronged, being ready and at hand to all those which call upon him in verity and truth, unbinding those that are bound, and fulfilling the desires of all those who honour and fear him; defending and keeping all those that love him, and utterly destroying and bringing to ruin the stiff-necked and impenitent sinner, and that the Lord Jesus Christ very God and man, being in great anguish, compassed in with the priests, scribes, and pharisees, wicked judges and witnesses, willing by the most bitter and ignominious death to redeem the children of God, chosen before the foundation of the world, from everlasting damnation; hath left behind him this godly example for a memory unto them who should come after him, to the intent they should commit all their causes into the hands of God, who can do all things, and knoweth and seeth all things, saying in this manner: O Lord, behold my affliction, for my enemy hath prepared himself against me, and thou art my protector and defender. O Lord, thou hast given me understanding, and I have acknowledged thee, thou hast opened unto me all their enterprises; and for my own part, I have been as a meek lamb which is led unto sacrifice, and have not resisted against them. They have wrought their enterprises upon me, saying, Let us put wood in his bread, and let us banish him out of the land of the living, that his name be no more spoken of, nor had in memory. But thou, O Lord of Hosts, who judgest justly, and seest the devices and imaginations of their hearts, hasten thee to take vengeance upon them, for I have manifested my cause unto thee, forasmuch as the number of those which trouble me is great, and have counselled together, saying, the Lord hath forsaken him, pursue him and catch him. O Lord my God, behold their doings, for thou art my patience; deliver me from mine enemies, for thou art my God; do not separate thyself far from me, for tribulation is at hand, and there is no man which will succour. My God, my God, look down upon me, wherefore hast thou forsaken me? So many dogs have compassed me in, and the company of the wicked have besieged me round about, for they have spoken against me with deceitful tongues, and have compassed me in with words full of despite, and have enforced me without cause. Instead of love towards me they have slandered me, and have recompensed me with evil for good, and in place of charity they have conceived hatred against me.

"Wherefore, behold, I staying myself upon this most holy and fruitful example of my Saviour and Redeemer, do appeal before God for this my grief and hard oppression, from this most wicked sentence and judgment, and the excommunication determined by the bishops, scribes, pharisees, and judges, who sit in Moses's seat, and resign my cause wholly unto him; even as the holy patriarch of Constantinople, John Chrysostom, appealed twice from the council of the bishops and clergy; and Andrew, bishop of Prague, and Robert, bishop of Lincoln, appealed to the sovereign and most just Judge, who is not defiled with cruelty, neither can he be corrupted with gifts and rewards, neither yet be deceived by false witness. Also I desire greatly that all the faithful servants of Jesus Christ, and especially the princes, barons, knights, esquires, and all other who inhabit our country of Bohemia, should understand and know these things, and have compassion upon me, who am so grievously oppressed by the excommunication which is out against me, and which was obtained and gotten by the instigation and procurement of Michael de Causis my great enemy, and by the consent and furtherance of the canons of the cathedral church of Prague, and given and granted out by Peter of St. Angelo, dean of the church of Rome, and cardinal, and also ordained judge by Pope John XXIII., who hath continued almost these two years, and would give no audience unto my advocates and procurators, which they ought not to deny, (no not to a Jew or Pagan, or to any heretic whatsoever he were) neither yet would he receive any reasonable excuse, for that I did not appear personally, neither would he accept the testimonials of the whole university of Prague with the seal hanging at it, or the witness of the sworn notaries, and such as were called unto witness. By this all men may evidently perceive that I have not incurred any fault or crime of contumacy or disobedience, forasmuch as that I did not appear in the court of Rome, was not for any contempt, but for reasonable causes.

"And moreover, forasmuch as they had laid ambushments for me on every side by ways where I should pass, and also because the perils and dangers of others have made me the more circumspect and advised; and forasmuch as my proctors were willing and contented to bind themselves even to abide the punishment of the fire to answer to all such as would oppose or lay any thing against me in the court of Rome; as also because they did imprison my lawful procurator in the said court, without any cause, demerit, or fault, as I suppose. Forasmuch then as the order and disposition of all ancient laws as well divine of the old and new testament, as also of the canon laws, is this, that the judges should resort unto the place where the crime or fault is committed or done, and there to inquire of all such crimes as shall be objected and laid against him which is accused or slandered, and that of such men as by conversation have some knowledge or understanding of the parties accused (who may not be the evil willers or enemies of him which is so accused or slandered; but must be men of an honest conversation, no common quarrel pickers or accusers, but fervent lovers of the law of God;) and finally, that there should be a fit and meet place appointed, whither as the accused party might without danger or peril, resort or come, and that the judge and witnesses should not be enemies unto him that is accused. And also forasmuch as it is manifest, that all these conditions were wanting and lacking, as touching my appearance for the safeguard of my life, I am excused before God from the frivolous pretended obstinacy and excommunication. Whereupon I, John Huss, do present and offer this my appeal unto my Lord Jesus Christ, my just Judge, who knoweth and defendeth, and justly judgeth every man's just and true cause."

Articles formerly contained or picked out of the Treatise of John Huss of Prague, which he entitled "Of the Church," following in this part or behalf the errors, as they term them, of John Wickliff, with the judgment against them.

The first article. "No reprobate is true pope, lord, or prelate." The error is in the faith, and behaviour, and manners, being many times before condemned, as well against the poor men of Lyons, as also against the Waldenses and Pikards. The affirmation of which errors is temerarious, seditious, offensive and pernicious, and tending to the subversion of all human policy and government, forasmuch as no man knows whether he be worthy of love or hatred, for all men offend in many points, and thereby should all rule and dominion be made uncertain and unstable, if it should be founded upon predestination and charity; neither should the commandment of Peter have been good, who desires all servants to be obedient unto their masters and lords, although they be wicked.

The second article. "That no man who is in deadly sin, whereby he is no member of Christ, but of the devil, is true pope, prelate, or lord." The error of this is like to the first.

The third article. "No reprobate or person in deadly sin, sits in the apostolic seat of Peter, neither has any apostolic power over the christian people." This error is also like to the first.

The fourth article. "No reprobates are of the church, nor any who do not follow the life of Christ." This error is against the common opinion of the doctors, concerning the church.

The fifth article. "They only are of the church, and sit in Peter's seat, and have apostolic power who follow Christ and his apostles in their life and living." The error hereof is in faith and manners, as in the first article, but containing more arrogance and rashness.

The sixth article. "That every man who lives uprightly, according to the rule of Christ, may and ought openly to preach and teach, although he be not sent, yea, although he be forbidden or excommunicated by any prelate or bishop, even as he might or ought to give alms; for his good life in living together with his learning, sufficiently sends him." This is a rash and temerarious error, offensive, and tending to the confusion of the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy.

The seventh article. "That the pope of Rome being contrary to Christ, is not the universal bishop, neither has the church of Rome any supremacy over other churches, except peradventure it be given to him of Cæsar, and not of Christ." An error lately and plainly reprovèd.

The eighth article. "That the pope ought not to be called most holy, neither that his feet are holy and blessed, or that they ought to be kissed." This error is temerarious, irreverently, and offensively published.

The ninth article. "That according unto the doctrine of Christ, heretics, be they never so obstinate or stubborn, ought not to be put to death, neither to be accursed or excommunicated." This is the error of the Donatists, temerariously, and not without great offence affirmed against the laws of the ecclesiastical discipline, as St. Augustine proves.

The tenth article. "That subjects and the common people, may and ought publicly and openly to detect and reprove the vices of their superiors and rulers, as having power given them of Christ, and example of St. Paul so to do." This error is pernicious, full of offence, inducing all rebellion, disobedience and sedition.

The eleventh article. "That Christ only is head of the church, and not the pope." It is an error according to the common interpretation of the doctors, if all the reason of the supremacy, and of being head, be secluded and taken away from the pope.

The twelfth article. "That the only church, which comprehends the predestinate and good livers, is the universal church, whereto subjects owe obedience. And this is consequent to the former article." The error is contained as in the former articles.

The thirteenth article. "That tithes and oblations given to the church, are public and common alms." This error is offensive, and contrary to the determination of the apostle, 1 Cor. ix.

The fourteenth article. "That the clergy living wickedly, ought to be reprovèd and corrected by the lay-people, by the taking away of their tithes and other temporal profits." A most pernicious error and offensive, inducing the secular people to perpetrate sacrilege, subverting the ecclesiastical liberty.

The fifteenth article. "That the blessings of such as are reprobate or evil livers of the clergy, are maledictions and cursings before God, according to the saying, I will curse your blessings." This error was reprovèd by St. Augustine, against St. Cyprian and his followers, neither is the master of the sentences allowed of the masters in that point when he seems to favour this article.

The sixteenth article. "That in these days, and in long time before, there has been no true pope, no true church or faith, which is called the Romish church, wherunto a man ought to obey, but that it both was, and is the synagogue of antichrist and Satan." The error in this article is in this point, that it is derived, and takes its foundation upon the former articles.

The seventeenth article. "That all gift of money given to the ministers of the church, for the ministration of any spiritual matter, makes such ministers in that case users of simony." This error is seditious and temerarious, forasmuch as something may be given to the clergy, under the title of sustentation or maintaining the minister, without the selling, or buying of any spiritual thing.

The eighteenth article. "That whoever is excommunicate of the pope, if he appeal to Christ, he is preserved that he need not fear the excommunication, but may utterly condemn and despise the same." This error is temerarious and full of arrogance.

The nineteenth article. "That every deed done without charity, is sin." This error was reprovèd and revoked before this time at Paris, specially if it be understood of deadly sin; for it is not necessary that he who lacketh grace, should continually sin and offend anew, although he be continually in sin.

This following, the masters of Paris, by their whole voice and consent, did add and join to these nineteen articles, as their reason and determination.

"We affirm, that these articles aforesaid are notoriously heretical, and that they are judicially condemned for such, and diligently to be rooted out with their most seditious doctrines, lest they do infect others. For although they seem to have a zeal against the vices of the prelates and the clergy, which (the more is the pity and grief) do but too much abound, yet it is not according to learning; for a sober and discreet zeal suffers and laments those sins and offences, which one sees in the house of God, that he cannot amend or take away; for vices cannot be rooted out and taken away by other vices and errors, forasmuch as devils are not cast out through Beelzebub, but by the power of God, which is the Holy Ghost, who wills, that in correction the measure and mean of prudence be always kept, according to the saying, Mark who, what, where and why, by what means and when, prelates and bishops are bound, under grievous and express penalties of the law, diligently and vigilantly to bear themselves against the foresaid errors, and such other like, and the maintainers of them; for let it be always understood and noted, that the error which is not resisted is allowed, neither is there any doubt of privy affinity or society of him, who is slow to withstand a manifest mischief.

"These things are intermeddled by the way under correction, as by way of doctrine.

(Signed) "JOHN GERSON,
"Chancellor of Paris, unworthily."

These things thus declared, a man may easily understand, that John Huss was not accused for holding any opinion contrary to the articles of our faith, but because he did stoutly preach and teach against the kingdom of antichrist for the glory of Christ, and the restoring of the church.

Now to return unto the history: when the articles, which I have before rehearsed, were all read over, the cardinal of Cambray, calling to John Huss, said, "Thou hast heard what grievous and horrible crimes are laid against thee, and what number of them they are; and now it is thy part to devise with thyself what thou wilt do. Two ways are proposed and set before thee by the council, of which one thou must of necessity enter into.

"First, that thou do humbly and meekly submit thyself unto the judgment and sentence of the council, that whatever shall be there determined, by their common voice and judgment, thou wilt patiently bear and suffer. Which thing if thou wilt do, we of our part, both for the honour of the most gentle emperor here present, and also for the honour of his brother the king of Bohemia, and for thy own safeguard and preservation, will treat and handle thee with as great humanity, love and gentleness, as we may. But if as yet thou art determined to defend any of those articles which we have propounded to thee, and dost desire or require to be further heard thereupon, we will not deny thee power and license thereto; but this thou shalt well understand, that there are such men, so clear in understanding and knowledge, and having so firm and strong reasons and arguments against thy articles, that I fear it will be to thy great hurt, detriment and peril, if thou shouldst any longer will or desire to defend the same. This I do speak and say to thee, to counsel and admonish thee, and not as a judge."

Many others of the cardinals, every man for himself, did exhort and persuade John Huss in the same way; to whom, with a lowly countenance he answered, "Most reverend fathers, I have often said, that I came hither of mine own free will, not to defend any thing, but if in any thing I should seem to have conceived a perverse or evil opinion, that I would meekly and patiently be content to be reformed and taught. Whereupon I desire that I may have yet further liberty to declare my mind. Whereof, except I shall allege most firm and strong reasons, I will willingly submit myself."

Then said the cardinal of Cambray, "Forasmuch then as thou dost submit thyself to the information and grace of this council, this is decreed by all almost three-score doctors.

"First of all, thou shalt humbly and meekly confess thyself to have erred in these articles which are alleged and brought against thee.

"Moreover, thou shalt promise by an oath, that from henceforth thou shalt not teach, hold or maintain any of these articles. And last of all, that thou shalt openly recant all these articles."

Upon which sentence, when many others had spoken their minds, at length John Huss said, "I once again do say, that I am ready to submit myself to the information of the council; but this I most humbly require and desire you all, even for his sake, who is the God of us all, that I be not compelled or forced to do the thing which my conscience rejects or strives against, or which I cannot do without danger of eternal damnation, that is, that I should make revocation by oath to all the articles which are alleged against me. For I remember, that I have read in the book of universalities, that to abjure, is to renounce an error which a man has before held. And forasmuch as many of these articles are said to be mine, which were never in my mind or thought to hold or teach, how should I then renounce them by an oath? But as touching those articles which are mine indeed, if there be any man who can teach me contrariwise to them, I will willingly perform that which you desire."

Then said the emperor, "Why mayest not thou without danger also renounce all those articles which thou sayest are falsely alleged against thee by the witnesses? For I verily would nothing at all doubt to abjure all errors, neither does it follow that therefore by and by I have professed any error." To whom John Huss answered: "Most noble emperor, this word, to abjure, signifies much more than your majesty here gives it." Then said the cardinal of Florence, "John Huss, you shall have a form of abjuration, which shall be gentle, and tolerable enough, written and delivered to you, and then you will easily and soon determine with yourself, whether you will do it or no." Then the emperor, repeating again the words of the cardinal of Cambray, said, "Thou hast heard that there are two ways laid before thee: first that thou shouldst openly renounce those thy errors, which are now condemned, and subscribe unto the judgment of the council, whereby thou shouldst try and find their grace and favour. But if thou proceed to defend thy opinions, the council shall have sufficient power, whereby according to their laws and ordinances, they may decree and determine upon thee." To whom John Huss answered, "I refuse nothing, most noble emperor, whatsoever the council shall decree or determine upon me. Only this one thing I except, that I do not offend God or my conscience, or say that I have professed those errors which was never in my mind or thought to profess. But I desire you all, if it may be possible, that you will grant me further liberty to declare my mind and opinion, that I may answer as much as shall suffice, as touching those things which are objected against me, and specially concerning ecclesiastical offices, and the state of the ministry."

Here a certain very old bishop of Pole put in his verdict. He said, "The laws are evident as touching heretics, with what punishment they ought to be punished." But John Huss constantly answered as before, insomuch that they said he was obstinate and stubborn. Then a certain well fed priest, and gaily apparelled, cried out unto the presidents of the council, saying, "He ought by no means to be admitted to recantation, for he hath written unto his friends, that although he do swear with his tongue, yet he will keep his mind unsworn without oath; wherefore he is not to be trusted." Unto this slander John Huss answered, as is said in the last article, affirming that he was not guilty of any error.

In the meantime there was exhibited to the council a certain article, wherein John Huss was accused, that he had slanderously interpreted a certain sentence of the pope's; which he denied that he did, saying, that he never saw it but in prison, when the article was shewn him by the commissioners.

Then was there another article read, in the which was contained, that three men were beheaded at Prague, because that through Wickliff's doctrine and teaching they were contumacious and slanderous against the pope's letters: and that they were by the same Huss, with the whole pomp of the scholars, and with a public convocation or congregation, carried out to be buried, and by a public sermon placed among the number of saints.

Then said John Huss, that it was false, that the corpses were by him conveyed with any such pomp into their sepulchre or burial.

Other charges of the same kind were made and denied again, and then there was great silence kept for a while. Then Paletz, who had conducted the process against John Huss, rising up, as having now finished his accusation, said, "I take God to my witness before the emperor's majesty here present, and the most reverend fathers, cardinals, and bishops, that in this accusation of John Huss, I have not used any hatred or evil will; but that I might satisfy the oath which I took when I was made doctor that I would be a most cruel and sharp enemy of all manner of errors, for the profit of the holy catholic church." Michael de Causis did also the like.

"And I," said John Huss, "do commit all these things unto the Heavenly Judge, which shall justly judge the cause or quarrels of both parties." Then said the cardinal of Cambray, "I cannot a little commend and praise the humanity and gentleness of Master Paletz, which he hath used in drawing out the articles against Master John Huss. For as we have heard, there are many things contained in his book much worse, and more detestable."

When he had spoken these words, the bishop of Reggio, unto whom John Huss was committed, commanded that the said John Huss should be carried again safely unto prison. Then John de Clum following him, did not a little encourage and comfort him. No tongue can express what courage and stomach he received by the short talk which he had with him; when in so great a broil and grievous hatred, he saw himself in a manner forsaken of all men. After John Huss was carried away, the emperor began to exhort the presidents of the council in this manner, saying,

"You have heard the manifold and grievous crimes which are laid against John Huss, which are not only proved by manifest and strong witnesses, but also confessed by him; of which, every one of them by my judgment and advice, have deserved, and are worthy of death. Therefore, except he do recant them all, I judge and think meet that he be punished with fire. And although he do that which he is willed and commanded to do, notwithstanding I do counsel you, that he be forbid the office of preaching and teaching, and also that he return no more into the kingdom of Bohemia. For if he be admitted again to teach and preach, and especially in the kingdom of Bohemia, he will not observe and keep that which he is commanded, but hoping upon the favour and goodwill of such as be his adherents and favourers there, he will return again unto his former purpose and intent, and then, besides these errors, he will also sow new errors amongst the people, so the last error shall be worse than the first.

"Moreover, I judge and think it good, that his articles which are condemned, should be sent to my brother the king of Bohemia, and afterward to Pole, and other provinces, where men's minds are replenished with his doctrine, with this commandment, that whosoever do hold or keep the same, should by the common aid both of the ecclesiastical and civil power, be punished. So at the length shall remedy be found for this mischief, if the boughs, together with the root, be utterly rooted and pulled up: and if the bishops, and other prelates, who here in this place have laboured for the extirpating of this heresy, be commended by the whole voices of the council to the king and princes, under whose dominion they are. Last of all, if there be any found here at Constance, who are familiars unto John Huss, they also ought to be punished with such severity and punishment as is due unto them, and especially his scholar, Jerome of Prague." Then said the rest, "When the master is once punished, we hope we shall find the scholar much more tractable and gentle."

After they had spoken these words, they departed out of the cloister, where they were assembled and gathered together. The day before his condemnation, which was the sixth of July, the Emperor Sigismund sent to him four bishops, accompanied by Master Wincelate de Duba, and John de Clum, that they should learn and understand of him what he intended to do. When he was brought out of prison to them, John de Clum began first to speak unto him, saying—

"Master John Huss, I am a man unlearned, neither am I able to counsel or advise you, being a man of learning and understanding: notwithstanding I do require you, if you know yourself guilty of any of those errors, which are objected and laid against you before the council, that you will not be ashamed to alter and change your mind to the will and pleasure of the council; if contrariwise, I will be no author to you, that you should do any thing contrary, or against your conscience, but rather to suffer and endure any kind of punishment, than to deny that which you have known to be the truth." To whom John Huss, with lamentable tears, said; "Verily, as before I have oftentimes done, I do take the most High God for my witness, that I am ready with my heart and mind, if the council can instruct or teach me any better by the holy scripture, and I will be ready with all my whole heart to alter and change my purpose." Then one of the bishops which sat by, said unto him, that he would never be so arrogant or proud, that he would prefer his own mind or opinion before the judgment of the whole council. To whom John Huss answered, "Neither do I otherwise mind or intend. For if he which is the meanest or least in all this council can convict me of error, I will with an humble heart and mind perform, and do whatever the council shall require of me." "Mark," said the bishops, "how obstinately he perseveres in his errors." And when they had thus talked, they commanded the keepers to carry him again to prison, and so they returned again unto the emperor with their commission.

The next day after, which was Saturday, and the sixth day of July, there was a general session held by the princes and lords, both of the ecclesiastical and temporal estates, in the head church of the city of Constance, the Emperor Sigismund being president, in his imperial robes and habit; in the midst whereof there was made a certain high place, being square like a table, and close by it there was a desk of wood, upon the which the garments and vestments pertaining to priesthood were laid for this purpose, that before John Huss should be delivered over to the civil power, he should be openly deprived and spoiled of his priestly ornaments. When John Huss was brought thither, he fell down upon his knees before the same high place, and prayed a long time. In the mean while the bishop of Londy went up into the pulpit, and made this sermon following.

The Sermon of the Bishop of Londy, before the Sentence was given upon John Huss.

"In the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Trusting by humble invocation upon the divine help and aid, most noble prince, and most christian emperor, and you, most excellent fathers, and reverend lords, bishops and prelates, also most excellent doctors and masters, famous and noble dukes, and high counts, honourable nobles and barons, and all other men worthy of remembrance; that the intent and purpose of my mind may the more plainly and evidently appear unto this most sacred congregation: I am first of all determined to treat or speak of that which is read in the epistle on the next Sunday, in the sixth chapter to the Romans; that is to say, 'Let the body of sin be destroyed,' &c.

"It appeareth by the authority of Aristotle, in his book entituled De Celo et Mundo, how wicked, dangerous, and foolish a matter it seemeth to be, not to withstand perverse and wicked beginnings. For he saith, that a small error in the beginning, is very great in the end. It is very damnable and dangerous to have erred, but more hard to be corrected or amended. Whereupon that worthy doctor St. Jerome, in his book upon the exposition of the catholic faith, teaches how necessary a thing it is that heretics and heresies should be suppressed, even in the first beginning of them, saying thus, the rotten and dead flesh is to be cut off from the body, lest that the whole body do perish and putrify. For a scabbed sheep is to be put out of the fold, lest that the whole flock be infected; and a little fire is to be quenched, lest the whole house be consumed and burned. Arius was first a spark in Alexandria, who, because he was not quenched at the first, he presumed, and went about with his wicked and perverse imaginations, and phantastical inventions, to spot and defile the catholic faith, which is founded and established by Christ, defended with the victorious triumphs of so many martyrs, and illuminated and set forth with the excellent doctrines and writings of so many men. Such, therefore, must be resisted; such heretics must of necessity be suppressed and condemned.

"Wherefore I have truly propounded, as touching the punishment of every such obstinate heretic, that the body of sin is to be destroyed. Whereupon it is to be considered according to the holy traditions of the fathers, that some sins are adverse and contrary unto another. Others are annexed or conjoined together; others are, as it were, branches and members of others; and some are, as it were, the roots and heads of others. Amongst all which, those are to be counted the more detestable, out of which the most and worst have their original and beginning. Wherefore, although all sins and offences are to be abhorred of us; yet those are especially to be eschewed, which are the head and root of the rest. For by how much the perverseness of them is of more force and power to hurt, with so much the more speed and circumspection ought they to be rooted out and extinguished, with apt preservatives and remedies. Forasmuch, then, as amongst all sins, none doth appear to be more inveterate than the mischief of this most execrable schism, therefore have I right well propounded, 'That the body of sin should be destroyed.' For by the long continuance of this schism, great and most cruel destruction is sprung up amongst the faithful, and hath long continued; abominable divisions of heresies are grown; threatenings are increased and multiplied; the confusion of the whole clergy is grown thereupon, and the opprobriums and slanders of the christian people, are abundantly sprung up and increased: and truly it is no marvel, forso much as that most detestable and execrable schism, is, as it were, a body and heap of dissolution of the true faith of God: for what can be good or holy in that place, where such a pestiferous schism hath reigned so long a time? For as St. Bernard saith, 'Like as in the unity and concord of the faithful, there is the habitation and dwelling of the Lord; so likewise in the schism and dissipation of the christians, there is made the habitation and dwelling of the devil. Is not schism and division the original of all subversion, the den of heresies, and the nourisher of all offences? For the knot of unity and peace being once troubled and broken, there is free passage made for all strife and debate. Covetousness is uttered in others for lucre sake; lust and will is set at liberty, and all means opened unto slaughter; all right and equity is banished, the ecclesiastical power is injured, and the calamity of this schism bringeth in all kind of bondage, sword and violence doth rule, the laity have the dominion, concord and unity are banished, and all prescribed rules of religion utterly contemned and set at naught.'

"Consider, most gentle lords, during this most pestiferous schism, how many heresies have appeared and shewed themselves, how many heretics have escaped unpunished; how many churches have been spoiled and pulled down, how many cities have been oppressed, and regions brought to ruin? What confusion hath there happened in the clergy? What and how great destruction hath been amongst the christian people? I pray you mark how the church of God, the spouse of Christ, and the Mother of all the faithful, is contemned and despised. For who doth reverence the keys of the church? who feareth the censures or laws? or who is it that doth defend the liberties thereof? but rather who is it that doth not offend the same, or who doth not invade it, or else who is he that dare not violently lay hands upon the patrimony or heritage of Jesus Christ? The goods of the clergy, and of the poor, and the relief of pilgrims and strangers, gotten together by the blood of our Saviour, and of many martyrs, are spoiled and taken away: behold, the abomination of desolation brought upon the church of God, the destruction of the faith, and the confusion of the christian people, to the ruin of the Lord's flock or fold, and all the whole company of our most holy Saviour and Redeemer. This loss is more great or grievous than any which could happen unto the martyrs of Christ, and this persecution much more cruel than the persecution of any tyrant, for they did but only punish the bodies, but in this schism and division the souls are tormented. There the blood of men was only shed; but in this case the true faith is subverted and overthrown. That persecution was salvation unto many; but this schism is destruction unto all men. When the tyrants raged, then the faith did increase; but by this division it is utterly decayed. During their cruelty and madness the primitive church increased; but through this schism it is confounded and overthrown. Tyrants did ignorantly offend; but in this schism many do wittingly and willingly even of obstinacy offend. There came in heretics, users of simony, and hypocrites, to the great detriment and deceit of the church; under those tyrants the merits of the just were increased.

"But during this schism, mischief and wickedness are augmented: for in this most cursed and execrable division, truth is made an enemy to all Christians, faith is not regarded, love and charity hated, hope is lost, justice overthrown, no kind of courage or valiantness, but only unto mischief: modesty and temperance cloaked, wisdom turned into deceit, humility feigned, equity and truth falsified, patience utterly fled, conscience small, all wickedness intended, devotion counted folly, gentleness abject and cast away, religion despised, obedience not regarded, and all manner of life reproachful and abominable. With how great and grievous sorrows is the church of God replenished and filled, whilst tyrants do oppress it, heretics invade it, users of simony do spoil and rob it, and schismatics go about utterly to subvert it? O most miserable and wretched christian people, whom now by the space of forty years, with such indurate and continual schism they have tormented, and almost brought to ruin! O the little bark and ship of Christ, which hath so long time wandered and strayed now in the midst of the whirlpools, and by and by sticketh fast in the rocks, tossed to and fro with most grievous and tempestuous storms! O miserable and wretched boat of Peter, if the most Holy Father would suffer thee to sink or drown, into what dangers and perils have the wicked pirates brought thee? Amongst what rocks have they placed thee? O most godly and loving christians, what faithful devout man is there, who beholding and seeing the great ruin and decay of the church, would not be provoked unto tears? What good conscience is there that can refrain weeping, because that contention and strife is poured upon the ecclesiastical rulers, which have made us to err in the way, because they have not found, or rather would not find the way of unity and concord, whereupon so many heresies and so great confusion is sprung up, and grown in the flock of Peter and the fold of the Lord.

"Many princes, kings, and prelates, have greatly laboured and worked for the rooting out hereof; but yet could they never bring to pass or finish that most wholesome and necessary work. Wherefore, most christian king, this most glorious and triumphant victory hath tarried only for thee, the crown and glory thereof shall be thine for ever, and this most happy victory shall be continually celebrated to thy great honour and praise, that thou hast restored again the church which was so spoiled, that thou hast removed and put away all inveterate and overgrown schisms and divisions, that thou hast trodden down users of simony, and rooted out all heretics. Dost thou not behold and see how great, perpetual, and famous renown and glory it will be unto thee? For what can be more just, what more holy, what better, what more to be desired; or, finally, what can be more acceptable, than to root out this wicked and abominable schism, to restore the church again unto her ancient liberty, to extinguish and put away all simony, and to condemn and destroy all errors and heresies from amongst the flock of the faithful? Nothing, truly, can be better, nothing more holy, nothing more profitable for the whole world; and, finally, nothing more acceptable unto God. For the performance of which most holy and godly work thou wast elect and chosen of God; thou wast first deputed and chosen in heaven before thou wast elect and chosen upon earth. Thou wast first appointed by the celestial and heavenly Prince, before the electors of the empire did elect or choose thee, and specially, that by the imperial force and power thou shouldst condemn and destroy those errors and heresies which we have presently in hand to be condemned and subverted. To the performance of this most holy work God hath given unto thee the knowledge and understanding of his divine truth and verity, power of princely majesty, and the just judgment of equity and righteousness, as the Most High himself doth say, I have given thee understanding and wisdom, to speak and utter my words, and have set thee to rule over nations and kingdoms, that thou shouldst help the people, pluck down and destroy iniquity, and by exercising of justice thou shouldst, I say, destroy all errors and heresies, and specially this obstinate heretic here present, through whose wickedness and mischief many places of the world are infected with most pestilent and heretical poison, and by this means and occasion almost utterly subverted and destroyed. This most holy and godly labour, O most noble prince! was reserved only for thee, upon thee it doth only lie, unto whom the rule and ministration of justice is given. Wherefore thou hast established thy praise and renown, even by the mouths of infants and sucking babes, for thy praises shall be celebrated for evermore, that thou hast destroyed and overthrown such and so great enemies of the faith. The which that thou mayest prosperously and happily perform and bring to pass, our Lord Jesus vouchsafe to grant thee his grace and help, who is blessed for ever and ever. Amen."

When this sermon was thus ended, the proctor of the council rising up, named Henry de Piro, required that the process of the cause against John Huss might be continued, and that they might proceed unto the definitive sentence. Then a certain bishop, who was appointed one of the judges, declared the process of the cause, which was pleaded long since in the court of Rome, and elsewhere, between John Huss and the prelates of Prague.

At the last he repeated those articles which we have before mentioned, amongst which he rehearsed also one article, that John Huss should teach the two natures of the Godhead and manhood to be one Christ. John Huss went about briefly with a word or two to answer every of them; but as often as he was about to speak the cardinal of Carbray commanded him to hold his peace, saying, "Hereafter you shall answer all together, if you will." Then said John Huss, "How can I at once answer all these things which are alleged against me, when I cannot remember them all?" Then said the cardinal of Florence, "We have heard thee sufficiently." But when John Huss for all that would not hold his peace, they sent the officers that they should force him thereunto. Then he began to intreat, pray, and beseech them, that they would hear him, that such as were present might not credit or believe those things to be true which were reported of him. But when all this could nothing prevail, he, kneeling down upon his knees, committed the whole matter unto God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, for at their hands he believed easily he would obtain that which he desired.

When the articles abovesaid were ended, last of all there was added a notable blasphemy, which they all imputed to John Huss, that is, that he said there should be a fourth person in divinity, and that a certain doctor did hear him speak of the same. When John Huss desired that the doctor might be named, the bishop that alleged the article said that it was not needful to name him. Then said John Huss, "O miserable and wretched man that I am, who am forced and compelled to bear such a blasphemy and slander."

Afterwards the article was repeated, how that he had appealed to Christ, and that appeal was called heretical. Whereto John Huss answered, "O Lord Jesus Christ, whose word is openly condemned here in this council, unto thee again I do appeal, who when thou wast evil intreated of thine enemies didst appeal unto God thy Father, committing thy cause unto a most just Judge, that by thy example we also being oppressed with manifest wrongs and injuries should flee unto thee." Last of all the article was rehearsed, as touching the contempt of the excommunication by John Huss. Whereto he answered as before, that he was excommunicated by his advocates in the court of Rome, wherefore he did not appear when he was cited; and also that it may be proved by the acts, that the excommunication was not ratified; and finally, to the intent he might clear himself of obstinacy, he was for that cause come unto Constance under the emperor's safe conduct. When he had spoken these words, one of them, who was appointed judge, read the definitive sentence against him, which follows thus word for word:—

"The most holy and sacred general council of Constance, being congregated and gathered together, representing the catholic church, for a perpetual memory of the thing, as the verity and truth did witness, 'An evil tree bringeth forth evil fruit;' hereupon it cometh, that the man of most damnable memory, John Wickliff, through his pestiferous doctrine, not through Jesus Christ by the gospel, as the holy fathers in times past have begotten faithful children, but contrary to the wholesome faith of Jesus Christ, as a most venomous root, hath begotten many pestilent and wicked children whom he hath left behind him, successors and followers of his perverse and wicked doctrine, against whom this sacred synod of Constance is forced to rise up, as against bastards and unlawful children, and with diligent care, with the sharp knife of the ecclesiastical authority, to cut up their errors out of the Lord's field, as most hurtful brambles and briars, lest they should grow to the hurt and detriment of others.

"Forsomuch then as in the holy general council, lately celebrated and holden at Rome, it was decreed, that the doctrine of John Wickliff, of most damnable memory, should be condemned, and that his books which contained the same doctrine should be burned as heretical, and this decree was approved and confirmed by the sacred authority of the whole council, nevertheless, one John Huss here personally present in this sacred council, not the disciple of Christ, but of John Wickliff, an arch heretic, after, and contrary or against the condemnation and decree hath taught, preached, and affirmed the articles of Wickliff, which were condemned by the church of God, and in times past by certain most reverend fathers in Christ, lords, archbishops, and bishops, of divers kingdoms and realms, masters of divinity of divers universities; especially resisting in his open sermons, and also with his adherents and accomplices in the schools, the condemnation of the said articles of Wickliff's, oftentimes published in the said university of Prague, and hath declared him the said Wickliff, for the favour and commendation of his doctrine before the whole multitude of the clergy and people, to be a catholic man, and a true evangelical doctor. He hath also published and affirmed certain and many of his articles worthily condemned, to be catholic, the which are notoriously contained in the books of the said John Huss.

"Wherefore, after diligent deliberation and full information first had upon the premises by the reverend fathers and lords in Christ of the holy church of Rome, cardinals, patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, and other prelates, doctors of divinity, and of both laws, in great number assembled and gathered together, this most sacred and holy council of Constance, declareth and determineth the articles abovesaid (the which, after due conference had, are found in his books written with his own hand, the which also the said John Huss in open audience, before this holy council, hath confessed to be in his books), not to be catholic, neither worthy to be taught, but that many of them are erroneous, some of them wicked, others offensive to godly ears, many of them temerarious and seditious, and the greater part of them notoriously heretical, and even now of late by the holy fathers and general councils reprov'd and condemned. And fersomuch as the said articles are expressly contained in the books of the said John Huss, therefore this said sacred council doth condemn and reprove all those books which he wrote, in what form or phrase soever they be, or whether they be translated by others, and doth determine and decree, that they all shall be solemnly and openly burned in the presence of the clergy and people of the city of Constance, and elsewhere; adding moreover for the premises, that all his doctrine is worthy to be despised and eschewed of all faithful christians. And to the intent that this most pernicious and wicked doctrine may be utterly excluded and shut out of the church, this sacred synod doth straightly command, that diligent inquisition be made by the ordinaries of the places by the ecclesiastical censure, for such treatises and works, and that such as are found be consumed and burned with fire. And if there be any found, who shall condemn or despise this sentence or decree, this sacred synod ordaineth and decreeth, that the ordinaries of the places, and the inquisitors of heresies, shall proceed against every such person as they suspect of heresy.

"Wherefore, after due inquisition made against the said John Huss, and full information had by the commissaries and doctors of both laws, and also by the sayings of the witnesses which were worthy of credit, and many other things openly read before the said John Huss, and before the fathers and prelates of this sacred council (by the which allegations of the witnesses, it appeareth, that the said John Huss hath taught many evil and offensive, seditious and perilous heresies, and hath preached the same for a long time), this most sacred and holy synod, lawfully congregated and gathered together in the Holy Ghost. (the name of Christ being invoked and called upon) by this their sentence which here is set forth in writing, determineth, pronounceth, declareth, and decreeth, that John Huss was and is a true and manifest heretic, and that he hath preached openly errors and heresies lately condemned by the church of God, and many seditious, temerarious, and offensive things, to no small offence of the Divine Majesty, and of the universal church, and detriment of the catholic faith and church, neglecting and despising the keys of the church, and ecclesiastical censures. In the which error he has continued with a mind altogether indurate and hardened by the space of many years, much offending the faithful christians by his obstinacy and stubbornness, in his having made his appeal unto the Lord Jesus Christ as the most high Judge, omitting and leaving all ecclesiastical means. In the which appeal he allegeth many false, injurious, and offensive matters, in contempt of the apostolic see, and the ecclesiastical censures and keys.

"Whereupon, both for the premises and many other things, the said synod pronounceth John Huss to be an heretic, and judgeth him by these presents to be condemned and judged as an heretic, and reproveth the said appeal as injurious, offensive, and done in derision unto the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and judgeth the said Huss not only to have seduced the christian people by his writings and preachings, and especially in the kingdom of Bohemia, neither to have been a true preacher of the gospel of Christ unto the said people, according to the exposition of the holy doctors; but also to have been a seducer of them, and also an obstinate and stiffnecked person, yea, and such an one as doth not desire to return again to the lap of our holy mother the church, neither to abjure the errors and heresies which he hath openly preached and defended. Wherefore this most sacred council decreeth and declareth, that the said John Huss shall be publicly deposed and degraded from his priestly orders and dignity, &c."

Whilst these things were thus read, John Huss, although he was forbidden to speak, notwithstanding did often interrupt them, and especially when he was reproved of obstinacy, he said, with a loud voice: "I was never obstinate, but as always heretofore, even so now again I desire to be taught by the holy scriptures, and I do profess myself to be so desirous of the truth, that if I might by one only word subvert the errors of all heretics, I would not refuse to enter into what peril or danger soever it were." When his books were condemned, he said: "Wherefore have you condemned those books, when you have not proved by any one article that they are contrary to the scriptures or articles of faith? And, moreover, what injury is this that you do to me, that you have condemned these books written in the Bohemian tongue, which you never saw, neither yet read?" And oftentimes looking up unto heaven he prayed.

When the sentence and judgment was ended, kneeling down upon his knees, he said: "Lord Jesus Christ, forgive mine enemies, by whom thou knowest that I am falsely accused, and that they have used false witness and slanders against me: forgive them, I say, for thy great mercy's sake." This his prayer and oration the greater part, and especially the chief of the priests derided and mocked.

At last, the seven bishops who were chosen out to degrade him of his priesthood commanded him to put on the garments pertaining unto priesthood, which, when he had done, he came to the putting on of the albe, he called to his remembrance the purple vesture which Herod put on Jesus Christ to mock him withal. So likewise in all other things he comforted himself by the example of Christ. When he had now put on all his priestly vestures, the bishops exhorted him that he should yet alter and change his mind, and provide for his honour and safety; then he (according as the manner of the ceremony is) going up to the top of the scaffold, being full of tears, spake to the people in this sort:

"These lords and bishops do exhort and counsel me, that I should here confess before you all that I have erred; to do which thing, if it were such as might be done with the infamy and reproach of man only, they might peradventure easily persuade me thereto; but now truly I am in the sight of the Lord my God, without whose great displeasure and the hurt of mine own conscience, I can by no means do that which they require of me. For I do well know, that I never taught any of those things which they have falsely alleged against me, but I have always preached, taught, written, and thought contrary thereto. With what countenance then should I behold the heavens? With what face should I look upon them whom I have taught, whereof there is a great number, if through me it should come to pass that those things, which they have hitherto known to be most certain and sure, should now be made uncertain? Should I by this my example astonish or trouble so many souls, so many consciences, indured with the most firm and certain knowledge of the scriptures and gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ and his most pure doctrine, armed against all the assaults of Satan? I will never do it, neither commit any such kind of offence, that I should seem more to esteem this vile carcass appointed unto death, than their health and salvation."

At this most godly word he was forced again to hear, by the sentence of the bishops, that he did obstinately and maliciously persevere in his pernicious and wicked errors.

Then he was commanded to come down to the execution of his judgment, and in his coming down, one of the seven bishops before rehearsed, first took away from him the chalice which he held in his hand, saying: "O, cursed Judas, why hast thou forsaken the council and ways of peace, and hast counselled with the Jews? We take away from thee this chalice of thy salvation." But John Huss received this curse in this manner: "But I trust unto God the Father omnipotent, and my Lord Jesus Christ, for whose sake I do suffer these things, that he will not take away the chalice of his redemption, but I have a steadfast and firm hope that this day I shall drink thereof in his kingdom." Then followed the other bishops in order, who every one of them took away the vestments from him which they had put on, each one of them giving him their curse. Whereunto John Huss answered: "That he did willingly embrace and bear those blasphemies for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." At the last they came to the erasing of his shaven crown. But before the bishops would go in hand with it, there was a great contention between them, with what instrument it should be done, with a razor or with a pair of shears.

In the mean time, John Huss, turning himself toward the emperor, said: "I marvel that forso much as they be all of like cruel mind and spirit, yet they cannot agree upon their kind of cruelty." Notwithstanding, at last they agreed to cut off the skin of the crown of his head with a pair of shears. And when they had done that, they added these words: "Now hath the church taken away all her ornaments and privileges from him. Now there resteth nothing else, but that he be delivered over unto the secular power." But before they did that, there yet remained another reproach. For they caused to be made a certain crown of paper, almost a cubit deep, in the which were painted three devils of wonderful ugly shape, and this title set over their heads, "ARCH-HERETIC," which, when he saw, he said: "My Lord Jesus Christ for my sake did wear a crown of thorns, why should not I then for his sake again wear this light crown, be it never so ignominious? Truly I will do it, and that willingly." When it was set upon his head, the bishop said: "Now we commit thy soul to the devil." "But I," said John Huss, lifting his eyes up towards the heavens, "do commit my spirit into thy hands, O Lord Jesus Christ, unto thee I commend my spirit which thou hast redeemed." These contumelies thus ended, the bishops turning themselves towards the emperor, said: "This most sacred synod of Constance leaveth now John Huss, who has no more any office in the church of God, to the civil judgment and power." Then the emperor commanded Lewis, duke of Bavaria, who stood before him in his robes, holding the golden apple with the cross in his hand, that he should receive John Huss from the bishops, and deliver him to them who should do the execution. As he was led by them to the place of execution, before the church doors he saw his books burning, whereat he smiled and laughed. And all men that passed by he exhorted, not to think that he should die for any error or heresy, but only for the hatred and ill will of his adversaries, who had charged him with most false and unjust crimes. Nearly the whole city followed him in armour.

The place appointed for the execution was before the gate Gottlebian, between the gardens and gates of the suburbs. When John Huss was come thither, kneeling down upon his knees, and lifting his eyes up unto heaven, he prayed, and said certain Psalms, and especially the thirty-first and fiftieth Psalms. And they who stood hard by, heard him oftentimes in his prayer, with a lively and cheerful countenance, repeat this verse: "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit," &c. Which thing when the lay people beheld who stood next to him, they said: "What he hath done before we know not, but now we see and hear that he doth speak and pray very devoutly and godly." Others wished that he had a confessor. There was a certain priest by, sitting on horseback, in a green gown, drawn about with red silk, who said: "He ought not to be heard, because he is an heretic." Yet, notwithstanding, while he was in prison, he was both confessed, and also absolved by a certain doctor, a monk, as Huss himself witnesses in an epistle which he wrote to his friends out of prison. Thus Christ reigns unknown to the world, even in the midst of his enemies. In the meantime, while he prayed, as he bowed his neck backward to look upward unto heaven, the crown of paper fell off from his head upon the ground. Then one of the soldiers, taking it up again, said, "Let us put it again upon his head, that he may be burned with his masters, the devils, whom he has served."

When by the commandment of the tormentors he was risen up from his prayer, with a loud voice, he said: "Lord Jesus Christ assist and help me, that with a constant and patient mind, by thy most gracious help, I may bear and suffer this cruel and ignominious death, whereunto I am condemned for the preaching of thy most holy gospel and word." Then, as before, he declared the cause of his death to the people. In the meantime the hangman stripped him of his garments, and turning his hands behind his back, tied him fast to the stake with ropes that were made wet. And whereas by chance he was turned towards the east, certain cried out that he should not look towards the east, for he was an heretic; so he was turned towards the west. Then was his neck tied with a chain to the stake, which chain, when he beheld, smiling, he said, "That he would willingly receive the same chain for Jesus Christ's sake, who, he knew, was bound with a far worse chain." Under his feet they set two fagots, mixing straw with them, and so likewise from the feet up to the chin he was enclosed in round about with wood. But before the wood was set on fire, Lewis, duke of Bavaria, with another gentleman, who was the son of Clement, came and exhorted John Huss, that he would yet be mindful of his safety, and renounce his errors. To whom he said: "What errors should I renounce, when I know myself guilty of none? For as for those things which are falsely alleged against me, I know that I never did so much as once think them, much less preach them. For this was the principal end and purpose of my doctrine, that I might teach all men repentance and the remission of sins, according to the verity of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and the exposition of the holy doctors; wherefore with a cheerful mind and courage I am here ready to suffer death." When he had spoken these words, they left him, and shaking hands together, they departed.

Then was the fire kindled, and John Huss began to sing with a loud voice, "Jesus Christ the Son of the living God have mercy upon me." And when he began to say the same the third time, the wind drove the flame so upon his face, that it choked him. Yet notwithstanding he moved a while after, by the space that a man might almost say the Lord's Prayer three times. When all the wood was burned and consumed, the upper part of the body was left hanging in the chain, so they threw down stake and all, and making a new fire, burned it, the head being first cut in small pieces, that it might the sooner be consumed unto ashes. The heart, which was found amongst the bowels, being well beaten with staves and clubs, was at last pricked upon a sharp stick, and roasted at a fire apart until it was consumed. Then, with great diligence gathering the ashes together, they cast them into the river Rhone, that the least remnant of the ashes of that man should not be left upon the earth, whose memory notwithstanding cannot be abolished out of the minds of the godly, neither by fire, neither by water, neither by any kind of torment.

I know very well that these things are very slenderly written by me as touching the labours of this most holy martyr, John Huss, with whom the labours of Hercules are not to be compared. For that ancient Hercules slew a few monsters; but this our Hercules with a most stout and valiant courage, hath subdued even the world itself, the mother of all monsters and cruel beasts. This history were worthy some other kind of more curious handling; but forso much as I cannot otherwise perform it myself, I have endeavoured according to the very truth, as the thing was indeed, to commend the same unto all godly minds: neither have I heard it reported by others, but I myself was present at the doing of all these things, and as I was able, I have put them in writing, that by this my labour and endeavour, howsoever it were, I might preserve the memory of this holy man and excellent doctor of the evangelical truth.

What was the name of this author which wrote this history it is not expressed. Cochleus, in his second book "Contra Hussitas," supposeth his name to be Johannes Pizibram, a Bohemian.

This godly servant and martyr of Christ was condemned by the cruel council, and burned at Constance, A. D. 1415, about the month of July.

How grievously this death of John Huss was taken among the nobles of Bohemia and of Moravia, hereafter (Christ willing) shall appear by their letters which they sent to the council, and by the letters of Sigismund, the king of the Romans. Wherein he labours, all that can, to purge and excuse himself of Huss's death. Although he was not altogether free from that cruel act, and innocent from that blood; yet notwithstanding he pretends in words so to wipe away that blot from him, that the greatest part of the crime seems to rest upon the bloody prelates of that council.

But it appears that the emperor, partly ashamed and sorry, would gladly have cleared himself thereof, and with Pilate have washed his hands; yet he could not so clear himself, but that a great portion of that murder remained on him, as may appear by his last words spoken in the council to John Huss, whereof John Huss in his epistles complains, writing to his friends in Bohemia in his thirty-third epistle, as follows:—

"I desire you again, for the love of God, that the lords of Bohemia joining together, will desire the king for a final audience to be given to me. Forso much as he alone said to me in the council, that they should give me audience shortly, and that I should answer for myself briefly in writing: it will be to his great confusion, if he shall not perform that which he hath spoken. But I fear that word of his will be as firm and sure, as the other was concerning my safe conduct granted by him.

There were some in Bohemia, who desired me to beware of his safe conduct. And other said, he will surely give you to your enemies. And the lord Mikest Dwaky told me before Master Jessenitz, saying, 'Master, know it for certain, you shall be condemned.' And this I suppose he spake, knowing before the intention of the king. I hoped that he had been well affected toward the law of God and the truth, and had therein good understanding; now I conceive that he is not very skilful, nor so prudently circumspect in himself. He condemned me before even mine enemies did. Who, if it had pleased him, might have kept the moderation of Pilate the Gentile, who said, 'I find no cause in this man;' or at least, if he had said but thus, 'Behold, I have given him his safe conduct safely to return.' And if he will not abide the decision of the council, I will send him home to the king of Bohemia with your sentence and attestations, that he with his clergy may judge him."

John Huss, while in prison, wrote several treatises, as, "of the commandments;" "of the Lord's prayer;" "of mortal sin;" "of matrimony;" "of the knowledge and love of God;" "of the three enemies of mankind, the world, and flesh, and the devil;" "of penance;" "of the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord;" "of the sufficiency of the law of God to rule the church," &c. He wrote also many epistles and letters to the lords, and to his friends of Bohemia. Some of his letters I thought here to insert, that the reader may have some taste, and take some profit of the christian writings and doings of this blessed man; first beginning with the letter of the Lord de Clum, concerning the safe conduct of John Huss.

"To all and singular that shall see and hear these presents, I John de Clum do it to understand, how Master John Huss, bachelor of divinity, under the safe conduct and protection of the renowned prince and Lord Sigismund of the Romans, ever Augustus, and king of Hungary, &c. my gracious lord, and under the protection, defence, and safe-guard of the holy empire of Rome, having the letters patent of the said my lord, king of the Romans, &c.; came unto Constance to render a full account of his faith in public audience to all that would require the same. This the said Master John Huss, in this imperial city of Constance, under the safe conduct of the said my lord king of the Romans, hath been and yet is detained. And although the pope, with the cardinals, have been seriously required by solemn ambassadors of the said my lord king of the Romans, in the king's name and behalf, that the said Master John Huss should be set at liberty, and be restored unto me, yet, notwithstanding, they have and yet do refuse hitherto to set him at liberty, to the great contempt and derogation of the safe conduct of the king, and of the safeguard and protection of the empire, or imperial majesty. Wherefore I, John aforesaid, in the name of the king, do here publish and make it known, that the apprehending, and detaining of the said Master John Huss, was done wholly against the will of the forenamed king of the Romans my lord, seeing it is done in the contempt of the safe conduct of his subjects, and of the protection of the empire, because that the said my lord was then absent, far from Constance; and if he had been there present, would never have permitted the same. And when he shall come, it is to be doubted of no man, but that he, for this great injury and contempt of this safe conduct done to him and to the empire, will grievously be molested for the same.

"Given at Constance, in the day of the Nativity of the Lord, 1414.

An Epistle of John Huss unto the People of Prague.

"Grace and peace from our Lord Jesus Christ, that you being delivered from sin may walk in his grace, and may grow in all modesty and virtue, and after this may enjoy eternal life.

"Dearly beloved, I beseech you who walk after the law of God, that you cast not away the care of the salvation of your souls, when you hearing the word of God are forewarned wisely to understand that you be not deceived by false apostles; who do not reprehend the sins of men, but rather extenuate and diminish them: who flatter the priests, and do not shew to the people their offences; who magnify themselves, boast their own works, and marvellously extol their own worthiness, but follow not Christ in his humility, in poverty, in the cross, and other manifold afflictions. Of whom our merciful Saviour did warn us before, saying, 'False christians and false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many.' And when he had forewarned his well-beloved disciples, he said unto them, 'Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves: ye shall know them by their fruits.' And true it is, that the faithful of Christ have much need diligently to beware and take heed to themselves. For, as our Saviour himself says, 'The elect also; if it were possible, shall be brought into error.' Wherefore, my well-beloved, be circumspect and watchful, that ye be not circumvented with the crafty trains of the devil. And the more circumspect ye ought to be, for antichrist labours the more to trouble you. The last judgment is near at hand: death shall swallow up many, but to the elect children of God the kingdom of God draweth near, because for them he gave his own body. Fear not death, love together one another, persevere in understanding the good will of God without ceasing. Let the terrible and horrible day of judgment be always before your eyes, that you sin not; and also the joy of eternal life, whereunto you must endeavour. Furthermore, let the passion of our Saviour be never out of your minds; that you may bear with him, and for him gladly, whatever shall be laid upon you. For if you shall consider well in your minds his cross and afflictions, nothing shall be grievous unto you, and you shall patiently give place to tribulations, cursings, rebukes, stripes, and imprisonment, and shall not doubt to give your lives moreover for his holy truth, if need require. Know ye, well-beloved, that antichrist being stirred up against you, devises various persecutions. And many he has not hurt, do not the least hair of their heads, as by mine own example I can testify, although he has been vehemently incensed against me. Wherefore, I desire you all, with your prayers to make intercession for me to the Lord, to give me understanding, sufferance, patience, and constancy, that I never swerve from his divine verity. He hath brought me now to Constance. In all my journey, openly and manifestly, I have not feared to utter my name as becomes the servant of God. In no place have I kept myself secret, nor used any dissimulation. But never did I find in any place more pestilent and manifest enemies than at Constance. Which enemies neither should I have had there, had it not been for certain of our own Bohemians, hypocrites, and deceivers, who, for benefits received, and stirred up with covetousness, with boasting and bragging, have persuaded the people that I went about to seduce them out of the right way: but I am in good hope, that through the mercy of our God, and by your prayers, I shall persist strongly in the immutable verity of God unto the last breath. Finally, I would not have you ignorant, that whereas every one here is put in his office, I only as an outcast am neglected, &c. I commend you to the merciful Lord Jesus Christ, our true God, and the Son of the immaculate Virgin Mary, who hath redeemed us by his most bitter death, without all merits, from eternal pains, from the thralldom of the devil, and from sin.

"From Constance the year of our Lord, 1415."

"My gracious benefactors and defenders of the truth, I exhort you by the bowels of Jesus Christ, that now ye setting aside the vanities of this present world, will give your service to the Eternal King, Christ the Lord. Trust not in princes, nor in the sons of men, in whom there is no help. For the sons of men are dissemblers and deceitful. To-day they are, to-morrow they perish, but God remaineth for ever. Who hath his servants, not for any need he hath of them, but for their own profit: unto whom he performs that which he promises, and fulfils that which he purposes to give. He casts off no faithful servant from him; for he saith, 'Where I am, there also shall my servant be.' And the Lord maketh every servant of his to be the lord of all his possession, giving himself unto him, and with himself, all things; that without tediousness, fear, and without defect he may possess all things, rejoicing with all saints in joy infinite. O! happy is that servant, whom, when the Lord shall come, he shall find watching. Happy is the servant which shall receive that King of Glory with joy. Wherefore, well beloved lords and benefactors, serve you that King in fear; who shall bring you, as I trust, by his grace, at this present time to Bohemia, in health, and hereafter to eternal life of glory. Fare you well, for I think that this is the last letter that I shall write to you; who, to-morrow, as I suppose, shall be purged in hope of Jesus Christ, through bitter death for my sins. The things that happened to me this night I am not able to write. Sigismund has done all things with me deceitfully, God forgive him, and only for your sakes. You also heard the sentence which he awarded against me. I pray you have no suspicion of faithful Vitus."

"The Lord God be with you. Many causes there were, my dear friends, well-beloved in God, which moved me to think that those letters were the last, which before I sent to you, looking that same time for instant death. But now understanding the same to be deferred, I take it for great comfort to me, that I have some leisure more to talk with you by letters. And therefore I write again to you, to declare and testify at least my gratitude and mindful duty toward you. And, as touching death, God doth know why he doth defer it both to me, and to my well-beloved brother, Master Jerome, who I trust will die holily and without blame; and do know also that he doeth and suffereth now more valiantly than I myself, a wretched sinner. God hath given us a long time, that we might call to memory our sins the better, and repent for the same more fervently. He hath granted us time, that our long and great temptation should put away our grievous sins, and bring the more consolation. He hath given us time, wherein we should remember the horrible rebukes of our merciful King and Lord Jesus, and should ponder his cruel death, and so more patiently might learn to bear our afflictions. And, moreover, that we might keep in remembrance, how that the joys of the life to come are not given after the joys of this world immediately, but through many tribulations the saints have entered into the kingdom of heaven. For some of them have been cut and chopped all to pieces, some have had their eyes bored through, some been boiled, some roasted, some flayed alive, some buried alive, stoned, crucified, ground betwixt millstones, drawn hither and thither unto execution, drowned in waters, strangled and hanged, torn in pieces, vexed with rebukes before their death, kept in prisons, and afflicted in bonds. And who is able to recite all the torments and sufferings of the holy saints, which they suffered under the Old and New Testament for the verity of God; namely, those which have at any time rebuked the malice of the priests, or have preached against their wickedness? And it will be a marvel if any man now also shall escape unpunished, who ever dare boldly resist the wickedness and perversity, especially of those priests, who can abide no correction. And I am glad that they are compelled now to read my books, in which their malice is somewhat described; and I know they have read the same more exactly and willingly, than they have read the holy gospel, seeking therein to find out errors.

"Given at Constance upon Thursday, the 28th day of June, A. D. 1415."

Another Letter of John Huss, wherein he confirmeth the Bohemians, and describeth the wickedness of the Council.

"John Huss, in hope the servant of God, to all the faithful in Bohemia, which love the Lord, greeting, through the grace of God. It cometh in my mind, wherein I must needs admonish you, that are the faithful and beloved of the Lord, how that the council of Constance being full of pride, avarice, and all abomination, has condemned my books written in the Bohemian tongue, for heretical, which books they never saw, nor ever heard. And if they had heard them, yet they could not understand the same, being some Italians, some Frenchmen, some Britons, some Spaniards, Germans, with other people of other nations; unless, peradventure, John, bishop of Litomysl, understood them, who was present in that council, and certain other Bohemians, and priests which are against me, and labour all they may how to deprave both the verity of God, and the honesty of our country of Bohemia; which I judge in the hope of God, to be a godly land, right well given to the true knowledge of the faith, for it so greatly desires the word of God, and honest manners. And if you were here at Constance, you would see the grievous abomination of this council, which they call so holy, and infallible. Of which council I have heard it reported, that the city of Constance cannot in thirty years be purged of those abominations committed in that council. And almost all are offended with that council, being sore grieved to behold such execrable things perpetrated in the same.

"When I stood first to answer before mine adversaries, seeing all things there done with no order, and hearing them also outrageously crying out, I said plainly to them, that I looked for more honest behaviour, and better order and discipline in that council. Then the chief cardinal answered, 'Sayest thou so? But in the Tower thou spakest more modestly.' To whom said I, 'In the Tower no man cried out against me, whereas now all do rage against me.' My faithful and beloved in Christ, be not afraid with their sentence in condemning my books. They shall be scattered hither and thither abroad, like light butterflies, and their statutes shall endure as spider-webs. They went about to shake my constancy from the verity of Christ; but they could not overcome the virtue of God in me. They would not reason from scripture against me, as divers honourable lords can witness with me, who being ready to suffer contumely for the truth of God, took my part stoutly; namely, Lord Wenceslate de Duba, and Lord John de Clum: for they were let in by King Sigismund into the council. And when I said, that I was desirous to be instructed if I did in anything err, then they heard the chief cardinal answer again, 'Because thou wouldest be informed, there is no remedy but that thou must first revoke thy doctrine according to the determination of fifty bachelors of divinity appointed.' O high instruction!

"After like manner St. Katherine also should have denied and revoked the verity of God, and faith in Christ, because the fifty masters likewise withstood her: which, notwithstanding, that good virgin would never do, standing in her faith unto death: but she did win those her masters unto Christ, when as I cannot win these my masters by any means. These things I thought good to write to you, that you might know how they have overcome me, with no grounded scripture, nor with any reason: but only did assay with terrors and deceits to persuade me to revoke and to abjure. But our merciful God, whose law I have magnified, was and is with me, and I trust, so will continue, and will keep me in his grace unto death.

"Written at Constance, after the feast of John Baptist, in prison and in bonds, daily looking for death; although for the secret judgments of God, I dare not say, whether this be my last epistle: for now also Almighty God is able to deliver me."

Another Letter of John Huss, wherein he comforteth his Friends, and willeth them not to be troubled for the condemning of his Books; and also declareth the wickedness of the Clergy.

"Master John Huss, in hope the servant of God, to all the faithful which love him and his statutes, wisheth the truth and grace of God.

"Beloved, I thought it needful to warn that you should not fear or be discouraged, because the adversaries have decreed that my books should be burnt. Remember how the Israelites burned the preachings of the prophet Jeremiah, and yet they could not avoid the things that were prophesied of in them. For after they were burnt, the Lord commanded to write the same prophecy again, and that larger, which was also done. For Jeremiah, sitting in prison spake, and Baruch, who was ready at his hand, wrote. This is written either in the thirty-fifth or forty-fifth chapter of the vision of Jeremiah. It is also written in the books of the Maccabees, 'That the wicked did burn the law of God, and killed them that had the same.' Again, under the New Testament, they burned the saints, with the books of the law of God. The cardinals condemned and committed to fire certain of St. Gregory's books, and had burnt them all if they had not been preserved by God through the means of Peter, Gregory's minister. Having these things before your eyes, take heed lest through fear you omit to read my books, and deliver them to the adversaries to be burnt. Remember the saying of our merciful Saviour, by which he forewarned us, Matt. xxiv. 'There shall be,' saith he, 'before the day of judgment, great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world until this day, no, nor yet shall be: so that even the elect of God should be deceived, if it were possible. But for their sakes those days shall be shortened.' When you remember these things, beloved, be not afraid, for I trust in God that that school of antichrist shall be afraid of you, and suffer you to be in quiet, neither shall the council of Constance extend to Bohemia. For I think, that many of them who are of the council, will die before they shall get from you my books. And they shall depart from the council, and be scattered abroad, throughout the parts of the world, like storks, and then they shall know when winter cometh, what they did in summer. Consider that they have judged their head, the pope, worthy of death, for many horrible acts that he hath done. Go to now; answer to this, you preachers, who preach that the pope is the god of the earth; that he may, as the lawyers say, make sale of the holy things; that he is the head of the whole holy church, in verity well governing the same; that he is the heart of the church in quickening the same spiritually: that he is the well-spring from which floweth all virtue and goodness: that he is the sun of the holy church: that he is the safe refuge to which every christian man ought to fly for succour. Behold now, that head is cut off with the sword, now the god of the earth is bound, now his sins are declared openly; now that well-spring is dried up, that sun darkened, that heart is plucked out and thrown away, lest that any man should seek succour thereat. The council hath condemned that head, and that for this offence, because he took money for indulgences, bishopricks, and other such like.

"I would that in that council God had said, 'He that amongst you is without sin, let him give the sentence against Pope John;' then surely they had gone all out of the council-house, one after another. Why did they bow the knee to him always, before this his fall, kiss his feet, and call him the most holy father, seeing they saw apparently before, that he was an heretic, that he was a killer, that he was a wicked sinner, all which things now they have found in him? Why did the cardinals choose him to be pope, knowing before that he had killed the holy father? Why suffered they him to meddle with holy things, in bearing the office of the popedom? for to this end they are his counsellors, that they should admonish him of that which is right. Are not they themselves as guilty of these faults as he? seeing that they accounted these things vices in him, and were partakers of some of them themselves? Why durst no man lay ought to his charge, before he had fled from Constance, but as soon as the secular power, by the sufferance of God, laid hold upon him, then, and never before, they conspired all together that he should not live any longer? Surely, even at this day is the malice, the abomination and filthiness of antichrist revealed in the pope, and others of this council.

"Now the faithful servants of God may understand what our Saviour Christ meant by this saying, 'When you shall see the abomination of desolation, which is spoken of by Daniel, &c. whoso can understand it,' &c. Surely, these be great abominations, pride, covetousness, simony, sitting in a solitary place; that is to say, in a dignity void of goodness, of humility, and other virtues; as we do now clearly see in those that are constituted in any office and dignity. O how acceptable a thing should it be (if time would suffer me) to disclose their wicked acts, which are now apparent that the faithful servants of God might know them? I trust in God that he will send after me those that shall be more valiant; and there are alive at this day, those who shall make more manifest the malice of antichrist, and shall give their lives to the death for the truth of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall give both to you and me the joys of life everlasting.

"This epistle was written upon St. John Baptist's day, in prison and in cold irons, I having this meditation with myself, that John was beheaded in his prison and bonds, for the word of God."

Another Letter of John Huss.

"John Huss, in hope the servant of God, to all the faithful at Bohemia which love the Lord, wisheth to stand and die in the grace of God, and at last to attain unto eternal life.

"Ye that bear rule over others, and be rich, and ye also that be poor, well-beloved and faithful in God, I beseech you, and admonish you all, that ye will be obedient unto God, make much of his word, and gladly hearing the same, will humbly perform that which ye hear. I beseech you stick fast to the verity of God's word, which I have written and preached unto you out of his law, and the sermons of his saints. Also I desire you if any man either in public sermon or in private talk heard of me any thing, or have read any thing written by me which is against the verity of God, that ye do not follow the same. Albeit I do not find my conscience guilty that I ever have spoken or written any such thing amongst you.

"I desire you, moreover, if any man, at any time have noted any levity either in my talk or in my conditions, that ye do not follow the same, but pray to God for me, to pardon me that sin of lightness. I pray you that ye will love your priests and ministers which be of honest behaviour, to prefer and honour them before others; namely, such priests as travel in the word of God. I pray you take heed to yourselves, and beware of malicious and deceitful men, and especially of these wicked priests of whom our Saviour doth speak, that they are under sheep's clothing, and inwardly are ravening wolves. I pray such as be rulers and superiors, to behave themselves gently towards their poor inferiors, and to rule them justly. I beseech the citizens that they will walk every man in his degree and vocation, with an upright conscience. The artificers also, I beseech that they will exercise their occupations diligently, and use them with the fear of God. I beseech the servants that they will serve their masters faithfully. And likewise the schoolmasters I beseech, that they living honestly, will bring up their scholars virtuously, and teach them faithfully, first to learn to fear God; then for the glory of God and the public utility of the commonwealth, and their own health, and not for avarice or for worldly honour, to employ their minds to honest arts. I beseech the students of the university, and all schools, in all honest things to obey their masters, and to follow them, and that with all diligence they will study to be profitable both to the setting forth of the glory of God, and to the soul's health, as well of themselves, as of other men. Together I beseech and pray you all, that you will yield most hearty thanks to the right honourable lords, the Lord Wenceslaus de Duba, Lord John de Clum, Lord Henry Lumlovio, Lord Vilem Zagacio, Lord Nicholas, and other lords of Bohemia, of Moravia, and Polonie; that their diligence towards me may be grateful to all good men; because that they, like valiant champions of God's truth, have oftentimes set themselves against the whole council for my deliverance, contending and standing against the same to the uttermost of their power; but especially Lord Wenceslaus de Duba, and Lord John de Clum. Whatsoever they shall report unto you, give credit unto them; for they were in the council when I there answered many. They know who they were of Bohemia, and how many false and slanderous things they brought in against me, and that council cried out against me, and how I also answered to all things whereof I was demanded. I beseech you also that ye will pray for the king of the Romans, and for your king, and for his wife, your queen, that God of his mercy would abide with them and with you, both now and henceforth in everlasting life. Amen.

"This epistle I have written to you out of prison and in bonds, looking the next day after the writing hereof, for the sentence of the council upon my death; having a full trust that he will not leave me, neither suffer me to deny his truth, and to revoke the errors, which false witnesses maliciously have devised against me. How mercifully the Lord God hath dealt with me, and was with me in marvellous temptations, ye shall know when hereafter by the help of Christ we shall all meet together in the joy of the world to come. As concerning Master Jerome, my dearly beloved brother and fellow, I hear no other but that he is remaining in straight bonds, looking for death as I do; and that for the faith which he valiantly maintained amongst the Bohemians, our cruel enemies of Bohemia have given us into the power and hands of other enemies, and into bonds. I beseech you pray to God for them.

"Moreover, I beseech you, namely of Prague, that ye will love the temple of Bethlehem, and provide so long as God shall permit, that the word of God may be preached in the same. For, because of that place, the devil is angry, and against the same place he hath stirred up priests and canons, perceiving that in that place his kingdom should be disturbed and diminished. I trust in God that he will keep that holy church so long as it shall please him, and in the same shall give greater increase of his word by other, than he hath done by me a weak vessel. I beseech you also, that ye will love one another, and withholding no man from the hearing of God's word, ye will provide and take care that good men be not oppressed by any force and violence. Written at Constance, the year of our Lord 1415."

Another right godly letter of John Huss to a certain priest, admonishing him of his office, and exhorting him to be faithful; worthy to be read of all Ministers.

"The peace of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. My dear brother be diligent in preaching the gospel, and do the work of a good evangelist; neglect not your vocation; labour like a blessed soldier of Christ. First, live godly and holily. Secondly, teach faithfully and truly. Thirdly, be an example to others in well doing, that you be not reprehended in your sayings: correct vice and set forth virtue. To evil livers threaten eternal punishment; but to those that be faithful and godly, set forth the comforts of eternal joy. Preach continually, but be short and fruitful, prudently understanding, and discreetly dispensing the holy scriptures. Never affirm or maintain those things that be uncertain and doubtful, lest that your adversaries take hold upon you, which rejoice in depraving their brethren, whereby they may bring the ministers of God into contempt. Exhort men to the confession of their faith, and to the communion of both kinds both of the body and blood of Christ, whereby such as do repent earnestly of their sins, may the more often come to the holy communion. And I warn you that you enter into no taverns with guests, and be not a common company-keeper. For the more a preacher keeps him from the company of men, the more he is regarded. However, deny not yet your help and diligence, wheresoever you may profit other. Against fleshly lust preach continually all that ever you can; for that is the raging beast, which devoureth men, for whom the flesh of Christ did suffer. Finally, howsoever you do, fear God and keep his precepts; so shall you walk wisely, and shall not perish; so shall you subdue the flesh, contemn the world, and overcome the devil; so shall you put on God, find life, and confirm others, and shall crown yourself with the crown of glory, the which the just Judge shall give you. Amen."

This letter of John Huss containeth a confession of the infirmity of man's flesh, how weak it is, and repugnant against the spirit. Wherein he also exhorteth to persevere constantly in the truth.

"Health be to you from Jesus Christ, &c. My dear friend, know that Paletz came to me to persuade me that I should not fear the shame of abjuration, but to consider the good which thereof will come. To whom I said that the shame of condemnation and burning is greater than to abjure.

"Almighty God shall confirm the hearts of his faithful, whom he hath chosen before the foundation of the world, that they may receive the eternal crown of glory. And let antichrist rage as much as he will, yet he shall not prevail against Christ, who shall destroy him with the spirit of his mouth, as the apostle saith; and then shall the creature be delivered out of the bondage of corruption, into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God, as saith the apostle in the words following. 'We also within ourselves do groan, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.'

"I am greatly comforted in those words of our Saviour, 'Happy are you when men shall hate you, and shall separate you, and shall rebuke you, and shall cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake: rejoice and be glad, for behold, great is your reward in heaven.' Luke vi. O worthy, yea, O most worthy consolation, which not to understand, but to practise in time of tribulation, is a hard lesson.

"This rule St. James, with the other apostles, did well understand, when he saith, 'Count it exceeding joy, my brethren, when ye shall fall into divers temptations, knowing that the trial of your faith worketh patience: let patience have her perfect work.' For certainly it is a great matter for a man to rejoice in trouble, and to take it for joy to be in divers temptations. A light matter it is to speak it and to expound it; but a great matter to fulfil it. For why? our most patient and most valiant champion himself, knowing that he should rise again the third day, overcoming his enemies by his death, and redeeming from damnation his elect, after his last supper, was troubled in spirit, and said, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.' Of whom also the gospel saith, 'That he began to fear, to be sorrowful and very heavy.' Who being then in an agony, was confirmed of the angel, and his sweat was like drops of blood falling upon the ground. And yet he notwithstanding, being so troubled, said to his disciples, 'Let not your hearts be troubled, neither fear the cruelty of them that persecute you, for you shall have me with you always, that you may overcome the tyranny of your persecutors.' Whereupon those his soldiers, looking upon the Prince and King of Glory, sustained great conflicts. They passed through fire and water, and were saved, and received the crown of the Lord God, of which St. James in his canonical epistle, saith, 'Blessed is the man who suffereth temptation, for when he shall be proved, he shall receive the crown of life, which God hath promised to them that love him.' Of this crown I trust steadfastly the Lord will make me a partaker also with you, which be the fervent sealers of the truth, and with all them which steadfastly and constantly do love the Lord Jesus Christ, who suffered for us, leaving to us an example that we should follow his steps. 'It behoved him to suffer,' as he saith, and us also it behoveth to suffer, that the members may suffer together with the head. For he saith, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.'

"O most merciful Christ! draw us weak creatures after thee, for except thou should draw us, we are not able to follow thee. Give us a strong spirit, that it may be ready, and although the flesh be feeble, yet let thy grace go before us, go with us, and follow us; for without thee we can do nothing, and much less enter into a cruel death for thy sake. Give us that prompt and ready spirit, a bold heart, an upright faith, a firm hope, and perfect charity, that we may give our lives patiently and joyfully for thy name's sake, Amen.

"Written in prison in bonds on the vigil of St. John the Baptist, who being in prison and in bonds for the rebuking of wickedness, was beheaded."

By the life, acts, and letters of John Huss hitherto rehearsed, it is evident and plain, that he was condemned not for any error of doctrine, for he neither denied their popish transubstantiation, neither spake against the authority of the church of Rome, if it were well governed, nor yet the seven sacraments, but said mass, himself, and in almost all their popish opinions was a papist with them; but only through evil will was accused by his malicious adversaries, because he spake against the pomp, pride, and avarice, and other wicked enormities of the pope, cardinals, and prelates of the church, and because he could not abide the high dignities and livings of the church, and thought the doings of the pope to be antichrist like. For this cause he procured so many enemies and false witnesses against him, who, straining and picking matter out of his books and writings, having no one just article of doctrine to lay unto him, yet they made him an heretic, whether he would or no, and brought him to his condemnation.

The tragical and lamentable history of the famous learned man and godly martyr of Christ, Master Jerome of Prague, burned at Constance for like cause and quarrel as Master John Huss was, A. D. 1416.

These things being discoursed, touching the life, acts, and constant martyrdom of Master John Huss, with part also of his letters, whose death was on the sixth of July, (A.D. 1415), it now remains to describe the like tragedy and cruel handling of his christian companion Master Jerome of Prague, who, grievously sorrowing for the slanderous reproach and defamation of his country of Bohemia, and also hearing of the manifest injuries done to that man of worthy memory, Master John Huss, freely and of his own accord came to Constance the fourth day of April, (A. D. 1415), and there perceiving that John Huss was denied to be heard, and that watch and wait was laid for him on every side, departed to Iberling, until the next day, which city was a mile from Constance, and from thence he wrote his letters to Sigismund, king of Hungary, and his barons, and also to the council, most earnestly requiring that the king and the council would give him a safe conduct freely to come and go, and that he would then come in open audience to answer to every man, if there were any of the council that would lay any crime to him, as by the tenor of his intimation shall more at large appear.

When the king of Hungary was required thereto, being in the house of the lord cardinal of Cambray, he refused to give Master Jerome any safe conduct, excusing himself for the evil speed he had with the safe conduct of John Huss before, and alleging also certain other causes. The deputies also of the four nations of the council being moved thereto by the lords of the king of Bohemia, answered: "We will give him a safe conduct to come, but not to depart." Whose answers, when they were reported to Master Jerome, he the next day after wrote certain intimations according to the tenor under written, which he sent to Constance to be set upon the gates of the city, and upon the gates of the churches and monasteries, and of the houses of the cardinals, and other nobles and prelates. The tenor whereof here follows word for word in this manner:—

"To the most noble prince and lord, the Lord Sigismund, by the grace of God, king of the Romans, always Augustus, and of Hungary, &c., I Jerome of Prague, master of arts of the general universities of Paris, Cologne, Heidelberg, and Prague, by these my present letters do notify to the king, together with the whole reverend council, and as much as in me lieth, do all men to understand and know, that because of the crafty slanderers, backbiters, and accusers, I am ready freely, and of mine own will, to come to Constance, there to declare openly before the council, the purity and sincerity of my true faith, and mine innocency, and not secretly in corners before any private or particular person. Wherefore, if there be any of my slanderers, of what nation or estate soever they be, who will object against me any crime of error or heresy; let them come forth openly before me in the presence of the whole council, and in their own names object against me, and I will be ready, as I have written, to answer openly and publicly before the whole council, of mine innocency, and to declare the purity and sincerity of my true faith. And if so be that I shall be found culpable in error or heresy, then I will not refuse openly to suffer such punishment as shall be meet and worthy for an erroneous person, or an heretic.

"Wherefore I most humbly beseech my lord the king, and the whole sacred council, that I may have to this end and purpose aforesaid, safe and sure access. And if it happen that I offering such equity and right as I do, before any fault be proved against me, be arrested, imprisoned, or have any violence done unto me; that then it may be manifest to the whole world, that this general council does not proceed according to equity and justice, if they would by any means put me back from this profound and straight justice, being come hither freely of mine own mind and accord, which thing I suppose to be far from so sacred and holy council of wise men."

When he could not get any safe conduct, then the nobles, lords, and knights, especially of the Bohemian nation, present in Constance, gave to Master Jerome their letters patents, confirmed with their seals for a testimony and witness of the premises. With which letters Master Jerome returned again unto Bohemia; but by the treason and conspiracy of his enemies he was taken in Hirsaw by the officers of Duke John, and brought back to the presence of the duke. In the meantime such as were the setters forward of the council against Master John Huss, and Master Jerome, that is to say, Michael de Causis, and Master Paletz, and other their accomplices, required that Master Jerome should be cited by reason of his intimations, and certain days after a citation was set upon the gates and porches of the city and churches.

After Sigismund, king of Hungary, with the rest of the council, understood that Master Jerome was taken, they were earnestly requiring that he should be brought before them to the council. The Duke John, after he had received letters of the king and the council, brought Master Jerome bound to Constance, whom his brother, Duke Lewis, led through the city to the cloisters of the friars minors in Constance, where the chief priests and elders of the people, Scribes and Pharisees, were gathered together, attending and waiting for his coming. Master Jerome carried a great hand-bolt of iron with a long chain in his hand; and as he passed, the chain made a great rattling and noise, and for the more confusion and despite towards him, they led him by the same chain after Duke Lewis, holding and stretching out the same a great way from him, with which chain they also kept him bound in the cloister. When he was brought into the cloister, they read before him the letter of Duke John unto the council, containing in effect how that the duke had sent Master Jerome, who by chance was fallen into his hands, because he heard an evil report of him, that he was suspected of heresies of Wickliff, that the council might take order for him, whose part it was to correct and punish such as did err and stray from the truth, besides many other flattering tales which were written in the said letter for the praise of the council. After this they read the citation which was given out by the council against Master Jerome. Then certain of the bishops said to him: "Jerome, why didst thou fly and run away, and not appear when thou wast cited?" He answered: "Because I could not have any safe conduct, neither from you, neither from the king, as it appears by these letters patents of the barons, which you have, neither by my open intimations could I obtain any safe conduct. Wherefore I, perceiving many of my grievous and heavy friends to be here present in the council, would not myself be the occasion of my perils and dangers; but if I had known or had any understanding of this citation, without all doubt, although I had been in Bohemia, I would have returned again." Then all the whole rabble rising up, alleged various accusations against him with a great noise and tumult. When the rest held their peace, then spake Master Gerson, the chancellor of Paris: "Jerome, when thou wast at Paris thou thoughtest thyself by means of thy eloquence to be an angel, and didst trouble the whole university, alleging openly in the schools many erroneous conclusions with their corollaries, and especially in the question de universaliibus et de ideis, with many other very offensive questions." To whom Master Jerome said: "I answer to you, Master Gerson; those matters which I did put forth there in the schools at Paris, in which also I answered the arguments of the Masters, I did put them forth philosophically, and as a philosopher, and master of the university; and if I have put forth any questions which I ought not to have put forth, teach me that they are erroneous, and I will most humbly be informed, and amend them."

While he was yet speaking, another, rising up, said: "When thou wast also at Cologne, in thy position which thou didst there determine, thou didst propound many erroneous matters." Then said Master Jerome unto him: "Shew me first one error which I propounded." Wherewithal he being in a manner astonished, said: "I do not remember them now at the first, but hereafter they shall be objected against you."

And by and by a third man rising up, said: "When you were also at Heidelberg, you propounded many erroneous matters as touching the trinity, and there painted out a certain shield or escutcheon comparing the trinity of persons in the divinity to water, snow, and ice, and such like." Unto whom Master Jerome answered: "Those things that I wrote or painted there, the same will I also speak, write, and paint here; and teach me that they be erroneous, and I will most humbly revoke and recant the same."

Then certain cried out: "Let him be burned, let him be burned." To whom he answered: "If my death do delight or please you, in the name of God let it be so."

Then said the archbishop of Saltzburg: "Not so, Master Jerome, forasmuch as it is written, I will not the death of a sinner, but rather that he be converted and live."

When these and many other tumults and cries were passed, whereby they most disorderly and outrageously witnessd against him, they delivered him bound to the officers of the city of Constance, to be carried to prison for that night; and so every one of them returned to their lodgings.

In meantime, one of the friends of Master John Huss, looking out at a window of the cloister, said unto him: "Master Jerome." Then said he: "You are welcome, my dear brother." Then said Peter to him: "Be constant and fear not to suffer death for the truth sake, of which, when you were in times past at liberty, you did preach so much and so well." Jerome answered: "Truly brother I do not fear death, and as we know that we have spoken much thereof in times past; let us now see what may be known or done in effect." By and by his keepers coming to the window, threatening him with blows, put away Peter from the window of the cloister.

Then came there one Vitus to Master Jerome, and said: "Master, how do you do?" He answered, "Truly brother, I do very well." Then his keepers coming about him laid hold of Vitus, saying: "This is also one of the number," and kept him. When it drew towards evening, the archbishop of Riegen sent his servants, who led away Master Jerome, being strongly bound with chains, both by the hands and by the neck, and kept him so for some hours. When night drew on, they carried him to a tower of the city, where, tying him fast to a great block, and his feet in the stocks, his hands also being made fast, they left him; the block was so high, that he could by no means sit upon it, so that his head must hang downward. They carried also Vitus to the archbishop of Riegen, who demanded of him, "Why he durst be so bold to talk with such a man, being a reprobate of all men, and an heretic;" and when he could find no cause of imprisonment in him, and that he said he was Master John de Clum's friend (taking an oath and promise of him, that he should not go about to endamage the council by reason of that imprisonment and captivity) he so dismissed him.

Master Jerome, unknown to his friends whither he was carried, lay in the tower two days and two nights, relieved only with bread and water. Then one of his keepers, coming to Master Peter, declared to him how Master Jerome lay hard by in bonds and chains, and how he was fed. Then Master Peter desired that he might have leave given him to give him meat, because he would procure the same for him. The keeper of the prison, granting his request, carried meat to him. Within eleven days after, so hanging by the heels, he used so small repast, that he fell sore sick even to death. When living in that captivity and prison, he desired to have a confessor; the council denied that he should have any, until such time as by great importunity he obtained one; his friends being then present in the prison and tower, wherein he lay by the space of one year, lacking but seven days.

After they had put John Huss to death, then about the feast of the nativity of the Virgin Mary, they brought forth Master Jerome, whom they had kept so long in chains; and threatening him with death, being instant upon him, they forced him to abjure and recant, and consent to the death of Master John Huss, that he was justly and truly condemned and put to death by them. He, for fear of death, and hoping thereby to escape out of their hands, according to their will and pleasure, and according to the tenor which was exhibited to him, did make abjuration, and that in the cathedral church and open session, the draught whereof penned to him by the papists, here ensues:

The abjuration of Master Jerome of Prague.

"I, Jerome of Prague, master of arts, acknowledging the catholic church, and the apostolic faith, do accurse and renounce all heresies, and especially that whereof I have hitherto been infamed, and that which in times past John Huss and John Wickliff have holden and taught in their works, treatises, and sermons, made unto the people and clergy; for the which cause the said Wickliff and Huss, together with the said doctrines and errors, are condemned by this synod of Constance as heretics, and all the said doctrine sententially condemned, and especially in certain articles expressed in the sentences and judgments given against them by this sacred council.

"Also I do accord and agree unto the holy church of Rome, the apostolic seat in this sacred council, and with my mouth and heart do profess in all things, and touching all things, and especially as touching the keys, sacraments, orders, and offices, and ecclesiastical censures, of pardons, relics of saints, ecclesiastical liberty, also ceremonies, and all other things pertaining unto the christian religion, as the church of Rome, the apostolic see, and this sacred council do profess: and especially that many of the said articles are notoriously heretical, and lately reproved by the holy fathers, some of them blasphemous, some others erroneous; some offensive unto godly ears, and many of them temerarious and seditious. And such also were counted the articles lately condemned by the sacred council, and it was inhibited and forbidden to all and singular catholic men hereafter to preach, teach, or presume to hold or maintain any of the said articles, under pain of being accursed.

"And I the said Jerome, forso much as I have laboured by scholastical arts to persuade the opinion, de universalibus reatibus, and that one substance of the common kind should signify many things subject under the same, and every one of them, as St. Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, do affirm, and likewise others; for the teaching hereof by a plain example I described as it were a certain triangle, form, or figure, the which I called the shield of faith.

"Therefore utterly to exclude and take away the erroneous and wicked understanding thereof, the which peradventure some men may gather thereby, I do say, affirm, and declare that I never made the said figure, neither named it the shield of faith to that intent or purpose, that I would extol or prefer the opinion of universalities above or before the contrary opinion, in such sort, as though that were the shield of faith, and that without the affirmation thereof the catholic faith could not be defended or maintained, when as I myself would not obstinately stick thereunto. But this I said, because I had put example in the description of the triangle or form, that one divine essence consisted in three subjects or persons in themselves distinct, that is to say, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. The article of the which Trinity is the chief shield of faith, and foundation of the catholic truth.

"Furthermore, that it may be evident unto all men what the causes were for which I was reputed and thought to stick to, and favour sometime John Huss, I signify unto all men by these presents, that when I heard him oftentimes both in his sermons, and also in the schools, I believed that he was a very good man, neither that he did in any point gainsay the traditions of our holy mother the church, or holy doctors; in so much as when I was lately in this city, and the articles which I affirmed were shewed unto me, which were also condemned by the sacred council, at the first sight of them I did not believe that they were his, at the least not in that form. But when as I had further understood, by certain famous doctors and masters of divinity, that they were his articles, I required for my further information and satisfaction to have the books of his own handwriting shewed unto me, wherein it was said those articles were contained, which books when they were shewed unto me written with his own hand, which I did know as well as mine own, I found all, and every one of those articles therein written in like form as they are condemned. Wherefore I do worthily judge and think him and his doctrine, with his adherents, to be condemned and reproved by the sacred council as heretical and without reason. All which the premises, with a pure mind and conscience, I do here pronounce and speak, being now fully and sufficiently informed of the foresaid sentences and judgments, given by the sacred council against the doctrines of the said John Wickliff, and John Huss, and against their own persons, unto the which judgment, as a devout catholic in all things, I do most humbly consent and agree.

"Also I the foresaid Jerome, who before the reverend fathers the lords cardinals, and reverend lords, prelates, and doctors, and other worshipful persons of this sacred council in this same place, did heretofore freely and willingly declare and expound mine intent and purpose amongst other things, speaking of the church, did divide the same into three parts. And as I perceived afterwards, it was understood by some that I would affirm, that in the triumphant church there was faith, whereas I do firmly believe that there is the blessed sight and beholding of God, excluding all dark understanding and knowledge, and now also I say, affirm, and declare, that it was never my intent and purpose to prove that there should be faith, speaking of faith as faith is commonly defined, but knowledge far exceeding faith. And generally whatsoever I said, either there, or at any time before, I do refer, and most humbly submit myself unto the determination of this sacred council of Constance.

"Moreover, I do swear both by the Holy Trinity, and also by the most holy gospel, that I will for evermore remain and persevere without all doubt in the truth of the catholic church; and all such as by their doctrine and teaching shall impugn this faith, I judge them worthy together with their doctrines of eternal curse. And if I by myself at any time (which God forbid I should) do presume to preach or teach contrary thereunto, I will submit myself unto the severity of the canons, and be bound unto eternal pain and punishment. Whereupon I do deliver up this my confession and tenour of my profession willingly before this sacred general council, and have subscribed and written all these things with mine own hand."

After all this they caused him to be carried again to the same prison, but not so straightly chained and bound as he was before, notwithstanding kept every day with soldiers and armed men; and when his enemies understood and knew by the words and talk of Master Jerome, and by other certain tokens, that he made the same abjuration and recantation, not of a sincere and pure mind, but only to escape their hands, they put up new accusations against Master Jerome, and drew the same into articles, being very instant and earnest that he should answer thereunto; and as his judges, and certain cardinals, as the cardinal of Cambray, the cardinal de Ursinis, the cardinal of Aquilegia, and of Florence, considering the malice of the enemies of Master Jerome, saw the great injury that was done to him, they laboured before the whole council for his delivery.

It happened upon a certain day, as they were labouring in the council for the delivery of the said Master Jerome, that his enemies with all force and power resisted against it, crying out that he should in no case be dismissed. Then started up one called Doctor Naso, who said unto the cardinals, "We marvel much of you, most reverend fathers, that your reverences will make intercession for such a wicked heretic, for whose sake we in Bohemia, with the whole clergy, have suffered much trouble and mischief, and peradventure your fatherhoods shall suffer; and I greatly fear, lest that you have received some rewards either of the king of Bohemia, or of these heretics." When the cardinals were thus rebuked, they discharged themselves of Master Jerome's cause and matter.

Then his enemies obtained to have other judges appointed, as the patriarch of Constantinople, and a German doctor, as they did know that the patriarch was a grievous enemy to Master Jerome, because he being before appointed judge by the council, had condemned John Huss to death.

But Master Jerome would not answer them in prison, requiring to have open audience, because he would there finally declare to them his mind, neither would he by any means consent to those private judges. Whereupon the presidents of the council, thinking that Master Jerome would renew his recantation before the audience, and confirm the same, did grant him open audience.

In the year A.D. 1416, the twenty-fifth day of May, Master Jerome was brought to open audience before the whole council, in the great cathedral church of Constance, where the commissioners of the council laid against him a hundred and seven articles, to the intent that he should not escape the snare of death, which they provided and laid for him. He answered to more than forty articles most subtly objected against him; denying that he held or maintained any such articles as were either hurtful or false, and affirming that those witnesses had deposed them against him falsely and slanderously, as his most cruel and mortal enemies. In the same session they had not yet proceeded to death, because that the noon-time drew so fast on, that he could not answer to the articles. Wherefore, for lack of time sufficient to answer to the residue of the articles, there was another time appointed, at which time again early in the morning he was brought to the cathedral church to answer to all the residue of the articles.

In all which articles, as well those which he had answered before, as in the residue, he cleared himself very learnedly, refuting his adversaries in such a way that they were themselves astonished at his oration, and the refutation of their testimonies against him, and with shame enough were put to silence. As when one of them had demanded of him what he thought of the sacrament of the altar, he answered, "Before consecration," said he, "it is bread and wine; after the consecration it is the true body and blood of Christ," adding more words according to their catholic faith. Then another rising up, "Jerome," said he, "there goes a great rumour of thee, that thou dost bold bread to remain upon the altar." To whom he pleasantly answered, saying, "That he believed bread to be at the baker's." At which words one of the Dominican friars rose angrily, and said, "What! dost thou deny, that which no man doubts?" His peevish sauciness Jerome with these words did well repress, "Hold thy peace, thou monk, thou hypocrite!" And thus the monk being nipped in the head, sat down dumb. After whom started up another, who with a loud voice cried out, "I swear, by my conscience, that to be true which thou dost deny." To whom Jerome replied, "Thus to swear by your conscience is the next way to deceive." Another there was, a spiteful and a bitter enemy of his, whom he called by no other name than dog, or ass. After he had thus refuted them one after another, that they could find no crime against him, neither in this matter, nor in any other, they were all driven to keep silence.

Then the witnesses were called, who coming gave testimony to the articles before produced. By reason whereof the innocent cause of Jerome was oppressed, and began to be concluded in the council. Then Jerome rising up began to speak, "Forsomuch," said he, "as you have heard mine adversaries so diligently, it is convenient that you should also now hear me speak for myself." Whereupon, with much difficulty, at last audience was given in the council for him to say his mind. Which being granted, he continued from morning to noon, treating of many matters, with great learning and eloquence. Who first beginning with his prayer to God, besought him to give him spirit, ability, and utterance, which might both tend to the profit and salvation of his own soul; and then began his oration as follows:—

"I know," said he "reverend lords, that there have been many excellent men, who have suffered much otherwise than they have deserved, being oppressed with false witnesses, and condemned with wrong judgments." And so beginning with Socrates, he declared how he was unjustly condemned of his countrymen, neither would he escape when he might; taking from us the fear of two things, which seem most bitter to men, to wit, imprisonment and death. Then he inferred the captivity of Plato, the banishment of Anaxagoras, and the torments of Zeno. Moreover, he brought in the wrongful condemnation of many Gentiles, as the banishment of Rupilius, reciting also the unworthy death of Boetius, and of others whom Boetius himself writes of.

From thence he came to the examples of the Hebrews, and first began with Moses the deliverer of the people, and the lawgiver, how he was oftentimes slandered of his people as being a seducer and contemner of the people. Joseph also for envy was sold of his brethren, and for false suspicion of crime was cast into bonds. Besides these, were Isaiah, Daniel, and almost all the prophets, who as contemners of God, and seditious persons, were oppressed with wrongful condemnation. From thence he proceeded to the judgment of Susanna, and of divers other besides, who being good and holy, were yet unjustly cast away with wrongful sentence. At length he came to John Baptist, and so in long process he descended to our Saviour, declaring how it was evident to all men, by what false witnesses both he and John Baptist were condemned. Moreover, how Stephen was slain by the college of the priests, and how all the apostles were condemned to death, not as good men, but as seditious stirrers up of the people, and contemners of the gods, and evil doers. It is unjust, said he, to be unjustly condemned one priest by another, and yet he proved that the same so happened most unjustly in that council of priests. These things did he discourse at large, with marvellous eloquence, and with singular admiration of all that heard him.

And forasmuch as all the whole sum of the cause did rest only in the witnesses, by many reasons he proved that no credit was to be given to them, especially seeing they spake all things of no truth, but only of hatred, malice, and envy. And so prosecuting the matter, so lively and expressly he opened to them the causes of their hatred, that he had almost persuaded them. In so lively and likely a way was their hatred detected, that almost no credit was given to their testimonies, save only for the cause and quarrel wherein they stood touching the pope's doctrine. All men's minds were moved and bending to mercy toward him; for he told them how that he of his own accord came up to the council, and to purge himself he did open to them all his life and doings, being full of virtue and godliness. This was (said he) the old manner of ancient and learned men, and most holy elders, that in matters of faith, they differed many times in arguments, not to destroy the faith, but to find out the truth. So did Augustine and Jerome dissent one from the other, and yet without any suspicion of heresy.

All this while the pope's holy council waited, still expecting when he would begin to excuse himself, and retract those things which were objected against him, and to crave pardon of the council; but he persisting still in his constant oration, did acknowledge no error, nor gave any signification of retraction.

At last entering to the praise and commendation of Master John Huss, he affirmed that he was a good, just, and holy man, and much unworthy that death which he suffered. He knew him from his youth upward to be neither immoral, a drunkard, nor any evil or vicious person, but a chaste and sober man, and a just and true preacher of the holy gospel; and whatever things Master John Huss and Wickliff had holden or written, specially against the abuse and pomp of the clergy, he would affirm even to the death, that they were holy and blessed men, and that in all points of the catholic faith he believes as the holy catholic church holds or believes. And finally, he concluded, that all such articles as John Wickliff and John Huss had written and put forth against the enormities, pomp, and disorder of the prelates, he would firmly and steadfastly, without recantation, hold and defend even to the death. And last of all he added, that all the sins that he had ever committed, did not so much gnaw and trouble his conscience, as did that only sin which he had committed in that most pestiferous act, when in his recantation he had unjustly spoken against that good and holy man and his doctrine, and specially in consenting to his wicked condemnation, concluding that he did utterly revoke and deny that wicked recantation which he made in that most cursed place, and that he did it through weakness of heart and fear of death. And, moreover, that whatever he had spoken against that blessed man, he had altogether lied upon him, and that he repented with his whole heart that he ever did it.

At the hearing hereof the hearts of the hearers were not a little sorry. For they wished and desired greatly that such a singular man should be saved, if otherwise their blind superstition would have suffered it. But he continued still in his opinion, seeming to desire rather death than life. And persisting in the praise of John Huss, he added moreover, that he never maintained any doctrine against the state of the church, but only spake against the abuses of the clergy, against the pride, pomp, and excess of the prelates. For as the patrimonies of the churches were first given for the poor, then for hospitality, and thirdly to the reparations of the churches; it was a grief to that good man (said he) to see the same mispent and cast away upon great feasting, and keeping of horses and dogs, upon gorgeous apparel, and such other things unbeseeming the christian religion. And herein he shewed himself marvellous eloquent; yes, never more.

And when his oration was interrupted many times by several of them, carping at his sentences as he was in speaking, yet was there none of all those that interrupted him who escaped unscathed, but he brought them all to confusion, and put them to silence. When any noise began, he ceased to speak, and after began again, proceeding in his oration, and desiring them to give him leave a while to speak, whom they hereafter should hear no more, nor was his mind ever dashed at all these noises and tumults.

And this was marvellous to behold in him, notwithstanding he continued in prison three hundred and forty days, having neither book, nor almost light to read by, yet how admirably his memory served him; declaring how all those pains of his straight handling did not so much grieve him, as he did wonder rather to see their unkind humanity towards him.

When he had spoken these and many things as touching the praise of John Wickliff and John Huss, they who sat in the council whispered together, saying, by these his words it appears that he is resolved with himself. Then was he again carried into prison, and grievously fettered by the hands, arms, and feet, with great chains and fetters of iron.

The Saturday next before the ascension-day, early in the morning, he was brought with a great number of armed men to the cathedral church before the open congregation, to have his judgment given him. There they exhorted him that those things which he had before spoken in the open audience, as is aforesaid touching the praise and commendation of master John Wickliff, and master John Huss, confirming and establishing their doctrine, he would yet recant: but he marvelously stoutly without all fear spake against them, and among other things said to them, "I take God to my witness, and I protest here before you all, that I do believe and hold the articles of the faith, as the holy catholic church does hold and believe the same; but for this cause shall I now be condemned, because I will not consent with you to the condemnation of those most holy and blessed men, whom you have most wickedly condemned for certain articles, detesting and abhorring your wicked and abominable life." Then he confessed there before them all his belief, and uttered many things very profoundly and eloquently, insomuch that all men there present could not sufficiently commend and praise his great eloquence and excellent learning, and by no means could they induce or persuade him to recant.

Then a certain bishop, named the Bishop of Londy, made a certain sermon against Master Jerome, persuading them to condemn him.

After the bishop had ended the sermon, Master Jerome said again unto them, "You will condemn me wickedly and unjustly. But I after my death will leave a remorse in your conscience, and a nail in your hearts. And here I cite you to answer unto me before the most high and just Judge, within a hundred years."

No pen can sufficiently write, or note those things which he most eloquently, profoundly, and philosophically had spoken in the said audience, neither can any tongue sufficiently declare the same; wherefore I have but only touched here the superficial matter of his talk, partly and not wholly noting the same. Finally, when they could by no means persuade him to recant the premises, immediately even in his presence, the sentence and judgment of his condemnation was given against him, and read before him.

Sentence.

"In the name of God, Amen. Christ our God, and our Saviour being the true vine, whose Father is the husbandman, taught his disciples, and all other faithful men, saying, 'If any man abide not in me, let him be cast out as a bough or branch, and let him wither and dry,' &c. The doctrine and precepts of which most excellent doctor and master, this most sacred synod of Constance executing and following in the cause of inquisition against heretics, being moved by this sacred synod, through report, public fame, and open infamation, proceeding against Jerome of Prague, master of arts, layman. By the acts and processes of whose cause it appeareth that the said Master Jerome hath holden, maintained, and taught divers articles heretical and erroneous, lately reprov'd and condemned by the holy fathers, some being very blasphemous, other some offending godly ears, and many temerarious and seditious, which have been affirmed, maintained, preached and taught by the men of the most damnable memory, John Wickliff and John Huss, the which are also written in many of their works and books. Which articles of doctrine and books of the said John Huss, and John Wickliff, together with their memory, and the person of the said John Huss, were by the said sacred synod condemned of heresy. Which sentence of condemnation this Jerome afterwards during the time of inquisition, acknowledged in the said sacred synod, and approved the true catholic and apostolic faith, thereunto consenting, accursing all heresy, especially that whereof he was infamed, and confessed himself to be infamed, and that which in times past John Huss and John Wickliff maintained and taught in their works, sermons, and books, for which the said Wickliff and Huss, together with their doctrine and errors, were by the said sacred synod condemned as heretical. The condemnation of all which premises he did openly profess and allow, and did swear that he would persevere and continue in the verity of that faith. And if that he should presume at any time to hold opinion, or preach contrary thereunto, that he would submit himself to the trial and truth of the canons, and be bound to perpetual punishment. And this his profession written with his own hand, he delivered up unto the holy council. Not many days after his said profession and abjuration, as a dog returning unto his vomit, to the intent he might openly vomit up the most pestilent poison which had long lurked and lain hid in his breast, he required and desired that he might be openly heard before the council. The which being granted unto him, he affirmed, said, and professed before the whole synod, being publicly gathered together, that he had wickedly consented and agreed to the sentence and judgment of the condemnation of the said Wickliff and Huss, and that he had most shamefully lied in approving and allowing the said sentence, neither was he ashamed to confess that he had lied; yea, he did also revoke and recant his confession, approbation, and protestation, which he had made upon their condemnation, affirming that he never at any time had read any errors or heresy in the books and treatises of the said Wickliff and Huss. Although he had before confessed it, and it is evidently proved, that he did diligently study, read, and preach their books, wherein it is manifest that there are contained many errors and heresies. Also the said Master Jerome did profess as touching the sacrament of the altar and the transubstantiation of the bread into the body of Christ, that he doth hold and believe as the church doth hold and believe, saying also that he doth give more credit unto St. Augustine, and the other doctors of the church, than unto Wickliff and Huss. It appeareth moreover, by the premises, that the said Jerome is an adherent and maintainer of the said Wickliff and Huss, and their errors, and both is, and has been a favourer of them. Wherefore the said sacred synod determineth the said Master Jerome as a rotten and withered branch, not growing upon the vine, to be cut off and cast out. The said synod also pronounceth, declareth and condemneth him as an heretic and drowned in all kind of heresies, excommunicate and accursed, leaving him unto the sentence and judgment of the secular judge, to receive just and due punishment, according to the quality of so great an offence; the sacred synod notwithstanding, entreating that the said judge would moderate his sentence of judgment without peril of death."

Which sentence so given before his face, being ended, a great and long mitre of paper was brought unto him, painted about with red devils, which when he beheld and saw, throwing away his hood upon the ground amongst the prelates, he took the mitre and put it upon his head, saying, "Our Lord Jesus Christ, when he should suffer death for me most wretched sinner, did wear a crown of thorns upon his head; and I for his sake instead of that crown, will willingly wear this mitre and cap." Afterwards he was laid hold of by the secular power.

After that he was led out of the said church to the place of execution; when he was going out of the church, with a cheerful countenance and loud voice lifting his eyes up unto heaven, he began to sing, "I believe in one God," &c., as it is accustomed to be sung in the church. Afterward as he passed along, he sung some canticles of the church; which being ended, in the entering out of the gate of the city, as men go to Bethlehem, he sung this hymn, Felix namque. After that he came to the place of execution where Master John Huss before had innocently suffered death, and kneeling down before an image which was like to the picture of Master John Huss, which was there prepared to burn Master Jerome, he made a certain devout prayer.

While he was thus praying, the tormentors took him up, and lifting him up from the ground, spoiled him of all his garments, and left him naked, and afterwards girded him about the loins with a linen cloth, and bound him fast with cords and chains of iron, to the image which was made fast unto the earth; and so standing upon the ground, when as they began to lay the wood about him, he sung Salve festa dies. And when the hymn was ended, he sung again with a loud voice, "I believe in one God," unto the end. That being ended, he said unto the people in the German tongue, in effect as follows. "Dearly beloved children, even as I have now sung, so do I believe, and none otherwise. And this creed is my whole faith, notwithstanding now I die for this cause, because I would not consent and agree to the council, and with them affirm and hold that Master John Huss was by them holily and justly condemned; for I did know well enough that he was a true preacher of the gospel of Jesus Christ."

After that he was compassed in with the wood up to the crown of the head, they cast all his garments upon the wood also, and with a fire-brand they set it on fire; which being once fired, he began to sing with a loud voice, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit." When that was ended, and that he began vehemently to burn, he said in the vulgar Bohemian tongue, "O Lord God, Father Almighty have mercy upon me, and be merciful unto mine offences, for thou knowest how sincerely I have loved thy truth." Then his voice by the vehemency of the fire was choked and stopped, that it was no longer heard, but he moved continually his mouth and lips, as though he had still prayed or spoken within himself.

When his whole body with his beard was so burned round about, that there appeared through the great burning upon his body certain great blisters as big as an egg, yet he continually very strongly and stoutly moved, and shook his head and mouth, by the space almost of one quarter of an hour. So burning in the fire, he lived with great pain and martyrdom, while one might easily have gone from St. Clement's over the bridge to our lady church. After he was thus dead in the fire, by and by they brought his bedding, his straw bed, his boots, his hood, and all other things that he had in the prison, and burned them all to ashes in the same fire. Which ashes, after that the fire was out, they diligently gathered together, and carried them in a cart, and cast them into the river Rhone, which ran hard by the city.

That man who was the true reporter hereof, and which testified to us the acts and doings about the condemnation of Master Jerome, and sent the same to us to Prague in writing, thus concludes. "All these things," said he, "I did behold, see, and hear to be done in this form and manner. And if any man do tell you the contrary, do not credit him; for all those things which happened unto him when he came toward Constance, and also at his first coming unto Constance of his own free will, and afterward when he was brought bound unto Constance, as is aforesaid, I myself did see and perfectly behold, and for a perpetual memory thereof to be had for ever, I have directed the same unto you, not lying or falsifying any point thereof, as he which is the Searcher of all men's hearts can bear me witness, willing rather to sustain the charge of ignorance and rudeness of style, to bear witness to the truth, than I would by any means be compelled by tickling, or flattering the ears of the hearers with feigned and cloaked speech, to swerve or go aside from the truth."

Thus end the tragical histories of Master John Huss, and Master Jerome of Prague, faithfully gathered and collected by a certain Bohemian, being a present eye-witness and beholder of the same, written and compiled first in Latin, and sent by the said Bohemian into his country of Bohemia, and again translated out of the Latin with like fidelity into our English tongue.

In the mean time, while Master Jerome was in this trouble, and before the council, the nobles and lords of Bohemia and of Moravia directed their letters to this barbarous council of popish murderers: in tenor and form of words as followeth.

The Letter of the fifty-four Nobles of Moravia, written unto the Council of Constance in the defence of Master John Huss and Jerome of Prague.

"To the right reverend fathers and lords in Christ, the lords cardinals, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, ambassadors, doctors, and masters, and to the whole council of Constance, We, the nobles, lords, knights, and esquires, of the famous marquisdom of Moravia, wish the desire of all goodness, and the observation of the commandments of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"Forsomuch as every man, both by the law of nature and also by God's law, is commanded to do that unto another man, which he would have done unto himself, and is forbidden to do that thing unto another, which he would not have done unto himself, as our Saviour saith, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets.' Yea, the law is fulfilled in this one point, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' We, therefore, (God being our author), having respect as much as in us lieth unto the said law of God, and the love of our neighbour, did before send our letters unto Constance for our dearly beloved friend of good memory, Master John Huss, bachelor of divinity, and preacher of the gospel. Whom of late in the council of Constance (we know not with what spirit being led) you have condemned as an obstinate heretic; neither having confessed any thing, neither being lawfully convicted as was expedient; having no errors or heresies declared or laid against him, but only at the sinister, false, and importune accusations, suggestions, and instigations of his mortal enemies, and the traitors of our kingdom and marquisdom of Moravia. And being thus unmercifully condemned, you have slain him with most shameful and cruel death, to the perpetual shame and infamy of our most christian kingdom of Bohemia, and the famous marquisdom of Moravia (as we have written unto Constance, unto the most noble prince and lord, the Lord Sigismund, king of the Romans, and of Hungary, the heir and successor of our kingdom) which was also read and published in your congregations, which we will here also have enrolled; and have burned him, as it is reported, in reproach and contempt of us.

"Wherefore, we have thought good even now to direct our letters patent to your reverences now present in the behalf of Master John Huss, openly professing and protesting, both with heart and mouth, that he, the said Master John Huss, was a just, good, and catholic man, and for a long season worthily commended and allowed in our kingdom for his life and conversation. He also preached and taught us and our subjects the law of the gospel, and of the holy prophets, and the books of the Old and New Testament, according to the exposition of the holy doctors approved by the church, and left many monuments in writing, most constantly detest-ing and abhorring all errors and heresies, continually admonishing both us and all faithful christians to do the like, diligently exhorting all men as much as in him lay, by his words, writings, and labours, unto quietness and concord; so that using all the diligence that we might, we never heard or could understand, that Master John Huss had preached, taught, or by any means affirmed any error or heresy in his sermons, or that by any manner of means he had offended us, or our subjects, either by word or deed, but that he always led a quiet and a godly life in Christ, exhorting all men diligently, both by his word and works, as much as he might, to observe and keep the law of the gospel, and the institutions of the holy fathers, after the preaching of our holy mother the church, and to the edifying of men's souls. Neither did these premises which you had so perpetrated to the reproach both of us and our kingdom and marquisdom, suffice and content you, but that also without all mercy and pity you have apprehended, imprisoned, and condemned, and even now, peradventure, like as you did Master John Huss, you have most cruelly murdered the worshipful man, Master Jerome of Prague, a man abounding in eloquence, master of the seven liberal arts, and a famous philosopher, not being seen, heard, examined, neither convicted, but only at the sinister and false accusations of his and our accusers and betrayers.

"Furthermore, it is come to our knowledge and understanding (which we do not without great grief rehearse) as we may also evidently gather by your writings, how that certain detractors, odious both to God and men, privy enviers and betrayers, have wickedly and grievously, although falsely and traitorously, accused us, our kingdom and marquisdom aforesaid, before you in your council, that in the said kingdom of Bohemia, and marquisdom of Moravia, divers errors are sprung up, which have grievously and manifoldly infected both our hearts, and also the hearts of many faithful men; insomuch that without a speedy stop or stay of correction, the said kingdom and marquisdom, together with the faithful christians therein, should incur an irreparable loss and ruin of their souls.

"These cruel and pernicious injuries which are laid to us, and to our said kingdom and marquisdom, although most falsely and slanderously, how may we suffer? Forsomuch as through the grace of God (when in a manner all other kingdoms of the world have oftentimes wavered, making schisms and antipopes) our most gracious kingdom of Bohemia, and most noble marquisdom of Moravia, since the time they did receive the catholic faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, have always without reproof stood constantly to the church of Rome, and have sincerely done their true obedience. Also with how great costs and charges, and great labour, with what worship and due reverence they have revered the holy mother the church and her pastors, by their princes and faithful subjects, is more manifest than the day-light to the whole world; and yourselves, if you will confess the truth, can witness the same also.

"Wherefore, that we, according to the mind of the apostle, may procure honest and good things, not only before God, but before men also, and lest by neglecting the famous renown of the kingdom and marquisdom, we be found cruel toward our neighbours; having a steadfast hope, a pure and sincere conscience and intent, and a certain true faith in Christ Jesus our Lord, by the tenour of these we signify and declare unto your fatherhoods, and to all faithful christians, openly professing both with heart and mouth, that whatsoever man, of what estate, pre-eminence, dignity, condition, degree, or religion, soever he be, who hath said, or affirmed, either doth say or affirm, that in the said kingdom of Bohemia, and marquisdom of Moravia, heresies have sprung up which have infected us and other faithful christians, as is aforesaid (the only person of our most noble prince and lord, Sigismund, king of Romans, and of Hungary, &c. our Lord and heir successor, being set apart, whom we trust and believe, not to be guilty in the premises) all and every such man (as is aforesaid) doth lie falsely upon his head, as a wicked and naughty traitor and betrayer of the said kingdom and marquisdom, and most traitorous to us, and most pernicious heretic, the son of all malice and wickedness, yea, and of the devil himself, who is a liar, and the father of all lies.

"Notwithstanding, we for this present committing the foresaid injuries unto God, unto whom vengeance pertaineth, who will also abundantly reward the workers of iniquity, will prosecute them more amply before him, whom God shall appoint in the apostolic see, to govern his holy church, as the only and undoubted pastor. Unto whom, God willing, we exhibiting our due reverence and obedience as faithful children, in those things which are lawful, honest, and agreeable to reason and the law of God, will make our request and petition, that speedy remedy may be provided for us, our said kingdom and marquisdom upon the premises, according to the law of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the institutions of the holy fathers. The premises, notwithstanding, we setting apart all fear and men's ordinances provided to the contrary, will maintain and defend the law of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the devout, humble, and constant preachers thereof, even to the shedding of our blood.

"Dated at Sternberg, in A. D. 1415, upon St. Wenceslaus' day, martyr of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Round about these letters there were fifty-four seals hanging, and the names of those noblemen subscribed, whose seals they were.

After these things, concerning the history of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, the order of time calls me back to other matters here of our own country, which passed in the mean time with us in England. Which things being finished, we will (Christ willing) afterward return to the troubles and conflicts of the Bohemians, with other things besides, pertaining to the later end of the council of Constance, and election of Pope Martin.

Ye heard before, how after the death of Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, succeeded Henry Chichesley, (A. D. 1414,) and sat twenty-five years. In whose time was much trouble and great affliction of good men here in England; of whom many were compelled to abjure, some were burned, several were driven to exile. Whereof, partly now to treat, as we find them in registers and histories recorded, we will first begin with John Claydon of London, and Richard Turning. The history of which John Claydon in the registers is thus declared.

The History of John Claydon, Currier; and of Richard Turning, Baker.

The 17th of August, 1415, did personally appear John Claydon, currier of London (arrested by the mayor of the city for the suspicion of heresy) before Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, in St. Paul's church; which John (it being objected to him by the archbishop, that in the city of London, and other places of the province of Canterbury, he was suspected by divers godly and learned men of heresy, and to be contrary to the catholic faith and determination of the church) did openly confess, and denied not, but that he had been for the space of twenty years suspected both about the city of London, and also in the province of Canterbury, and especially by the common sort, of the opinions of the Lollards and heresy, and to be contrary to the catholic faith and determination of the church of Rome, and defamed of the same all the time aforesaid.

Insomuch, that in the time of Master Robert Braybrook, bishop of London, deceased, he was for the space of two years, committed to the prison of Conway for the foresaid defamation and suspicion, and for the same cause also he was in prison in the Fleet for three years. Out of which prison he (in the reign of King Henry IV.) was brought before the Lord John Scarle, then chancellor to the king, and there did abjure all heresy and error. And the said John Claydon being asked of the said archbishop whether he did abjure the heresy of which he was suspected before any other? did confess, that in a convocation at London, in St. Paul's church, before Thomas Arundel, late archbishop, deceased, he did abjure all such doctrine, which they called heresy and error, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of the church, and that he had not only left such articles and opinions, wherein he was defamed, but also did abstain from all company that were suspected of such opinions, so that he should neither give aid, help, counsel, nor favour unto them.

And, moreover, the said John was asked by the said archbishop, whether he had ever since his abjuration had in his house or in his keeping, any books written in English. Whereunto he confessed, that he would not deny, but that he had in his house, and in his keeping, many English books; for he was arrested by the mayor of the city of London for such books as he had, which books (as he thought) were in the mayor's keeping. Upon the which the mayor did openly confess, that he had such books in his keeping, which in his judgment were the worst, and the most perverse that ever he did read or see, and one book that was well bound in red leather, of parchment, written in a good English hand; and among the other books found with the said John Claydon, the mayor gave up the said book before the archbishop. Whereupon the said John Claydon, being asked of the archbishop if he knew that book, did openly confess that he knew it very well, because he caused it to be written of his own costs and charges, for he spent much money thereupon since his abjuration. Then was he asked who wrote it. He did answer, one called John Grime.

And further, being required what the said John Grime was, he answered, he could not tell. Again, being demanded whether he did ever read the same book, he did confess, that he could not read, but he had heard the fourth part thereof read of one John Fullar. And being asked, whether he thought the contents of that book to be catholic, profitable, good and true? He answered, that many things which he had heard in the same book, were both profitable, good, and healthful to his soul; and as he said he had great affection to the said book, for a sermon preached at Horslydown, that was written in the said book. And being further asked, whether, since the time of his said abjuration, he did commune with one Richard Turming, of the city aforesaid; he did answer, yea: for the said Richard Turming did come often unto his house to have communication with him. And being asked whether he knew the said Richard to be suspected and defamed of heresy, he did answer again, that he knew well that the said Richard was suspected and defamed by many men and women in the city of London, as one whom they thought to be an heretic.

Which confession being made, he did cause the said books to be delivered to Master Robert Gilbert, doctor of divinity, to William Lindewood, doctor of both laws, and other clerks to be examined, and in the mean time, David Beard, Alexander Philip, and Balthasar Mero, were taken for witnesses against him, and were committed to be examined to Master John Escourt, general examiner of Canterbury. This done, the archbishop continued his session till Monday next, in the same place. Which Monday being come, which was the twentieth of the said month, the said Master Escourt openly and publicly exhibited the witnesses, being openly read before the archbishop, and other bishops; which being read, then after that were read divers treatises, found in the house of the said John Claydon: out of the which being examined, various points were gathered and noted for heresies and errors, and especially out of the book aforesaid, which book John Claydon confessed by his own costs to be written and bound, which book was intitled "The Lanthorn of Light."

For the articles contained in this and other books, the archbishop, with other bishops, and learned men, communing together, first condemned the books as heretical, and burned them in the fire: and then, because they thought John Claydon to be forsworn and fallen into heresy, the archbishop proceeded to his definitive sentence against him, he personally appearing before him in judgment, (his confessions being read and deposed against him) after this manner:

"In the name of God, Amen. We, Henry, by the grace of God, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolical see, in a certain cause of heretical pravity, and of relapse into the same, whereupon John Claydon, layman of the province of Canterbury, was detected, accused and denounced, and in the said our province of Canterbury publicly defamed, (as by public fame and common report notoriously to us hath been known), first, sitting in judgment-seat, and observing all things lawfully required in this behalf, do proceed to the pronouncing of the sentence, definitive in form as followeth. The name of Christ being invoked and only set before our eyes, forasmuch as by the acts and things enacted, produced, exhibited and confessed before us; also by divers signs and evidences, we have found the said John Claydon to have been, and to be publicly and notoriously relapsed again into his former heresy, heretofore by him abjured; according to the merits and deserts of the said cause, being of us diligently searched, weighed, and pondered before, to the intent that the said John Claydon shall not infect others with his scab, by the consent and assent of our reverend brethren, Richard, bishop of London, John, bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, and Stephen, bishop of St. David's, and of other doctors, as well of divinity as of both laws and also of other discreet and learned men assisting us in this behalf, we do judge, pronounce, and declare the said John Claydon to be relapsed again into his heresy, which he before did abjure, finally and definitively appointing him to be left unto the secular judgment, and so do leave him by these presents."

Thus John Claydon, receiving his judgment and condemnation of the archbishop, was committed to the secular power, and by them was committed to the fire at Smithfield, where meekly he was made a burnt offering unto the Lord, A. D. 1415.

Robert Fabian, and other chronologers who follow him, add also, that Richard Turming, baker, of whom mention is made before, in the examination of John Claydon, was likewise at the same time burned with him in Smithfield. But in the register I find no sentence of condemnation given against the said Turming, neither yet in the history of St. Albans, is there any such mention of his burning made, but only of the burning of John Claydon aforesaid; wherefore the judgment hereof I leave free to the reader. Notwithstanding, concerning the said Turming this is certain, that he was accused to the bishops, and, no doubt, was in their hands and bands. What afterwards was done with him, I refer it to the authors.

The next year after the burning of these two aforesaid, and also of John Huss, being burnt at Constance, which was A. D. 1416, the prelates of England seeing the daily increase of the gospel, and fearing the ruin of their papal kingdom, were busily occupied with all their counsel and diligence to maintain the same. Wherefore, to make their state and kingdom sure, by statutes, laws, constitutions, and terror of punishment, as Thomas Arundel, and other prelates had done before, so Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, in his convocation at London, makes another constitution (as though there had not enough been made before) against the poor Lollards; the copy and tenor whereof he sendeth abroad to the bishop of London, and to other his suffragans, by them to be put in straight execution, as follows:

"Henry, by the grace of God archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the chief seat: to our reverend brother in the Lord, Richard, by the grace of God bishop of London, health and brotherly love, with continual increase. Lately in our last convocation in St. Paul's church in London, being kept by you and other our brethren and clergy of our province, we do remember to have made this order underwritten, by your consents: when as among many other our cares, this ought to be chief, that by some means we may take those heretics, who like foxes, lurk and hide themselves in the Lord's vineyard; and that the dust of negligence may be utterly shaken from our feet, and from the feet of our fellow brethren; in this the said convocation of the prelates and clergy, we have ordained, that our fellow brethren, our suffragans and archdeacons of our province of Canterbury, by themselves, their officials or commissaries in their jurisdictions, and every one of their charges in their country, twice every year at the least, do diligently inquire for such persons as are suspected of heresy; and that in every such their archdeaconries in every parish, wherein is reported any heretics to inhabit, they cause three or more of the honestest men, and best reported of, to take their oath upon the holy evangelists, that if they shall know or understand any frequenting either in privy conventicles, or else differing in life or manners, from the common conversation of other catholic men, or else that hold any either heresies or errors, or else that have any suspected books in the English tongue, or that do receive any such persons suspected of heresies and errors into their houses, or that be favourers of them that are inhabitants in any such place, or conversant with them, or else have any recourse unto them; they make certificates of those persons in writing, with all the circumstances wherewith they are suspected, to the said our suffragans or archdeacons, or to their commissaries, so soon, and with as much speed as possibly they can; and that the said archdeacon, and every of their commissaries aforesaid, do declare the names of all such persons denounced, together with all the circumstances of them, the diocese and places, and secretly under their seals do send over unto us the same: and that the same diocesans effectually direct forth lawful process against them, as the quality of the cause requireth, and that with all diligence they discern, define and execute the same.

"And if perhaps they leave not such persons convicted unto the secular court, yet notwithstanding let them commit them unto the perpetual or temporal prisons, as the quality of the cause shall require, until the next convocation of the prelates and clergy of our province of Canterbury, there personally to remain; and that in the same prisons they cause them to be kept according as the law requires; and that of all and singular the things aforesaid, that is, what inquisition they have made, and what they have found, and how in the process they have behaved themselves, and what persons so convicted they have caused to be put in safe keeping, with what diligence or negligence of the commissaries aforesaid, with all and all manner of other circumstances premised, and thereunto in anywise appertaining, and especially of the abjurations, if in the meantime they shall chance to abjure any heresies, that then in the next convocation of the prelates and clergy under the form aforesaid, they cause the same distinctly and openly to be certified to us and our successors; and that they deliver effectually to the official of our court, the same process to remain with them, or else in the register of our court of Canterbury, so that every one, to whom such things appertain, for the further execution of the same process, may have recourse unto the same official with all effect.

"We therefore command, that as touching the constitution brought unto your city and diocesan, you cause the same in convenient place and time to be published, and that in all points you both observe the same yourselves, and cause it also of others to be diligently observed; commanding, furthermore, all and singular our fellow brethren and suffragans, that they in likewise cause the same to be published throughout all their cities and dioceses, and both diligently observe the same themselves, and also cause all others to do the same; and what thing soever you shall do in the premises, that you certify us betwixt this and the feast of St. Peter ad vincula next coming, that you duly certify us of these things by your letters patent, containing the same effect, sealed with your seals. Dated at our house in London, the first day of July, A. D. 1416."

During the time of this convocation, two priests were presented and brought before the bishops, defamed for heretics, one named John Barton, to whom it was objected by Philip, bishop of Lincoln, that he had been excommunicated about six or seven years before, upon articles concerning religion, and yet neither would appear when cited, nor would seek to be reconciled again to the church. Which things being so proved against him, he was committed to the custody of Philip, bishop of Lincoln, and to be holden in prison, till he should hear further what should be done.

The other was Robert Chapel, otherwise named Holbech, chaplain sometimes to the Lord Cobham; to whom likewise it was objected, that he being under the sentence of excommunication about three or four years, yet notwithstanding continued saying mass, and preaching, and sought not to be reconciled; Chapel denying that he knew of any such excommunication given out against him. Then was the copy of his excommunication first made by the bishop of Rochester, afterward denounced by the bishop of London at St. Paul's cross, brought and read before him; and that being done, the session brake up for that time, which was about the latter end of May, A. D. 1416.

The twelfth day of the month of July next following, Chapel appeared again before the archbishop and the prelates; and confessing and submitting himself, he desired pardon. The bishop of Rochester putting in his hands the decree of the canon law, made him abjure all his former articles and opinions as heretical and schismatical, never to hold the same again, according to the contents of the canon. Upon which, Robert Chapel being absolved by the authority of the archbishop, (save only that he should not intermeddle with saying mass before he had been dispensed from the pope himself for irregularity), was enjoined by the archbishop himself for his penance, to stand at St. Paul's, and to publish these articles following unto the people, instead of his confession given him to be read.

"1. I confess that bishops, priests, and other ecclesiastical persons, having no other possession to the contrary, may lawfully have, receive, and retain lands and possessions temporal, to dispense and dispose the same and the rents thereof, to the behoof of themselves, or of their church where they dwell, according as seemeth good to them.

"2. I confess that it were very unlawful, yea, rather unjust, that temporal men upon any occasion soever, should take away temporal lands and possessions from the church, either universal or particular, to which they are given, the consideration of the abuse of mortal prelates, priests, or other ministers in the church conversant (which are mixt together good with bad) abusing the same, to the contrary notwithstanding.

"3. I confess that pilgrimages to the relics of saints, and to holy places, are not prohibited, nor to be condemned of any catholic, but are available to remission of sins, and approved of holy fathers, and worthy to be commended.

"4. I confess that to worship the images of Christ or of any other saints, being set up in the church or in any other place, is not forbidden; neither does it conduce to idolatry, being so used as the holy fathers do will them to be worshipped; but rather such images do profit much to the health of christians, because they do put us in remembrance of the merits of those saints whom they represent, and the sight of them doth move and stir up the people to prayers and devotion.

"5. I confess that auricular confession used in the church is necessary for a sinner to the salvation of his soul, and necessary to be done of such a priest, as is ordained by the church to hear the confession of the sinner, and to enjoin him penance for the same; without which confession (if it may be had) there is no remission of sins to him that is in mortal sin.

"6. I confess and firmly do hold, that although the priest be in mortal sin, yet he may make the body of Christ, and minister other sacraments and sacramentals, which nevertheless are profitable to all the faithful, whoever receives them in faith and devotion of the church.

"7. I confess that bishops in their own dioceses may forbid, decree, or ordain upon reasonable causes, that priests should not, without their special license, preach the word of God, and that those that do against the same, should suffer the ecclesiastical censures.

"8. I confess that private religions, as well of monks, canons, and others, as also of the begging friars, being allowed by the church of Rome, are profitable to the universal church, and in no means contrary to God's law, but rather founded and authorised thereof.

"9. I promise and swear upon these holy evangelists, which I hold here in my hands, that I will henceforth never hold, affirm, nor by any means teach any thing contrary unto the premises either openly or privately."

After the setting out of the constitution aforesaid, in the days of Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, great inquisition followed in England, and many good men, whose hearts began to be won to the gospel, were brought to much vexation, and caused outwardly to abjure.

Thus, while Christ had the inward hearts of men; yet the catholic antichrist would needs possess their outward bodies, and make them sing after his song. In the number of those who were compelled to abjure, besides the other aforesaid, was also John Taylor of the parish of St. Michael's at Quern; William James, master of arts and physician, who had long remained in prison, and at length, after abjuration, was licensed with his keeper to practice his physick.

Also John Dwarf, so named for his low stature, who was sent by the duke of Bedford to the aforesaid Chicheley, and other bishops, to be examined before them or the convocation; there he at length revolting from his doctrine, recanted and did penance.

In like manner John Jourdelay of Lincolnshire, well commended in the registers for his learning, accused by the priests of Lincoln for a certain book, which he, contrary to the former decree of the bishops, concealed, and did not exhibit to them, was therefore forced to abjure. After whom was brought likewise before the bishops one Katharine Dertford, a spinster, who being accused and examined upon these three articles concerning the sacrament of the pope's altar, adoration of images, and of pilgrimage, answered, that she was not able, being unlearned, to answer to such high matters, neither had she any further skill, but only her creed and ten commandments; and so was she committed to the vicar general of the bishop of Winchester, (for she was of the same diocese), to be kept, and further to be examined of the same.

At the same sitting was also brought before the archbishop and his fellow bishops, by the lieutenant of the Tower, the parson of Heggeley in Lincolnshire, named Master Robert, who being long kept in the Tower, at length by the king's writ, was brought and examined the same time upon the like articles, to wit, touching the sacrament of their altar, pilgrimage, adoration of images, and whether it was lawful for spiritual men to enjoy temporal lordships, &c. To which articles he answered (saith the register) doubly and mockingly, save only in the sacrament he seemed something more conformable, although not yet fully to their content. Wherefore, being committed to the custody and examination of Richard, bishop of Lincoln, in the end he was also induced to submit himself.

The same likewise did William Henry of Tenterden, being suspected and arrested for keeping company with them whom the bishops called Lollards, and for having suspected books.

Besides these, many others there were who in the same convocation were assembled and revoked their opinions, as John Galle, a priest of London, for having a book in English, intituled "A Book of the New Law." Richard Monk, vicar of Chesham in Lincolnshire, who submitted himself likewise. In this race and number followed moreover Bartholomew Cornmonger, Nicholas Hoper, servant to the Lord Cobham; Thomas Granter, with others, mentioned in the register.

Among the rest who were at this time troubled for their faith, was one Radulph Mungin, priest, who for the same doctrine was arrested and sent by the lord chancellor of England to the archbishop, and by him committed to David Price, vicar-general to the bishop of London; where, after he had endured four months in prison, he was presented to the convocation, against whom divers articles were objected.

But for the better explaining of the matter, first here is to be noted, that touching the time of this convocation provincial, Pope Martin had sent down to the clergy of England, for a subsidy to be gathered of the church, to maintain the pope's war against the Lollards (so the papists did term them) of Bohemia. Also another subsidy was demanded to persecute one Peter Clerk, master of arts of Oxford, who, flying out of England, was at the council of Basil, disputing on the Bohemians' side. And thirdly, another subsidy was also required to persecute William Russel, warden of the Gray Friars in London, who the same time was fled from England to Rome, to maintain his opinion before the pope, and there escaped out of prison, &c. of whom we shall treat more largely hereafter (Christ willing). In the meantime mark here the petty shifts of the pope to hook in the English money, by all manner of pretences possible.

Thus Ralph Mungin, appearing before the bishops in the convocation, it was objected against him, first, that he affirmed and held, that it was not lawful for any christian to fight and make war against the heretics of Bohemia.

Also, it was objected to him that he did hold and say that it was not lawful for any man to have property of goods, but that they should be common, which he expressly denied that ever he so said or affirmed. Whereby we have to observe how the crafty malice of these adversaries use falsely to collect and surmise of men, what they never spake, to oppress them wrongfully whom by plain truth they cannot expugn.

Moreover they objected against him, that he kept company with Master Clerk, and also that he dispersed in the city of London certain books of John Wickliffe, and of Peter Clerk, namely the book 'Triologus,' and the gospel of John Wickliffe, &c. He was charged, moreover, to have spoken against the pope's indulgences, affirming that the pope had no more power to give indulgences than he had.

Upon these and other such articles objected, Mungin being asked if he would revoke, answered, "That it seemed to him not just or meet so to do, who did not know himself guilty of any heresy." Thus he being respited for the time, was committed to prison till the next sitting, who then being called afterward before the bishops, after long inquisition and straight examination made, also depositions brought in against him so much as they could search out, he notwithstanding still denied as before to recant. Wherefore the aforesaid Henry, the archbishop, proceeding to his sentence definitive, condemned him to perpetual imprisonment.

After this followed the recantation of Richard Monk, and Thomas Granter. Also of Edmund Frith who was before butler to Sir John Oldcastle.

Besides these, many are recorded in the register, who for their faith and religion were greatly vexed and troubled, especially in the diocese of Kent, in the towns of Romney, Tenterden, Woodchurch, Cranbrook, Staplehurst, Benenden, Halden, Rolvenden, and others, where whole households, both man and wife, were driven to forsake their houses and towns for danger of persecution; as sufficiently appears in the process of the archbishop Chicheley against those persons, and in the certificate of Burbath his official, wherein are named the following persons:

1. W. White, priest.
2. Thomas Grensted, priest.
3. Bartholomew Cornmonger.
4. John Wadnon.
5. Joan his wife.

6. Thomas Everden.
7. William Everden.
8. Stephen Robin.
9. W. Chiveling.
10. John Taue.
11. John Fowlin.
12. William Somer.
13. Marian his wife.
14. John Abraham.
15. Robert Munden.
16. Laurence Coke.

These being cited up together by the bishop, would not appear. Upon which great inquisition being made for them by his officers, they were constrained to fly their houses and towns, and shift for themselves as secretly as they could.

Concerning Sir John Oldcastle the Lord Cobham, his first apprehension with his whole history and life, has been sufficiently expressed before, and how being committed to the Tower, and condemned falsely of heresy, he escaped afterwards out of the Tower, and was in Wales about the space of four years. In which time, a great sum of money was promised by proclamation by the king, to him that could take Sir John Oldcastle, either alive or dead. About the end of which four years the Lord Powis, whether for love and greediness of the money, or whether for hatred of the true and sincere doctrine of Christ, seeking all manner of ways how to play the part of Judas, at length obtained his bloody purpose, and brought the Lord Cobham bound up to London; which was about A.D. 1417, and about the month of December. At which time there was a parliament assembled in London. The records of which parliament do thus say: "That on Tuesday the fourteenth day of December, and the nine-and-twentieth day of the said parliament, Sir John Oldcastle of Cowling, in the county of Kent, knight, being outlawed (as is before mentioned) in the king's bench, and excommunicated before by the archbishop of Canterbury for heresy, was brought before the lords, and having heard his said convictions, answered not thereto in his excuse. Upon which record and process it was adjudged that he should be taken as a traitor to the king and the realm; that he should be carried to the Tower of London, and from thence down through London, unto the new gallows in St. Giles without Temple Bar, and there to be hanged and burned hanging."

Thus, after long process, they condemned him again for heresy and treason, by force of the aforementioned act; he rendering thanks unto God, that he had so appointed him to suffer for his name's sake.

And, upon the day appointed, he was brought out of the Tower with his arms bound behind him, having a very cheerful countenance. Then was he laid upon a hurdle, as though he had been a most heinous traitor to the crown, and so drawn forth into St. Giles's-fields, where they had set up a new pair of gallows. As he was coming to the place of execution, and was taken from the hurdle, he fell down devoutly upon his knees, desiring Almighty God to forgive his enemies. Then he stood up and beheld the multitude, exhorting them, in most godly manner, to follow the laws of God written in the scriptures, and, in any wise, to beware of such teachers as they see contrary to Christ in their conversation and living; with many other special counsels. Then was he hanged up there by the middle, in chains of iron, and so consumed alive in the fire, praising the name of God, so long as his life lasted. In the end he commended his soul into the hand of God, and so departed hence most christianly, his body being resolved into ashes. And this was done A. D. 1418, which was the fifth year of the reign of King Henry V.; the people there present, shewing great sorrow. How the priests that time fared, blasphemed, and accursed, requiring the people not to pray for him, but to judge him damned in hell because he departed not in the obedience of their pope, it were too long to write.

This terrible kind of death, with gallows, chains, and fire, appears not very precious in the eyes of men that be carnal, no more than did the death of Christ, when he was hanged up among thieves. "The righteous seemeth to die," saith the wise man, "in the sight of them which are unwise, and their end is taken for very destruction. Ungodly souls think their lives very madness, and their passage hence without all honour; but, though they suffer pains before men," saith he, "yet is their expectation full of immortality. They are accounted for the children of God, and have their portion among the saints. As gold in the furnace doth God try his elect, and as a most pleasant burnt offering, receiveth he them to rest." The more hard the passage be, the more glorious shall they appear in the latter resurrection. Not that the afflictions of this life are worthy of such a glory, but that it is God's heavenly pleasure so to reward them. Never are the judgments and ways of men like unto the judgments and ways of God, but contrary evermore, unless they be taught of him. "In the latter time," saith the Lord unto Daniel, "shall many be chosen, proved, and purified by fire; yet shall the ungodly live wickedly still, and have no understanding that is of faith." By an angel from heaven was John earnestly commanded to write that "blessed are the dead that die in the Lord." "Right dear," saith David, "in the sight of God, is the death of his servants."

Thus rested this valiant christian knight, Sir John Oldcastle, under the altar of God, which is Jesus Christ, among that godly company, who, in the kingdom of patience, suffered great tribulation with the death of their bodies, for his faithful word and testimony, abiding there with them. He, fulfilling of their whole number and the full restoration of his elect. The which he grant, in effect, who is one God eternal! Amen.

Thus have you heard the whole matter concerning the martyrdom of the good Lord Cobham, as we have gathered it partly out of the collections of John Bale and others.

Moreover, in the records above mentioned, it follows how in the parliament, after the martyrdom of this valiant knight, a motion was made, that the Lord Powis might be thanked and rewarded, according to the proclamation made for his great pains taken in the apprehension of "Sir John Oldcastle, knight, heretic." Thus stand the words of the record. Where two things are to be noted: first, how Sir John here in the record is called not traitor, but heretic only. Secondly, mark how this brother of Judas here craveth his reward for betraying the innocent blood. Wherein it is not to be doubted, but that his light fee, and "what will you give me?" in this world, will have an heavy reward hereafter in the world to come, unless he repented.

And now from our English matters, to return again to the history of the Bohemians, from whence we have a little digressed. When the news of the barbarous cruelty exercised at Constance against John Huss and Jerome of Prague, were noised in Bohemia, the nobles and gentlemen of Moravia and Bohemia, such as favoured the cause of John Huss, gathering themselves together in the zeal of Christ; first sent their letter to the council; expostulating with them for the injury done to those godly men, as is before expressed. For which letter they were all cited up to the council. To this letter Sigismund the emperor makes answer in the name of the whole council; first, excusing himself of John Huss's death, which, he said, was against his safe conduct, and against his will: insomuch that he rose in anger from the council, and departed out of Constance, as is before remembered. Secondly, he requires them to be quiet, and to conform themselves peaceably to the order of the catholic church of Rome, &c.

Also the council hearing or fearing some stir to rise among the Bohemians, did make several laws and articles whereby to bridle them.

The Bohemians, however, notwithstanding these cruel articles, contemning the vain devices of these prelates and fathers of the council, ceased not to proceed in their league and purpose, joining themselves more strongly together.

In the meantime it happened, that during this council of Constance, after the deposing of Pope John, and spoiling of his goods, which came to seventy five thousand pounds of gold and silver, as is reported in the history of St. Alban's; Pope Martin, upon the day of St. Martin, was elected to the pontifical chair. Concerning his election great preparation was made before by the council, so that beside the cardinals, five other bishops of every nation should enter into the conclave, who there together should be kept with thin diet, till they had chosen a pope. At last, when they were together, they agreed upon this man, and not tarrying for opening the door, like mad men, for haste they broke open a hole in the wall, crying out, "We have Pope Martin!" The emperor hearing thereof, came with similar haste, and falling down kissed the new pope's feet. Then they all went to the church together, and sung Te Deum.

The next day, this Martin was made priest (for before, he was only a cardinal deacon) and the day after was consecrated bishop, and sang his first mass, whereat one hundred and forty mitred bishops were present. After this, the new holy pope ordained a general procession, where a certain clerk was appointed to stand with flax and fire, who, setting the flax on fire, thus said, "Behold, holy father, thus the glory of this world passeth away." Which done, the same day the holy father was brought up to a high scaffold (saith the history) I will not say to a high mountain, where was offered to him all the glory of the world, &c. there to be crowned for a triple king. This done, the same day after dinner, the new crowned pope was with great triumph brought through the midst of the city of Constance, where all the bishops and abbots followed wearing their mitres. The pope's horse was all in scarlet trappings down to the ground. The cardinal's horses were all in white silk; the emperor on the right side, and prince elector on the left, (playing both the pope's footmen) went on foot, leading the pope's horse by the bridle.

As this pageant, with the great giant, thus proceeded, and came to the market place, there the Jews (according to the manner) offered to him their law and ceremonies. Which the pope receiving, cast behind him saying, "Let old things pass away, all things are become new," &c. This was A.D. 1417. (Ex Hist. St. Alb. ex paralip. Ursperg.)

Thus the pope, being now confirmed in his kingdom, first begins to write his letters to the Bohemians, wherein partly he moves them to catholic obedience, partly he dissembles with them, pretending that if it were not for the emperor's request, he would enter process against them. Thirdly, and finally, he threatens to attempt the utmost against them, and with all force to invade them, as well with the apostolic, as with the secular arm, if they still persisted, as they began. However, these new threats of the new bishop did not move the constant hearts of the Bohemians, whom the inward zeal of Christ's word had before inflamed. And although it had been to be wished such bloodshed and wars had not followed; yet, to say the truth, how could these men greatly blame them herein, whom their bloody tyranny had before provoked so unjustly, if now with their glossing letters they could not so easily appease them again?

Wherefore, these Bohemians, partly for the love of John Huss and Jerome their countrymen; partly for the hatred of the malignant papistry, assembling together, first agreed to celebrate a solemn memorial of the death of John Huss and Jerome, decreeing the same to be held and celebrated yearly. And, afterward, by means of their friends, they obtained certain churches of the king, wherein they might freely preach and minister the sacraments to the congregation. This done, they suppressed several monasteries, pharisaical temples, and idolatrous fanes, beginning first with the great monastery of the Blackfriars, eight miles from Prague, driving away the wicked and vicious priests and monks out of them, or compelling them to a better order. And thus their number more and more increasing under the safe conduct of a certain nobleman, named Nicholas, they went again to the king, requiring to have more and ampler churches granted to them. The king seemed at the first willingly and gently to give ear to Nicholas intreating for the people, and commanded them to come again the next day.

When the people were departed, the king turning himself to the nobleman Nicholas, who tarried still behind, said, "Thou hast begun a web to put me out of my kingdom, but I will make a rope of it, wherewithal I will hang thee." Whereupon he immediately departed out of the king's presence, and the king himself went into the castle of Vissegrade, and soon after, into a new castle, which he himself had built five stones' cast from thence, and sent ambassadors to his brother to require aid.

These protestants' being assembled in the town of Prague, holding their meetings, the king sent his chamberlain with three hundred horsemen to fall upon them; but he fearing for his life, fled. When the news was brought to the king, all that were about him being amazed, utterly detested the act: but the king's cup-bearer standing by, said, "I knew before, that these things would thus come to pass." Whom the king taking hold of in a rage, threw down before his feet, and with his dagger would have slain him; but being prevented by such as were about him, with much persuasion he pardoned him his life. Immediately the king being taken with a palsy, fell sick, and within eighteen days after, when he had marked the names of such whom he had appointed to be put to death, and was incessantly calling for aid of his brother, and his other friends, he departed this life before the princes whom he had sent to, were come, when he had reigned five-and-fifty years, and was about the age of seven-and-fifty years.

The History of Zisca.

Immediately after the death of Wenceslaus, there arose a certain nobleman named Zisca, born at Tronovia, who, from his youth upward, was brought up in the king's court, and had lost one of his eyes in a battle, where he had valiantly conducted himself. This man being grieved for the death of John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, and minding to revenge the injuries which the council had done, greatly to the dishonour of the kingdom of Bohemia, gathered together a number of men of war, and pulled down the monasteries and idolatrous temples, pulling down and breaking in pieces the images and idols, driving away the priests and monks, who he said were kept in their cloisters, like swine in their styes, to be fatted. After this, his army being increased, having gathered together about forty thousand men, he attempted to take the castle of Vissegrade, which was but slenderly defended. From thence Zisca went speedily unto Pelzina, where he knew he had many friends of his faction, and took the town into his power, fortifying it very strongly, and those who tarried behind, took the castle of Vissegrade.

Then the Queen Sophia sent letters and messengers to the Emperor Sigismund and other nobles, requiring aid and help: but the emperor made preparation against the Turk, who had then lately won certain castles of him. Upon which the queen, seeing all aid so far off, together with Zenko Wartenberge, gathered a host with the king's treasure, and fortified the castle of Prague, and the lesser city which joins to the castle, making gates and towers of wood upon the bridge, that the protestants should have no passage that way. Then it happened that at the Isle of St. Benedict, one Peter Steremberge fought an equal or indifferent battle with them.

In the meantime, the number of the protestants being increased in Prague, they fought for the bridge. In which battle many were slain on both parts, but at

(1) Our author is treating of events about a century before the Reformation, and he gives the appellation of protestants to those who at that age were opposed to the papal system. There were many such in all ages of the church. [Ed.]

length the Hussites won the bridge and the lower part of lesser Prague, the queen's party flying into the upper part, where they, turning again, fiercely renewed the battle, and fought continually day and night for the space of five days. Many were slain on both sides, and goodly buildings were destroyed, and the council house, which was in a low place, was utterly defaced and burned.

During the time of this troublous estate, the ambassadors of the Emperor Sigismund were come, who, taking upon them the rule and government of the realm, made a truce with the city of Prague on this condition, that the castle of Vissegrade being surrendered, it should be lawful for them to send ambassadors to the Emperor Sigismund to treat as to their estate, and that Zisca should surrender Pilzina and Piesta with the other forts which he had taken. These conditions thus agreed upon and received, all the foreign protestants departed out of the city, and the senate of the city began to govern again according to their accustomed manner, and all things were quieted. However, the papists, who were gone out of the town, durst not return, but still looked for the emperor, by whose presence they thought they should have been safe. But this their hope was frustrated by means of certain letters which were sent from the emperor, that he would shortly come and rule the kingdom, even after the same manner as his father Charles had done before him. Upon which, the protestants understood that their sect and religion should be utterly banished.

About Christmas, the Emperor Sigismund came to Brunn, a city of Moravia, and there he pardoned the citizens of Prague, on condition that they would let down the chains and bars of the city, and receive his rulers and magistrates. The whole city obeyed, and the magistrates, lifting up their hands to heaven, rejoiced at the coming of the new king. But the emperor turned another way, and went to Uratislavia, the head city of Silesia, where a little before the commonalty of the city had slain, in an insurrection, the magistrates, which his brother Wenceslaus had set in authority; the leaders of which he beheaded. When the news of this was reported at Prague, the citizens being terrified by the example of the Uratislavians, distrusting their pardon, rebelled, and having influenced Cencho to join them, who had the government of the castle of Prague, they sent letters into all the realm, that no man should suffer the emperor to enter, as he was an enemy to Bohemia, and sought nothing else but to destroy the kingdom: he had also bound the ancient city of the Prutenians under order, by pledges, and put the marquess of Brandenburg from the Bohemian crown: and had not only suffered John Huss and Jerome of Prague to be burned at the council of Constance, but also procured the same, and with all his endeavours impugned the doctrine and faith which they taught and followed. While these things were thus done, Zisca, having given over Pelzina by arrangement, was twice assaulted by his enemies, but through skill he was always victor. The places where they fought were rough and unknown, his enemies were on horseback, and his soldiers on foot, neither could there be any battle fought but on foot. Whereupon, when his enemies were alighted from their horses, Zisca commanded the women who usually followed the host, to cast their kerchiefs upon the ground, in which the horsemen being entangled by their spurs, were slain before they could unloose their feet.

After this, he went unto Ausca, a town situate upon the river Lucinitius, out of which town, Procopius and Ulricus, two brethren papists, had cast out many protestants. This town Zisca took by force of arms the first night of Lent, and set it on fire. He also took the castle of Litus, which was a mile off, where Ulric was fled, and put Ulric and all his family to the sword, saving one only.

Then, as he had no walled or fenced town to inhabit, he chose a certain place upon the river, which was fenced by nature, about eight miles from the city of Ausca. This place he compassed with walls, and commanded every man to build houses, where they had pitched their tents, and named this city Tabor, and the inhabitants, his companions, Taborites, because their city was builded upon the top of some hill or mount. This city, though it was fenced with high rocks and cliffs, yet was compassed with a wall and ramparts, and the river of Lucinitius fences a great part of the town; the rest is compassed in with a great brook, which, running straight into the river Lucinitius, is stopped by a great rock, and driven back towards the right hand all the length of the city, and at the further end it joineth with the great river. The way unto it by land is scarce thirty feet broad, for it is almost an island. In this place there was a deep ditch cast, and a triple wall made, of such thickness, that it could not be broken with any engine. The wall was full of towers and forts set in their convenient and meet places. Zisca was the first that built the castle, and those that came after him fortified it, every man according to his own device. At that time the Taborites had no horsemen among them, until such time as Nicholas, master of the mint (whom the emperor had sent into Bohemia with a thousand horsemen to set things in order, and to withstand the Taborites, lodging all night in a village named Vogize) was surprised by Zisca coming upon him suddenly in the night, taking away all his horse and armour, and setting fire to the village. Then Zisca taught his soldiers to mount on horseback, to leap, to run, to turn, and to cast a ring, so that after this he never led an army without his wings of horsemen.

In the meantime, Sigismund, the emperor, gathering together the nobles of Silesia, entered Bohemia, and went into Grecium, and thence, with a great army, to Cuthna, alluring Cencho with many great and large promises to surrender the castle of Prague, and there placed him to annoy the town. This Cencho, inflamed with double treason, returned home. The citizens of Prague sent for Zisca, who speeding himself thither with the Taborites, received the city under his government. In the Bohemian's host there were but only two barons, Hilco Crusina of Lituburge; and Hilco Waldestene; with a few other nobles; all the rest were of the common people. They went first to subdue the castle, which was by nature very strongly fenced, and could not be won by any other means than with famine: whereupon all the passages were stopped, that no victuals should be carried in. But the emperor opened the passages by dint of sword, and when he had given to the besieged all things necessary, and sent for aid out of the empire, he determined shortly after to besiege the city. There were in the emperor's camp the duke of Saxony; the marquess of Brandenburg; and his son-in-law, Albert of Austria. The city was assaulted for the space of six weeks. The Emperor Sigismund was crowned in the metropolitan house in the castle; Conrad, the archbishop, solemnizing the ceremonies of the coronation. The city was straightway besieged. In the meantime the captains, Rosenses and Chragery, who had taken the tents of the Taborites, being overcome in battle by Nicholas Huss, whom Zisca had sent with part of his force, for that purpose, were driven out of their tents, and Grecium, the queen's city, was also taken.

There is also above the town of Prague a high hill, which is called Videchon. On this hill had Zisca strongly planted a garrison, that his enemies should not possess it, with whom the marquis of Misnia skirmishing, lost a great part of his soldiers. For when the Misnians had got the top of the hill, being driven back into a corner, which was broken and steep, and fiercely set upon, when they could no longer withstand the violent force of their enemies, some of them were slain, and some falling headlong from the hill, were destroyed. Upon which the Emperor Sigismund raising his siege, departed to Cuthna, and Zisca with his company departed to Tabor, and subdued many places; among which he subverted a town pertaining to the captain of Vissegrade. During this time the castle of Vissegrade was strongly besieged, where, when other victuals failed, they were compelled to eat horse-flesh. Last of all, unless the emperor aided them, by a certain day, they promised to yield it up, but on this condition, that if the emperor came, they within the castle should be no more molested.

The emperor was present before the day, but being ignorant of the truce taken, entering into a strait underneath the castle, was suddenly set upon by the soldiers of Prague, where he had a great overthrow, and so leaving his purpose unperformed, returned back again. There were slain in that conflict fourteen noblemen of the Moravians, and of the Hungarians, and others a great number. The castle was delivered up to them. While these things were in doing, Zisca took Boslaus, a captain, who was surnamed Cigneus, by force, in a very strong town of his, and brought him to his religion. Who, a few years after, leading the protestant army in Austria, was wounded before Rhetium, and died. There were in the territory of Pelzina many monasteries, of which Zisca pulled down and burned five. And as the monastery of St. Clare was the strongest, there he pitched himself.

There also came the emperor with his army: but when Zisca brought forth his forces against him, he most cowardly fled, and not long after, he departed and left Bohemia. Then Zisca went with his army to Pelzina; but as he saw the city so fenced, that he was in doubt of winning it, he went to Committavia, a famous city, which he took by force, burning all the priests in it.

Afterwards, when as he lay before the town of Raby, and strongly besieged it, he was struck with an arrow in the eye, having only that one before to see with. From thence he was carried to Prague by physicians, where he was cured of his wound, and his life saved, although he lost his sight, and yet he would not forsake his army, but still took the charge of them.

After this the garrisons of Prague went to Verona, where there was a great garrison of the emperors, and took it by force, many being slain on both sides. They also took the town of Broda, in Germany, and slew the garrison, and afterward took Cuthna, and many other cities, by composition. Further, when they led their army unto a town called Pons, which is inhabited by the Misnians, the Saxons meeting them by the way, because they durst not join battle, they returned back. After all this, the emperor appointed the princes electors a day, that they should with their army invade the west part of Bohemia, and he, with an host of Hungarians, would enter the east part. There came to his aid the archbishop of Mentz, the county palatine of Rhein, the dukes of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburg, and many other bishops out of Almaine; all the rest sent their aids. They encamped before the town of Sozias, a strong and well fenced place, which they could by no means subdue. The country was spoiled and wasted round about, and the siege continued until the feast of St. Galle. Then it was broken up, because the emperor was not come at his day appointed: but he having gathered together a great army of the Hungarians, and West Moravians, about Christmas entered into Bohemia; and took certain towns by force, and Cuthna was yielded unto him. But when Zisca (although he was blind) came towards him, and set upon him, he being afraid, and many of his nobles slain, fled. But first he burned Cuthna, which the Taborites, by means of the silver mines, called the Pouch of Antichrist. Zisca, pursuing the emperor a day's journey, got great and rich spoil, and taking the town of Broda by force, set it on fire, which afterward almost by the space of fourteen years, remained uninhabited. The emperor passed by a bridge over the river of Iglaria. And Piso, a Florentine, who had brought fifteen thousand horsemen out of Hungary to these wars, passed over the ice; which by the multitude and number of his horsemen being broke, drowned and destroyed a great number. Zisca having obtained this victory, would not suffer any image or idol to be in the churches, neither thought it tolerable that priests should minister with copes or vestments: for which cause he was much the more envied amongst the states of Bohemia. And the consuls of Prague, being grieved at the insolency of John Premonstratensis, called him and nine others of his adherents, whom they supposed to be the principals of this faction, into the council-house, as though they would confer with them as touching the commonwealth: and when they were come in, they slew them, and afterward departed home every man to his own house, thinking the city had been quiet, as though nothing had been done. But their servants not being circumspect enough, washing down the court or yard, washed out also the blood of those that were slain through the sinks or channels; which being once seen, the people understood what was done. By and by there was a tumult; the council-house was straightway overthrown, and eleven of the principal citizens who were thought to be the authors of it, were slain, and many houses plundered.

About the same time, the castle of Purgel, wherein the emperor had left a small garrison (whither also many papists with their wives and children were fled) was, through negligence, burned, and those who escaped out of the fire went unto Pelzina. After this, many of the Bohemian captains, and the senate of Prague, sent ambassadors to Vitold, duke of Lithuania, and made him their king. This did Zisca and his adherents gainsay. This Vitold sent Sigismund Coributus with two thousand horsemen into Bohemia, who was honourably received by the inhabitants of Prague. At his coming, they determined to lay siege to a castle situate upon a hill, which was called Charles' Stone.

Here Sigismund had left for a garrison four centuries of soldiers. The tents were pitched in three places. The siege continued six months, and the assault never ceased day and night. Five great slings threw continually great stones over the walls, and about two thousand vessels, tubs, or baskets, filled with dead carcasses, and other excrements, were cast in amongst those which were besieged: which thing did so infect them with stench, that their teeth did either fall out, or were all loose. Notwithstanding they bare it out with stout courage, and continued their fight until the winter.

In the mean time, Frederick the Elder, prince of Brandenburg, entering into Bohemia with a great army, caused them of Prague to raise the siege. And Vitold, at the request of Uladislans, king of Poland, which had talked with the emperor on the borders of Hungary, called Coributus, his uncle, with his whole army, out of Bohemia. Whereupon the emperor, supposing that the protestants, being destitute of foreign aid, would the sooner do his commandment: but he was far deceived therein; for they, leading their armies out of Bohemia, subdued the borderers thereupon adjoining. It is also reported that Zisca went into Austria, and when the husbandmen of the country had carried away a great number of their cattle by water into an isle of the river called Danube, and by chance had left certain calves and swine in their villages behind them: Zisca drove them to the river side, and kept them there so long, beating them, and causing them to roar out and cry, until the cattle feeding in the island, hearing the lowing and grunting of the cattle on the other side the water, for the desire of their like, did swim over the river; by the means whereof he got and drove away a great booty.

About the same time the Emperor Sigismund gave unto his son-in-law, Albert, duke of Austria, the country of Moravia, because it should not want a ruler. At the same time also, Eric, king of Denmark, and Peter Infant, brother to the king of Portugal, and father of James, cardinal of St. Eustace, came to the emperor, being both very expert men in the affairs of war, which did augment the emperor's host with their aid and power. Whereupon they straightway pitched their camp before Lutemperge, a town of Moravia, and continued the siege by the space of three months. There was at that time a certain knight at Prague, surnamed Aqua, which was very rich, and of great authority. This man, forsomuch as he had no child of his own, adopted his sister's son, named Procopius; whom when he was of mean nature and age, he carried with him into France, Spain, and Italy, and unto Jerusalem, and at his return caused him to be made priest. This man, when the gospel began to flourish in Bohemia, took part with Zisca; and as he was strong and valiant, and also painful, he was greatly esteemed.

This Procopius for his valiant acts was afterwards called Procopius Magnus, and had committed unto him the whole charge of the province of Moravia, and the defence of the Lutemperges, who receiving a great power by force, carried victuals into the town which was besieged, and so frustrated the emperor's siege. The emperor before this, had delivered to the marquises of Misnia the bridge and town of Ausca, upon the river Elbe, that they should fortify them with their garrisons. Whereupon Zisca besieged Ausca; and Frederick, the marquis of Misnia, with his brother the landgrave of Turing, gathering together a great army out of Saxonia, Turing, Misnia, and both the Lusaces, determined to rescue and aid those which were besieged.

There was a great battle fought before the city, and the victory was long uncertain, but at last it fell on the protestants' part. There were slain in the battle, the burghers of Misnia or Chyrpogenses, the barons of Glychen, and many other nobles, besides nine thousand common soldiers, and the town of Ausca was taken and utterly razed.

At last, dissension rising between Zisca and them of Prague, they of Prague prepared an army against him, wherewith he perceiving himself overmatched, fled to the river Elbe, and was almost taken, but that he had passage through the town of Poggiebras; but they of Prague, pursuing the tail of the battle, slew many of his Taborites. At length they came to certain hills, where Zisca going into the valley, knowing the passes of the place, that his enemies could not spread their army, he commanded his standard to stand still, and exhorting and encouraging his soldiers, he gave them battle.

This battle was very fierce and cruel; but Zisca having the upper hand, slew three thousand of them of Prague, and put the rest to flight, and took the city of Cuthna by force (which they of Prague had repaired) and set it on fire: then with all speed he went with his army to besiege Prague, and encamped within a bowshot of the town. There were many both in the city, and also in his host, who grudged sore at that siege; some accusing Zisca, others them of Prague. There were great tumults in the camp, the soldiers saying that it was not reasonable that the city should be suppressed, which was both the head of the kingdom, and did not dissent from them in opinion, saying, that the Bohemians' power would soon decay, if their enemies should know that they were divided within themselves: also that they had sufficient wars against the emperor, and that it was but a foolish device to move wars amongst themselves. This talk came to the ear of Zisca, who, calling together his army, standing upon a place to be heard, spake in these words:

"Brethren, be ye not aggrieved against me, neither accuse him who hath sought your health and safety. The victories which ye have obtained under my conduct are yet fresh in memory, neither have I brought you at any time to any place, from whence you have not come victors. You are become famous and rich, and I for your sake have lost my sight, and dwell in darkness. Nothing have I gotten by all these fortunate battles, but only a vain name. For you have I fought, and for you have I vanquished; neither do I repent me of my toil; neither is my blindness grievous to me, but only that I cannot provide for you according to my accustomed manner: neither do I persecute them of Prague for mine own cause, for it is your blood that they thirst and seek for, and not for mine. It were but small pleasure for them to destroy me, being now an old man and blind, it is your valiantness and stout courage which they fear. Either you or they must perish, who while they seem to lie in wait for me, seek after your lives. You must rather fear civil wars than foreign, and civil sedition ought first to be avoided. We will subdue Prague, and banish the seditious citizens before the emperor shall have any news of this sedition. And then having but a few of his faction left, we may with the less fear look for it, better than if these doubtful citizens of Prague were still in our camp. But because ye shall accuse me no more, I give you free liberty to do what you will. If it please you to suffer them of Prague to live in quietness, I will not be against it, so that there be no treason wrought. If you determine to have war, I am also ready. Look which part you will incline to; Zisca will be your aid and helper."

When he had spoken these words, the soldiers' minds were changed, and wholly determined to make war, so that they ran by and by to take up their armour and weapons, to run to the walls, to provoke their enemies to fight for the gates of the city. Zisca, in the mean time, prepared all things ready for the assault. There is near Pelzina, a certain village named Rochezana. In this place, there was a child born of poor and base parentage, whose name was John; he came to Prague, and got his living there by begging, and learned grammar and logic. When he came to man's estate, he became the school-master of a nobleman's child; and as he was of an excellent wit, and ready tongue, he was received into the college of the poor: and last of all, being made priest, he began to preach the word of God to the citizens of Prague, and was named John of Rochezana, by the name of the town where he was born. The man grew to be of great name and authority in the town of Prague. Upon which, when as Zisca besieged Prague, he by the consent of the citizens, went out into the camp, and reconciled Zisca again to the city.

When the emperor perceived that all things came to pass according to Zisca's will and mind, and that upon him alone the whole state of Bohemia depended, he sought privy means to reconcile and get Zisca into his favour, promising him the government of the whole kingdom, the guiding of all his hosts and armies, and great yearly revenues, if he would proclaim him king, and cause the cities to be sworn to him. Upon which conditions, when Zisca, for the performance of the covenants, went to the emperor, during his journey at the castle of Priscovia, he was struck with sickness, and died.

It is reported, that when he was asked, while sick, in what place he would be buried; he commanded the skin to be pulled off from his carcass, and the flesh to be cast to the fowls and beasts, and that a drum should be made of his skin, which they should use in their battles; affirming, that as soon as their enemies should hear the sound of that drum, they would not abide, but take their flight. The Taborites, despising all other images, yet set up the picture of Zisca over the gates of the city.

The Epitaph of John Zisca, the valiant Captain of the Bohemians.

"I, John Zisca, not inferior to an emperor, or captain in warlike skill, a severe punisher of the pride and avarice of the clergy, and a defender of my country, do lie here. That which Appius Claudius, by giving good counsel, and M. Furius Camillus by valiantness, did for the Romans, the same, I being blind, have done for my Bohemians. I never slackened opportunity of battle, neither did fortune at any time fail me. I, being blind, did foresee all opportunity of well ordering or doing my business. Eleven times in joining battle I went victor out of the field. I seemed to have worthily defended the cause of the miserable and hungry against the delicate, fat, and gluttonous priests, and for that cause to have received help at the hands of God. If their envy had not promoted it, without doubt I had deserved to be numbered amongst the most famous men. Notwithstanding my bones lie here in this hallowed place, even in despite of the pope.

Signed "John Zisca, a Bohemian, enemy to all wicked and covetous priests, but with a godly zeal."

And thus have you the acts and doings of this worthy Zisca, and other Bohemians, which for the more credit we have drawn out of Aeneas Sylvius, only his railing terms we have here suppressed.

All this while the emperor, with the whole power of the Germans, were not so busy on the one side, but Martin the pope was much occupied on the other side, who about the same time directed down a terrible bull, full of all poison, to all bishops and archbishops, against all such as took any part or side with Wickliff, John Huss, Jerome, or with their doctrine and opinions. The copy of which bull, which I found in an old written monument, I wish the reader thoroughly to peruse, wherein he shall see the pope to pour out at once all his poison.

"Martin, bishop, the servant of God's servants, to our reverend brethren the archbishops of Salzberg, Gueznun, and Prague, and to the bishops of Olumzen, Luthomuslen, Bamberg, Misnen, Patavien, Uratislavian, Ratisponen, Cracovian, Posnamen, and Nitrien, and also to our beloved children the inquisitors appointed of the prelates above recited, or where else soever, unto whom these present letters shall come, greeting, and apostolical benediction. Amongst all other pastoral cares wherewith we are oppressed, this chiefly and specially does enforce us, that heretics with their false doctrine and errors, being utterly expelled from amongst the company of christian men, and rooted out (so far as God will make us able to do), the right and catholic faith may remain sound and undisturbed; and that all christian people, immovable and inviolate, may stand and abide in the sincerity of the same faith, the whole veil of security being removed. But lately in divers places of the world, but especially in Bohemia, and the dukedom of Moravia, and in the straits adjoining thereunto, certain arch-heretics have risen and sprung up, not against one only, but against divers and sundry documents of the catholic faith, being land-lopers, schismatics, and seditious persons, fraught with devilish pride, and wolfish madness, deceived by the subtlety of Satan, and from one evil vanity brought to a worse. Who although they rose up and sprang in divers parts of the world, yet agreed they all in one, having their tails as it were knit together, to wit, John Wickliff of England, John Huss of Bohemia, and Jerome of Prague, of damnable memory, who draw with them no small number to miserable ruin and infidelity. For when as those and such like pestiferous persons did in the beginning of their poisoned doctrine obstinately sow and spread abroad perverse and false opinions, the prelates who had the government and the execution of the judicial power, like dumb dogs not able to bark, neither yet revenging speedily with the epistle all such disobedience, nor regarding to cast out of the Lord's house (as they were enjoined by the canons) those subtle and pestilent arch-heretics, and their wolfish fury and cruelty, with all expedition, but suffering their false and pernicious doctrine negligently, by their over-long delays, to grow and wax strong; a great multitude of people, instead of true doctrine, received those things, which they did long falsely, perniciously, and damnable sow among them, and giving credit unto them, fell from the right faith, and are entangled (the more pity) in the foul errors of paganism.

"Inasmuch, that these arch-heretics, and such as spring of them, have infected the catholic flock of Christ in divers climates of the world, and parts bordering upon the same, and have caused them to putrify in the filthy dunghill of their lies. Wherefore the general synod of Constance was compelled with St. Augustine to exclaim against so great and ruinous a plague of faithful men, and of the sound and true faith itself, saying, 'What shall the sovereign medicine of the church do, with motherly love seeking the health of her sheep, chafing as it were, amongst a company of men frantic, and having the disease of the lethargy? What, shall she desist and leave off her good purpose? No, not so. But rather let her, if there be no remedy, be sharp to both these sorts, which are the grievous enemies of her body. For the physician is sharp unto the man distracted and raging in his frenzy, and yet he is a father to his own rude and unmannerly son, in binding the one, in beating the other, by shewing therein his great love unto them both. But if they be negligent, and suffer them to perish,' saith St. Augustine, 'this mansuetude is rather to be supposed false cruelty.'

"And therefore the foresaid synod, to the glory of Almighty God, and preservation of his catholic faith, and augmenting of christian religion, and for the salvation of men's souls, hath corporally rejected and cast forth of the household of God, the foresaid John Wickliff, John Huss, and Jerome, who amongst other things did believe, preach, teach, and maintain, of the sacrament of the altar, and other sacraments of the church, and articles of the faith, contrary to that the holy church of Rome believeth, holdeth, preacheth, and teacheth, and have presumed obstinately to preach, teach, hold, and believe many other things, to the damnation of themselves and of others; and the said synod hath separated the same, as obstinate and malapert heretics from the communion of the faithful people, and hath declared them to be spiritually thrown forth. And many other things both wholesome and profitable hath the same council, as touching the premises, established and decreed, whereby they, which by the means of those arch-heretics, and by their false doctrine, have spiritually departed from the Lord's house, may by the canonical rules be reduced to the straight path of truth and verity.

"And moreover (as we to our great grief do hear) not only in the kingdom of Bohemia, and dukedom of Moravia, and other places above recited, but also in certain parts and provinces near adjoining and bordering upon the same, there be many other of the sectaries and followers of the foresaid arch-heretics and heretical opinions; casting behind their back as well the fear of God as the shame of the world, neither receiving fruit of conversion and repentance by the miserable destruction of the foresaid John Huss and Jerome, but as men drowned in the dungeon of their sins, cease not to blaspheme the Lord God, taking his name in vain (whose minds the father of lies hath damnably blinded), and do read and study the foresaid books or works, containing heresies and errors, being lately by the foresaid synod condemned to be burned; also to the peril of themselves and many other simple men, and against the statutes, decrees, and ordinances in the synod aforesaid, and the canonical sanctions, do presume to preach and teach the same, to the great peril of souls, and derogation of the catholic faith, and slander of many others besides, we therefore considering, that error, where it is not resisted, seemeth to be allowed and liked, and having a desire to resist such evil and pernicious errors, and utterly root them out from amongst the company of faithful christians, especially from the afore-recited places of Bohemia, Moravia, and other straits and islands joining and bordering upon the same, lest they should stretch out and enlarge their limits, we will and command your discretions by our letters apostolical, the holy council of Constance approving and allowing the same, that you that are archbishops, bishops, and other of the clergy, and every one of you by himself, or by any other or others, being grave and fit persons to have spiritual jurisdiction, do see that all and singular persons, of what dignity, office, pre-eminence, state, or condition soever they be, and by what name soever they are known, which shall presume otherwise to teach, preach, or observe, touching the most high and excellent, the most wholesome and superadmirable sacrament of the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, or else of the sacrament of baptism, confession of sins, penance for sins, and extreme unction, or else of any other sacraments of the church, and the articles of the faith, than that which the right holy and universal church of Rome doth hold, teach, preach, and observe; or else that shall presume obstinately by any ways or means, privily or openly, to hold, believe, and teach the articles, books, or doctrine of the foresaid arch-heretics, John Wickliff, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, being by the fore-said synod of Constance with their authors (as is said) damned and condemned, or dare presume publicly or privily to allow or commend in anywise the death and end of the said arch-heretics, or of any other their receivers, aiders, and favourers, in the favour or support of the foresaid errors, as also their believers and adherents; that then as before, you see and cause them, and every of them to be most severely punished, and that you judge and give sentence upon them as heretics, and that as arrant heretics you leave them to the secular court or power. Let the receivers also and favourers and defenders of such most pestiferous persons, notwithstanding they neither believe, favour, nor have devotion towards their errors, but haply shall receive or entertain such pestiferous persons because of earthly affection or friendly love, besides the punishment due unto them by both laws, over and above the same punishment by competent judges, be so afflicted, for such heinous acts of theirs, and with so severe pain and punishment excruciated, that the same may be to others in like case offending, an example of terror; that, at the least, those whom the fear of God by no means may revoke from such evil doing, yet the severity of this our discipline may force and constrain.

"As touching the third sort, which shall be any manner of ways infected with this damnable sect, and shall after competent admonition repent and amend themselves of such errors and sects aforesaid, and will return again into the lap and unity of our holy mother the church, and fully acknowledge and confess the catholic faith, towards them let the severity of justice, as the quality of the fact shall require, be somewhat tempered with a taste of mercy.

"And furthermore we will and command, that by this our authority apostolical ye exhort and admonish all the professors of the catholic faith, as emperors, kings, dukes, princes, marquises, earls, barons, knights, and other magistrates, rectors, consuls, proconsuls, shires, countries, and universities of the kingdoms, provinces, cities, towns, castles, villages, their lands and other places, and all other executing temporal jurisdiction, according to the form and exigence of the law, that they expel out of their kingdoms, provinces, cities, towns, castles, villages and lands, and other places, all and all manner of such heretics, according to the effect and tenor of the council of Lateran, beginning Sicut ait Ecclesia, &c., that those whom publicly and manifestly by the evidence of their deeds shall be known to be such as like sick and scabbed sheep infect the Lord's flock, they expel and banish till such time as from us, or you, or else other ecclesiastical judges or inquisitors, holding the faith and communion of the holy church of Rome, they shall receive other order and countermand; and that they suffer no such within their shires and circuits to preach or to keep either house or family, either yet to use any handicraft or occupations, or other trades of merchandise, or else to solace themselves any ways, or frequent the company of christian men.

"And furthermore, if such public and known heretics shall chance to die (although not so denounced by the church), yet in this so great a crime let him and them have no christian burial, and let no offerings or oblations be made for them nor received. His goods and substance also from the time of his death, according to the canonical sanctions being confiscate, let no such enjoy them to whom they appertain, till that by the ecclesiastical judges, having power and authority in this behalf, sentence upon that his or their crime of heresy be declared, and promulgated; and let such owners as be found suspected or noted with any such suspicion of heresy, before a competent and ecclesiastical judge, according to the consideration and exigence of that suspicion, and according to the quality of the person, by the arbitrement of such a judge, shew and declare his proper and own innocency with devotion, as becometh in that behalf. And if in his purgation, being canonically interdicted, he do fail, or be not able canonically to make his purgation, or that he refuse to take his oath by damnable obstinacy to make such purgation; then let him be condemned as an heretic. But such as through negligence or through slothfulness shall omit to shew their said innocency, and to make such purgation, let him be excommunicate, and so long put out from the company of christian men, till that they shall make condign satisfaction; so that if by the space of one whole year they shall remain in such excommunication, then let them as heretics be condemned.

"And further, if any shall be found culpable in any point of the aforesaid pestiferous doctrine of the arch-heretics aforesaid, or in any article thereof, whether it be by the report of the seditious, or else well-disposed; let them yet be punished according to the report of the canons. If only through infamy and suspicion of the aforesaid articles, or any of them, any man shall be suspected, and in his purgation canonical for this thing being interdicted, shall fail; let him be accounted as a man convicted, and as a convicted person by the canons let him be punished.

"And furthermore, we invoking and putting in execution the canon of our predecessor of happy memory, Pope Boniface VIII., which beginneth thus, Ut inquisitionis negotium, &c. In exhorting-wise require, and also command all temporal potentates, lords and judges before recited, by whatsoever dignities, offices and names they are known, that as they desire to be had, esteemed, and counted for the faithful members and children of the church, and do rejoice in the name of Christ, so likewise for defence of the same faith, they will obey, attend, give their aid and favourable help to you that are archbishops, bishops, and ecclesiastical men, inquisitors of all heretical pravity, and other judges and ecclesiastical persons by you hereunto, as aforesaid, appointed (holding the faith and communion of our holy mother the church) for the searching out, taking, and safe custody of all the aforesaid heretics, their believers, their favourers, their receivers, and their defenders, whensoever they shall be thereunto required.

"And that they bring and cause to be brought (all delay set apart) the aforesaid pestiferous persons so seeking to destroy others with them, into such safe keeping and prisons, as by you the archbishops, bishops, clergy and inquisitors aforesaid, are to be appointed, or else unto such other place or places, as either you or they shall command within any of their dominions, governments and rectories, where they by catholic men, that is, by you the archbishops, bishops, the clergy and inquisitors, or any other that shall be by you appointed, or are already appointed by any of you, may be holden and kept in safe keeping, putting them in fetters, shackles, bolts, and manacles of iron, under most straight custody for escaping away, till such time as all that business, which belongeth unto them, be by the judgment of the church finished and determined, and that of such heresy, by a competent ecclesiastical judge (which firmly holdeth the faith and communion of the aforesaid holy church of Rome) they be condemned.

"The residue let the aforesaid temporal lords, rectors, judges, or other their officers and pursuivants take amongst them with condign deaths, without any delay to punish. But fearing lest to the prejudice and slander of the aforesaid catholic faith and religion, through the pretext of ignorance, any man herein should be circumvented, or that any subtle and crafty men should under the veil of frivolous excuse, cloke and dissemble in this matter; and that as touching the convincing or apprehending of the aforesaid heretics, their receivers and defenders, favourers, believers, and adherents; and also of such as are suspected of heresy, and with such like perverse doctrine in any wise spotted, we might give more perfect instruction; therefore, as well to the kingdom of Bohemia, and parts near adjoining to the same, as all other where this superstitious doctrine began to spread, we have thought it good to send the articles hereunder written concerning the sect of those arch-heretics, for the better direction of the aforesaid catholic faith.

"Touching which articles, by virtue of holy obedience, we charge and command you and all other archbishops and bishops, all manner of commissaries and inquisitors, that every one of them within the diocese and limits of their jurisdiction; and also in the foresaid kingdom and dukedom, and places near adjoining, although the same places be beyond the same their jurisdiction, in the favour of the catholic faith, do give most diligent and vigilant care about the extirpation and correction of those errors, arch-heresies, and most pestiferous sect aforesaid; and also that they compel all defamed persons and suspected of so pestiferous a contagion, whether it be under the penalty of the crime confessed, or of excommunication, suspension, or interdict, or any other formidable pain canonical or legal, when and wheresoever it shall seem good unto them, and as the quality of the act requireth, by an oath corporally taken, either upon the holy Evangelists, or upon the relics of saints, or upon the image of the crucifix, according to the observances of certain places, and according to the interrogatories, to make convenient answer to every article therein written. For we intend against all and singular archbishops, bishops, ecclesiastical persons, or inquisitors which shall show themselves negligent and remiss in the extirpation of the leaven of this heretical pravity, and purging their territories, dioceses, and places to them appointed, of such evil and wicked men, to proceed and cause to be proceeded unto the deprivation and deposition of their pontifical dignities, and shall substitute such other in their places, which can and may be able to confound the said heretical pravity, and proceed to further pains against such by the laws limited, and to others yet more grievous, (if need require) we ourselves will proceed and cause to be proceeded, according as the party, his act, and filthiness of his crime committed, shall deserve. The tenor of those articles whereof we have made mention in this our own writing is in words as follow:—

The Articles of John Huss to be inquired upon.

1. There is one only universal church, which is the university of the predestinate, as shall after be declared.
2. The universal church is only one; and there is one university of those that are predestinate.
3. Paul was never a member of the devil, although he did certain acts like unto the acts of the church malignant.
4. The reprobate are not parts of the church, for that no part of the same finally falleth from her, because that the charity of predestination, which bindeth the same church together, never falleth.
5. The two natures (that is) the Divinity and the humanity, be one Christ.
6. The reprobate, although he be sometime in grace according to present justice, yet is he never a part of the holy church; and the predestinate is ever a member of the church, although sometime he fall from grace adventitia, but not from grace of predestination; ever taking the church for the convocation of the predestinate, whether they be in grace or not, according to present justice. And after this sort the church is an article of our belief.
7. Peter is not, nor never was the head of the holy catholic church.
8. Priests living viciously do defile the authority of priesthood, and so, as unfaithful children, do unfaithfully believe of the seven sacraments, of the keys of the church, of offices, of censures, of ceremonies, of the worshipping of relics, indulgences, orders, and other holy things of the church.
9. The papal dignity came and grew from the emperor; and his government and institution sprang from the emperor's government.
10. No man can reasonably affirm either of himself or other, that he is the head of any particular church, or that the bishop of Rome is head of the church of Rome.
11. A man ought not to believe that he who is bishop of Rome is the head of every particular church, unless God have predestinated him.
12. None is the vicar of Christ, or else of Peter, unless he follow him in manners and conditions, seeing that there is no other following more pertinent, nor otherwise apt to receive of God this power procuratory.

For unto the office of a vicegerent of Christ is required the conformity of manners, and the authority of the institutor.

13. The pope is not the manifest and true successor of Peter the prince of apostles, if he live in manners contrary to Peter; and if he hunt after avarice, then is he the vicar of Judas Iscariot. And likewise the cardinals be not the true and manifest successors of the college of the other apostles of Christ, unless they live according to the manner of the apostles, keeping the commandments and councils of our Lord Jesus Christ.

14. The doctors alleging that a man, who will not be amended by ecclesiastical censures, is to be delivered to the secular powers, do follow in this point the bishops, scribes and pharisees, that delivered Christ to the secular power, saying, it is not lawful for us to kill any man, because he would not obey them in all things; and that such be greater homicides than Pilate.

15. The ecclesiastical obedience is such an obedience as the priests of the church have found out, besides the express authority of the scripture. The immediate division of human works, is, that they be either virtuous or vicious: and if a man be vicious and doeth any thing, then he does it viciously; and if he be virtuous, and doeth any thing, then he does it virtuously. For like as vice, which is called a great offence or mortal sin, doth stain all the doings of a vicious man, so virtue doth quicken all the doings of a virtuous man.

16. A priest of God living after his law, and having a knowledge of the Scripture, and a desire to edify the people, ought to preach, notwithstanding any excommunication pretended of the pope. And further, if the pope, or any other magistrate, doth forbid a priest so disposed to preach, he ought not to be obedient unto him. For every one who taketh upon himself the order of priesthood, receiveth in charge the office of a preacher; and of that burden ought he well to discharge himself, any excommunication against him pretended in any wise notwithstanding.

17. By the censures ecclesiastical, as of excommunication, suspending and interdict, the clergy to their own advancement cause the lay people to aid them; they multiply their avarice, they defend their malice, and prepare the way to antichrist. And it is an evident sign that such censures proceed from antichrist, which in their process they call fulminations; that is, their thunderbolts wherewith the clergy principally proceedeth against those that declare the wickedness of antichrist, who so greatly for his own commodity hath abused them.

18. If the pope be evil, especially if he be a reprobate, then is he with Judas a very devil, a thief, and the son of perdition, and is not the head of the holy church militant, nor any member of the same.

19. The grace of predestination is the band wherewith the body of the church and every member of the same is indissolubly joined to their head Christ.

20. The pope or prelate that is evil and reprobate, is a pastor in name, and not in deed, yea he is a thief and a robber in very deed.

21. The pope ought not to be called the most holy one for his office sake, for then ought the king to be called by his office the most holy one; and the hangman, with other such officers also, were to be called holy; yea, the devil himself ought to be called holy, for as much as he is God's officer.

22. If the pope live contrary to Christ, although he climb up by the right and lawful election, according to the common custom of men; yet notwithstanding, should he otherwise climb than by Christ; yea, though we admit that he should enter by the election principally made by God. For Judas Iscariot was lawfully elect of God Christ Jesus to his bishoprick, and yet came not he the same way he ought to do unto the sheepfold.

23. The condemnation of the forty-five articles of John Wickliff made by the doctors is unreasonable, wicked, and nought, and the cause by them alleged is feigned—that is, that none of them are catholic, but every one of them heretical, erroneous, or slanderous.

24. Not for that the electors or the most part of them have consented together with lively voice, according to the custom of men upon the person of any, therefore that person is lawfully elect, or therefore is the true and manifest successor and vicar of Peter the Apostle, or of any other the apostles in the ecclesiastical office. Wherefore, whether the electors have either well or evil made their election, it behoveth us to believe the same by the works of him that is elected. For in that that every one that worketh more meritoriously to the profit of the church, he hath so much the more authority from God.

25. There is not so much as one spark of appearance, that there ought to be one head, ruling and governing the church in spiritual causes, which should always be conversant in the church militant; for Christ without any such monstrous heads, by his true disciples dispersed through the whole world, could better a great deal rule his church.

26. The apostles and faithful priests of God have right worthily, in all things necessary to salvation, governed the church before the pope's office took place, and so might they do again, by like possibility until Christ came to judgment, if the office should fail.

Let every one that is suspected in the foresaid articles, or else otherwise found with the assertion of them, be examined in manner and form as followeth:—

1. Whether he knew John Wickliff of England, John Huss of Bohemia, and Jerome of Prague, or any of them, and how he came by the knowledge of them; whether that during the lives of them, or any of them, they had been conversant with them, or found any friendship at their hands?

2. Whether he knowing them, or any of them, to be excommunicate, did willingly participate with them; esteeming and affirming the same their participation to be no sin?

3. Whether that after their deaths, he ever prayed for them, or any of them, openly or privily, doing any work of mercy for them, affirming them to be either saints, or else to be saved?

4. Whether he thought them, or any of them to be saints, or whether that ever he spake such words, and whether ever he did exhibit any worship to them as to saints?

5. Whether he believe, hold, and affirm, that every general council, as also the council of Constance, represents the universal church?

6. Whether he believes that that which the holy council of Constance, representing the universal church, hath and doth allow in the favour of the faith, and salvation of souls, is to be approved and allowed of all the faithful christians; and that whatsoever the same council hath condemned and doth condemn to be contrary both to faith and to all good men, is to be believed, holden, and affirmed for condemned, or not?

7. Whether he believes that the condemnations of John Huss, John Wickliff, and Jerome of Prague, made as well upon their persons as their books and doctrine, by the holy general council of Constance be rightly and justly made, and of every good Catholic man are so to be holden or affirmed or not?

8. Whether he believe, hold, and affirm, that John Wickliff of England, John Huss of Bohemia, and Jerome of Prague, were heretics or not, and for heretics to be nominated and preached, yea or not; and whether their books and doctrines were and be perverse or not; for the which, together with their pertinancy, they were condemned by the holy sacred council of Constance for heretics?

9. Whether he have in his custody any treatises, small works, epistles, or other writings in what language or tongue soever, set forth and translated by any of these heretics, John Wickliff, John Huss, and Jerome, or any other of their false disciples and followers, that he may deliver them to the ordinaries of that place, or his commissary, or to the inquisitors upon his oath? And if he say that he hath no such writing about him, but that they are in some other place, that then you swear him to bring the same before his ordinary, or other aforementioned, within a certain time to him prefixed.

10. Whether he knows any that has the treatises, works, epistles, or any other writings of the aforesaid John Wickliff, John Huss, and Jerome, in whatever tongue they are made or translated, and that he detect and manifest the same, for the purgation of their faith and execution of justice.

11. Especially let the learned be examined, whether he believes that the sentence of the holy council of Constance upon the forty-five articles of John Wickliff, and the thirty articles of John Huss be not Catholic; which saith that some of them are notorious and heretical, some erroneous, others blasphemous, some slanderous, some rash and seditious, some offensive to godly ears?

12. Whether he believes and affirms that in no case it is lawful for a man to swear?

13. Whether he believes that at the commandment of a judge or any other it is lawful to take an oath to tell the truth in any convenient cause, although it be but purging of infamy or not?

14. Whether he believes that perjury wittingly committed, upon what cause soever, whether it be for the safeguard of his own life, or of any other man's life, (yea although it be in the cause and defence of the faith), be a sin or not?

15. Whether a man contemning purposely the rites of the church, and the ceremonies of exorcism, of catechism, and the consecration of the water of baptism be in deadly sin or not?

16. Whether he believe, that after the consecration of the priest, in the sacrament of the altar, under the figure of bread and wine be no material bread and wine; but in all points the same very Christ which was crucified upon the cross, and sitteth upon the right hand of the father?

17. Whether he believe, that after the consecration made by the priest, under the only form of bread, and besides the form of wine, be the very flesh of Christ and his blood, his soul and his deity, and so whole Christ as he is; and in likewise, whether under the form of wine, without the form of bread, be the very flesh of Christ and his very blood, his soul and deity, and so whole Christ, and the same body absolutely under every one of those kinds severally?

18. Whether he doth believe, that the custom of administering to the lay people under the form of bread only, observed of the universal church, and allowed by the only council of Constance, be to be used, and not without the authority of the church at men's pleasures to be altered, and that they that obstinately affirm the contrary to this are to be punished as heretics, or not?

19. Whether he believe that those which contain the receiving of the sacraments of confirmation, or extreme unction; or else the solemnization of matrimony, commit deadly sin or not?

20. Whether he believe that a christian man, over and besides the contrition of heart, being licensed of a convenient priest, is bound to confess himself only to a priest, and not to any layman, be he never so devout or good, upon the necessity of salvation?

21. Whether he believe, that in cases before put, a priest may absolve a sinner confessing himself, and being contrite, from all sins, and enjoin him penance for the same?

22. Whether he believe, that an evil priest, with due manner and form, with the intention of doing, does verily consecrate, verily absolve, verily baptize, and verily dispose all other sacraments even as the church does?

23. Whether he believe that St. Peter was the vicar of Christ, having power to bind and loose upon the earth?

24. Whether he believe that the pope being canonically elect, which for the time shall be, by that name expressly be the successor of Peter or not, having supreme authority in the church of God?

25. Whether he believe, that the authority or jurisdiction of the pope, an archbishop or a bishop, in binding or loosing, be more than the authority of a simple priest or not, although he have charge of souls?

26. Whether he believe, that the pope may, upon a just and good cause give indulgences and remission of sins to all christian men, being verily contrite and confessed, especially to those that go on pilgrimage to holy places and good deeds?

27. Whether he believe, that by such grant the pilgrims that visit those churches, and give them any thing, may obtain remission of sins or not?

28. Whether he believe that all bishops may grant unto their subjects, according as the holy canons do limit, such indulgences, or not?

29. Whether he believe and affirm, that it is lawful for faithful christians to worship images and the relics of saints, or not?

30. Whether he believe that those religions, which the church hath allowed, were lawfully and reasonably brought in of the holy fathers, or not?

31. Whether he believe that the pope, or any other prelate for the time being, or their vicars, may excommunicate their subject ecclesiastical or secular for disobedience or contumacy, so that such an one is to be held and taken for excommunicated, or not?

32. Whether he believe, that for the disobedience and contumacy of persons excommunicated, increasing, the prelates or their vicars in spiritual things have power to aggravate and to re-aggravate, to put upon men the interdict, and to call for the secular arm; and that the same secular arm or power ought to be obedient to the censures, by their inferiors called for?

33. Whether he believe that the pope and other prelates, or else their vicars, have power in spiritual things to excommunicate priests and laymen that are stubborn and disobedient, from their office, benefice, or entrance into the church, and from the administration of the sacraments of the church, also to suspend them?

34. Whether he believe that it is lawful for ecclesiastical persons, without committing sin, to have any possessions and temporal goods; and whether he believe that it is not lawful for laymen to take away the same from them by their authority: but rather that such takers away and encroachers upon ecclesiastical goods are to be punished as committers of sacrilege, yea, although such ecclesiastical persons live naughtily that have such goods?

45. Whether any such taking away or encroaching upon any priest rashly or violently made, although the priest be an evil liver, be sacrilege, or not?

36. Whether he believe that it is lawful for the laity whether men or women, to preach the word of God, or not?

37. Whether he believe that it is lawful to all priests freely to preach the word of God wherever, whenever, and to whoever it shall please them, although they be not sent at all?

38. Whether he believe that all mortal sins, and especially such as be manifest and public, are to be corrected and to be extirpated, or not?

"Furthermore, we will, command, and decree, that if any by secret information, by you or any other to be received, shall be found either infamed or suspected of any kind of the pestiferous sect, heresy, and doctrine of the most pestilent men, John Wickliff, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, the arch-heretics aforesaid, or of favouring, receiving, or defending the aforesaid damned men whilst they lived on the earth, their false followers and disciples, or any that believeth their errors, or any that after their death pray for them or any of them, or that nominateth them to be amongst the number of catholic men, or that defendeth them to be placed amongst the number of the saints, either by their preaching, worshipping, or other ways, wherein they deserve to be suspected; that then they by you or some of you may be cited personally to appear before you or some of you, without either proctor or doctor to answer for them, an oath being openly taken by them as is aforesaid, to speak the plain and mere verity of the articles above written, and every of them, or other opportune, as case and circumstance shall require, according to your discretion, as you or any of you shall see expedient to proceed against them, or any of them, according to these presents, or otherwise canonically, as you shall think good.

"Also that you do publish solemnly, and cause to be published these present letters, omitting the articles and interrogatories herein contained, in the cities and other places of your diocese, where conveniently you may, under our authority, and there to denounce and cause to be denounced all and singular such heretics, with their abettors and favourers of their heresies and errors; of what sex or kind soever, that do hold and defend the said errors, or do participate any manner of way with heretics, privily or openly; of what state, dignity, or condition soever he or they be, patriarch, archbishop, king, queen, duke, or of what other dignity either ecclesiastical or secular he be; also with their advocates and procurators whosoever, which are believers, followers, favourers, defenders, or receivers of such heretics, or suspected to be believers, followers, favourers, defenders, or receivers of them, to be excommunicate every Sunday and festival day, in the presence of the people.

"Furthermore, that you diligently cause to be inquired, by the said our authority, upon all and singular such persons both men and women, that maintain, approve, defend, and teach such errors, or that be favourers, receivers and defenders of them, whether exempt or not exempt, of what dignity, state, pre-eminence, degree, order, or condition soever. And such as you shall find in the said your inquisition, either by their own confession, or by any other means to be defamed, or otherwise infected with the spot of such heresy or error, you through the sentence of excommunication, suspension, interdict, and privation of their dignities, parsonages, offices, or other benefices of the church, and fees which they hold of any church, monastery, and other ecclesiastical places, also of honours and secular dignities and degrees of sciences, or other faculties, as also by other pains and censures of the church, or by any ways and means whatsoever that shall seem to you expedient, by taking and imprisoning their bodies, and other corporal punishments wherewith heretics are punished, or are wont, and are commanded by canonical sanctions to be used; and if they be clerks, by degradation, do correct and punish, and cause them to be corrected and punished with all diligence.

"Furthermore, that you do rise up stoutly and courageously against such heretics, and the goods as well of them, as of the laymen, according to the canonical sanction made against heretics and their followers, under which we will and command them and their partakers to be subject. And also such persons as shall be infamed of the heresies or errors aforesaid, or any of the premises, shall be bound to purge themselves at your arbitration; but the others, who either by witnesses, or by their own confessions, or other allegations or probations, shall be convicted of the aforesaid heresies or articles, or of any the premises, they shall be compelled to revoke and abjure publicly and solemnly the said articles and errors, and to suffer condign penance and punishment, yea, even to perpetual imprisonment (if need be) for the same.

"And to the intent that they shall not nourish any kind of heresies hereafter, either in word, deed or gesture, or shall induce other either in word or deed, privily or openly, directly or indirectly to believe the same, they shall be forced to put in sufficient surety. Who, if it so chance that they will not publicly and solemnly renounce and abjure their articles and errors, and take at your hands condign penance, though it be to perpetual or temporal punishment according to your discretion, neither will be contented to put in sufficient surety that they will not hereafter hold or nourish these errors and heresies, neither will induce other by word or deed privily or openly, directly or indirectly, or by any other manner of colour to believe the same, that then you all proceed against them, according to the quality of their errors and demerits; yea, and if you see it so expedient, as against heretics, and as infected with heresy, by our authority, according to the canonical sanctions summarily, and simply and plainly, Sine strepitu et figura iudicii, and of office, all appellation or appellations whatsoever ceasing, and that you punish the same, according to the sanctions and traditions canonical, yea if need be, in leaving and committing them to the secular power; and against such as be superiors or learned doctors, laying the censures of ecclesiastical excommunication, all appellation set aside, also invoking, if need shall require, aid of the secular arm; the constitution as well of our predecessor Pope Boniface VIII. of blessed memory, wherein is decreed that no man without his city or diocese (except in certain cases) or in places being one day's journey distant from thence where he inhabiteth, shall be called into judgment, and that no man do presume to depute judges from the see apostolic, without the city and diocese where they are deputed to proceed against any; and do presume to commit their authority to any other person or persons, or to fetch and remove any man beyond one day's journey from out his diocese where he dwelleth, or at most two days' journey, if it be in a general council; as also all other constitutions of any bishop of Rome, touching as well judges delegate, as persons not be called to judgment beyond a certain number; or else any other edict, indulgence, privilege, or exemption general or special, granted from the apostolic see, for any person or persons not to be interdicted, suspended, or excommunicated, or cited up to judgment without the compass of certain limits, or else whatsoever thing otherwise may hinder, stop, or impeach your jurisdiction, power, and free proceeding herein by any means to the contrary notwithstanding. Given at Constance the first year of our popedom."

This bloody and abominable commission of Pope Martin, which I have copied out of a certain old monument, remaining in the hands of Master Hackluyt, student in the Temple, seems to be directed and given out to the public destruction of all faithful christian men, about the latter end and breaking up of the council of Constance, (A. D. 1418.) By the which the prudent reader may note and consider, what labour, what policy, what counsel, and what laws have been set, what ways have been taken, what severity has been shewed, how men's power, wit, and authority of the whole world have conspired together from time to time, continually by all manner of means to subvert and supplant the word and way of the Lord; and yet notwithstanding man has not prevailed, but all his force and devised policies hath been overthrown, dispatched, and with the counsel of Abithophel and Ammon, have been brought to nought, and contrary to the fury of the world, the gospel of Christ has still increased. Neither yet for all this will the pope cease to spurn and rebel still against the kingdom of Christ and his gospel, against which neither he, nor yet the gates of hell shall ever prevail. The Lord of hosts be merciful to his poor persecuted flock! Amen.

Against this pestilent bull and inquisition of Pope Martin the great antichrist, I thought good here to annex another contrary writing of the Bohemians, bearing the name and subscription of Procopius, Conrad, and other captains of the Bohemians; which seems to have been written not long after the death of Zisca, against the pestiferous see of Rome, the tenor whereof here followeth.

A fruitful and Christian Exhortation of the Bohemians to kings and princes, to stir them up to the zeal of the Gospel.

"May the Almighty God the Father, by his well-beloved Son Jesus Christ, and by his Holy Spirit, open the understanding both of you and of all christians, and lighten your hearts with the light of his doctrine of righteousness, and make you to continue therein surely established to the end. This we desire of you for your salvation, all ye honourable, wise, and honest noblemen, and all the commonalty, yea rich and poor, hear and consider with diligent heed the words of this present letter, which is sent unto you from the country of the Bohemians. It is manifest and well known to you and many other cities, kings, princes, and lords, that now for a certain number of years there hath been great discord betwixt us and you; and there have been some which have moved you by letters, and provoked you to make war against us, and to destroy us. And as well on your part as ours many men, as well noble as un noble, have foolishly lost their lives. Yet never hitherto have ye in any part understood our faith by our own confession, neither whether we be able to prove the same out of the scriptures, or not; and yet in the mean time kings, princes, lords, and cities, have sustained great damage. And hereof we greatly marvel that you do so much trust and believe the pope and his priests, which give you drink full of poison, and such comfort as no man can understand, in that they say that they will give you forgiveness of all your sins, and great grace and pardon, to this end that you should war upon us and destroy us; whereas their graces and pardons are none other than great lies, and a great seducing of the body and soul of all them that believe them, and put their trust in them. This we would prove to them, and convince them by the holy scripture; and we would suffer, that whoever is desirous to hear, the same should hear it. For the pope and all his priests herein deal with you as the devil would have done with our Lord Jesus Christ. Of whom Luke writes in his fourth chapter, that he brought him upon an high hill, and shewed unto him in the twinkling of an eye, all the kingdoms that are in the compass of the earth, and said unto him, 'I will give thee,' &c. So the devil deceiveth the pope, and all the priests, with the riches of the world, and worldly power; and they think they can give grace and pardon when they will; and they themselves shall never find favour before Almighty God, except they repent and make amends, because of their great deceiving of Christendom. And how can they give that to others, which they themselves have not? So did the devil, who was rich in promising, and poor in giving. And like as the devil is not ashamed to tell a lie, so all they are not ashamed to speak that which shall never be found true, nor be proved by the holy scriptures, because for no cause they stir up kings, princes, lords, and citizens, to make war against us, not to the end that the christian faith should thereby be defended, but because they fear that their secret vices and heresies shall be disclosed and made manifest. For if they had a true cause, and a godly love to the christian faith, they would then take the books of the holy scripture, and would come to us, and confute us with the weapons of God's word, and that is our chief desire. For so did the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, who came to the Pagans and Jews, and brought them from their infidelity to the true faith of our Lord Jesus Christ; and this they did in the spirit of meekness, as the apostle Paul writes in the sixth chapter of the Galatians, 'Brethren, if any man be grieved,' &c. So ought they also to do, if they perceived that they were just and we unjust. And if we would not abide instruction, then they might take to them kings, princes, lords, and imperial cities, and resist us according to the commandments of the holy scripture. But this is the subtle defence of all the bishops and priests, that they say that Master Huss and Jerome, which were burnt at Constance, were confuted by the holy father the pope, and by the whole council. For ye must understand that they were not overcome by the Holy Ghost, but unjustly, with wrongful violence, which God may yet hereafter grievously punish in all them that gave their counsel and aid thereto. And they say it ought not to be suffered, that we should be heard in confessing our faith. How may that be proved by the holy scripture, since Christ heard the devil, as it is written in the fourth chapter of Matthew? And they are not better than Christ, nor we worse than the devil. If they be just and have the truth with them (as they say they have) and we be unrighteous, why do they fear, since the truth ought not to be afraid of falsehood, as Esdras writeth in his second book, the third chapter? Zorobabel declareth that truth is of all things the most mighty, and overcometh all things. For Christ is the truth, John xiv. 'I am the way, the truth,' &c. And the devil is the father of lies, John viii. 'He is a liar from the beginning, and never abode in the truth, and there is no truth in him.' Therefore, if the pope and his priests have the truth, let them overcome us with the word of God. But if they have lies, then they cannot long abide in their presumption. Wherefore, we exhort and beseech all the imperial cities, all kings, princes, noblemen, rich and poor, for God's sake, and for his righteousness, that one of them write hereof to another, and that there may be some means made, how we may commune with you safely and friendly, at some such place as shall be fit both for you and us, and bring with you your bishops and teachers, and let them and our teachers fight together with the word of God, and let us hear them, and let not the one overcome the other by violence or false subtlety, but only by the word of God. And if your bishops and teachers have better proofs of their faith out of the holy scripture than we, and our faith be found untrue, we will receive penance and satisfaction, according to the gospel. But if your bishops and teachers be overcome of ours by the holy scripture, then do ye repent and hearken to us, and hold with us. And if your bishops and teachers will cease from their spiritual pride, and repent and make satisfaction; then we will help you according to our power, and will compel them, either to join with us, or else we will expel them out of Christendom. And if your bishops and teachers will say that it is not lawful for laymen to hear such reasoning, or to be present at it; that you may understand to tend to no other end, but that they fear they should be overcome and put to shame in the sight of you. For if they knew that they should overcome therein, out of doubt they would desire that every man should hear it, and thereby their glory should become the greater, and their fame and praises should be increased upon the earth. And if your bishops and teachers counsel you to come to no hearing with us, then do it whether they will or no, and suffer not yourselves at any time to be so foolishly seduced with their foolish pardons, but tarry at home in your houses with your wives and children. And let the pope of Rome come to us with all his cardinals and bishops, and with all his priests, with his own person and power, to war with us, and let themselves deserve the absolution of sins, grace and pardon, which they preach to you (for they have great need of forgiveness of sins, grace, and pardon,) and by the grace of God, we will give them pardon enough as they shall need. But their subtle excuse is this, they say that it belongs not to priests to fight with bodily weapons: and true it is that it belongs not to them; but it belongs as little to them to stir up, to counsel, and to fortify others thereto. For Paul saith in the first chapter of the Romans, and in the fifth of the Galatians, 'That all that do such things are worthy of everlasting death.'

"And if ye will not determine to do any other thing than to fight against us, then will we take the Lord to our help and his truth, and we will defend it to the death, and we will not be afraid for the excommunication or curse of the pope, or his cardinals, or of the bishops, because we know that the pope is not God, as he maketh himself, that he can curse and excommunicate when he will, or bless when he will; who has now these many years cursed and excommunicated us, and yet notwithstanding, God and his gracious blessing hath been our help. But peradventure ye will say, that though we see that bishops and priests be evil and wicked, yet we cannot do without them; for who should baptize our children, who should hear confessions, and minister the holy sacraments? and then also we should be within the excommunication of the pope, and of his bishops. Well-beloved, ye need to take no care for these matters. The excommunicating of the pope hurts you nothing. Fear ye the excommunicating of God, and the Lord will provide for those things well enough. If ye would banish evil bishops and priests, ye should have good priests who should baptize your children, hear confessions, and minister the holy mysteries, because when the devil is banished, then place is made for the Holy Ghost: so when ill bishops and priests shall be banished, then place shall be made for good priests and bishops. Also, your bishops and priests say, that we are miscreants and heretics, and that we believe not on purgatory, upon the Virgin Mary, nor upon the saints; wherein they say ill, for we will prove by the holy scripture, that we know better by God's grace how we ought to believe upon purgatory, and upon Mary the mother of our Lord, and upon his well-beloved saints, than they can tell us. Also they say, that we will not be obedient unto the pope. Truly when he shall become holy and just, then we know well that we ought to be obedient to him in all things, and not before. They say also, that we destroy God's holy service, in that we destroy monasteries, banishing thence the wicked monks and nuns. Truly we did it, thinking once that they were holy, that they did the reverend service of God; but after that we well perceived and considered their life and works, then we perceived that they were false lowly hypocrites, and wicked builders on high, and sellers of pardons and masses for the dead, and such as devoured in themselves the sins of the people. And whereas they said that they rise at midnight when other men sleep, and pray for the sins of the people: forasmuch as their selling of their prayers and masses for the dead for gifts, is no better than hypocrisy and lercasy; therefore, if we do speak against them and destroy their monasteries, we do not therein destroy the service of God, but rather the service of the devil, and the schools of heretics. And if ye knew them as we know them, ye would as diligently destroy them as we do. For Christ our Lord did not ordain any such order, and therefore it must needs come to pass that shortly it shall be destroyed, as our Lord said in the gospel of St. Matthew, chap. xv. Every plant which my Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up."

(Signed) Procopius, Smahors, Conrad, Samssmolich; captains of Bohemia.

Now to return to the wars of the Bohemians again. After Zisca was dead, there was great fear, sorrow, and lamentation in the army, the soldiers accusing fortune which gave over such an invincible captain to be overcome with death. Immediately there was a division in the host, the one part choosing Procopius Magnus to be their captain, the other part saying, that there was none could be found worthy to succeed Zisca, whereupon they choosing out certain to serve the wars, named themselves orphans.

Thus the Taborites being divided into two armies, the one part retained their old and accustomed name, and the other, by reason of the death of their captain, named themselves orphans. And although often there was dissension between them, yet whenever any foreign power came towards them, they joined their powers together in one camp, and defended themselves. They seldom went to any fenced towns, except it were to buy necessities, but lived with their wives and children in their camp and tents. They had amongst them many cars, which they used as a bulwark; for whenever they went unto battle, they made two wings of them, which closed in the footmen. The wings of the horsemen were on the outside, and when they saw their time to join battle, the waggon-men which led the wings, going forth to the emperor's standard, and compassing in such part of their enemies as they would, did close themselves in together, whereby the enemies being enclosed, so that they could not be rescued, they were partly by the footmen, and partly by the men that were in the cars, with their darts, slain. The horsemen fought without the fortification; and if it happened that they were oppressed, or put to flight, by and by the cars opening themselves, received them as it were into a fenced city; and by this means they got many victories, forasmuch as their enemies were ignorant of their policies.

These two armies went forth, the one into Silesia, and the other into Moravia, and returned again with great prey, before their enemies knew of their coming. After this they besieged the town of Swiella in Austria, where the Taborites and the Orphans during two nights, continually assailed the walls without ceasing; but Albert, duke of Austria, coming with his host to aid the citizens, they fought for the space of almost four hours, the valiantest warriors being slain on both parts. At length the battle was broken off, and the Taborites lost their cars, and Albert was put out of his camp and tents. Within a while after, Procopius Magnus came again and enclosed the city of Rhetium in Austria with a notable siege. They of Prague were in his army, and Boslaus Cygneus, of whom we spake before, was slain there with a dart, and the city of Rhetium was taken by force, sacked and burnt. The burgrave of Malderburg, lord of the town, was also taken and carried unto Prague, where also he died in prison.

These things being done, the emperor sent for the nobles of Bohemia, who went to him to a town of Hungary, called Posonium, in the borders of Austria, upon the banks of the river Danube; but they would not enter into the town, but remained without the town in their tents; whither, the emperor going out unto them, communed much with them, as touching his right and title, and the recovering of his father's kingdom, promising if there were any cause, which did alienate the Bohemians' minds from him, that he would take away all the occasion thereof: they made answer, that he had made war upon them without cause, and that he had suffered their countrymen, contrary to his promise, to be burnt at Constance not being heard, and the kingdom to be contumeliously interdicted, and the nobles of Bohemia to be condemned by the church of Rome as heretics; and that he should think the force and power of the Bohemians not to be so small, but that they would provide for their own honour. Whereto the emperor answered very gently, and offered them a general council, wherein they might declare their innocency, if they would submit themselves to the judgment of the universal church; but the Bohemians who were become valiant victors in arms, would not be overcome with words; and so nothing being finally concluded, the emperor returned home.

Then Pope Martin, perceiving the gospel to increase daily more and more, sent the cardinal of Winchester, an Englishman, born of a noble house, into Germany, to move them to war against the Bohemians. The emperor also assisted him.

There were three armies provided. In the first army were the dukes of Saxony, and the lower cities. The second army, which was gathered of the Franconians, was under the conduct of the marquis of Brandenburg. The third army was led by Otho, the archbishop of Treves, whom the Rhenenses, the Bavarians, and the imperial cities of Swevia followed. These armies entering into Bohemia in three several parts, after they were passed the wood, joined together and pitched before Mimsa. This town a certain learned and eloquent protestant, named Prichicho, the night before had won from the papists; wherefore the army was determined first to recover that city, before they would go any further. But when news came to the host, how the protestants had gathered an army, and came with all speed towards them, they fled before they saw their enemies, and went to Tacovia, leaving behind them their warlike engines with a great prey. The cardinal was not yet come to the camp, but meeting them in their flight at Tacovia, he marvelled at the cowardly flight of so many noble and valiant men, desiring them that they would turn again to their enemies, which, he said, were far weaker than they. Which thing, when he had long laboured about in vain, he was fain to be a companion with them in their flight. They were scarcely entered the wood, when the Bohemians coming upon them, set upon the rearward. Then was their flight much more disordered and fearful than before, neither did they leave flying before the Bohemians left following. Then all impediment or hindrance being taken away, they vanquished Tacovia; and having obtained great store of warlike engines, they destroyed Mimsa. And when they would have returned home by Franconia, they had great sums of money sent unto them, that they should not waste or destroy the countries of Bamberg and Noremburg; whereby the host of the Bohemians was greatly enriched.

Sigismund, the emperor, having news of these things, went straight unto Noremburg, and gathered there fresh aid and help. Also Pope Martin sent Julian, the cardinal of St. Angelo, into Germany, with his ambassage, to make war against the Bohemians, and that he should in the council of Basil, which would now shortly draw on, be president in the pope's name. He, entering into Germany, went straight to Noremburg to the emperor, where many of the nobles of Germany were assembled.

There was a new expedition decreed against the Bohemians, against the eighth of the kalends of July, and Frederick, marquis of Brandenburg, appointed general of that war, who should follow the cardinal. He entered into Bohemia by the way that leadeth unto Thopa, and Albert, prince of Austria, was appointed to bring his army through Moravia.

In this expedition were Albert and Christopher of Bavaria, and Frederick, dukes of Saxony, John and Albert princes of Brandenburg, with their father, who was general of those wars. Also the bishops of Hyperbolis, Bamberge, and Eysten. Also the company of the Swevians, which they called the company of St. George, and the magistrates of the imperial cities, the bishop of Mentz, Treves, and Cologne, sent their aids, and with them the chieftains of their provinces. It is said that the number of their horsemen were above forty thousand, but their footmen were not full so many, for the Germans for the most part fight their battles on horseback.

Also Rhenatus, prince of Lorraine, promised to come to these wars; but being hindered by his civil wars, forso much as he went about to vanquish the earl of Vandome, he could not keep his promise, and the county palatine of Rheine, who did aid and succour the earl of Vandome, could not go against the Bohemians. The cardinal, staying for them, deferred his journey until the kalends of August. In the meantime Albert, leading his army out of Austria, understanding that the cardinal was not present at the day appointed, and seeing himself unable to encounter with the Bohemian power, he returned back again. After this the cardinal entered into Bohemia with a huge army, and destroyed many of the protestants' towns, killing men, women, and children, sparing neither old nor young; notwithstanding this, his tyranny was exercised in the uttermost borders of Bohemia, for his captains feared to enter far into the land. The Bohemians, as soon as they had heard that their enemy was come, made ready and gathered their host with all speed, and laid siege to a tower called Stiltverge, and brought it under subjection.

In the meantime there fell such a marvellous sudden fear amongst the papists throughout the whole camp, that they began most shamefully to run away before any enemy came in sight. The cardinal Julian, marvelling at this most sudden fear, and what should move so great an army to flee, went about to the captains, exhorting them to put on armour, to order their battles, and courageously to abide their enemies, saying they did not fight for the glory of their kingdom, or for the possession of lands, but for their lives, honour, and religion of Christ, and for the salvation of souls. How ignominious a thing is it (said he) for the Germans to flee in battle, whose courage and valiantness all the world doth extol? It were much better to die, than to give place to any enemies before they were seen; for they can by no means live in safety within the walls, who give place unto their enemy in the field; for it is the weapon that defends a man and not the walls, and except they would even presently defend their liberty with the sword, they should shortly be in greater bondage, more miserable than any death. But this exhortation was all in vain, for fear had put away all boldness; for the ensigns were snatched up, and as though there had been no captain in the host, every man ran headlong away. No man regarded any commandment, neither once took his leave of his captain, but casting away their armour with speedy flight, they ran away, as though their enemy had been at their backs. The cardinal also, although it were against his will, was forced to do the like.

Thus the protestants, by the fear of their enemies, made the more bold and courageous, pursued them through the woods, and had a great prey and spoil of them. Notwithstanding, Albert, when he heard that the cardinal was entered into Bohemia, with all speed came again out of Austria with his army, and besieged the strong town of Prezorabia; but when he understood how the cardinal was fled, he left off his purpose, and returned through Moravia, which was not yet subject to him, and destroyed above fifty towns with fire and sword, took many of their cities by force, and spoiled them, committing great murder and slaughter, and so afflicted them that they took upon them his yoke, and promised to be subject and obedient to him under this condition, that as touching religion he would be bound to do that which the council of Basil should determine.

Then was there an ambassage sent out of Bohemia unto Basil, where Sigismund held the council, who, during the time of the wars had kept himself at Nuremberg. When he should take his journey unto Rome to be crowned emperor, he wrote letters unto the nobles of Bohemia, wherein was contained, how that he was a Bohemian born, and how he was not more attached to any nation than to his own, and that he went to Rome for none other cause but to be crowned, which honour should also be a renown to the Bohemians, to advance whom had been always his especial care.

Also, how that through his endeavour the council was begun at Basil, exhorting all such as were desirous to be heard as touching religion, that they should come thither, and that they would not maintain any quarrel contrary to the holy mother the church; that the council would lovingly and gently hear their reasons; that they should only endeavour themselves to agree with the synod as touching religion, and reserve and keep a quiet and peaceable kingdom for him, against his return: neither should the Bohemians think to refuse his government, whose brother, father, and uncle had reigned over them, and that he would reign over them, after no other mean or sort than other christian kings used to do.

The council of Basil also wrote their letter to the Bohemians, that they should send their ambassadors who should shew a reason of their faith, promising safe conduct to go and come, and free liberty to speak what they would. The Bohemians on this point, were of two opinions; for the protestants, and almost all the common people said, it was not good to go, alleging the examples of John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, who going unto Constance, under the safe conduct of the emperor, were there openly burned. But the nobility, following the mind of Maynard, prince of the new house, said, that they ought to go to the council, and that they are not to be suffered who had invented those new and strange opinions of faith, and new kind of religion, except they would render account of their doings and sayings before the universal church, and defend those things which they had openly taught before learned men. This opinion prevailed, and an ambassage of three hundred horse was sent to Basil. The chief whereof were William Cosca, a valiant knight, and Procopius, surnamed Magnus, a man of worthy fame for his manifold victories, John Rochezana, preacher of Prague, Nicholas Galecus, minister of the Taborites, and one Peter, an Englishman, of excellent, prompt and pregnant wit. The people came in great numbers out of the town, and many out of the synod and council, attending before the gates to see the coming of this valiant and famous people; others gathered together, in great numbers into the streets where they should pass through. The matrons, maids, and children filled the windows and houses to behold and see, and to marvel at their strange kind of apparel, and stout courageous countenances, saying, that it was not untrue which was reported of them: notwithstanding all men beheld Procopius, saying, this is he who has overthrown the papists in so many battles, who has subverted so many towns and slain so many men, whom both his enemies, and also his own soldiers do fear and reverence; also, that he was a bold, valiant, and invincible captain, who could not be overcome with any terror, labour, or travail.

These Bohemian ambassadors were gently received. The next day after, Cardinal Julian, sending for them to the council-house, made a gentle, long, and eloquent oration to them, exhorting them to unity and peace, saying, that the church was the spouse of our Saviour Christ, and the mother of all faithful, that it hath the keys of binding and losing, and also that it is white and fair, without spot or wrinkle, and cannot err in those points that are necessary to salvation, and that he who contemns the same church is to be counted as a profane heathen and publican, neither can this church be represented better by any means than in this council. He exhorts them also to receive the decrees of the council, and to give no less credit to the council than to the gospel, by whose authority the scriptures themselves are received and allowed. Also that the Bohemians, who call themselves the children of the church, ought to hear the voice of their mother, who is never unmindful of her children; how that now of late they have lived apart from their mother; although (said he) that is no new or strange thing, for there have been many in times past who have forsaken their mother, and yet seeking after salvation have returned to her again; that in the time of Noah's flood, as many as were without the ark perished; that the Lord's passover was to be eaten in one house; that there is no salvation to be sought for out of the church, and that this is the garden and famous fountain of water, whereof whosoever shall drink, shall not thirst everlastingly; that the Bohemians have done as they ought, in that they have sought the fountains of this water at the council, and have determined now at length to give ear unto their mother. Now all hatred ought to cease, all armour and weapon to be laid apart, and all occasion of war utterly to be rejected. For the fathers would lovingly and gently hear whatever they would say in their own cause or quarrel, requiring only that they would willingly receive and embrace the good counsels and determinations of the sacred synod; whereto not only the Bohemians, but also all other faithful christians, ought to consent and agree, if they will be partakers of eternal life.

This oration of the cardinal was heard and very well approved by the fathers. Whereto the Bohemians answered in a few words, that they neither had contemned the church nor the council; that the sentence given at Constance, against those who were unheard, doth diminish nothing of the christian religion; that the authority of the fathers hath always remained amongst them inviolate; and that whatever the Bohemians have taught, was confirmed by the scriptures and gospel; and that they are now come to manifest their innocency before the whole church, and to require open audience, where the laity may also be present. Their request was granted them; and being further demanded in what points they did disagree from the church of Rome, they propounded four articles.

First. They affirmed, that all such as would be saved, ought of necessity to receive the communion of the last supper under both kinds of bread and wine.

The second article. They affirmed all civil rule and dominion to be forbidden to the clergy by the law of God.

The third article. That the preaching of the word of God is free for all men, and in all places.

The fourth article. As touching open crimes and offences which are in nowise to be suffered for the avoiding of greater evil.

These were the only propositions which they propounded before the council in the name of the whole realm. Then another ambassador affirmed, that he had heard of the Bohemians very many things offensive to christian ears, amongst which this was one point, that they had preached that the invention of the order of begging friars was diabolical.

Then Procopius, rising up, said, "Nor is it untrue; for if neither Moses, neither before him the patriarchs, neither after him the prophets, neither in the new law Christ and his apostles did institute the order of begging friars, who does doubt but that it was an invention of the devil, and a work of darkness?"

This answer of Procopius was derided by them all. And cardinal Julian went about to prove, that not only the decrees of the patriarchs and prophets, and those things which Christ and his apostles had instituted, were of God, but also that all such decrees as the church should ordain, being guided through the Holy Ghost, be the works of God. Although, as he said, the order of begging friars might seem to be taken out of some part of the gospel.

The Bohemians chose out four divines who should declare their articles to be taken out of the scriptures. Likewise on the contrary part there were four appointed by the council. This disputation continued fifty days, where many things were alleged on either part, whereof, as place shall serve, more hereafter (by the grace of Christ) shall be said, when we come to the time of that council.

In the meantime, while the Bohemians were thus in long conflicts with Sigismund the emperor and the pope, fighting for their religion, to whom, notwithstanding all the fulness of the pope's power was bent against them, God of his goodness had given such noble victories, as is above expressed, and ever did prosper them so long as they could agree among themselves; as these things (I say) were doing in Bohemia, King Henry V. of England, fighting likewise in France, although for no like matter of religion, fell sick at Blois and died, after he had reigned nine years, five months, three weeks, and odd days from his coronation. This king in life, and in all his doings, was so devout and serviceable to the pope and his chaplains, that he was called by many the prince of priests, he left behind him a son being yet an infant, nine months and fifteen days of age, whom he had by Queen Katharine, daughter to the French king, who was married to him about two or three years before. The name of which prince, succeeding after his father, was Henry VI., left under the government and protection of his uncle, named Humphrey, duke of Gloucester.

BOOK VI.

PERTAINING TO

THE LAST THREE HUNDRED YEARS, FROM THE LOOSING OUT OF SATAN.

A PREFACE TO THE READER.

ACCORDING to the five different periods and states of the church, so have I divided hitherto the order of this present church history into five principal parts, every part containing three hundred years. So that now coming to the last three hundred years, that is, to the last times of the church, counting from the time of Wickliff: forasmuch as in the compass of the said last three hundred years are contained great troubles and perturbations of the church, with the marvellous reformation of the same through the wonderous operation of the Almighty; all which things cannot be comprehended in one book; I have therefore disposed the later three hundred years into several books, beginning now with the sixth book, at the reign of King Henry VI. In which book, beside the many and grievous persecutions raised up by antichrist, herein is also to be observed, that whereas it has of long time been received and thought of the common people, that this religion now generally used, has sprung up and risen but of late, even by the space (as many do think) of twenty or thirty years, it may now manifestly appear, not only by the acts and monuments heretofore passed, but also by the histories hereafter following, how this profession of Christ's religion has been spread abroad in England, of old and ancient time, not only for the space of these two hundred late years, from the time of Wickliff, but has continually from time to time sparkled abroad, although the flames thereof have never so perfectly burst out, as they have done within these hundred years and more; as by these histories here collected and gathered out of registers, especially of the diocese of Norwich, shall manifestly appear; wherein may be seen what men, and how many both men and women within the diocese of Norwich there have been, who have defended the same doctrine which now is received by us in the church. Which persons, although then they were not so strongly armed in their cause and quarrel as of late years they have been, yet were they warriors in Christ's church, and fought to their power in the same cause. And although they gave back through tyranny, yet judge thou the best, good reader, and refer the cause thereof to God, who reveals all things according to his determinate will and appointed time.

This young prince being under the age of one year, after the death of his father, succeeded to the throne and kingdom of England, (A. D. 1422), and in the eighth year was crowned at Westminster; and the second year after was crowned also at Paris, Henry, bishop of Winchester, cardinal, being present at them both, he reigned thirty-eight years, and then was deposed by Edward IV. as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared in his time. In the first year of his reign was burned the constant witness-bearer of Christ's doctrine, William Tailor, a priest, under Henry Chichesley, archbishop of Canterbury. Of this William Tailor I read, that in the days of Thomas Arundel he was first apprehended, and adjudged. Afterwards in the days of Henry Chichesley, about A.D. 1421, which was a year before his burning, William Tailor appeared again in the convocation before the archbishop, being brought by the bishop of Worcester, being complained of as having taught at Bristol, these articles following:

First, That whoever hangs any scripture about his neck, takes away the honour due only to God, and gives it to the devil.

Secondly, That no human person is to be worshipped, but only God is to be adored.

Thirdly, that the saints are not to be worshipped nor invoked.

Upon these articles William Tailor being examined, denied that he did preach or hold them in way of defending them, but only did commune and talk upon the same, especially upon the second and third articles, only in way of reasoning, and for argument sake. And to justify his opinion to be true in what he held, he brought out of his bosom a paper, wherein were contained certain articles, with the testimonies of the doctors alleged, and exhibited the same to the archbishop. Who then being bid to stand aside, the archbishop consulting together with the bishops and other prelates what was to be done in the matter delivered the writings to Master John Castle, and John Rikingle, the two vice-chancellors of Oxford, and Cambridge, and to John Langdon, monk of Canterbury, who, advising with themselves, and with other divines, about the articles and allegations, on the Monday following presented the articles of William Tailor to the archbishops and prelates, as erroneous and heretical. Upon which, William Tailor being called before them, in conclusion was contented to revoke the same, and for his penance was by them condemned to perpetual prison.

Notwithstanding, through favour, they were contented that he should be released from his incarceration, in case he would put in sufficient surety in the king's chancery, and swear that he shall never hold nor favour such opinions hereafter. And thus William Tailor, appointed to appear the next Wednesday at Lambeth, before the archbishop, to take his absolution from his long excommunication during the time from Thomas Arundel, appeared again before him, where he, laying aside his cloak, his cap, and stripped to his doublet, kneeled at the feet of the archbishop, who, then standing up, and having a rod in his hand, began the psalm Miserere, &c. His chaplains answering the second verse. After that was said, the collect, Deus cui proprium, &c. with certain other prayers. And so taking an oath of him, the archbishop committed him to the custody of the bishop of Worcester, to whom power and authority was permitted to release him upon those conditions. And thus was William Tailor for that time absolved, being enjoined notwithstanding to appear at the next convocation, whenever it should be, before the archbishop or his successor that should follow him.

In the meantime, while William Tailor was thus in the custody of the bishop of Worcester, there passed certain writings between him and one Thomas Smith, priest at Bristol, in the which writings William Tailor replied against Thomas, concerning the question of worshipping of saints. Upon the occasion of which reply, being brought to the hands of the bishop of Worcester, William Tailor began a new to be troubled, and was brought again before the public convocation of the clergy by the said bishop of Worcester, to answer unto his writings. This was the eleventh day of February, A. D. 1422. To which convocation William being presented, his writings were read to him; which he would not, nor could not, deny to be of his own hand-writing.

The tenor and effect of whose writing only tended to prove, that every petition and prayer for any supernatural gift ought to be directed to God alone, and to no creature. Although in his writing he did not utterly deny that it was lawful in any respect to pray to saints (and brings for the same Thomas Aquinas) but only in respect of that worship, which is called latría; and he seems little or nothing to differ from the superstition of the papists. And yet the writing, being delivered by the archbishop to the four orders of friars of London to be examined, was found erroneous and heretical in these points:—

1. That every prayer, which is a petition of some supernatural gift or free gift, is to be directed only to God.

2. That prayer is to be directed to God alone.

3. To pray to any creature is to commit idolatry.

4. Also, another opinion there was, much like to the other, to make up the fourth;—hereupon came down a writ from the king, directed to the lord mayor and sheriffs of London, De heretico comburendo, i. e. "the writ for burning a heretic," dated the first day of March, the first year of his reign. Upon which, William Tailor, condemned as a relapse, was first degraded, and then sentenced to be burned, and so was committed to the secular power, then being brought to Smithfield, the first day of March, with christian constancy, after long imprisonment, he there consummated his martyrdom, (A. D. 1422.)

The manner of his degrading was all one with the degrading of John Huss before, for the papists use but one form for all men. First, Degrading them from priesthood, by taking from them the chalice and patine. From deaconship, by taking from them the gospel-book and tunicle. From sub-deaconship, by taking from them the epistle-book and tunicle. From acolytship, by taking from them the cruet and candlestick. From an exorcist, by taking away the book of exorcisms or gradual. From the sextonship, by taking away the church-door-key and surplice. And likewise from benedict, in taking away the surplice, and first tonsure, &c. All which they in due order accomplished upon this godly martyr, before his burning.

John Florence, a turner, dwelling in Shelton, in the diocese of Norwich, was attached, because he held and taught these heresies here underwritten (as they called them) contrary to the determination of the church of Rome.

That the pope and cardinals have no power to make or constitute any laws.

That there is no day to be kept holy, but only the Sunday which God has hallowed.

That images are not to be worshipped, neither that the people ought to set up any lights before them in the churches, neither to go on pilgrimage, neither to offer for the dead.

That curates should not take the tithes of their parishioners, but that such tithes should be divided amongst the poor parishioners.

That all such as swear by their life or power, shall be damned, except they repent.

On the second of August, in the year 1424, John Florence personally appeared before William Bernam, chancellor to William, bishop of Norwich, where, being threatened by the judge, he acknowledged that he had erred, and submitted himself to the correction of the church, and abjured, taking an oath that from that time forward he would not hold, teach, preach or willingly defend any error or heresy contrary to the determination of the church of Rome, neither maintain, help, or aid any that shall teach or hold any such errors or heresies, either privily or publicly; and for his offence he was enjoined this penance following:—

That for three Sundays, in a solemn procession in the cathedral church of Norwich, he should be disciplined, i. e. have a rod or scourge laid on him before all the people. The same also should be done around his parish-church of Shelton, three other several Sundays, he being bare-headed, bare-footed, and bare-necked, after the manner of a public penitent, his body being covered with a canvass shirt, and canvass breeches, carrying in his hand a taper of a pound weight; and that done he was dismissed.

Richard Belward of Ersham, in the diocese of Norwich, was accused of holding and teaching these errors and opinions here under-written, contrary to the determination of the church of Rome.

That ecclesiastical ministers have no power to excommunicate. And that if a bishop excommunicate any man, God absolves him.

That he held the erroneous opinions that Sir John Oldcastle held when he was in prison, and affirmed that Sir John Oldcastle was a true catholic man, and falsely condemned and put to death without reasonable cause.

That such as go on pilgrimage, offering to images made of wood and stone, are excommunicated, because they ought to offer to the living, and not to the dead; and that the curates sell God upon Easter-day, when they receive offerings of such as communicate, before they minister the sacrament to them.

That he counselled women, that they should not offer in the church for the dead.

That the saints who are in heaven ought in no case to be prayed to, but God only.

The fifth day of July (A. D. 1424), Richard Belward was brought before John, bishop of Norwich, when articles were objected against him, which he there denied; therefore the bishop appointed him another day; upon which he appeared again before the bishop, and brought with him nine of his neighbours to purge him upon those articles, and there did solemnly purge himself. And afterwards, the bishop commanded him to swear upon the evangelists, That from that day forward he should not wittingly preach, teach, or defend any error or heresy, contrary to the church of Rome; neither aid, assist, favour, or maintain, privily or openly, any manner of person or persons, that should hold or maintain the said errors or heresies.

In like manner John Goddesel, of Ditchingham, was accused upon the same articles, and brought before the bishop, where he denying them, purged himself by his neighbours, as Richard Belward before had done, being sworn also in like manner as he was, and so was dismissed and set at liberty, until the year 1428, when he was again apprehended, accused, and abjured, as shall be more at large declared in the history when we come to that year. Sir Hugh Pic also, chaplain of Ludney, in the diocese of Norwich, was likewise accused and brought before the bishop of Norwich the fifth day of July, (A.D. 1424,) for holding these opinions following:—

That the people ought not to go on pilgrimage.

That the people ought not to give alms, but only to such as beg at their doors.

That the image of the cross and other images are not to be worshipped. And that the said Hugh had cast the cross of Bromehold into the fire to be burned, which he took from one John Welgate, of Ludney. Which articles being objected against him, he utterly denied; whereupon he had a day appointed to purge himself by the witness of three laymen and three priests. That so done, he was sworn as the other before, and was dismissed.

After this, (A.D. 1428,) King Henry VI. sent down most cruel letters of commission unto John Exeter and Jacolet Germain, keeper of the castle of Colchester, for the apprehending of Sir William White, priest; and others, suspected of heresies, the tenour whereof here ensues.

The Copy of the King's Letters directed to John Exeter and Jacolet Germain, keeper of the Castle of Colchester, for the apprehending of Sir William White, priest: and other (as they called them) Lollards.

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and of France, lord of Ireland, to his well-beloved John Exeter, and Jacolet Germain, keeper of the castle of Colchester, health:

"Ye shall understand that we, fully trusting unto your fidelity and circumspections, have appointed you jointly and severally to take and arrest William White, priest; and Thomas, late chaplain of Setling, in the county of Norfolk; and William Northampton, priest; and all others, whatsoever they be, that are suspected of heresy or Lollardy, wheresoever they may be found, within the liberties or without; and straightway being so taken, to send them unto our next gaol or prison, until such time as we shall have taken other order for their delivery: and therefore we straightly command you, that ye diligently attend about the premises, and fulfil the same in form aforesaid. Also we charge and command all and singular justices of peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and all other our faithful officers, by the tenour of these presents, That they do assist, aid, and counsel you and every of you, in the execution of the premises, as it shall be comely for them. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters patent to be made.

"Witness myself at Westminster, the sixth of July, the sixth of our reign."

By virtue of which commission we find in old monuments, that within a short time after, John Exeter, who was appointed one of the commissioners, attached six persons in the town of Bungay, in the diocese of Norwich, and committed them to be sent within ten days following, under safe custody, unto the castle of Norwich.

Besides these, we also find in the said old monuments within the diocese of Norfolk and Suffolk, specially in the towns of Beccles, Ersham, and Ludney, a great number both of men and women to have been vexed and cast into prison, and after their abjuration brought to open shame in churches and markets, by the bishop of the diocese, called William, and his chancellor William Bernham, John Exeter being the registrar; so that within the space of three or four years, that is, from the year 1428 to the year 1431, about the number of one hundred and twenty men and women were examined, and sustained great vexation for the profession of the christian faith, of whom some were only taken upon suspicion, for eating meats prohibited upon vigil days, who, upon their purgation made, escaped more easily away, and with less punishment.

Others were more cruelly handled, and some of them were put to death and burned, among whom we do specially find mention made of these three:—

Father Abraham of Colchester.

William White, priest.

John Waddon, priest.

A great number of good men and women, seventy-eight in all, were forced to abjure, sustaining such cruel penance as the bishop and his chancellor pleased to lay upon them.

These soldiers of Christ, being much beaten with the cares and troubles of those days, although they were constrained to relent and abjure, that is, to protest otherwise with their tongues than their hearts did think, partly through correction, and partly through infirmity (being as yet but new trained soldiers in God's field), yet for the good-will they bare to the truth, although with their tongues they durst not express it, we have thought good to mention them here; for this cause, either to stop the mouths of malignant adversaries, or to answer to their ignorance, who following rather blind prejudice, than the true knowledge of history, for lack of knowledge, blame what they know not, accusing the true doctrine of the word of God as a novelty, and carping at the teachers thereof as new made brethren. Who should understand by these histories, how this doctrine of the grace of God, lacking no antiquity, has from time to time continually sought to burst out, and in some places has prevailed, although in most places, through tyranny and the malice of men, Christ's proceedings have been suppressed and kept under from rising, so much as men's power and strength joined with craft and subtlety could labour to keep it down; as here by these good men of Norfolk and Suffolk may well appear. For if the knowledge and the goodness of those men had had the same liberty of time, with the help of the same authority, as we have now, and had not been restrained through the iniquity of the times and the tyranny of prelates, it had well appeared how old this doctrine would have been, which now they condemn and reject for its newness: neither needed Bonner to have asked of Thomas Hawks, and such others, where their church was forty years ago, inasmuch as for forty years ago, and more, within the country of Norfolk and Suffolk, was then found such plenty of persons of the same profession and the like doctrine which we now profess. And thus much for the number of these persons.

Now as touching their articles which they maintained and defended:

Concerning the articles, many of them either were falsely objected against them, or not truly reported, according to the common manner of these adversaries. The notaries reported them erroneously, either mistaking that which they said, or misunderstanding that which they meant, especially in these two articles concerning baptism and paying of tithes. For, when speaking against the ceremonial and superfluous traditions then used in baptism, as salt, oil, spittle, taper, light, chrismes, exorcising of the water, with such other, they accounted them as no material thing in the holy institution of baptism, the notaries slanderously depraving this assertion, to make it more odious to the ears of the people, so gave out the article, as if they held that the sacrament of baptism used in the church by water is but a light matter and of small effect.

Again, in speaking against women christening newborn infants in private houses, against the opinion of such as think children damned who depart before they come to their baptism, they are falsely reported, as if they said, that christian people are sufficiently baptized in the blood of Christ, and need no water, and that infants are sufficiently baptized, if their parents be baptized before them.

Moreover they thought, or said, perhaps, that in certain cases tithes might be withheld from wicked priests sometimes, and be conferred to better uses to the benefits of the poor: therefore they are falsely slandered, as saying and affirming, that no tithes were to be given to the ministers and curates of the churches.

And likewise for matrimony, wherein they are reported to hold and affirm, as if it consisted only in the mutual consent betwixt the man and the woman, needing no other solemnizing in the public church, and all because they denied it to be a sacrament. Other articles were objected against them, as these which hereafter follow:—

That auricular confession is not to be made to a priest, but to God only; because no priest has any power to absolve a sinner from his sin.

That no priest has power to make the body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar; but that, after the sacramental words, there remains pure material bread as before.

That every true christian man is a priest to God.

That no man is bound under pain of damnation to observe Lent, or any other days prohibited by the church of Rome.

That the pope is antichrist, and his prelates the disciples of antichrist, and the pope has no power to bind and loose upon earth.

That it is lawful for every christian to do any bodily work (sin only except) upon holy days.

That it is lawful for priests to have wives.

That excommunications and ecclesiastical censures given out by the prelates, are not to be regarded.

It is not lawful to swear in private cases.

That men ought not to go on pilgrimages.

That there is no honour to be given to the images of the crucifix, of our lady, or any other saint.

That the holy water, hallowed in the church by the priest, is not holier or of more virtue than other running or well-water, because the Lord blessed all waters in their first creation.

That the death of Thomas Becket was neither holy nor meritorious.

That the relics, as dead men's bones, ought not to be worshipped or digged out of their graves, or set up in shrines.

That prayers made in all places are acceptable unto God.

That men ought not to pray to any saint, but only to God.

That the bells and ringing in the church was ordained for no other purpose, but to fill the priests' purses.

That it is no sin to withstand the ecclesiastical precepts.

That the catholic church is only the congregation of elect.

These were the articles which were generally objected against them all, wherein they did so agree in one uniform faith, that whatever one held, all the others maintained and held the same. By which their consent and doctrine it appears, that they all received it of some one instructor, who was William White, who being a scholar and follower of John Wickliff, resorted afterwards into this country of Norfolk, and there instructed these men in the light of the gospel. Now it remains to speak of their troubles, how they were handled, beginning with William White.

William White, Priest.

This William White, being a follower of John Wickliff, and a priest, not after the common sort of priests, but rather reputed amongst the number of them, of whom the wise man speaketh, "He was as the morning star in the midst of a cloud," &c. This man was well-learned, upright, and a well-spoken priest. He gave over his priesthood and benefice, and took him a godly young woman to his wife, notwithstanding he did not therefore cease from his former office and duty, but continually laboured to the glory and praise of the spouse of Christ, by reading, writing, preaching. The principal points of his doctrine were these, which he was forced to recant at Canterbury.

That men should seek for the forgiveness of their sins only at the hands of God.

That the wicked living of the pope, and his holiness, is nothing else but a devilish estate and heavy yoke of antichrist, and therefore he is an enemy unto Christ's truth.

That men ought not to worship images, or other idolatrous paintings.

That men ought not to worship the holy men which are dead.

That the Romish church is the fig-tree which the Lord Christ hath accursed, because it hath brought forth no fruit of the true belief.

That such as wear cowls, or be anointed or shorn, are the lance-knights and soldiers of Lucifer; and that they all, because their lamps are not burning, shall be shut out when the Lord shall come.

Upon which articles he being attached at Canterbury under the archbishop Henry Chicheley, (A. D. 1424), there for a certain space, stoutly and manfully witnessed the truth which he had preached; but as there he lost his courage and strength, so afterwards he became again much stouter and stronger in Jesus Christ, and confessed his own error and offence. For after this, going into Norfolk with his wife, and there occupying himself busily in teaching and converting the people to the true doctrine of Christ, at the last, by the means of the king's letters sent down for that intent and purpose, he was apprehended and brought before William, bishop of Norwich, by whom he was convicted and condemned of thirty articles, and there was burned in Norwich, in the month of September, A. D. 1424.

This William White and his wife lived much with one Thomas Moon of Ludney. This man was of so devout and holy life, that all the people had him in great reverence, and desired him to pray for them; so that one Margaret Wright confessed, that if any saints were to be prayed to, she would rather pray to him than any other. When he was come to the stake, thinking to open his mouth to speak to the people, to exhort and confirm them in the truth, one of the bishop's servants struck him on the mouth, to force him to keep silence. And thus this good man, receiving the crown of martyrdom, ended this mortal life to the great sorrow and grief of all the good men of Norfolk. His wife, following her husband's footsteps according to her power, teaching and sowing abroad the same doctrine, confirmed many men in God's truth: she suffered much trouble and punishment the same year at the hands of the bishop.

About the same time also was burned Father Abraham of Colchester, and John Waddon, priest, for the like articles.

Concerning them which abjured, how and by whom they were examined, what depositions came in against them, and what was the order and manner of the penance enjoined them, here it might be set out at large; but for avoiding of prolixity, it shall be sufficient briefly to touch certain of the principals, whereby the better understanding may be given to the reader, after what manner and order all the other were entreated.

First, amongst those who were arrested and forced to abjure (A. D. 1428), were Thomas Pic, and John Mendham, who, being convicted upon the articles before-mentioned, were enjoined penance in their own parish church, as by the bishop's letter directed to the dean of Rhodenhall, and the parish priest of Aldborough, more at large appears.

The copy of the Bishop of Norwich's Letter.

William, by the sufferance of God, bishop of Norwich, to our well-beloved sons in Christ, the dean of Rhodenhall of our diocese, and to the parish priest of the parish church of Aldborough of the same our diocese, health, grace, and benediction. Forasmuch as we, according to our office, lawfully proceeding to the correction and amendment of the souls of Thomas Pie and John Mendham of Aldborough, of the diocese aforesaid, because they have held, believed and affirmed divers and many errors and heresies, contrary to the determination of the holy church of Rome, and the universal church and catholic faith, have enjoined the said Thomas and John, appearing before us personally, and confessing before us judicially that they have holden, believed, and affirmed divers and many errors and heresies, this penance hereunder written, for their offences to be done and fulfilled in manner, form, and time hereunder written, according as justice doth require, that is to say, six whippings, or disciplinings about the parish church of Aldborough aforesaid, before a solemn procession six several Sundays, and three disciplinings about the market-place of Herelstone, of our said diocese, three principal market days, bare neck, head, legs, and feet, their bodies being covered only with their shirts and breeches, each of them carrying a taper in his hand of a pound weight, as well round about the church, as about the market-place, in each of the aforesaid appointed days; which tapers, the last Sunday after the penance finished, we will that the said John and Thomas do humbly and devoutly offer unto the high altar of the parish church of Aldborough, at the time of the offertory of the high mass the same day, and that either of them, going about the market-place aforesaid, shall make four several pauses and stays, and at every of those same pauses humbly and devoutly receive at your hands three disciplinings. Therefore we straightly charge and command you, and either of you, jointly and severally by virtue of your obedience, that every Sunday and market-day, after the receipt of our present commandment, you do effectually admonish and bring forth the said Thomas Pie and John Mendham to begin and accomplish their said penance, and so successfully to finish the same in manner and form afore-appointed. But if they will not obey your admonitions, or, rather our commandments, in this behalf, and begin and finish their said penance effectually, you, or one of you, shall cite them peremptorily, that they, or either of them, appear before us, or our commissary, in the chapel of our palace at Norwich, the twelfth day after the citation so made, if it be a court day, or else the next court day following, to declare if they, or any of them, have any cause why they should not be excommunicated for their manifest offence in this behalf committed, according to the form and order of law, and further to receive such punishment as justice shall provide in that behalf. And what you have done in the premises, whether the said Thomas and John have obeyed your admonitions, and performed the same penance or no, we will that you, or one of you, which have received our said commandment for the execution thereof, do distinctly certify us between this and the last day of November next coming. Dated at our palace of Norwich, under our commissary's seal, the eighth day of October, A.D. 1428."

This, gentle reader, was for the most part, the order of their whole penance: however some were more cruelly handled; and after their penance they were banished out of the diocese, and others more straightly used by longer imprisonment, whereof we will briefly rehearse one or two for example.

John Beverly, alias Battild.

John Beverly alias Battild, a labourer, was attached by the vicar of Southcreke, the parish priest of Waterden, and a lawyer, and so delivered unto Master William Barnham the bishop's commissary, who sent him to the castle of Norwich there to be kept in irons: afterward being brought before the commissary, and having nothing proved against him, he took an oath, that every year afterward he should confess his sins once a year to his curate, and receive the sacrament at Easter, as other christians did; and for his offence was enjoined that the Friday and Saturday next after he should fast on bread and water, and upon the Saturday to be whipped from the palace of Norwich, going round about by Tomblands, and by St. Michael's church, by Cottlerew, and about the market, having in his hand a wax candle of twopence, to offer to the image of the Trinity after he had done his penance. And forasmuch as he confessed that he had eaten flesh upon Easter-day, and was not shriven in all Lent, nor received upon Easter-day, the judge enjoined him that he should fast Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday in Whitsun-week, having but one meal a day of fish and other white meats, and after this penance he should depart out of the diocese, and never come there any more.

John Skilley of Flixon, Miller.

John Skilley of Flixon, miller, being apprehended and brought before the bishop of Norwich, the fourteenth day of March, A.D. 1428, for holding and maintaining the articles above-written, was thereupon convicted and forced to abjure; and after this abjuration solemnly made, he had a most sharp sentence of penance pronounced against him; that forasmuch as he was convicted by his own confession, for holding and maintaining the articles before-written, and for receiving certain good and godly men into his house, as Sir William White, priest, and John Wadden, whom they called famous, notorious, and damnable heretics, and had now abjured the same, being first absolved from the sentence of excommunication which he had incurred by means of his opinions, he was enjoined for penance seven years' imprisonment in the monastery of Langly, in the diocese of Norwich. And as in times past he used upon the Fridays to eat flesh, he was enjoined to fast on bread and water every Friday, for the space of that seven years to come; and that for the space of two years next immediately after the seven years expired, every Wednesday in the beginning of Lent, and every Maundy Thursday, he should appear before the bishop, or his successor, or commissary for the time being, in the cathedral church of Norwich, together with the other penitents, to do open penance for his offences.

Besides these there were others of the same company, who in the same year were forced to similar abjuration and penance. And so to proceed to the next year following, which was A.D. 1429, there ensues a great number in the same register, who were examined, and did penance also to the number of sixteen or seventeen. In the number of whom was John Baker, otherwise called Usher Tonstal, who for having a book with the Lord's Prayer, the Ave and Creed in English, and for certain other articles of fasting, confession, and invocation, contrary to the determination of the Romish church, after much vexation, was caused to abjure and sustain such penance, as others before him had done.

The History of Margery Backster.

Another was Margery Backster, against whom one Joan, wife of Cliffand, was brought in by the bishop, and compelled to depose.

First, that the said Margery Backster did inform this deponent, that she should in no case swear, saying to her in English: "Dame, beware of the bee, for every bee will sting, and therefore take heed you swear not, neither by God, neither by our lady, neither by any other saint; and if ye do contrary, the bee will sting your tongue and venom your soul."

Also, this deponent being demanded by Margery, what she did every day at church; she answered, "That she kneeled down and said five Pater Nosters, in worship of the crucifix, and as many Ave Marias in worship of our lady." Whom Margery rebuked, saying, "You do evil to kneel or pray to such images in the churches, for God dwelleth not in such churches, neither shall come down out of heaven, and will give you no more reward for such prayer, than a candle lighted, and set under the cover of the font, will give light by night to those which are in the church." Saying, moreover, in English: "Ignorant workmen hew and form such crosses and images, and after that, ignorant painters gloss them with colours. And if you desire so much to see the true cross of Christ, I will shew it you at home in your own house." Which this deponent being desirous to see, Margery, stretching out her arms abroad, said to this deponent, "This is the true cross of Christ, and this cross thou oughtest and mayest every day behold and worship in thine own house, and therefore it is but vain to run to the church to worship dead crosses and images."

Also, this deponent being asked by Margery how she believed touching the sacrament of the altar, said, "That she believed the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, to be the very body of Christ in form of bread." To whom Margery said, "Your belief is wrong; for if every such sacrament were God, and the very body of Christ, there would be an infinite number of gods, because that a thousand priests and more do every day make a thousand such gods, and afterwards eat them. And therefore know for certainty, that by the grace of God it shall never be my God, because it is falsely and deceitfully ordained by the priests in the church, to induce the simple people to idolatry; for it is only material bread."

Moreover Margery said to this deponent, "That Thomas of Canterbury, whom the people called St. Thomas, was a false traitor, and damned in hell, because he injuriously endowed the churches with possessions, and raised up many heresies in the church, which seduce the simple people; and therefore if God be blessed, Thomas is accursed; and those false priests that say that he suffered his death patiently before the altar, do lie; for as a cowardly traitor he was slain in the church door, as he was flying away."

Moreover, this deponent saith, that Margery told her that the cursed pope, cardinals, archbishop, and bishops, and especially the bishop of Norwich and others that support and maintain heresies and idolatry, reigning and ruling over the people, shall shortly have the very same or worse mischief fall upon them, than that cursed man Thomas of Canterbury had. For they falsely and cursedly deceive the people, to extort money from the simple folk to sustain their pride, riot and idleness. And know assuredly that the vengeance of God will speedily come upon them, who have most cruelly slain the children of God, father Abraham, and William White, a true preacher of the law of God, and John Wadden, with many other godly men; which vengeance had come upon the said Caiaphas, the bishop of Norwich and his ministers, who are members of the devil, before this time, if the pope had not sent over these false pardons to those parties, which the said Caiaphas had falsely obtained, to induce the people to make procession for the state of them and of the church. Which pardons brought the simple people to cursed idolatry.

Also Margery said to this deponent, that every faithful man and woman is not bound to fast in Lent, or other days appointed for fasting by the church, and that every man may lawfully eat flesh and all other meats upon those days and times: and that it were better to eat the fragments left upon Thursday at night on the fasting days, than to go to the market to bring themselves in debt to buy fish: and that Pope Silvester made the Lent.

Also Margery said to this deponent, that William White was falsely condemned for an heretic, and that he was a good and holy man, and that he desired her to follow him to the place of execution, where she saw that when he would have opened his mouth to speak to the people to instruct them, but a devil, one of Bishop Caiaphas's servants, struck him on the lips, and stopped his mouth, that he could in no case declare the will of God.

This deponent saith, that Margery taught her that she should not go on pilgrimage, neither to our lady of Walsingham, nor to any other saint or place.

Also this deponent saith, that Margery desired her that she and Joan her maid would come secretly in the night to her chamber, and there she should hear her husband read the law of Christ to them; which law was written in a book that her husband was wont to read to her by night, and that her husband is well learned in the christian verity.

That Margery said to this deponent, that the people worshipped devils which fell from heaven with Lucifer, which devils in their fall to the earth, entered into the images which stand in the churches, and have long lurked and dwelled in them; so that the people, worshipping those images commit idolatry.

She said also to this deponent, that holy bread and holy water were but trifles of no effect or force, and that the bells are to be cast out of the church, and that they are excommunicated which first ordained them.

Moreover, that she should not be burned, although she were convicted of Lollardy, for that she had a charter of salvation in her body.

Also the said deponent saith, that Agnes Berthem her servant, being sent to the house of the said Margery the Saturday after Ash-Wednesday, the said Margery not being within, found a brass pot standing over the fire, with a piece of bacon and oatmeal seething in it, as the said Agnes reported to this deponent.

There were also, besides this deponent, others sworn and examined against the said Margery, as John Grimley and Agnes Berthem, servants to William Clifland, who altogether confirmed the former depositions.

Thus much we have thought good to note as concerning Margery Backster. But what became of her after this her accusation, because we find no mention made in the registers, we are not able to declare.

The same year also were the like depositions made by one William Wright against divers good men, as here followeth.

First, this deponent saith, that William Taylor told John Piry of Ludney, in the house of John Bungay of Beighton, in the presence of John Bungay, Robert Griggs, wright of Martham, and John Usher, that all the good men of Martham who were favourers and helpers to that good man William White, are evil troubled now-a-days, and that William White was a good and holy doctor; and that the best doctor after him was William Everden, who wrought with William Taylor of Ludney, for the space of one month, and that the first Sunday of the month, William Everden did sit all day upon the table at work, saying to William Taylor, that he would not go to church to shew himself a scribe or a pharisee; and the second Sunday he put on gentleman's apparel, and went to Norwich to hearken how the bishop and his ministers used the poor christians there in prison.

Also the said William Wright deposed, that William Taylor of Ludney was one of the sect, and went to London with Sir Hugh Pie, and had conversation oftentimes with Sir William White, having often conference upon the Lollards' doctrine.

Also that Anise, wife of Thomas Moon, is of the same sect, and favoured them, and receives them often, and also the daughter of Thomas Moon is partly of the same sect, and can read English.

Also that Richard Fletcher of Beckles is a most perfect doctor in that sect, and can very well and perfectly expound the holy scriptures, and has a book of the new law in English, which was Sir Hugh Pie's first.

Also that Nicholas Belward, son of John Belward, dwelling in the parish of Southelem, is one of the same sect, and has a new testament which he bought at London for four marks and forty pence, and taught the said William Wright and Margery his wife, and wrought with them continually by the space of one year, and studied diligently upon the New Testament.

That Thomas Gremmer, turner, of Dychingham, is perfect in that sect and law.

John Clark the younger, of Bergh, had the bedding and apparel of William Everden in his custody, after the return of William White from Bergh, and is of the same sect.

Also William Bate, tailor, of Sething, and his wife, and his son, who can read English very well, are of the same sect.

Also William Skirving of Sething, received Joan the wife of William White into his house, being brought thither by William Everden, after their departure from Martham.

Also William Osbourn of Sething, John Reve, glover, and Bawdwin Cooper of Beckles, are of the same sect.

Also John Pert, late servant of Thomas Moon, is of the same sect, and can read well, and did read in the presence of William White, and was the first that brought Sir Hugh Pie into the company of the Lollards, who assembled oftentimes together at the house of Thomas Moon, and there conferred upon their doctrine.

Also Sir Hugh Pie bequeathed to Alice, servant to William White, a New Testament, which they then called the book of the new law, and was in the custody of Oswald Godfrey of Colchester.

John Perker, mercer, of a village by Ipswich, is a famous doctor of that sect. Also he said, that father Abraham of Colchester is a good man.

Also the said William Wright deposes, that it is read in the prophecies amongst the Lollards, that the sect of the Lollards shall be in a manner destroyed; notwithstanding at length the Lollards shall prevail and have the victory against all their enemies.

Also he said that Tucke knows all of that sect in Suffolk, Norfolk, and Essex.

Besides these, there were many others the same year, whose names being before expressed in the table of Norfolk men, here for brevity's sake we omit to treat of, passing over to the next year, which was 1430. [Ex Regist. Norw.]

John Barrel, servant to Thomas Moon of Ludney, in the diocese of Norwich, was apprehended and arrested for heresy, the ninth day of September, in this year (A.D. 1430,) and examined by Mr. William Bernham, the bishop's commissary, upon the articles before mentioned, and others.

That the catholic church is the soul of every good christian man.

That no man is bound to fast in Lent or other fasting days appointed by the church, for they were not appointed by God, but ordained by the priests; and that every man may eat flesh or fish upon the same days indifferently, according to his own will, and every Friday in a free day to eat both flesh and fish indifferently.

That pilgrimage ought not to be made, but only to the poor.

That it is not lawful to swear, but in case of life and death.

That masses and prayers for the dead are but vain; for the souls of the dead are either in heaven or hell: and there is none other place of purgatory but this world. Upon which articles he being convicted, was forced to abjure, and suffered a similar penance as the others before had done.

Thomas Moon of Ludney was apprehended and attached for suspicion of heresy, against whom were objected by the bishop the articles before written, but especially this article, that he had familiarity and communication with several heretics, and had received, comforted, supported, and maintained several of them, as Sir William White, Sir Hugh Pie, Thomas Pet, and William Callis, priests, with many more; upon which articles he being convicted before the bishop was forced to abjure, and received the penance, in like manner as before.

In like manner, Robert Grigges of Martham was brought before the bishop the seventeenth day of February, in the year aforesaid, for holding and affirming the aforesaid articles, but especially these hereafter following.

That the sacrament of confirmation, ministered by the bishop did avail nothing to salvation.

That it was no sin to withstand the ordinances of the church of Rome.

That holy bread and holy water were but trifles, and that the bread and water were the worse for the conjurations and characters which the priests made over them.

Upon which articles he being convicted, was forced to abjure, and received penance in manner and form as the others had done before him.

The like also (though somewhat more sharp) happened unto John Finch of Colchester, the twentieth day of September, who although he was of the diocese of London, being suspected of heresy, was attached in Ipswich in the diocese of Norwich, and brought before the bishop there, before whom he being convicted of the articles, as all the others before him, was enjoined penance, three disciplinings in solemn procession about the cathedral church of Norwich, three several Sundays, and three disciplinings about the market-place of Norwich, three principal market-days, his head and neck and feet being bare, and his body covered only with a short shirt or vesture, having in his hand a taper of wax of a pound weight, which, the next Sunday after his penance, he should offer to the Trinity; and that for the space of three years after, every Ash-Wednesday and Maunday-Thursdays, he should appear in the cathedral church at Norwich, before the bishop or his vicegerent, to do open penance amongst the other penitentiaries for his offences.

About the same time, even the same year, 1430, shortly after the solemn coronation of King Henry VI., a certain man named Richard Hoveden, a wool-winder, and citizen of London, received the crown of martyrdom. Which man when he could by no persuasions be withdrawn or plucked back from the opinions of Wickliff, he was by the rulers of the church condemned for heresy: and as Fabian writes, burned hard by the Tower of London.

Nicholas, Canon of Eye.

Now to proceed in our account of the persecution of Norfolk and Suffolk, we find that in the year 1431, Nicolas, canon of Eye, was brought before the bishop of Norwich for suspicion of heresy, with witnesses sworn to depose against him, which witnesses appointed one William Christopher to speak, and he deposed as follows:

First, that on Easter-day, when all the parishioners went about the church of Eye solemnly in procession, as the manner was, this Nicolas Canon, as it were, mocking and deriding the other parishioners, went about the church the contrary way, and met the procession.

This article he confessed, and affirmed that he thought he did well in so doing.

Again, Nicolas asked of Master John Colman, of Eye, this question, "Master Colman, what think you of the sacrament of the altar?" Colman answered, "I think that the sacrament of the altar is very God, and very man, the very flesh and very blood of our Lord Jesus Christ under the form of bread and wine." To whom Nicolas in derision said, "Truly, if the sacrament of the altar be very God and very man, and the very body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, then very God and very man may be put in a small space; as when it is in the priest's mouth. And why may not we laymen as well eat flesh upon Fridays, and all other prohibited days, as the priest to eat the flesh and drink the blood of our Lord every day indifferently?" Nicolas thought he had spoken well in that matter.

Also, that on Corpus Christi day, at the elevation of high mass, when all the parishioners and strangers kneeled down, holding up their hands, and doing reverence to the sacrament, Nicolas went behind a pillar of the church, and turning his face from the high altar, mocked them that did reverence to the sacrament.

This article he also acknowledging affirmed that he believeth himself to do well in so doing.

Also, when his mother would have him to lift up his right hand, and cross himself from the crafts and assaults of the devil, when he deferred doing so, his mother took up his right hand, and crossed him, saying, "In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Amen;" and then Nicolas immediately deriding his mother's blessing, took up his right hand of his own accord, and blessed himself otherwise. This article Nicolas acknowledged to be true.

Also, that upon Allhallows-day, in the time of elevation of high mass, when many of the parishioners of Eye lighted many torches, and carried them up to the high altar, kneeling down there in reverence and honour of the sacrament, Nicolas carrying a torch went up to the high altar, and standing behind the priest's back, saying mass, at the time of the elevation stood upright upon his feet, turning his back to the priest, and his face toward the people, and would do no reverence to the sacrament. This article he acknowledged, affirming, that he thought he had done well in that behalf. All which articles the bishop's commissary caused to be copied out, word for word, and sent to Master William Worsted, prior of the cathedral church of Norwich, and to other doctors of divinity, that they might deliberate upon them, and shew their minds between that and Thursday next following. Upon which Thursday, Nicolas was again examined upon two other articles, that he doubted whether in the sacrament of the altar were the very body of Christ or no. This article he confessed before the commissary to be true.

Also, that he believed that a man ought not to confess his sins to a priest. This article he also confessed that he doubted upon.

Now remains to declare what these doctors concluded upon the articles; whose answer was this.

First of all, as to the first article, they said that the article in the terms as it was propounded, is not simply an heresy, but an error.

Also, as to the second article, the doctors agree as in the first.

Also, as to the third article, they affirm that it is an heresy.

To the fourth article, they answered as to the first and second.

Also, the doctors affirm the fifth article to be an heresy.

Also, as to the sixth article, the doctors conclude, that if the said Nicolas, being of perfect mind and remembrance, did doubt whether the sacrament of the altar were the very perfect body of Christ or no, then the article is simply an heresy.

Upon this, the commissary declared and pronounced Nicolas to be an heretic, and forced him to abjure; and enjoined Nicolas penance for his offences, three disciplinings about the cloister of the cathedral church of Norwich, before a solemn procession, bare-headed and bare-foot, carrying a taper of half-a-pound in his hand.

Thomas Bagley, priest.

I find in Fabian's chronicles, that in the same year (A. D. 1431), Thomas Bagley, a priest, vicar of Morden, beside Malden, being a valiant disciple, and adherent of Wickliff, was condemned by the bishops of heresy at London, about the midst of Lent, and was degraded and burned in Smithfield.

Paul Craw, a Bohemian.

The same year also, was Paul Craw, a Bohemian, taken at St. Andrews, by the bishop Henry, and delivered over to the secular power to be burnt, for holding opinions contrary to the church of Rome, touching the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the worshipping of saints, auricular confession, with other of Wickliff's opinions.

The History of Thomas Rhedon, a Frenchman, and a Carmelite Friar, burnt in Italy for the profession of Christ.

We have before declared how this cruel storm of persecution, which first began in England after it had long raged here against many good and godly men, brake out and passed into Bohemia, and after a short time, increasing by little and little, invaded Scotland, and now, with greater force and violence, this furious devouring flame entered Italy, and suffered not any part of the world to be free from the murder and slaughter of good and godly men. It happened about his time that one Thomas Rhedon, a Carmelite friar, came with the Venetian ambassadors into Italy. This man, although he was a Carmelite, yet understood the word of God, judging that God ought not to be worshipped neither in that mount, nor at Jerusalem only, but in spirit and truth. This man being a true Carmelite, prepared himself to go into Italy, trusting that he should find there, some by whose good life he might be edified and instructed. For where ought more abundance of virtue to be, than in that place which is counted to be the fountain of all religion? And how could it otherwise be, but that where so great holiness is professed, where all men's eyes are bent as upon a stage, where St. Peter's seat is, and which is thought to be the ruler and governor of all the church, all things should flourish and abound worthy of so great a place? This holy man, having these things before his eyes, forsook his own country, and went to Rome, conceiving a firm and sure hope that by the example of so many notable and worthy men, he should greatly profit in godliness and learning: but the success of the matter utterly frustrated his hope, for all things were clean contrary. Whatever he saw was nothing else but mere dissimulation and hypocrisy. Instead of heavenly gifts, there reigned among them the pomp and pride of the world: in place of godliness, riot: instead of learning and study, slothfulness and superstition. Tyranny and haughtiness of mind had possessed the place of apostolic simplicity: that now there remained no more any place or liberty for a man to learn that which he knew not, or to teach that which he perfectly understood. Finally, all things were reversed—all things happened contrary to his expectation. But nothing so much offended this good man's mind, as the intolerable ambition and pompous pride in them, whom an example of humility should especially commend and praise to the whole world. And, although he saw nothing which accorded with the rule of the apostles, yet these things so much passed all measure and patience, that he could by no means refrain his tongue in so much abuse and corruption of the church, seeing such ambitious pride in their buildings, apparel, in their palaces, in their dainty fare, in their great trains of servants, in their horse and armour, and finally in all things. Which things, so far as they differed from the prescribed rule of the gospel, so much the more was this good man forced to speak; although he well understood how little he should prevail by speaking: for if admonition would profit any thing at all, the books of Wickliff, and others were not wanting. The famous testimonies of John Huss, and of Jerome of Prague, and their blood shed for the same, was yet present before their eyes: at whose most effectual exhortations, they were so little corrected and amended, that they seemed twice more cruel than they were before. Yet all this could not terrify this good man. So by this means, he who came to be a scholar to others, was now forced to be their teacher: and he who determined to follow other men's lives and manners, had now, on the other hand, set before them his life to be marked and followed. For he lived so among them, that his life might be a rule to them all, and so taught, as he might also be their schoolmaster. For even as Paul had fore-shewn to such as desired to live godly in Christ, that they should suffer persecution, such reward happened to this man. He gave to them the fruit of godliness, which they should follow: they again set upon his head the diadem of martyrdom. He shewed them the way of salvation; and they for the benefit of life, rewarded him with death: and whereas no rewards had been worthy of his great labours and troubles, they with most extreme ignominy persecuted him even unto the fire. For when by continual preaching he had gotten great envy and hatred, the rulers began to consult together by what means they might circumvent this man's life. Here they had recourse to their accustomed remedies: for it was a peculiar and continual custom among the prelates of the church, that if any man did displease them, or that his talk was not according to their mind, or by any means hurtful, or a hindrance to their lucre and gain, by and by they frame out articles of some heresy, which they charge him withal. And like as every living thing has his peculiar and proper weapon to defend himself from harm, as nature hath armed the boar with his tusks, the hedgehog with his prickles, as the lion is feared for his claws, the dog for his biting, the bull fights with his horns, neither doth the ass lack his hoofs to strike withal; even so this is the only armour of the bishops, to strangle a man with heresy, if he once go about to mutter against their will and ambition; which thing may be easily perceived and seen in this most holy man, beside a great number of others. Who when he began to wax grievous unto them, and could no longer be suffered, what did they do? Straightways flew to their old devices, and as they had done with Huss, and Jerome of Prague, even so they went about to practise against this man. They overwhelm him with suspicion, they seek to entangle him with questions, they examine him in judgment, they compile articles against him, and lay heresy to his charge, they condemn him as an heretic, and being so condemned, they destroy and kill him! This was their godliness: this was the peaceable order of those Carmelites. Whose religion was to wear no sword nor shield, yet they bore in their hearts malice, rancour, vengeance, poison, craft, and deceit, sharper than any sword. With how great care and policy is it provided by law, that none of these clergymen should fight with sword in the streets? when in judgment and accusations there is no murderer who has more ready vengeance, or that does more vilely esteem his brother's soul than they. They shed no blood themselves, they strike not, nor kill, but they deliver them over to others to be slain! What difference is there I pray you, but that they are the authors, and the other are but the ministers of the cruel act? they kill no man as murderers do. How then? Although not after the same sort, yet they do it by other means.

The articles which they falsely gathered against this man, are affirmed by some to be these:—

That the church lacks reformation, and that it shall be punished and reformed.

That infidels, Jews, Turks, and Moors, shall be converted to Christ in the latter days.

That abominations are used at Rome.

That the unjust excommunication of the pope is not to be feared; and those which do not observe the same, do not sin or offend.

But yet there lacked a minister for these articles; however he could not long be wanting at Rome, where all things are to be sold, even men's souls. For this office and ministry there was no man thought more meet than William of Rouen, cardinal of St. Martin's in the mount, vice-chancellor of the court of Rome. Eugenius at that time was pope, who had a little before succeeded Pope Martin above mentioned. Before which Eugenius, this godly Rhedon the Frenchman was brought, and from thence sent unto prison. And again after his imprisonment, and divers and sundry grievous torments, he was brought before the judges. The wolf sat in judgment, the lamb was accused. Why? Because he had troubled the spring. But here need not many words. This good Thomas not being able to resist the malice of these mighty potentates, had offended enough, and was easily convicted and condemned to be burned, but not before he was deprived of all such degrees of priesthood as he had taken.

After the death of Pope Martin, who reigned fourteen years, Eugenius IV. succeeded, about the year A.D. 1431. Of whom Antonius thus writes, that he was much given to wars, as his conflicts and fighting with the Romans may declare; also the battles between the Venetians and the Florentines.

This pope began first to celebrate the council of Basil, which council Martin his predecessor had before intended to assemble, according to the direction of the council of Constance. Eugenius, however, perceiving afterward that this council of Basil would not favour him and his doings, and fearing some injury, afterwards laboured by all subtle practice to dissolve and interrupt the council, and to translate it first from Basil to Ferrara, then to Florence, nearer to his own see of Rome. Concerning which council of Basil, as we have begun here to make mention, it will be no great digression to discourse something more at large, so much as shall seem sufficient or necessary to be known.

THE ORDER AND MANNER OF THE COUNCIL OF BASIL,

With the principal matters concluded therein, briefly collected and abridged here in this present book.

In the thirty-ninth session of the council of Constance, it was decreed and provided concerning such general councils as should hereafter follow:—That the first that should ensue, should be assembled the fifth year after the council of Constance: that the second should be held the seventh year after that, and so all others to follow successively every tenth year. Wherefore, according to this decree, there followed a general council five years after the council of Constance, celebrated and held at Siene, under Pope Martin, A.D. 1424, but it soon broke up. After which council, the term of seven years being expired, another council was held at Basil, A.D. 1431, which council is noted to have been the most troublesome, and to have endured longer than any other council before celebrated and held in the church. This council continued almost the space of seventeen years, wherein it was concluded, as in the council of Constance, that the general councils were above the pope, and both of these two councils attributed to the general council the chief authority in decreeing, and determining, which is the reason that the opposite party derogate so much from the authority of this council.

When Pope Martin V. had appointed Julian cardinal and deacon of St. Angelo, his legate, to celebrate and hold a general council at Basil, for the reformation of the church, and rooting out of heresies, within a short space afterwards Pope Martin died. Eugenius IV. succeeded, and confirmed to Cardinal Julian the same authority which his predecessor had given him. To this council of Basil came the Emperor Sigismund, who during his life, with his presence and authority, protected and defended the synod. After the emperor's death, Pope Eugenius altering his mind and purpose, wished to remove the council to Bononia, and thus check the council of Basil. And first he held an opposition council at Ferrara, and afterwards at Florence. For, after the death of the Emperor Sigismund, there were no princes nor noblemen that had any care or regard for the council. Eugenius cited Cardinal Julian, and the fathers of the council, to Bononia, under a great penalty. They again cited the pope, that either he should come himself to the council, or send ambassadors under the like penalty. For this cause the ambassadors of Albert king of the Romans, and of the other princes of Germany, assembled together first at Nuremberg; and when they could determine nothing there, they assembled again at Frankfort to appease the dissension between the council and the pope: for it was thought that the electors of the empire could best assemble and meet in that place: in the meantime the emperor's ambassadors, and the ambassadors of the electors went to Basil, and having conference with the ambassadors of the other princes who were there, they earnestly exhorted the fathers of the council, that they would embrace the unity which they would offer. The request of the princes was, that the fathers would transport the council, and go unto another place; which was the very thing Pope Eugenius seemed always to seek and desire, that he might either divide the fathers of the council, or take away their liberty.

This sacred synod however, thought good neither to deny the princes' request, nor to grant what Pope Eugeius required. During this doubt, the emperor's ambassadors, the bishops of Patavia and Augusta, appointed a noble and valiant baron called Conrad Weinsperger, by the king's command to be protector and defender of the council and the fathers. By which the enemies perceived the emperor to be alienated from the pope, and the fathers of the council understood his good-will towards them, as he would not have sent them a protector if he had not judged it a lawful council; neither would he have judged it a council in Basil, if he had given credit to Pope Eugenius. But owing to a great pestilence which began to spread there, the assembly that should have been held at Frankfort was transported unto Mentz.

The assembly was very famous, for there were present the archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Treves, electors of the sacred empire, and all the ambassadors of the other electors. The archbishop of Cologne was the chief favourer of the council in this assembly, who with all his labour and diligence went about to bring the matter unto a good end. Rabanus, the archbishop of Treves, shewed himself somewhat more rough. The sacred synod also thought good to send their ambassadors, and appointed the patriarch of Aquileia, the bishop of Vicence, and the bishop of Argens; divines, John Segovius, and Thomas de Corcellis, with others. There was no man there present who would name himself the ambassador of Eugenius, although there were many of his favourers and friends, both from the council, and also out of Florence, who although they had sworn to the contrary, yet favoured Eugenius more than the council. But the chief Hercules of all the Eugenians was Nicolas Cusan, a man singularly well learned, and of great experience. After several consultations, the electors of the empire, and the ambassadors of the other princes of Germany, gave command throughout their whole nation and country, that the decrees of the council of Basil should be received and observed.

Whilst these things were thus debated at Mentz, there sprang a certain very doubtful question among the divines who remained at Basil, whether Eugenius might be called an heretic, who had so rebelliously contemned the commandments of the church. They gathered themselves together, disputing long among themselves, some affirming, and others holding the negative part. Upon this there arose three several opinions, some affirming that he was an heretic; others, not only an heretic, but also a relapse. The third sort would neither grant him to be an heretic nor a relapse. Among these divines, the chief and principal both in learning and authority, was the bishop of Ebrun, ambassador of the king of Castile, and a certain Scottish abbot, who, as two most valiant champions, subdued all their enemies, so that all the rest either consented to their arguments, or gave place to them, and so their determination took place, and Eugenius was pronounced both an heretic and relapse. Eight conclusions were there determined and allowed amongst the divines, which they called verities, a copy of which they published throughout all Christendom.

When the ambassadors of the council were returned from Mentz, by the commandment of the deputies, all the masters, and doctors, and clergy were called together, with all the other prelates, into the chapter of the great church, there openly to dispute and discuss Eugenius' heresy. This disputation continued six days, both forenoon and afternoon, among whom Cardinal Lewis, archbishop of Arelata, was appointed judge and arbiter, who, besides many other notable virtues, was both valiant and constant. Nicholas Amici, who was also a protector of the faith, a famous man among the divines of Paris, demanded of every man what their opinion was. John Deinlefist, public notary, wrote every man's sentence and judgment. The conclusions of the divines, which were the ground and foundation of their disputation, were these here following:—

1. It is a verity of the catholic faith, that the sacred general council hath power over the pope, or any other prelate.

2. The pope cannot by his own authority, either dissolve, transport, or prorogue the general council being lawfully congregated, without the whole consent of the council, and this is of like verity.

3. He who doth obstinately resist these verities, is to be counted an heretic.

4. Pope Eugenius IV. hath resisted these verities, when at the first, by the fulness of his apostolic power, he attempted to dissolve or to transport the council of Basil.

5. Eugenius being admonished by the sacred council, did recant the errors repugnant to these verities.

6. The dissolution or translation of the council, attempted the second time by Eugenius, is against the aforesaid verities, and containeth an inexcusable error touching the faith.

7. Eugenius, in going about to dissolve and transport the council again, is fallen into his before revoked errors.

8. Eugenius being warned by the synod that he should revoke the dissolution or translation the second time attempted, after that his contumacy was declared, persevering in his rebellion, and erecting a council at Ferraria, shewed himself thereby obstinate.

These were the conclusions which were read in the chapterhouse before the fathers of the council. Upon which, when they were desired to speak their minds, they all in a manner confirmed and allowed them. Archbishop Panormitan, however, disputed much against them. Also the bishop of Burgen, the king of Arragon's almoner. Yet they did not oppose the first three conclusions, but only those in which Pope Eugenius was touched. This Panormitan, as he was subtle, so did he subtly dispute against the late conclusions, endeavouring himself to declare that Eugenius was not relapsed, and he had great contention with the bishop of Argens, John Segovius, and Francis de Fure, divines.

The oration of Panormitan was more praised than allowed of men. Yet it wrought this effect, that afterwards this word "relapse" was taken out of the conclusions, and the word "prolapse" put in. Neither durst Panormitan himself altogether excuse Eugenius of heresy, but defended more the first dissolution than the second, yet he departed not without answer, for John Segovius, an expert divine, rising up, answered him reverently, as was comely for such a prelate.

Segovius could scarcely finish his oration without interruption; for Panormitan, often interrupting him, went to confute now this, and now that reason. Whereupon the bishop of Argens rising up, a man not only eloquent, but also of a stout courage, assailed Panormitan in his reasons and arguments, and put him from his purpose; so they proceeded so far, that they did not abstain from opprobrious taunts.

When the bishop of Argens chanced to say that the bishop of Rome ought to be the minister of the church, Panormitan could not suffer that: insomuch that he so forgot himself, and his knowledge (which otherwise was great) so failed him, that he was not ashamed to say that the pope was lord over the church. Segovius answered, "Mark (saith he) O Panormitan, what thou sayest; for this is the most honourable title of the bishop of Rome, wherein he calleth himself the 'servant of the servants of God.' Which is gathered upon this point, when as Christ said unto his disciples, when they demanded of him which of them was the greatest, you know he answered them, 'The princes of the Gentiles have rule and dominion over them, but amongst you it is not so,' &c. Wherein he utterly prohibits lordship and dominion; and Peter, who was the first vicar of Christ, said, 'Feed the flock of Christ which is committed unto you, providing for them not by compulsion, but willingly;' and immediately after he said, 'not as lords over God's heritage.' For if Christ, the Son of God, came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to serve, how then can his vicar have any dominion, or be called lord, as you Panormitan will affirm? the disciple is not above his Master, nor the servant above his Lord. And the Lord himself saith, ‘Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant.’” Panormitan, being somewhat disquieted with this answer, the council brake up and departed.

The next day there was a general congregation, and they returned all again to the chapterhouse after dinner, where the archbishop of Lyons, the king’s orator, being required to speak his mind, after he had proved Eugenius to be a heretic, he bitterly complained of those that had preferred such a man unto the papacy, and so moved all their hearts who were present, that they altogether with him bewailed the calamities of the universal church.

Then the bishop of Burgen, the ambassador of Spain, divided the conclusions into two parts; some he called general, and others personal, disputing very excellently as to the three first conclusions, affirming, that he did in no point doubt of them, but only, that the addition, which made mention of the faith, seemed to be doubtful to him. But upon this point he stayed much, to prove that the council was above the pope. Which, after he had sufficiently proved, both by God’s law and man’s law, he taught it also by physical reason, alleging Aristotle for witness. He said, “That in every well ordered kingdom it ought especially to be desired, that the whole realm should be of more authority than the king; which, if it happened otherwise, it should not be called a kingdom but a tyranny: so likewise he thinks of the church, that it ought to be of more authority than the prince thereof; that is to say, the pope.” His oration he uttered so eloquently, learned, and truly, that all men depended on him, and desired to have him continue his oration.

But when he entered into the other conclusions, he seemed to have forgotten himself, and to be no more the same man that he was; for neither was there the same eloquence in his words, neither gravity in oration, or cheerfulness of countenance; so that if he could have seen himself, he would peradventure greatly have marvelled at himself. Every man might well see and perceive then the power and force of the truth, which ministered matter to him, so long as he spake in the defence thereof. But when he began once to speak against her, she took away even his natural eloquence from him.

After this there were long and heated debates about the authority of councils, and about Pope Eugenius, and about the sessions of the council, and certain conclusions which were proposed, these discussions continued for many days; and it happened in them, even as in warlike affairs; for, as there, such as are most valiant and strong, and do most worthy feats, obtain most fame, as in the battle of Troy, Achilles, and Hector were the heroes: so in these spiritual wars and contentions, those who most excel in learning and eloquence, and do more than others, should be most renowned and named: for, on the one part, Panormitan was prince and captain; on the other, Arelatensis: and when all was finally determined, the protector also desired the sacred council, that none should be suffered to bring any weapon to the session which was to be held next day, as he was ready to enforce the safe conduct of the emperor; and, together with the senate of the city, to prohibit all quarrels that would lead to injury.

When the sixteenth day of May was come, all they whom the session pleased, assembled. The ambassadors also of the princes were come together into the quire of the church, to attempt further what they could do; and sending the bishop of Lubeck and Constance, and the dean of Tournon, an excellent learned man, they offered themselves to be present at the session, if the deposing of Pope Eugenius would be deferred four months. Who, when they had received a gentle answer of Arelatensis and the other principals, returning again to the ambassadors, they would only have the first conclusion decreed, and thereupon sent again to Arelatensis: answer was made, “That the chief force did consist in the two other conclusions, and that the council would specially determine upon them. If the ambassadors would not be present, they should understand, that the concord was broken by them, who would not observe what they had offered.” With which answer they departed, and the session began to be celebrated. There was no prelate of Aragon present at it, neither out of Spain, nor out of Italy, only the bishop of Grossetane, and the abbot of Dona, who, for their constancy and steadfast good will toward the universal church, could not be changed from their purpose: but of doctors and other inferiors, there were a great number of Aragon, and almost all the inferiors of Spain and Italy (for the inferiors feared not the princes, as the bishops did) and then the worthy stoutness of the Aragon and Castilians appeared in the inferior sort, who would not shrink away in the necessity of the church. Of the two other nations there were only present twenty bishops. The rest lurked in their lodgings, professing the faith in their hearts, but not in their mouths. Arelatensis seeing beforehand what would come to pass, caused prayers to be made, and after prayers to Almighty God, with tears and lamentation, that he would send them his Holy Spirit to aid and assist them, they were greatly comforted and encouraged. This congregation was famous, and although there were not many bishops present, yet all the seats were filled with the bishops, proctors, archdeacons, presidents, priors, priests, and doctors of both laws, which were about the number of four hundred or more: amongst whom there was no noise, no chiding, no opprobrious words or contention, but one exhorted another to the profession of the faith, and there appeared a full and whole consent of them all to defend the church. The bishop of Massilia, a nobleman, read the decree, which was attentively hearkened to, and not one word interrupted. When it was ended, “Te Deum laudamus” was sung with great joy and gladness, and so the session dissolved, which was in number the thirty-third session, and amongst all the preceding ones the most quiet and peaceable.

The day following, being the 22d of May, the prince’s ambassadors, against all men’s expectation, came to the general congregation, by so doing, at the least giving their assent to the session before passed. In celebrating which, if the fathers had erred, it had not been lawful for the princes and ambassadors to have held the council with those fathers. But it was thought that they were touched with remorse of conscience, and even now detested and abhorred what they had done; as it was not hidden to the ambassadors of the empire and France. For the bishop of Lubeck said, “That the cause of his absence was, that he was appointed by the emperor’s commandment to treat for a peace: wherefore it was not comely for him to be present at any business, whereby he should be vexed or troubled, with whom the peace should be treated.” Notwithstanding, he did much commend the session before held, and believed the decree therein promulgated to be most good and holy, and the verities therein contained to be undoubted; and said, “That he would stick thereto both now and ever, even to the death.” But the bishop of Tournon, a man both learned and eloquent, speaking for him and his fellows, said, “That he heard how they were evil spoken of, in that they had not honoured their king in that most sacred session, whom it becomes specially to exalt and defend the faith; who also for that cause above all other kings was named most christian, notwithstanding,” he said, “that they had a lawful excuse, in that it was convenient that they, who were sent to treat peace, should do nothing whereby their embassy should be stopped or hindered.”

After the bishop of Tournon had made an end, Cardinal Arelatensis gave thanks unto God, who had so defended his church, and after great storms and clouds had sent fair and clear weather; and commending the good will of the emperor and the king of France toward the church, he also praised the bishops of Lubeck, and Tournon, for that often in the council, and also of late at Mentz, they had defended the authority of the council. But especially he commended their present doings, that they had openly confessed the truth, and had not separated themselves from the faith of the church.

Afterward, entering into the declaration of the matter, he said, that he was at Pisa and at Constance, and never saw a more quiet or devout session than this; affirming that this decree was most necessary, to repress the ambition of the bishops of Rome, who exalting themselves above the universal church, thought it lawful to do all things after their own pleasure, and also affirming that no one man should transport the council from one place to another, as Eugenius attempted to do, now to Bononia, now to Florentia, then again to Bononia, after to Ferrara, and after that again to Florentia; and that hereafter the bishops should withdraw their minds from the carefulness of temporal goods; and therefore by how much this session was most holy and necessary, by so much more the assent of the ambassadors was most laudable and acceptable to all the fathers. These words thus spoken, he rose up, and the congregation was dissolved.

Now after Pope Eugenius was deposed from the bishopric of Rome, the principal fathers of the council, being called together in the chapter-house of the great church, consulted together, whether it were expedient that a new bishop should be created at once, or deferred for a time. Such as thought good that the election should be done with speed, shewed how dangerous a thing it was for such a congregation to be without a head; also what a pestiferous sickness was in all the city, which not only consumed young men and children, but also men of middle age, and old men in like manner; and that this plague came first by strangers to the poor of the city, and so infected the rich, and now was come to the fathers of the council; exaggerating and making the thing worse than it was. The other party which thought that there should be a delay, said, that the council wanted no head, for Christ was the head thereof; neither did lack a ruler, for it was governed by the presidents and other officers; and that no mention should be made of any pestilence in such case, seeing that to stout and strong men, death is not to be feared, neither can any thing daunt or fear them who contend for the christian faith. The matter being thus discussed amongst them, (although there were as many minds as there were men), yet it seemed to them all, that it was most profitable to choose the bishop by and by, but most honest to defer it.

Hereupon John Segovius, a man of excellent learning, said, "Most reverend fathers, I am drawn by various reasons, to this side and to that. But as I weigh the matter more deeply in my mind, this is my opinion, that to come to a speedy election seems good, to speak after man's judgment; but to delay it for two months, to speak after God's judgment, seems much better. I judge that not only the words, but also the meaning of our decree, ought to be observed. Wherefore, if ye will give any credit to me, follow rather dangerous honesty, than secure utility; although indeed utility cannot be discerned from honesty." This opinion of delay took place among the fathers, and they determined to stay for the space of two months.

In the mean time messengers were sent unto the princes, to declare the deposition of Eugenius by the synod, and publish it abroad.

During this time, the corrupt air was not at all purged, but the mortality daily increasing, many died and were sick. Whereupon a sudden fear came upon the fathers. Nor were they sufficiently advised what they ought to do; for they thought it not to be without danger, either to depart or tarry. However they thought it good to tarry, that since they had overcome famine, and the assaults of their enemies on earth, they would not seem to shrink for the persecution of any plague. When the dog-days were come, and that all herbs withered with heat, the pestilence daily increased more and more, that it is incredible how many died. It was horrible to see the corpses hourly carried through the streets, when on every side there was weeping, wailing and sighing. There was no house void of mourning; no mirth or laughter in any place, but matrons bewailing their husbands, and the husbands their wives. Men and women went through the streets, and durst not speak one to another. Some tarried at home, and others that went abroad, had perfumes to smell, to preserve them against the plague.

The common people died without number; and as in the cold autumn the leaves of the trees do fall, even so did the youths of the city consume and fall away. The violence of the disease was such, that you might have met a man merry in the street now, and within ten hours heard that he had been buried. The number of the dead corpses was such also, that they lacked place to bury them in; insomuch that all the church-yards were digged up, and filled with dead corpses, and great holes made in the parish churches, where a great number of corpses being thrust in together, they covered them over with earth. For which cause the fathers were so afraid, that there appeared no blood in their faces; and especially the sudden death of Lewis the prothonotary made all men afraid, for he was a strong man, and flourishing in age, and singularly learned in both laws, whom the same envious and raging sickness took away in a few hours. By and by, after died Lewis the patriarch of Aquileia, a man of great age, and brought up always in troubles and adversity, neither could he see the day of the pope's election which he had long wished for. However, he took partly a consolation, in that he had seen Eugenius deposed before his death. This man's death was regretted by all the fathers; for now they said, that two pillars of the council were decayed and overthrown, meaning the prothonotary and the patriarch, whereof the one by the law, and the other with his deeds, defended the verity of the council.

Likewise a great number of the registers and doctors died; and of such as fell into that disease, few or none escaped. One among all the rest, Æneas Sylvius, being stricken with this disease, by God's help escaped. This man lay three days even at the point of death, all men being in despair of him; notwithstanding it pleased God to grant him longer life. When the pestilence was most fervent and hot, and that daily there died about one hundred, there was great entreaty made to Cardinal Arelatensis, that he would go to some other town or village near hand; for these were the words of all his friends and household, "What do you, most reverend father? At the least avoid this wane of the moon and save yourself; who being safe, all we shall also be safe; if you die, we all perish. If the plague oppress you, unto whom shall we fly? Who shall rule us? Or who shall be the guide of this most faithful flock? The infection hath already invaded your chamber. Your secretary and chamberlain are already dead. Consider the great danger, and save both yourself and us." But neither the entreaty of his household, neither the corpses of those which were dead could move him, he being willing rather to preserve the council with peril of his life, than to save his life with peril of the council; for he knew, that if he should depart, few would have tarried behind, and that deceit would have been wrought in his absence.

Wherefore, as in war the soldiers fear no danger, when they see their captain in the midst of their enemies: so the fathers of the council were ashamed to fly from this pestilence, seeing their president to remain with them in the midst of all dangers. Which utterly subverted the opinion of them, who babbled abroad, that the fathers tarried in Basil, to seek their own profit and not the verity of the faith; for there is no commodity upon earth which men would change for their lives; for all such as serve the world, prefer it before all other things. But these our fathers, shewing themselves an invincible wall for the house of God, overcoming all difficulties, which this most cruel and pestiferous year brought upon them, at length all desire of life also being set apart, they overcame all dangers, and did not hesitate with most constant minds to defend the verity of the council, even to this present.

The time of the decree being passed, after the deposition of the pope, it seemed good to the fathers, to proceed to the election of another bishop. And first of all, they nominated those that together with the cardinals, should elect the pope. The first and principal of the electors, was the Cardinal Arelatensis, a man of invincible constancy, and incomparable wisdom; to whose virtue may justly be ascribed whatever was done in the council; for without him, the cardinals had not persevered in their purpose, neither could the shadow of any prince have so defended them. This man came not to the election by any favour or denomination, but by his own proper right. The rest of the electors were chosen out of the Italian, French, German, and Spanish nations, and their cells and chambers appointed to them by lots, without respect of dignity or person, and as the lots fell, so were they placed; whereby it chanced a doctor to have the highest place, and a bishop the last.

The next day after there was a session held; Marcus a famous divine, made an oration to the electors; he reckoned up the manifold crimes of Pope Eugenius, who was deposed. He endeavoured to persuade the electors to choose such a man, as should in all points be contrary to Eugenius, and eschew all his vices; that as he, through his manifold reproaches, was hurtful to all men, so he who should be chosen, should shew himself acceptable to all men.

There was so great a number of people gathered together to behold this matter, that neither in the church, nor in the streets, could any man pass. There was present, John earl of Dierstein, who supplied the place of the emperor's protector; also the senators of the city, with many other noblemen, to behold the same. The citizens were without in arms, to take care that there should be no uproar. The electors received the communion together, and afterwards they received their oath; and the Cardinal Arelatensis, opening the book of decrees, read the form of the oath in the audience of all men, and first of all, he taking the oath himself, began in this manner:

"Most reverend fathers, I promise, swear, and vow before my Lord Jesus Christ (whose most blessed body I unworthy sinner have received, unto whom in the last judgment, I shall give an account of all my deeds) that in this business of election, whereto now by the will of the council we are sent, I will seek nothing else, but only the salvation of the christian people, and the profit of the universal church. This shall be my whole care and study, that the authority of the general councils be not contemned, that the catholic faith be not impugned, and that the fathers who remain in the council be not oppressed. This will I seek for: this shall be my care; to this, with all my whole force and power, will I bend myself; neither will I respect any thing in this point, either for mine own cause, or for any friend, but only God, and the profit of the church. With this mind and intent, and with this heart, will I take mine oath before the council."

His words were lively and fearful. After him all the other electors in their order, did swear and take their oath: then they went with great solemnity unto the conclave, where they remained seven days. The manner of their election was in this sort. Before the cardinals' seat was set a desk, whereupon there stood a bason of silver, into the which bason all the electors did cast their schedules; which the cardinal receiving, read one by one, and four other of the electors wrote as he read them.

The tenor of the schedules was in this manner: "I George, bishop of Vicenza, do choose such a man, or such a man for bishop of Rome," and peradventure named one or two; every one of the electors subscribed his name to the schedule, that he might thereby know his own, and say nay, if it were contrary to that which was spoken; whereby all deceit was utterly excluded. The first scrutiny thus ended, it was found that there were many named to the papacy; yet none had sufficient voices, for that day there were seventeen of different nations nominated. Notwithstanding, Amedeus duke of Savoy, a man of singular virtue, surmounted them all; for in the first scrutiny he had the voice of sixteen electors, which judged him worthy to govern the church.

After this, there was a diligent inquisition had in the council touching those who were named of the electors, and as every man's opinion served him, he either praised or discommended those who were nominated. But there was such report made of Amedeus, that in the next scrutiny, which was held in the nones of November, Amedeus had twenty-one voices, and in the third and fourth scrutiny, twenty-one voices. And as there was none found in all the scrutiny to have two parts, all the other schedules were burnt. And as there lacked but only one voice to the election of the high bishop, they fell to prayer, desiring God that he would vouchsafe to direct their minds to an unity and concord, worthily to elect and choose him who should take the charge over the flock of God. As Amedeus seemed to be nearer unto the papacy than all others, there was great communication had among them, touching his life and disposition. Some said that a layman ought not so suddenly to be chosen; for it would seem a strange thing, for a secular prince to be called to the bishopric of Rome; which would also too much derogate from the ecclesiastical state, as though there were none therein meet or worthy for that dignity. Others said, That a man who was married and had children, was unmeet for such a charge. Others again affirmed, that the bishop of Rome ought to be a doctor of law, and an excellent learned man.

When these words were spoken, others rising up, spake far otherwise; that although Amedeus was no doctor, yet was he learned and wise, as all his whole youth he had bestowed in learning and study, and had sought not the name, but even the ground of learning. Then said another, "If ye be desirous to be instructed further of this prince's life, I pray you give ear to me, who know him thoroughly. Truly this man from his youth upward, and even from his young and tender years, has lived more religiously than secularly, being always obedient to his parents and masters, and being always indured with the fear of God, never given to any vanity or wantonness; neither has there at any time been any child of the house of Savoy, in whom has appeared greater wit or towardness; whereby all those who did behold and know this man, judged and foresaw some great matter in him; neither were they deceived. For if ye desire to know his rule and government, what and how noble it has been; first, know ye this, that this man has reigned since his father's decease, about forty years."

"During whose time, justice, the lady and queen of all other virtues, has always flourished: for he, hearing his subjects himself, would never suffer the poor to be oppressed, or the weak to be deceived. He was the defender of the fatherless, the advocate of the widows, and protector of the poor. There was no rapine or robbery in all his territory. The poor and rich lived all under one law, neither was he burthenous to his subjects, or importune against strangers throughout all his country; there were no grievous exactions of money throughout all his dominion. He thought himself rich enough, if the inhabitants of his dominions did abound and were rich; knowing that it was the point of a good shepherd to shear his sheep, and not to devour them. In this also was his chief study and care, that his subjects might live in peace, and such as bordered upon him, might have no occasion of grudge."

"By which policies he did not only quietly govern his father's dominions, but also augmented the same by others, who willingly submitted themselves unto him. He never made war upon any, but resisting against such as made war upon him, he studied rather to make peace than to seek any revenge, desiring rather to overcome his enemies with benefits, than with the sword. He married only one wife, who was a noble maiden, and of singular beauty and virtue. He would have all his family to live virtuously, and throughout all his house, honesty and integrity of manners was observed. When his wife had departed this life, and he perceived his duchy to be established, and that it would come without any controversy to his posterity, he declared his mind, which was always religious, and dedicated to God, and shewed what will and affection he had long borne in his heart. For he contemning the pomp and state of this world, calling to him his dear friends, departed and went into a wilderness; where building a goodly abbey, he addicted himself wholly to the service of God, and taking his cross upon him, followed Christ. In which place he being conversant by the space of many years, shewed forth great examples of holiness, wearing no other garments but such as could withstand the cold, neither using any kind of dainty fare, but only to resist hunger, watching and praying the most part of the night. Wherefore this prince is not newly come to the church (as some suppose) but being a christain, horn of progenitors, who have been christians a thousand years and more, doth now serve God in a monastery.

"But as to that which is spoken concerning a wife, I do not regard it; when not he only who has had a wife, but he also who has a wife may be elected and chosen pope. For why do the doctors dispute, whether a married man chosen pope, ought to continue to live with his wife, but only because a married man might be received and chosen? For as you know well enough, there were many popes that had wives; and Peter also was not without a wife. But what do we stand about this? For peradventure, it had been better that more priests had been married; for many would be saved through marriage, who are now damned through their single life. But hereof we will speak in another place. I pray you, choose this man. He will augment the faith, he will reform manners, and preserve the authority of the church. Have ye not heard these troubles of the church to have been before spoken of, and that the time now present should be an end of all troubles? Have ye not heard that about this time there should a pope be chosen which should comfort Zion, and set all things in peace? And who, I pray you, should he be that could fulfil these things except we choose this man? Believe me, these sayings must be fulfilled, and I trust that God will move your minds thereto. Notwithstanding, do whatever you shall think most good and holy."

When he had spoken these words, the greatest number of the electors seemed to consent to him, and his words took such effect, that in the next scrutiny the matter was finished and ended, and when the scrutiny was opened, it was found that Amedeus, the most devout duke of Savoy, according to the decree of the council, was chosen pope. Wherefore suddenly, there was great joy and gladness among them, and all men highly commended their doings. Then the Cardinal Arelatensis published the name of the elect bishop. After this all the prelates in their pontifical robes and mitres, and all the clergy of the city coming unto the conclave, the electors being likewise adorned, they brought him to the great church, where after great thanks given to God, and the election again declared to the people, a hymn being sung for joy, the congregation was dissolved.

This Amedeus was a man of reverend age, of comely stature, of grave and discreet behaviour; also before married. Who thus being elected pope about November, was called Felix V., and was crowned in the city of Basil, in the month of July. There was present at his coronation, Lewis, duke of Savoy; Philip, Earl Gebenensis; Lewis, marquis of Salutz; the marquis of Rotelen; Conrad of Winsperg, chamberlain of the empire; the earl of Dierstein; the ambassadors of the cities of Strasburgh, Berne, Friburgh, Solaturn, with a great multitude of others beside, to the number of fifty thousand persons. At this coronation, the pope's two sons served and ministered to their father. Lewis, cardinal of Hostia, set on his head the pontifical diadem, which was esteemed at thirty thousand crowns. It were too long here to recite the whole order and solemnity of the procession of the pope's riding about the city. First proceeded the pope under his canopy of cloth of gold, having on his head a triple crown, and blessing the people as he went. By him went the marquis of Rotelen and Conrad of Winsperg, leading his horse by the bridle. The procession finished, they went to dinner, which lasted four full hours, being excessively sumptuous; where the pope's two sons were butlers to his cup; the marquis of Salutz was the steward, &c.

Of this Felix, Volaterrane in his third book thus writes, that he being asked by certain of the ambassadors, if he had any dogs or hounds, to shew them; he desired them the next day to repair unto him, and he would shew them such as he had. When the ambassadors, according to the appointment were come, he shewed to them a great number of poor people and beggars sitting at his tables at meat, declaring that those were his hounds, which he every day used to feed, hunting with them (he trusted) for the glory of heaven to come.

And thus you have heard the state of this council hitherto, which council endured a long season, the space of seventeen years.

About the sixth year of the council, Sigismund the emperor died, leaving but one daughter to succeed him in his kingdoms, whom he had married to Albert, the second duke of Austria, who first succeeded in the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, a sore adversary to the Bohemians, and afterwards was made emperor, A. D. 1438, and reigned emperor but two years, leaving his wife, who was Sigismund's daughter, great with child. After which Albert, his brother Frederick, the third duke of Austria, succeeded in the empire, &c.

And having thus far proceeded in the matters of this council, until the election of Amedeus, called pope Felix V., before we prosecute the rest, order requires to intermix the matters concluded between this council and the Bohemians.

The Bohemians then were invited to Basil, where the council was appointed; and having, after much delay, and some treaty, procured a safe conduct from the council, from the princes, and from the city of Basil, they appeared by their ambassadors, and addressed the council.

Then Rochezanus made an oration, requiring to have a day appointed when they should be heard, which was appointed the sixteenth day of the same month. Upon which day John Rochezanus, having made his preface, began to propound the first article, touching the communion to be ministered under both kinds, and disputed upon the same for the space of three days always before noon. Then Wenceslaus, the Taborite, disputed upon the second article, touching the correction and punishing of sin, for the space of two days. After whom Ulderic, priest of the Orphans, propounded and disputed upon the third article, for the space of two days, touching the free preaching of the word of God.

Last of all, Peter Pain, an Englishman, disputed three days upon the fourth article, touching the civil dominion of the clergy, and afterward gave copies of their disputations in writing to the council, with hearty thanks that they were heard. The three last did somewhat inveigh against the council for condemning John Huss and John Wickliff for their doctrine. Whereupon John de Ragusio, a divine, rising up, desired that he might have leave to answer in his own name, to the first article of the Bohemians. The council consented, so that for the space of eight days in the forenoon, he disputed thereupon. But before he began to answer, John, the Abbot of Sistertia, made an oration to the Bohemians, that they should submit themselves to the determination of the holy church, which this council represents. This matter did not a little offend the Bohemians. John Ragusius, a divine, after scholars' fashion, in his answer spake often of heresies and heretics. Procopius could not suffer it, but rising up with an angry spirit, complained openly to the council of this injury. "This our countryman, (saith he,) does us great injury, calling us oftentimes heretics." Ragusius answered: "As I am your countryman both by tongue and nation, I do the more desire to reduce you again unto the church." It came almost to this point, that through this offence the Bohemians would depart from Basil, and could scarcely be appeased. Certain of the Bohemians would not hear Ragusius finish his disputation.

After him a famous divine, one Egidius Carlarinus, dean of the church of Cambray, answered to the second article, for the space of four days. To the third article answered one Henry, three days together. Last of all, one John Polomarius answered to the fourth article, likewise for the space of three days, so that the long time which they used in disputations seemed tedious to the Bohemians. Notwithstanding this answer, the Bohemians still defended their articles, and especially the first, inasmuch as John Rochezanus did strongly impugn Ragusinus's answer, for the space of six days. But as one disputation bred another, and it was perceived how that by this means no concord could be made; the Prince William, duke of Bavaria, protector of the council, attempted another remedy, that all disputations being set aside, the matter should be friendly debated.

There were certain appointed on either part to treat upon the concord, who coming together the eleventh day of March, those who were appointed for the council, were demanded to say their minds. "It seemed good," said they, "if these men would be united unto us, and be made one body with us, that this body might then accord, and declare and determine all manner of diversities of opinions and sects, what is to be believed or done in them."

The Bohemians, when they had a while paused, said, "This way seems not apt enough, except first of all the four articles were exactly discussed, so that either we should agree with them, or they with us: for otherwise it would be but a frivolous matter, if they being now united, again disagree in the deciding of the articles." Here answer was made to the Bohemians, "That if they were rightly united, and the aid of the Holy Ghost called for, they would not err in the deciding of the matter, as every christian ought to believe that determination, which, if they would do, it would breed a most firm and strong concord and amity on either part." But this answer satisfied them not, so that the other three rose up, and disputed against the answers which were given. At that time Cardinal Julian, president of the council, made this oration unto the Bohemian ambassadors.

"This sacred synod," said he, "has now for the space of ten days patiently heard the propositions of your four articles." And afterward he annexed, "You have propounded," saith he, "four articles, but we understand that, beside these four, you have many other strange doctrines, wherein ye dissent from us. Wherefore it is necessary, if a perfect unity and fraternity shall follow between us, that all these things be declared in the council, to the end that by the grace of the Holy Ghost, which is the author of peace and truth, due provision may be made therein. Wherefore we desire you, that you will certify us upon these and certain other points, what you do believe, or what credit you give to them. But we do not require, that you should now declare your reasons, but it shall satisfy us, if you will answer unto every article by this word: 'We believe or believe not.' Which if you will do (as we trust you will) then we shall perceive that you desire that we should conceive a good estimation of you. If there be any thing whereof you would be certified by us, ask it boldly, and we will give you an answer out of hand; for we are ready, according to the doctrine of St. Peter, to render account unto every man which shall require it, touching the faith which we hold." Hereto the Bohemian ambassadors answered in few words, "That they came only to propound those four articles, not in their own name, but in the name of the whole kingdom of Bohemia," and spake no more. Whereupon William, the noble protector of the council, calling upon four men on either part, treated touching the pacifying the matter, by whose advice the council decreed to send a famous ambassage with the Bohemian ambassadors, to Prague, where the people should assemble upon Sunday. But they would not receive these conditions of peace which were offered, but made haste to depart. Whereupon on the fourteenth day of April, there were ten chosen out of the council, to go with the Bohemian ambassadors unto Prague.

After the coming of those ambassadors, much contention began to rise between the parties. First began John Rochezanus, who speaking in the public person of the commonalty, laboured to commend and prefer the four verities of the Bohemians before propounded; charging also the prelates and priests for their slanderous and undeserved contumelies wherewith they did defame the noble kingdom of Bohemia, complaining also that they would not receive those christian verities, left and allowed by their king, Wenceslaus, now departed. Wherefore he required them in the behalf of the whole nation, that they would leave off hereafter to oppress them in such sort, that they would restore to them again their Joseph's vesture, that is, the ornament of their good fame and name, whereof their brethren, their enemies, had spoiled them, &c.

To this Polomar makes answer again, with a long and curious oration, exhorting them to peace and unity of the church, which, if they would embrace, all other obstacles and impediments (said he) should be soon removed, promising also, that this their vesture of honour and fame should be amply restored again; and afterward, if there were any doubtful matters, they might and should be the better discussed.

But all this pleased not the Bohemians, unless they might first have a declaration of their four articles, which, if they might obtain, they promised then to embrace peace and concord. Which peace (said they) began first to be broken by themselves, in that the council of Constance, by their unjust condemnation, burned John Huss, and Jerome of Prague; and also by their cruel bulls and censures, raised up first excommunication, then war against the whole kingdom of Bohemia.

When the ambassadors saw the matter could not otherwise be settled, they required to have those articles delivered to them in a certain form, which they sent to the council by three Bohemian ambassadors.

Afterward the council sent a declaration into Bohemia, to be published by the ambassadors, which were commanded to report unto the Bohemians, in the name of the council, that if they would receive the declaration of those three articles, and the unity of the church, there should be a means found whereby the matter touching the fourth article, of the communion under both kinds, should be passed with peace and quietness.

After the Bohemians had taken deliberation, they said, "That they would give no answer before they understood what should be offered them as touching the communion." Wherefore, it was necessary to declare the matter, as it was written in form following:—

"In the name of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, upon the sacrament of whose most blessed last supper we shall treat, that he who hath instituted this most blessed sacrament of unity and peace, will vouchsafe to work this effect in us, and to make us that we may be one in the Lord Jesus our Head, and that he will subvert all the subtleties of the devil, who, through his envious craftiness hath made the sacrament of peace and unity, an occasion of war and discord; that, while christians do contend, touching the manner of communicating, they be not deprived of the fruit of communion. This was thought good above all things to be premised, that the general custom of the church, which your fathers and you also in times past have observed, hath a long time had and still useth, that they who do not consecrate, communicate only under the kind of bread. Which custom being lawfully brought in by the church and holy fathers, and now a long time observed, it is not lawful to reject, or to change at your will and pleasure, without the authority of the church. Therefore, to change the custom of the church, and to take in hand to communicate unto the people under both kinds, without the authority of holy church, is altogether unlawful. For holy church, upon reasonable occasions, may grant liberty unto the people to communicate under both kinds. And every communion, which, being attempted without the authority and license of the church, should be unlawful; when it is done with the authority of holy church, shall be lawful, if other things prevent it not; because, as the apostle saith, 'He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation.'

Moreover, doctors do say, that the custom of communicating to the people, only under the kind of bread, was reasonably introduced by the church and holy fathers, for reasonable causes, specially for the avoiding of two perils—of error and irreverence. Of error, as to think that the one part of Christ's body were in the bread, and the other part in the cup, which were a great error. Of irreverence, as many things may happen, as well on the part of the minister, as on the part of the receiver: as it is said, that it happened when a certain priest carried the sacrament of the cup unto a sick man, when he should have ministered, he found nothing in the cup, being all spilt by the way, with many other such like chances. We have heard, moreover, that it hath often happened that the sacrament consecrated in the cup has not been sufficient for the number of communicants, whereby a new consecration must be made, which is not agreeable to the doctrine of the holy fathers, and also that oftentimes they minister wine unconsecrated for consecrated wine, which is a great peril. By this means, when it shall be brought to pass, that if you will effectually receive the unity and peace of the church in all other things besides the use of the communion under both kinds, conforming yourselves to the faith and order of the universal church, you that have that use and custom shall communicate still by the authority of the church under both kinds, and this article shall be discussed fully in the sacred council, where you shall see what as touching this article, is to be holden as a universal verity, and is to be done for the profit and salvation of the christian people, and all things being thus thoroughly handled, then if you persevere in your desire, and that your ambassadors do require it, the sacred council will grant licence in the Lord to your ministers, to communicate to the people under both kinds, that is to say, to such as be of lawful years and discretion, and shall reverently and devoutly require the same; this always observed, that the ministers shall say to those who shall communicate, that they ought firmly to believe, 'not the flesh only to be contained under the form of bread, and the blood only under the wine, but under each kind to be whole and perfect Christ.'

Thus, hitherto we have declared the decree of the council. As to the other questions, a concord and unity was concluded and confirmed by setting to their hands. The Bohemians promised to receive the peace and unity of the church, and the declaration of the three articles. This was done in the year 1438.

At the last the concord was confirmed by writing with their seals at Ingavia, a city of Moravia, the fifth day of July, in the presence of the emperor.

Certain petitions which the Bohemians put up last of all in the sacred council of Basil, A. D. 1438, in the month of November.

"To the most reverend fathers in Christ, and our most gracious lords: we the ambassadors of the kingdom of Bohemia do most humbly and heartily require you that for the perpetual preservation of peace and concord, and for the firm preservation of all things contained in the composition, you will vouchsafe of your clemency to give and grant unto us all and singular our requests here underwritten, with effectual execution of the same.

"First, and above all things we desire and require you, for the extirpation of divers dissensions and controversies which will undoubtedly follow amongst our people under the diversity of the communion, and for the abolishing of infinite evils which we are not able to express as we have conceived them, that you will gently vouchsafe of your goodness and liberality to give, grant, and command, unto our kingdom of Bohemia, and marquisdom of Moravia, one uniform order of the communion unto all men, under both kinds, that is to say, unto the archbishop of Prague, the bishop of Luthonus, Olmutz, and other prelates of the kingdom and marquisdom, having charge of souls, and to their vicars, and also to their flocks and subjects, and that according to those things which are contained in the bull of the ambassadors, and in the compositions made in the name of the whole council, written in the chapter, pro firmitate, where it is thus said, 'And all other things shall be done, which shall be meet and necessary for the preservation of the peace and unity.' For this done, by your benefit the whole kingdom shall be comforted above measure, and established in brotherly love; whereby an uniform subjection and obedience shall be perpetually attributed unto the holy church.

"Also, we require and desire (as before) that for the avoiding of all suspicion and doubtfulness of many, who suppose that the sacred council has granted the communion under both kinds to us but for a time, as neither profitable nor wholesome, but as the writing of divorce-ment; that you will vouchsafe, wholesomely and speedily to provide for our safety, and with your grant in this behalf, and with the bulls in your letters, to confirm that chapter, together with the other pertaining to the office of your ambassadors.

"Also, we beseech you (as before) that for the confirmation of obedience, and for the discipline of all the clergy, and for the final defence and observation of all things determined and agreed upon, and for the good order in spiritualities, ye will vouchsafe effectually to provide for us a good and lawful pastor, archbishops and bishops, who shall seem to us most meet and acceptable for our kingdom, to execute those offices and duties.

"Also, we require you that your fatherly reverences will vouchsafe, for the defence of the worthy fame of the kingdom and marquisdom, to declare and shew our innocence, in that they have communicated, do, and hereafter shall communicate under both kinds; to give out, ordain, and direct the letters of the sacred council, in manner and form most apt and meet for such declaration, to all princes, as well secular as spiritual, cities and commonalties, according to the compositions, and as the lords the ambassadors are bound to us to do.

"Also, we desire you that in the discussing of the matter for the communion under both kinds, and of the commandment given to all faithful, ye will not proceed otherwise than according to the Concordatum agreed upon in Egra: that is to say, according to the law of God, the order of Christ, and his apostles, the general councils, and the minds of the holy doctors, truly grounded upon the law of God.

"Also, we desire that your fatherly reverences, considering the great affection of our people, will give us the desired liberty to communicate to the younger sort the sacrament of the supper. For if this use of communicating should be taken away, which our kingdom being godly, moved by the writings of most great and holy doctors, and brought in by example, has received as catholic, and exercised now a long time; verily it would raise up an intolerable offence among the people, and their minds would be grievously vexed and troubled.

"Also, we require you (as before) that for like causes your fatherly reverences would vouchsafe to permit, at the least the gospels, epistles, and creed, to be sung and read in the church in our vulgar tongue, before the people, to move them to devotion; for in our language it has been used of old in the church, and likewise in our kingdom.

"Also, we require you in the name of the said kingdom, and of the famous university of Prague, that your fatherly reverences would vouchsafe to shew such diligence and care toward the desired reformation of that university, that according to the manner and form of other universities reformed by the church, prebends and collations of certain benefices of cathedral and parish churches may be annexed and incorporated into the said university, that thereby it may be increased and preferred.

"Also, we desire you (as before) as heartily as we may, and also (saving always your fatherly reverences) require you, and by the former compositions we most instantly admonish you, that with your whole minds and endeavours, and with all care and study, your reverences will watch and seek for that long desired and most necessary reformation of the church and christian religion, and effectually labour for the rooting out of all public evils, as well in the head, as in the members, as you have often promised to do in our kingdom, in the compositions, and as our fourth article, touching the avoiding of all public evils, exacts and requires."

There were certain answers provided by the council to these petitions of the Bohemians, which were not delivered to them, but kept back, for what purpose and intent we know not. Wherefore because we thought them not greatly necessary for this place, and also to avoid prolixity, we have judged it meet to omit them. Thus have ye heard compendiously the chief and principal matters treated of and done in this famous council of Basil.

Concerning the authority of this general council of Basil, what is to be thought of it, may be learned by all good men by the acts and fruits of it. Neither was it doubted by any man in the beginning, so long as the pope agreed and consented to it. But after the pope began to draw back, many others followed, especially of the richer sort of prelates, who had anything to lose. In the number of those inconstant prelates was Cardinal Julian, the first collector of this council, and vicar-general of the pope, as by his fervent and vehement letter, written to Pope Eugenius in defence of this council appears. In it he most earnestly expostulates with Pope Eugenius, for seeking to dissolve the council, and declares many causes, why he should rather rejoice, and give God thanks for the godly proceedings and joyful agreement between the council and the Bohemians, and so exhorts him with many persuasions to resort to the council himself, and not to seek its dissolution.

In like manner Æneas Sylvius also, with his own hand-writing, not only gave testimony to the authority of this council, but also bestowed his labour and pains in setting forth the whole history of it. Notwithstanding Sylvius afterward being made pope, with his new honour, altered and changed his old opinion. His epistle, touching the commendation of the council, because it is but short, I thought here, for satisfying the reader's mind, to insert:—

An Epistle of Æneas Sylvius to the Rector of the University of Cologne.

"To a christian man, which will be a true christian indeed, nothing ought to be more desired, than that the sincerity and pureness of faith, given to us of Christ by our forefathers, be kept of all men immaculate. And if at any time anything be wrought or attempted against the true doctrine of the gospel, the people ought with one consent to provide lawful remedy, and every man to bring with him some water to quench the general fire; neither must we fear how we be hated or envied, so we bring the truth. We must resist every man to his face, whether he be Paul or Peter, if he walk not directly to the truth of the gospel. Which thing I am glad, and so are we all, to hear that your university has done in this council of Basil. For a certain treatise of yours is brought here to us, wherein you reprehend the rudeness, or rather the rashness of such, as deny the bishop of Rome, and the consistory of his judgment, to be subject to the general council; and that the supreme tribunal seat of judgment stands in the church, and in no one bishop. Such men as deny this, you so confound with lively reasons and truth of the scriptures, that they are neither able to slide away like slippery eels, neither to cavil or bring any objection against you."

The deposed Pope Eugenius, not acknowledging the acts of deposition, called a council at Florence, and in the meantime prevailed on the French king to make war on the council of Basil. The dauphin was defeated, but the council was at last dissolved.

As these things were doing at Basil, Pope Eugenius brought to pass in his convocation at Florence, that the emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople, with the rest of the Greeks there present, were persuaded to receive the sentence of the church of Rome, concerning the proceeding of the Holy Ghost; also to receive the communion in unleavened bread, to admit purgatory, and to yield themselves to the authority of the Romish bishop. To which, however, the churches of Greece would in no wise assent at their coming home, so that with a public anathema they condemned all those legates who had consented to these articles, that none of them should be buried in christian burial. (A.D. 1439.)

And thus endeth the history, both of the council of Basil and of the council of Florence, also of the emperor Sigismund, and of the schism between Pope Eugenius and Pope Felix, (who was induced to resign the popedom to the successor of Eugenius,) and also of the Bohemians. The Bohemians, notwithstanding all these troubles and tumults, did right well, and were strong enough against all their enemies, till at length through discord, partly between the two preachers of the old and new city of Prague, partly also through the discord of the messengers and captains taking sides one against the other, they made their enemies strong, and enfeebled themselves. However they so defended the cause of their religion, not by sword, but by argument and disputation, that the bishop of Rome could never, nor yet to this day remove the Taborites and city of Prague from the communion of both kinds, nor could ever cause them to keep the conditions, which in the beginning of the council were enjoined their priests to observe.

During this business beyond the sea, our bishops here in England were not unoccupied. Whether it be the nature of the country, or the great livings and wealthy promotions of the clergy that influences them, it is certain that in England there is more burning and slaying for religion, and for all other matters more bloodshed among us, than in any other land or nation in Christendom besides. After the burning of Richard Hoveden, of Nicholas Canon, and of Thomas Bagley, priest, above recorded, whom the bishops condemned to death (A.D. 1431), not long after, about A.D. 1439, which was the seventeenth of the reign of King Henry VI., they had another poor man, named Richard Wiche, priest, who was first degraded, then burnt at Tower-hill for heresy.

After the burning of this man, a convocation was called by Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, wherein was propounded among the clergy, to consult what way were best for the removing away the law of Premuniri facias; for so were the hearts then of the temporality set against the ecclesiastical sort, that where any vantage might be given them by the law, they did spare nothing; by reason of which the churchmen at that time were greatly molested by the law of Premuniri, and by the king's writs, and other indictments. By long consultation and good advisement, at last this way was taken, that a petition or supplication should be drawn and presented to the king, for the abolishing of the law of Premuniri facias, and also for the restraining of other briefs, writs, and indictments, which seemed then to lie heavy upon the clergy. This bill or supplication being contrived and exhibited by the archbishops of Canterbury and of York to the king, when he was standing in need of a subsidy to be collected of the clergy; this answer was given to their supplication, on the king's behalf; that forasmuch as the time of Christmas drew near, whereby he had as yet no sufficient leisure to advise upon the matter, he would take therein a farther pause. In the meantime, as one tendering their quiet, he would send to all his officers and ministers within his realm, that no such brief of Premuniri should pass against them, or any of them, from the said time of Christmas, till the next parliament, A.D. 1439.

The Invention of Printing.

In following the course of years, we find this year of our Lord, 1450, to be famous and memorable, for the divine and miraculous inventing of printing. Nauclearius, and Wymselingus following him, refer the invention to A.D. 1440. Others refer it to A.D. 1446, and 1450. The first inventor is thought to be a German, dwelling first in Strasburg, afterwards citizen of Mentz, named John Faustus, a goldsmith. The occasion of this invention was by engraving the letters of the alphabet in metal, then laying black ink upon the metal, it gave the form of letters in paper. The man being industrious and active, thought to proceed further, and to try whether it would frame as well in words, and in whole sentences, as it did in letters: and when he perceived it did so, he acquainted one John Guttemberg, and Peter Schaffer, binding them by their oath to keep silence for a season. After ten years, John Guttemberg, co-partner with Faustus, began then first to broach the matter at Strasburg. The art, being yet but rude, in process of time was advanced by various men of inventive genius, adding more and more to the perfection of it. In the number of whom, John Mentel, John Pruss, Adolphus Ruschius, were great helpers. Ulrichus Han, in Latin called Gallus, first brought it to Rome.

However, whatever man was the instrument, without all doubt God himself was the ordainer and disposer thereof, no otherwise, than he was of the gift of tongues, and that for a similar purpose. And well may this gift of printing be resembled to the gift of tongues; for as God then spake with many tongues, and yet all that would not turn the Jews; so now, when the Holy Ghost speaks to the adversaries in innumerable sorts of books, yet they will not be converted, nor turn to the gospel.

Now to consider to what end and purpose the Lord hath given this gift of printing to the earth, and to what great utility and necessity it serves, is not hard to judge.

And first, touching the time of this invention being given to man, this is to be observed, that when the bishop of Rome, with all the whole and full consent of the cardinals, patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, lawyers, doctors, provosts, deans, archdeacons, assembled together in the council of Constance, had condemned poor John Huss, and Jerome of Prague to death for heresy, though they were no heretics, and after they had subdued the Bohemians and all the whole world under the supreme authority of the Romish see; and had made all christian people obedient and vassals, having, as one would say, all the world at their will, so that the matter now was past, not only the power of all men, but the hope also of any man to be recovered: in this very time so dangerous and desperate, where man's power could do no more, then the blessed wisdom and omnipotent power of the Lord began to work for his church, not with sword and target to subdue his exalted adversary, but with printing, writing, and reading to convince darkness by light, error by truth, ignorance by learning. So that by this means of printing, the secret operation of God has heaped upon that proud kingdom a double confusion. For, whereas the bishop of Rome had burned John Huss before, and Jerome of Prague, who neither denied his transubstantiation, nor his supremacy, nor yet his popish mass, but said mass, and heard mass themselves, neither spake against his purgatory, nor any other great matter of his popish doctrine, but only exclaimed against his excessive and pompous pride, his unchristian or rather antichristian abomination of life: thus while he could not abide his wickedness of life to be touched, but made it heresy, or, at least matter of death, whatever was spoken against his detestable conversation and manners, God of his secret judgment, seeing time to help his church, has found a way by this art of printing, not only to confound his life and conversation, which before he could not abide to be touched, but also to cast down the foundation of his standing, that is, to examine, confute, and detect his most detestable doctrine, laws, and institutions in such sort, that though his life were never so pure, yet his doctrine standing as it does, no man is so blind but he may see, that either the pope is antichrist, or else that antichrist is near cousin to the pope; and all this does and will hereafter more and more appear by printing.

The reason whereof is this: Hereby tongues are known, knowledge grows, judgment increases, books are dispersed, the scripture is seen, the doctors are read, histories opened, times compared, truth discerned, falsehood detected, and all, as I said, through the benefit of printing. Wherefore, I suppose, that either the pope must abolish printing, or he must seek a new world to reign over; for else, as this world stands, printing doubtless will abolish him. But the pope, and all his college of cardinals, must understand this, that through the light of printing the world begins now to have eyes to see, and heads to judge: he cannot walk so invisible in a net, but he will be spied. And although through might he stopped the mouth of John Huss before, and of Jerome, that they might not preach, thinking to make his kingdom sure; yet, instead of John Huss and others, God hath opened the press to preach, whose voice the pope is never able to stop with all the puissance of his triple crown. By this printing, as by the gift of tongues, and as by the singular organ of the Holy Ghost, the doctrine of the gospel sounds to all nations and countries under heaven, and what God reveals to one man, is dispersed to many, and what is known in one nation is opened to all.

The first and best were for the bishop of Rome, by the benefit of printing, to learn and know the truth. If he will not, let him well understand that printing is not set up for nought. To strive against the stream will not avail. What the pope has lost, since printing and the press began to preach, let him cast his counters. First, when Erasmus wrote, and Frobenius printed, what a blow thereby was given to all friars and monks in the world? And who sees not that the pen of Luther following after Erasmus, and set forward by printing, has set the triple crown so awry on the pope's head, that it is like never to be set straight again?

Briefly, if there were no demonstration to lead, yet by this one argument of printing, the bishop of Rome might understand the counsel and purpose of the Lord to work against him, having provided such a way in earth, that almost as many printing presses as there be in the world, so many bulwarks there are against the high castle of St. Angelo, so that either the pope must abolish knowledge and printing, or printing at length will root him out. As nothing made the pope strong in time past but lack of knowledge and ignorance of simple christians: so contrariwise, now nothing debilitates and shakes the high spire of his papacy so much as reading, preaching, knowledge and judgment, that is to say, the fruit of printing; whereof some experience we see already, and more is likely (by the Lord's blessing) to follow. For although, through outward force and violent cruelty tongues dare not speak, yet the hearts of men daily, no doubt, are instructed through the benefit of printing. And though the pope hath now by cruelty, and in times past by ignorance, had all under his possession; yet neither must he think, that violence will always continue, neither must he hope for that now which he had then. In former days books were scarce, and of such excessive price, that few could attain to the buying, and still fewer to the reading and studying of them, which books now by the means of this art, are made accessible to all men. Ye heard before how Nicholas Belward bought a New Testament in those days for four marks and forty pence, whereas now the same price will well serve forty persons with so many books!

Moreover, it was before noted and declared by the testimony of Armeanus, how for defect of books and good authors, both universities were decayed and good men kept in ignorance, while begging friars, scraping all the wealth from other priests, heaped up all books that could be gotten, into their own libraries, where either they did not diligently apply them, or else did not rightly use them, or at least kept them from such as more fruitfully would have perused them. Wherefore Almighty God of his merciful Providence, seeing both what lacked in the church, and how also to remedy the same, for the advancement of his glory, gave the understanding of this excellent art or science of printing, whereby three singular benefits at one time came to the world. First, the price of all books is diminished. Secondly, the speedy help of reading furthered. And thirdly, the plenty of all good authors enlarged.

By reason of which, as printing of books ministered matter of reading, so reading brought learning, learning shewed light, by the brightness of which blind ignorance was suppressed, error detected, and finally God's glory with truth of his word advanced.

A. D. 1453, Constantine Paleologus, being emperor of Constantinople, on the twenty-ninth day of May, the great city of Constantinople was taken by the Turk Mahomet, after a siege of fifty-four days, which siege began in the beginning of April. Within the city, beside the citizens, there were only six thousand rescuers of the Greeks; and three thousand of the Venetians and Genoese. Against these Mahomet brought an army of four hundred thousand, collected out of the countries and places adjoining near about, as out of Grecia, Illyrica, Wallachia, Dardanis, Triballis, Bulgaria, out of Bithyolia, Galatia, Lydia, Sicily, and such other, which places had the name yet of Christians. Thus one neighbour for lucre's sake helped to destroy another.

The city was compassed by the Turks both by the sea and land. Mahomet, the Turk, divided his army into three sundry parts, which in three parts of the city so beat the walls and brake them down, that they attempted by the breaches thereof to enter the city. But the valiantness of the christians therein won much commendation, whose duke was called John Justinian of Genoa. But as the assaults were great, and the number of the christian soldiers daily decreased, fighting both at the walls and at the haven against such a multitude of the Turks, they were not able long to hold out. Beside the armies which lay battering at the walls, the Turk had upon the sea his navy of two hundred and fifty sail, lying upon the haven of the city, reaching from the one side of the haven's mouth to the other, as if a bridge should be made from the one bank to the other. Which haven by the citizens was barred with iron chains, whereby the Turks were kept out a certain space. Against which navy there were seven ships of Genoa within the haven, and three of Crete, and certain of Chios, which stood against them. Also the soldiers issuing out of the city, as occasion would serve, did manfully withstand them, and with wild-fire set their ships on fire, that a certain space they could serve to no use. At length the chains being broken, and a way made, the Turk's navy entered the haven, and assaulted the city, whereby the Turk began to conceive great hope, and was in forwardness to obtain the city. The assault and skirmish then waxing more hot, Mahomet the tyrant stood by upon a hill, with his warriors about him, crying and howling out to them to scale the walls and enter the town, otherwise, if any recoiled, he threatened to kill them, and so he did. Wherefore a great number of his soldiers, in their repulse and retreat, were slain by the Turk's men, being sent by his commandment to slay them, and so they were justly served, and well paid their hire.

Although this was some comfort to the christians to see and behold out of the city the Turk's retinue so consumed, yet that hope lasted not long. Shortly after by the rage of war, it happened that one Justinian, the duke above-named, was wounded; who, notwithstanding that he was earnestly desired by Paleologus the emperor, not to leave the tower which he had to keep, seeing his wound was not deadly dangerous; yet could he not be entreated to tarry, but left his standing and his fort undefended, setting none in his place to guard the same. And so this doughty duke hurt more with his false heart than with force of weapon, gave over and fled to Chio, where shortly after for sorrow, rather than for soreness of his wound, he died. Many of his soldiers, seeing their captain flee, followed after, leaving their fort utterly destitute without defence. The Turks, understanding that vantage, soon burst into the city. The Emperor Paleologus, seeing no other way but to fly, making toward the gate, either was slain, or else trodden down with the multitude. In the which gate, eight hundred dead men's bodies were found and taken up.

The city of Constantinople thus being got, the Turks sacking and ranging about the streets, houses, and corners, did put to the sword most unmercifully whomsoever they found, both aged and young, matrons, maidens, children, and infants, sparing none; the noble matrons and maidens were horribly insulted; the goods of the city, the treasures in houses, the ornaments in churches were all sacked and spoiled; the pictures of Christ opprobriously handled in hatred of Christ. The spoil and havock of the city lasted three days together, while the barbarous soldiers murdered and rifled what they liked.

These things being done, and the tumult ceased, after three days Mahomet the Turk entered the city, and first calling for the heads and ancients of the city, such as he found alive he commanded to be mangled and cut in pieces. It is also (saith my author) reported, that in the feasts of the Turks, all such as were of the king's stock, after other barbarities, were hewn and cut in pieces for their sport.

And this was the end of that princely and famous city of Constantinople, beginning first by a Constantine, and ending also with a Constantine, which for its princely royalty was named and ever honoured, from the time of the first Constantine, equally with the city of Rome, and called also by the name thereof New Rome, and also continued the space of 1123 years. I pray God that Old Rome may learn of New Rome, to take heed and beware betime.

This terrible destruction of the city of Constantinople, the queen of cities, I thought here to describe, not so much to set forth the barbarous cruelty of these filthy and merciless murderers; as specially for this, that we being admonished by the doleful ruin and misery of these our fellow christians, may call to mind the deserved plagues and miseries which seem to hang no less over our own heads, and thereby may learn betime to invoke and call more earnestly upon the name of our terrible and merciful God, that he for his Son's sake will keep us, and preserve his church among us, and mitigate those plagues and sorrows, which we no less have deserved, than these above minded have done before us. Christ grant it, Amen.

The history of Reynold Peacock bishop of Chichester, afflicted and imprisoned for the gospel of Christ.

After the death of Henry Chichesley before mentioned, next succeeded John Stafford, (A. D. 1445), who continued eight years. After him came John Kemp, (A. D. 1453), who sat but three years. Then succeeded Thomas Burschere. In the time of which archbishop, Reynold Peacock, bishop of Chichester, was afflicted by the pope's prelate for his faith and profession of the gospel. This man (saith Hall) began to move questions not privately, but openly in the universities, concerning the Annates, Peter-pence, and other jurisdictions, and authorities pertaining to the see of Rome, and not only put forth the questions, but declared his mind and opinion in the same; wherefore he was for this cause abjured at Paul's Cross. This bishop, first of St. Asaph, then of Chichester, so long as Duke Humfrey lived, (by whom he was promoted and much made of) was quiet and safe, and also bold to dispute and to write his mind, and wrote several books and treatises. But after that good duke was made away, this good man was open to his enemies, and matter soon found against him. Being complained of, and accused to the archbishop, letters were directed down from the archbishop, to cite all men to appear that could say any thing against him.

This citation being thus issued, the bishop came before the judges and bishops to Lambeth, where Thomas the archbishop, with his doctors and lawyers, were gathered together in the archbishop's court. The duke of Buckingham was present, accompanied with the bishops of Rochester, and of Lincoln. What were the opinions and articles objected against him, shall be specified in his revocation. In his answering for himself, in such a company of the pope's friends, although he could not prevail; yet stoutly defending himself, he declared many things worthy great commendation of learning, if learning could have prevailed against power.

But they on the contrary part, with all labour and diligence exerted themselves, either to reduce him, or else to confound him. Briefly, no stone was left unturned, no ways unproved, either by fair means to entreat him, or by terrible menaces to terrify his mind, till at length, he being vanquished and overcome by the bishops, began to faint, and gave over. Whereupon, by and by, a recantation was put unto him by the bishops, which he should declare before the people. The copy of which recantation here follows :

"In the name of God, Amen. Before you the most reverend father in Christ and Lord, the Lord Thomas, by the grace of God, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England and legate of the apostolic see, I Reynold Peacock, unworthy bishop of Chichester, do purely, willingly, simply, and absolutely confess and acknowledge, that I in times past, that is to say, by the space of these twenty years last past and more, have otherwise conceived, holden, taught and written, as touching the sacraments, and the articles of the faith, than the holy church of Rome, and universal church; and also that I have made, written, published, and set forth many and divers pernicious doctrines, books, works, writings, heresies, contrary and against the true catholic and apostolic faith, containing in them errors contrary to the catholic faith, and especially these errors and heresies hereunder written.

1. First of all, that we are not bound, by the necessity of faith, to believe that our Lord Jesus Christ after his death descended into hell.

2. That it is not necessary to salvation to believe in the holy catholic church.

3. That it is not necessary to salvation to believe the communion of saints.

4. That it is not necessary to salvation to affirm the body material in the sacrament.

5. That the universal church may err in matters which pertain unto faith.

6. That it is not necessary unto salvation to believe that which every general council doth universally ordain, approve, or determine, should necessarily for the help of our faith, and the salvation of souls, be approved and holden of all faithful christians.

"Wherefore I, Reynold Peacock, wretched sinner, who have long walked in darkness, and now by the merciful disposition and ordinance of God, am reduced and brought again unto the light and way of truth, and restored to the unity of our holy mother the church, renounce and forsake all errors and heresies aforesaid."

"It is probable that this bishop repented afterward of his recantation; which may easily be supposed, because he was committed again to prison and detained captive, where it is uncertain whether he was oppressed with privy and secret tyranny, and there obtained the crown of martyrdom, or no.

From the persecutions and burnings in England we will now digress a little, to speak of foreign matters of the church of Rome.

Pope Nicholas, to get and gather great sums of money, appointed a jubilee A. D. 1450, at which time there resorted a greater number of people to Rome, than had at any time before been seen. At which time we read in the history of Platina, that to have happened, which I thought here not unworthy to be noted for the example of the thing. As there was a great concourse of people resorting to the mount Vatican to behold the image of our Saviour, which they had there to shew to the pilgrims, the people being thick going to and fro between the mount and the city, by chance a certain mule of the cardinals of St. Mark, came by the way, by which the people not being able to avoid the way, one or two falling upon the mule, there was such a throng upon that occasion on the bridge, that to the number of two hundred bodies of men, and three horses were there strangled, and on each side of the bridge many besides fell over into the water, and were drowned.

In the time of this pope one Matthew Palmerius wrote a book On Angels, for defending which he was condemned by the pope, and burned at Corna.

After him succeeded Calixtus III., who among divers other things ordained, both at noon and evening the bell to toll the Aves, as it was used in the popish time, to help the soldiers that fought against the Turks; for which cause also he ordained the feast of the transfiguration of the Lord, solemnizing it with like pardons and indulgencies, as was Corpus Christi day.

Also this pope, proceeding contrary to the councils of Constance and Basil, decreed that no man should appeal from the pope to any council. By whom also St. Edmund of Canterbury, with divers others, were made saints.

Next after this Calixtus succeeded Pius II., otherwise called Aeneas Sylvius, who wrote the two books of commentaries upon the council of Basil before mentioned. This Aeneas, at the time of the writing of those books, seemed to be a man of tolerable judgment and doctrine, from which he afterward, being pope, seemed to decline and swerve, seeking by all means possible how to deface and abolish the books which he had written.

Sentences attributed unto this Pius.

"The divine nature of God may rather be comprehended by faith than by disputation.

"Christian faith is to be considered, not by what reason it is proved, but from whom it proceeds.

"Neither can a covetous man be satisfied with money, nor a learned man with knowledge.

"Learning ought to be to poor men instead of silver, to noblemen instead of gold, and to princes instead of precious stones.

"An artificial oration moves fools, but not wise men.

"Suitors in the law are as birds; the court is the bait; the judges are the nets; and the lawyers are the fowlers.

"Men are to be given to dignities, and not dignities to men.

"The office of a bishop is heavy, but it is blessed to him that doth well bear it.

"A bishop without learning may be likened to an ass.

"An evil physician destroyeth bodies, but an unlearned priest destroyeth souls.

"Marriage was taken from priests not without great reason; but with much greater reason it ought to be restored again."

The like sentence to this he utters in his second book of the council of Basil, saying, "Peradventure it were not the worst, that the most part of priests had their wives; for many should be saved in priestly marriage, which now in unmarried priesthood are damned." The same Pius also, as Celcius reports, dissolved certain orders of nuns, of the orders of St. Bridget and St. Clare, bidding them to depart out, that they should no more disgrace the profession of religion.

This Pius, if he had brought so much piety and godliness as he brought learning unto his popedom, had excelled many popes that went before him.

Before his elevation he preferred general councils before the pope, now being pope, he decreed that no man should appeal from the high bishop of Rome to any general council. And likewise for priests' marriage, whereas, before he thought it best to have their wives restored, yet afterward he altered his mind.

After this Pius II. succeeded Paul II., a pope wholly set upon his own gratification and ambition, and not so much void of all learning, as the hater of learned men.

After this Paul came Sixtus IV. This pope, amongst his other acts, reduced the year of jubilee from the fiftieth to the twenty-fifth. He also instituted the feast of the Conception, and the presentation of Mary and of Anna her mother, and Joseph. Also he canonized Bonaventure and St. Francis for saints. By this Sixtus also were beads brought in, and instituted to make our lady's Psalter. This pope made two-and-thirty cardinals in his time.

Next after this Sixtus came Innocent, as rude, and as far from all learning, as his predecessor was before him. Amongst the noble acts of this pope this was one, that in the town of Polus apud Equicolas, he caused eight men and six women, with the lord of the place, to be apprehended and taken, and judged for heretics, because they said none of them was the vicar of Christ who come after Peter, but they only who followed the poverty of Christ. Also he condemned of heresy, George the king of Bohemia, and deprived him of his dignity and also of his kingdom, and procured his whole stock to be utterly rejected and put down, giving his kingdom to Matthias king of Pannonia.

Now, from the popes let us descend to other estates, beginning with our troubles here at home, pertaining to the overthrow of King Henry VI. and his seat. Here is to be remembered, how, after the death of the duke of Gloucester, mischiefs came in by heaps upon the king and his realm. For, after the giving away of Anjou and Maine to the Frenchmen, by the unfortunate marriage of Queen Margaret above mentioned, the Frenchmen, perceiving now by the death of the duke of Gloucester, the stay and pillar of this commonwealth to be decayed, and seeing, moreover, the hearts of the nobility amongst themselves to be divided, lost no time, having such an open way into Normandy, and in a short time they recovered the same, and also got Gascony, so that no more now remained to England of all the parts beyond the sea, but only Calais. Neither yet did the calamity of the realm only rest in this: for the king now having lost his friendly uncle, as the stay and staff of his age, who had brought him up so faithfully from his youth, was now thereby the more open to his enemies, and they more emboldened to set upon him; as appeared first by Jack Cade the Kentish captain, who, encamping first on Blackheath, afterward aspired to London, and had the spoil thereof, the king being driven into Warwickshire (A.D. 1450.) Not long after the suppression of Cade's insurrection, the duke of York, accompanied by three earls, set upon the king near to St. Alban's, where the king was taken captive, and the duke of York was by parliament declared protector in the same year 1455. After this followed long division and mortal war between the two houses of Lancaster and York, continuing many years. At length, in the year 1460, the duke of York was slain in battle by the queen near to the town of Wakefield, and with him also his son, the earl of Rutland. The queen, also, shortly after, discomfited the earl of Warwick, and the duke of Norfolk, to whom the keeping of the king had been committed by the duke of York, and so the queen again delivered her husband.

After these victories, the northern men, advancing not a little in pride and courage, began to take upon them great attempts, not only to spoil and rob churches, and religious houses, and villages, but also fully intending, partly by themselves, partly by the inducement of their lords and captains, to sack, waste, and utterly to subvert the city of London, and to take the spoil thereof; and no doubt (saith my history) would have proceeded in their conceived greedy intent, had not the opportune favour of God provided a speedy remedy. For as these mischiefs were in brewing, suddenly the noble Prince Edward came to London with a mighty army, on the twenty-seventh of February, (1461.) he was the son and heir to the duke of York above mentioned, and was accompanied by the earl of Warwick, and divers more. King Henry, in the meantime, with his victory, went up to York; when Edward being at London, caused there to be proclaimed certain articles concerning his title to the crown of England, on the second of March; and then on the fourth, accompanied with the lords spiritual and temporal, and with much concourse of people, he rode to Westminster-hall, and there, by the full consent, as well of the lords, as also by the voice of all the commons, took his possession of the crown, and was called King Edward IV.

These things thus accomplished at London, the king proceeded northward against Henry, when, with his army he had passed over the river of Trent, and was come near to Ferrybridge, where the army of King Henry was not far off, upon Palm Sunday, between Ferrybridge and Tadcaster, both the armies of the southern and northern men joined together in battle. And although at the beginning, some horsemen of King Edward's side turned their backs, yet the courageous prince, with his captains, little discouraged, fiercely and manfully set on their adversaries. The battle was so cruelly fought on both sides, that in the conflict there were slain to the number, as is reported, beside men of name, thirty-six thousand of the poor commons. Notwithstanding, the conquest fell on King Edward's part, so that King Henry having lost all, was forced to fly into Scotland, where he gave up to the Scots the town of Berwick, after he had reigned eight-and-thirty years and a half.

KING EDWARD THE FOURTH.

King Edward, after his conquest and victory achieved against King Henry, returned again to London, where, upon the vigil of St. Peter and Paul, (A.D. 1461.) being on Sunday, he was crowned king of England, and reigned twenty-two years.

When it was proposed that the king should marry, several alliances were suggested; and first, the Lady Margaret, sister to James IV. king of Scots, was thought of; afterward the Lady Elizabeth, sister to Henry king of Castile, but she being under age, the earl of Warwick turned to the French king Lewis XI., to obtain Lady Bona, daughter of the duke of Savoy, and sister to the French queen, and obtained consent. Meanwhile the king was pleased with Elizabeth Grey, widow of Sir John Grey, knight, slain before in the battle of St. Albans, daughter to the duchess of Bedford, and Lord Rivers, and first endeavoured to have her as his mistress. But she being unworthy (as she said) to be the wife of such an high personage, and thinking herself to be too good to be his mistress, so won the king's heart, that before the return of the earl of Warwick, he married her; at which marriage only the duchess of Bedford, two gentlewomen, the priest and clerk, were present. Upon this so hasty and unlucky marriage ensued no little trouble to the king, much bloodshed to the realm, undoing almost to all her kindred, and finally confusion to King Edward's two sons, which both were declared afterward to be illegitimate, and also deprived of their lives. For the earl of Warwick, who had been the faithful friend and chief maintainer before of the king, at the hearing of this marriage, was so angry, that he ever afterwards endeavoured to work displeasure to the king. And although for a time he dissembled his wrathful mood, till he might find a time convenient, and a world to set forward his purpose, at last finding occasion serving to his mind, he made known his purpose to his two brethren, to wit, the Lord Mountacute, or Montague, and the archbishop of York, conspiring with them how to bring it about. Then he also thought to find out the mind of the duke of Clarence, King Edward's brother, and he likewise obtained him on his aide, giving him his daughter in marriage.

This matter being thus prepared against the king, the first flame of his conspiracy began to appear in the north country; where the northern men in a short space gathering themselves in an open rebellion, and finding captains of their wicked purpose, came down from York toward London. Against whom was appointed by the king, William Lord Herbert earl of Pembroke, with the Lord Stafford, and certain other captains to encounter. The Yorkshiremen giving the overthrow first to the Lord Stafford, then to the earl of Pembroke, and his company of Welshmen at Banbury Field, at last joining together with the army of the earl of Warwick, and the duke of Clarence, in the dead of the night secretly stealing on the king's field at Wolney by Warwick, killed the watch, and took the king prisoner, who first being in the castle of Warwick, then was conveyed by night to Middleham castle in Yorkshire, under the custody of the archbishop of York, where he having loose keeping, and liberty to go on hunting, meeting with Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas of Borough, and other friends, was too good for his keepers, and escaped the hands of his enemies and so came to York, where he was well received; from thence to Lancaster, where he met with the Lord Hasting his chamberlain, well accompanied, by whose help he came safe to London.

After this tumult, when reconciliation could not come to perfect peace and unity, although much labour was made by the nobility, the earl of Warwick raises up a new war in Lincolnshire, the captain whereof was Sir Robert Wells, knight, who shortly after, being taken in battle with his father and Sir Thomas Duncock, they were beheaded, the rest casting away their coats ran away and fled, giving the name of the field called Losecoat Field. The earl of Warwick, after this, put out of comfort and hope to prevail at home, fled out of England, A.D. 1470, first to Calais, then to Lewis the French king, accompanied by the duke of Clarence. The fame of the earl of Warwick, and of his famous acts, was at that time in great admiration above measure, and so highly favoured, that both in England and in France all men were glad to behold his person. Wherefore the coming of this earl, and of the duke of Clarence, was not a little grateful to the French king, and no less opportune to Queen Margaret, King Henry's wife, and Prince Edward her son, who also came to the French court to meet and confer together touching their affairs; where a league was concluded between them, and moreover a marriage between Edward prince of Wales, and Anne the second daughter of the earl of Warwick was wrought. Thus all things falling luckily upon the earl's part, beside the large offers and great promises made by the French king, that he would do his best to set forward their purpose, the earl having also intelligence by letters, that the hearts almost of all men went with him, and longed sore for his presence, so that there now lacked only haste to return with all speed possible; he, with the duke of Clarence, well fortified with the French navy, set forward towards England; for so was it before decreed between them, that they two should prove the first venture, and then Queen Margaret, with Prince Edward her son, should follow after. The arrival of the earl was no sooner heard of at Dartmouth in Devonshire, but great concourse of people by thousands went to him from all quarters to receive and welcome him; who immediately made proclamation in the name of King Henry VI., charging all men, able to bear armour, to prepare themselves to fight against Edward duke of York, usurper of the crown. There lacked no friends, strength of men, furniture, nor policy convenient for such a matter.

When King Edward (who was passing the time in hunting, in hawking, in all pleasure and dalliance), had knowledge what great resort of multitudes incessantly repaired more and more daily about the earl and the duke, he began now to provide for remedy when it was too late. Who trusting too much to his friends, and fortune before, did now right well perceive what a variable and inconstant thing the people is, and especially the people of England, whose nature is never to be content long with the present state, but always delighting in news, seek new variety of changes, either envying that which standeth, or else pitying that which is fallen. Which inconstant mutability of the light people, changing with the wind, and wavering with the reed, did well appear in the course of this king's story. For he, through the favour of the people, when he was down, was exalted; now being exalted by them, was forsaken: in which this is to be noted by all princes, that as there is nothing in this mutable world firm and stable, so there is no trust nor assurance to be made, but only in the favour of God, and in the promises of his word, only in Christ his Son, whose kingdom alone shall never end, and never change.

While these things were passing on in England, King Edward, accompanied by the duke of Gloucester his brother, and the Lord Hastings, who had married the earl of Warwick's sister, and yet was ever true to the king; and the Lord Scales, brother to the queen, sent abroad to all his friends for able soldiers to withstand his enemies. When he could obtain but little assistance, the king departed into Lincolnshire, where, perceiving his enemies daily increasing, and all the country in disturbance, making fires, and singing songs, crying, "King Henry, King Henry! a Warwick, a Warwick!" and hearing that his enemies the Lancastrians were within half a day's journey of him, he was advised to fly over the sea to the duke of Burgundy, who not long before had married King Edward's sister.

Charles, duke of Burgundy, at hearing of the condition of King Edward his brother-in-law, was greatly amazed and perplexed, doubting what he should do. For being then at war with the French king, he could not well provoke the English nation against him, nor could he, without great shame, leave King Edward in that necessity. So he demeaned himself through fair speech, pretending to the Englishmen to join part with the house of Lancaster, being himself partly descended of the same family by his grandmother's side; so that he was his own friend openly, and the king's friend covertly, pretending what he did not, and doing what he pretended not.

When tidings were spread in England of King Edward's flying, innumerable people resorted to the earl of Warwick, to take his part against King Edward, and a few only of his constant friends took sanctuary. Among whom was Elizabeth his wife, who, in despair almost of all comfort, took sanctuary at Westminster, where in great penury she was delivered of a fair son called Edward, who was baptized without any pomp, like any poor woman's child, the godfathers being the abbot and prior of Westminster, the godmother was the lady Scroope.

To make the story short, the earl of Warwick having now brought all things to his wishes, upon the 12th of Oct. rode to the Tower, which was then delivered to him, and there took King Henry out of the ward, and placed him in the king's lodging. The 25th of the same month, the duke of Clarence, accompanied by the earls of Warwick, Shrewsbury, and the Lord Stanley, with a great company, brought him in a long gown of blue velvet through the high streets of London, first to Paul's church, then to the bishop's palace of London, and there he resumed again the royal crown. (A. D. 1470.) After this followed a parliament, in which King Edward with all his partakers were judged traitors. King Edward made urgent and successful suit to Duke Charles his brother, to rescue him with such forces as he could give him; for he was fully resolved to protract the time no longer.

The duke secretly gave to him 50,000 florins, and further caused four great ships to be appointed for him in a haven in Zealand, where it was free for all men to come. Also the duke had hired for him fourteen ships of the Easterlings well appointed, taking security from them to serve him faithfully till he were landed in England, and fifteen days after.

Thus King Edward with only two thousand men of war, took his voyage into England, and landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire. Dissembling his purpose, he pretended not to claim the crown and kingdom, but only to claim the duchy of York, which was his own title, and caused the same to be published. This being notified to the people, that he desired no more than only his just patrimony and lineal inheritance, they began to be moved with mercy and compassion towards him, either to favour him or not to resist him; and so journeying toward York, he came to Beverley. He then proceeded to York without resistance, where he required of the citizens to be admitted into their city. They durst not grant it to him, but on the contrary sent him word to approach no nearer, as he loved his own safety. The desolate king was here driven to a narrow strait, he could not retire, for in the opinion of the country it would be the loss of his cause; neither could he advance, for the present danger of the city. So using policy as before, with loving words and gentle speech, he desired the messengers to declare to the citizens, that his coming was not to demand the realm of England, but only the duchy of York, his old inheritance; and therefore had determined to set forward, neither with army nor weapon. The messengers were no sooner within the gates, than he was there as soon.

The citizens hearing his courteous answer, and that he intended nothing to the prejudice of the king, nor of the realm, were somewhat softened toward him, and began to parley with him from the walls, desiring him to withdraw his soldiers to some other place, and that they should be the more ready to aid him, at least he should have no damage by them.

However, he again used such lowly language, and delivered so fair speech to them, treating them so courteously, and saluting the aldermen by their names, requiring at their hands no more but only his own town, whereof he had the name and title, that at length the citizens, after long talk and debating upon the matter, partly also enticed with fair and large promises, agreed that if he would swear to be true to King Henry, and gentle in entertaining his citizens, they would receive him into the city.

This being concluded, the next morning at the entering of the gate, a priest was ready to say mass, in the which after the receiving of the sacrament, the king received a solemn oath to observe the two articles afore agreed. By which he obtained the city of York. Where, in short time forgetting his oath, he set garrisons of armed soldiers. King Edward, being soon more fully furnished at all points, by the accession of his friends, came to the town of Leicester, and there hearing that the earl of Warwick, with the earl of Oxford were at Warwick, with a great army, he marched his army, hoping to give battle to the earl. The duke of Clarence in the meantime, had levied a great host and was coming toward the earl of Warwick. But when the earl saw the duke delay the time, he began to suspect that he was altered to his brother's party. When the armies of the two brothers, King Edward and the duke of Clarence, were in sight of the other, Richard, duke of Gloucester, brother to them both, as arbiter between them, first rode to the one, then to the other. Whether all this was for appearances, is uncertain. But hereby both the brothers, laying all army and weapons aside, first lovingly and familiarly communed; after that, brotherly and naturally joined together. And that fraternal amity was ratified by proclamation, and thereby put out of all suspicion.

Then it was agreed between the three brothers to attempt the earl of Warwick, if he likewise would be reconciled; but he crying out shame upon the duke of Clarence, stood in utter defiance. From thence King Edward so strongly supported, and daily increasing, takes his way to London. Where after it was known that the duke of Clarence had joined him, much fear fell upon the Londoners, as to what was best to be done. So the citizens consulting with themselves, having no walls to defend them, thought best to take that way which seemed to them most sure and safe, and therefore they concluded to take part with King Edward. This was no sooner known abroad, than the commonalty ran out by heaps to meet King Edward, and to salute him as their king. The duke of Somerset, with others of King Henry's council, hearing of this, and wondering at the sudden change in the world, fled away and left King Henry alone.

The earl had now passed a great part of his journey to London, when hearing the news how affairs were changed, and that King Henry was a prisoner in the Tower, was not a little appalled; so he stayed with his army at St. Albans, to see what course to take. And then removed to Barnet, ten miles from St. Albans.

Against him King Edward set forth with a strong army of picked and able persons, with artillery and every requisite; bringing with him also his prisoner King Henry. On Easter even he came to Barnet, and there he entrenched himself. In the morning upon Easter-day the battle began, and fiercely continued almost till noon, with murder on each side, till both parts were almost weary with fighting and murdering. King Edward then, with a great body of fresh soldiers set upon his wearied enemies. Where the earl's men, encouraged with words of their captain, stoutly fought, but they being already wounded and wearied, could not long hold out. The earl, rushing into the midst of his enemies, ventured so far, that he could not be rescued; where he was stricken down and slain, (April 14, 1471.) The Marquis Montecute thinking to succour his brother, whom he saw to be in great jeopardy, was likewise overthrown and slain. After Richard Nevil, earl of Warwick, and his brother were gone, the rest fled, and many were taken.

In the same year, and about the same time, upon the Ascension-even, king Henry, being prisoner in the Tower, departed, after he had reigned in all thirty-eight years and six months. Polydore, and Hall following him, affirm that he was slain with a dagger, by Richard, duke of Gloucester, for the more quiet and safeguard of his brother King Edward.

Polydore, after he had described the virtues of this king, records, that King Henry VII. afterward removed his corpse from Chertsey, where he was buried, to Windsor, and adds, that certain miracles were wrought by him. For which cause King Henry VII. saith he, laboured with Pope Julius, to have him canonised for a saint, but the death of the king prevented the matter proceeding. Edward Hall, writing of this matter, adds, declaring the cause why King Henry's sainting was not completed, to be this: that the fees for canonizing of a king were so great at Rome, (more than of bishop or prelate) that the king thought it better to keep the money in his chests, than to buy so dear, and pay so much for a new holy-day of St. Henry in the Calendar.

During the time of these doings, about A. D. 1465, there was in England a Carmelite friar, who preached at St. Paul's, in London, that our Lord Jesus Christ, while here in this world, was in poverty, and did beg. To this doctrine, the provincial of that order seemed also to incline, defending it both in his reading and preaching, with other doctors and brethren of the same order; also certain of the Jacobites. On the contrary side, many doctors and also lawyers, both in their public lectures and preaching, withstood their assertion, as most pestiferous in the church. Such a bitter contention was among them, that the defendant part was driven for a while to keep silence. This question of the begging-friars, whether Christ did beg or no, went so far, that at length it came to the ears of Pope Paul II., who was no beggar ye may be sure. After the fame of this doctrine, mounting over the Alps, came flying to the court of Rome, A. D. 1465, it brought with it such an evil smell to the fine noses there, that there was no need to bid them to stir, for begging to them was worse than high heresy. Wherefore the holy father, Pope Paul II., to repress the sparkles of this doctrine, which otherwise, perhaps, might have set his whole kitchen on fire, takes the matter in hand, and directs his bull into England, insinuating to the prelates here, that this heresy, which pestiferously affirms that Christ did openly beg, was condemned of old time by the bishops of Rome, and his councils, and that the same ought to be declared in all places for a damned doctrine, and worthy to be trodden down under all men's feet, &c.

As to the rest of the affairs of this king, (who had vanquished in nine battles, himself being present) how afterward he, through the incitement of Charles, duke of Burgundy, his brother-in-law, ventured into France with a puissant army, and how the duke failed him in his promise; also how peace between these two kings was at length concluded in a solemn meeting of both kings together (which meeting is notified in histories, by a white dove sitting the same day of meeting upon the top of King Edward's tent) also of the marriage promised between the young dauphin and Elizabeth, King Edward's eldest daughter, but afterwards broken off on the French king's part; moreover, as touching the death of the duke of Burgundy, slain in war, and of his daughter Mary, niece to King Edward, spoiled of her lands and possessions wrongfully by Lewis, the French king, and married after to Maximilian; furthermore, as touching the expedition of King Edward into Scotland, by reason of King James breaking promise in marrying with Cicely, the second daughter of King Edward, and of driving out his brother, and how the matter was composed there, and of the recovery again of Berwick; of these, I say, and such other things more, partly because they are described sufficiently in our common English histories, partly also because they are matters not greatly pertaining to the church, I omit to speak, making of them a supersedeas. Two things I find here, among many other, specially to be remembered,

The first is, concerning a godly and constant servant of Christ, named John Goose, who in the time of this king, was unjustly condemned and burnt at the Tower-hill, A. D. 1473, in the month of August. Thus had England also its John Huss, (Huss signifies a goose) as well as Bohemia. Wherein this is to be noted, that since the time of King Richard II., there is no reign of any king in which some good man or other has not suffered the pains of fire for the religion and true testimony of Christ Jesus. Of this John Goose, or John Huss, I find it recorded, that being delivered to one of the sheriffs, to see him burnt in the afternoon; the sheriff, like a charitable man, brought him home to his house, and there exhorted him to deny his alleged errors. But the godly man, after long exhortation, desired the sheriff to be content, for he was satisfied in his conscience. However, this he desired of the sheriff, for God's sake to give him some meat, saying, that he was very sore hungered. Then the sheriff commanded him meat; whereof he took, and did eat, as if he had been in no manner of danger, and said to such as stood about him, "I eat now a good and competent dinner, for I shall pass a little sharp shower ere I go to supper." And when he had dined, he gave thanks, and required that he might shortly be led to the place where he should yield up his spirit unto God.

The second thing herein to be noted, is the death of George, duke of Clarence, the king's second brother; of whom relation was made before, how he assisted King Edward his brother, against the earl of Warwick, at Barnet Field, and helped him to the crown; and now, after all these benefits, was at length thus requited, that (for what cause it is uncertain) he was apprehended and cast into the Tower, where he being adjudged for a traitor, was privily drowned in a butt of malmsey. What the true cause was of his death it cannot certainly be affirmed.

Now having long tarried at home in describing the tumults and troubles within our own land, we will proceed more at large, to consider the afflictions and perturbations of other parties and places also of Christ's church, as well here in Europe, under the pope, as in the eastern parts under the Turk, first beginning our history from the time of Sigismund, which Sigismund, as it is above recorded, was so engaged in the council of Constance against John Huss, and Jerome of Prague. This emperor ever had evil luck fighting against the Turks. Twice he warred against them, and in both the battles was discomfited and put to flight; once, about the city of Mysia, fighting against Bajazet, the Great Turk, A. D. 1395, the second time fighting against Celebinus, the son of Bajazet, about the town called Columbacium. But especially after the council of Constance, wherein were condemned and burned these two godly martyrs, more unprosperous results followed him fighting against his own subjects, the Bohemians, A. D. 1420, by whom he was repulsed in so many battles, to his great dishonour, during all the life of Zisca, and of Procopius, as is before more at large expressed; he was so beaten by the Turks, and at home by his own people, that he never encountered the Turks afterwards. Then followed the council of Basil, after the beginning of which this Sigismund, who was emperor, king of Hungary, and king of Bohemia, died in Moravia, A. D. 1437.

THE EMPEROR ALBERT.

This Sigismund left behind him only one daughter, Elizabeth, who was married to Albert, duke of Austria, by which he was advanced to the empire, and so was both duke of Austria, emperor, king of Hungary, and also king of Bohemia. This Albert, being an enemy and a disquieter to the Bohemians, and especially to the good men of Tabor, as he was preparing and setting forth against the Turks, died in the second year of his reign, A. D. 1439, leaving his wife great with child; who being then in Hungary, and believing that she should bear a daughter, called to her the princes and the chieftains of the realms, declaring to them that she was but a woman, and insufficient to the government of such a state; and moreover, how she thought herself to be with child of a daughter; and therefore required them to provide among them such a prince and governor, (reserving the right of the kingdom to herself) as were fit and able under her, to have the management of the empire committed to. The Turk, in the mean while, being elevated and encouraged with his victories against Sigismund, began more fiercely to invade Hungary, and those parts of Christendom. Wherefore the Hungarians, making the more haste, consulted among themselves to make Duke Uladislav, brother to Casimir, king of Poland, their king.

But while this was in progress between the Hungarians and Uladislav, in the mean space Elizabeth brought forth a son called Ladislav, who being the lawful heir of the kingdom, the queen called back again her former word, minding to reserve the kingdom for her son, being the true heir, and therefore refused marriage with Uladislav, which she had before designed. But Uladislav joining with a great part of the Hungarians, persisting still in the condition before granted, would not give over; by which great contention and division kindling among the people of Hungary, Amurath, the Great Turk, taking his advantage of their discord, and partly elated with pride at his former success against Sigismund, with his whole main and force invaded the realm of Hungary; where Huniades, surnamed Vainoda, prince of Transilvania, joining with the new king Uladislav, both together set against the Turk, A. D. 1444, and there Uladislav, the new king of Hungary, the fourth year of his kingdom, was slain. Elizabeth, with her son, fled in the meanwhile to Frederic the emperor. Of Huniades Vainoda, the noble captain, and of his acts, and also of Ladislav (Christ willing) more shall be said hereafter, in his time and place.

FREDERIC III., EMPEROR.

After the decease of Albert, Frederic III., duke of Austria, succeeded in the empire, A. D. 1440. By whom it was procured (as we have before signified) that Pope Felix, elected by the council of Basil, resigned his popedom to Pope Nicholas V.; upon this condition, that Pope Nicholas should ratify the acts decreed in the council of Basil. In the days of this emperor much war and dissension raged almost through all christian realms, in Austria, Hungary, Poland, in France, in Burgundy, and also here in England, between King Henry VI. and King Edward IV., so that it might have been easy for the Turk to have overrun all the christian realms in Europe, had not the providence of our merciful Lord otherwise provided to keep Amurath the Turk occupied in other civil wars at home in the meanwhile. To this Frederic came Elizabeth, with Ladislav her son, by whom he was nourished and entertained a certain space, till at length, after the death of Uladislav, king of Hungary, the men of Austria, through the instigation of Ulric Eizingerus, and of Ulric, earl of Cilicia, rising in arms, required Frederic the emperor, either to give them their young king, or else to stand to his own defence.

When Frederic heard this, he would neither render a sudden answer, neither would he abide any longer delay; and so the matter going to war, the new city was besieged, where many were slain, and much harm done. At length the emperor's part being the weaker, the emperor, through the intervention of certain nobles of Germany, restored Ladislav to their hands, who being yet under age, committed his three kingdoms to three governors. John Huniades, the worthy captain above-mentioned, had the ruling of Hungary; George Pogiebracius had Bohemia; and Ulric, the earl of Cilicia, had Austria. Which Ulric, having the chief custody of the king, had the greatest authority; a man as full of ambition and tyranny, as he was hated almost by all the Austrians, and shortly after, by means of Eizingerus, was excluded also from the king and the court, but afterward restored again, and Eizingerus thrust out. Such is the unstable condition of those who are in place about princes.

Not long after, Ladislaus, the young king, went to Bohemia to be crowned there, where George Pogiebracius had the government. But Ladislaus during all the time of his being there, though being much requested, yet would neither enter into the churches, nor hear the service of those who followed the doctrine of Huss. So that when a certain priest, in the high tower of Prague, was appointed and addressed, after the manner of priests, to say service before the king, being known to hold with John Huss and Rochezana, the king disdainingly him, commanded him to give place and depart, or else he would send him headlong from the rock of the tower; and so the good minister repulsed by the king, departed. Also, another time, Ladislaus seeing the sacrament carried by a minister of that side, whom they called then Hassites, would pay no reverence to it.

At length the abode of the king, although it was not very long, yet seemed to the godly-disposed to be longer than they wished; and that was not unknown to the king, which made him make the more haste away; but before he departed, he thought first to visit the noble city Uratislavia, in Silesia; in which city Ladislaus being there in the high church at service, many great princes were about him; among whom was also George Pogiebracius, who then stood nearest to the king, to whom one Chilian, playing the parasite about the king, (as the fashion is of such as feign themselves fools, to make other men as very fools as they) spake as follows: "With what countenance you behold this our service I see right well, but your heart I do not see. Say, then, doth not the order of this our religion seem unto you decent and comely? Do you not see how many and how great princes, yea, the king himself, follow one order and uniformity? And why do you then follow rather your preacher Rochezana than these? Do you think a few Bohemians more wise than all the church of Christ besides? Why then do you not forsake that rude and rustic people, and join to these nobles, as you are a nobleman yourself?"

To whom thus Pogiebracius sagely answered, "If you speak these words of yourself, you are not the man whom you feign yourself to be; and so I answer to you not as to a fool. But if you speak this by the suggestion of others, then must I satisfy them. Hear, therefore: As to the ceremonies of the church, every man has a conscience of his own to follow. As for us, we use such ceremonies, as we trust please God: neither is it for our choice to believe what we will ourselves. The mind of man, being persuaded with great reasons, is captivated whether he will or no; and as nature is instructed and taught, so is she drawn, in some one way, and in some another. As for myself, I am fully persuaded in the religion of my preachers. If I should follow thy religion, I might perchance deceive men, going contrary to mine own conscience, but I cannot deceive God, who seeth the hearts of all; neither shall it become me to frame myself to thy disposition. That which is meet for a jester, is not likewise convenient for a nobleman. And these words either take to thyself as spoken to thee, if thou be a wise man, or else I refer them to those who set thee on work."

After the king was returned from the Bohemians again to Austria, the Hungarians likewise made their petitions to the king, that he would come to them. The governor of Hungary was John Huniades, whose victorious acts against the Turks are famous. Against this Huniades, wicked Ulric, earl of Cicilia, did all he could with the king to bring him to destruction, and therefore caused the king to send for him to Vienna, and there privily to work his death. But Huniades having intelligence, offers himself in Hungary, to serve his prince to all affairs. Out of the land where he was, it was neither best, said he, for the king, nor safest for himself to come. The earl being so disappointed, came down with certain nobles of the court to the borders of Hungary, thinking either to apprehend him and bring him to Vienna, or there to dispatch him. Huniades, said he, would commune with him in the open fields, but within the town he should not be brought. After that another train also was laid for him, that under pretence of the king's safe conduct, he should meet the king in the broad fields of Vienna. But Huniades, suspecting deceit, came indeed to the place appointed, where he neither seeing the king to come, nor the earl to have any safe conduct for him, was moved, (and not without cause) against the earl, declaring how it was in his power there to slay him, who went about to seek his blood, but for his reverence to the king he would spare him, and let him go.

Not long after this, the Turk, with a great army of fighting men, to the number of one hundred and fifteen thousand, arrived in Hungary, where he laid siege to the city Alba. But through the merciful hand of God, John Huniades, and Capistranus, a certain Minorite, with a small garrison of christian soldiers, gave him the repulse, and put him to flight, with all his mighty host. Huniades shortly after this victory, died; of whose death when the king and the earl were informed, they came the more boldly into Hungary, where being received by Ladislaus Huniades' son into the town of Alba, there viewed the place where the Turks before had pitched their tents. When this Ladislaus heard that the king was coming first toward the town, he obediently opened to him the gates. He prevented four thousand armed soldiers from entering the city.

In the mean time, while the king was resident in the city, the earl, with other nobles, sat in council, requiring Ladislaus also to resort to them; who first doubting with himself what he might do, at length put on secret armour, and came to them. Whether the earl first began with him, or he with the earl, is not known. The opinion of some is, that Ulric first called him traitor, for shutting the gates against the king's soldiers. However the occasion began, this is undoubted, that Ulric, taking his sword from his page, struck at his head. To break the blow, some putting up their hands had their fingers cut off. The Hungarians, hearing a noise and tumult within the chamber, brake it open, and there instantly slew Ulric the earl, wounding and cutting him almost all to pieces. The king hearing thereof, although he was not a little discontented at it in his mind; yet seeing there was then no other remedy, dissembled his grief for a time.

From thence the king took his journey again to Buda, accompanied with Ladislaus; passing by the town where the wife of Huniades was mourning for the death of her husband, he seemed with many fair words to comfort her, and after he had there sufficiently refreshed himself, with such pretence of dissembled love, and feigned favour, that they were without all suspicion and fear, he set forward from thence in his journey, taking with him the two sons of Huniades, Ladislaus and Matthias, who were right ready to wait upon him. The king being come to Buda, (whether of his own head, or by sinister counsel set on) when he had them at a vantage, caused them both to be seized. And first, Ladislaus, the elder son, was brought forth to the place of execution, there to be beheaded, where he meekly suffered, being charged with no other crime but this, published by the voice of the cryer, saying, "Thus are they to be chastened who are rebels against their lord." Peucer, writing of his death, adds, that after the hangman had struck three blows at his neck, yet Ladislaus, having his hands bound behind him, after the third stroke, rose upright upon his feet, and looking up to heaven, called upon the Lord, and protested his innocency in that behalf; and so laying down his neck again, at the fourth blow was dispatched. Matthias, the other brother, was led captive with the king into Austria. The rest of the captives brake the prison, and escaped.

It was not long after this act of cruelty, the king being about the age of twenty-two years, that talk was made of the king's marriage with Magdalen, daughter to the French king. The place of the marriage was appointed at Prague, where was great preparation for the matter. At the first entrance of the king into the city of Prague, Rochezana, with a company of ministers, such as were favourers of John Huss, and of sincere religion, came with all solemnity to receive the king, making there his oration to congratulate the king's most joyful and prosperous access into his own realm and country of Bohemia. After he had ended his oration, the king would scarcely open his mouth to give thanks to him, or any cheerful countenance to his company, but fiercely seemed to frown upon them. In the next pageant after these came forth the priests of the high minister, after the most popish manner, meeting him with procession, and with the sacrament of the altar. For as a panacea among physicians serves for all diseases, so the sacrament of the pope's altar serves for all pomps and pageants. First it must lie upon the altar, then it must be held up with hands, then it must hang in the pix, it must serve for the living, it must also help the dead, it must visit the sick, it must walk about the churchyard, it must go about the streets, it must be carried about the fields to make the grass to grow, it must be had to the battle, it must ride on horseback before the pope. And finally it must welcome kings into cities. These catholic fathers do seem somewhat to forget themselves. For if the pope, being inferior to the sacrament of the altar, sit still, while the kings come and kiss his feet, what reason is it that the sacrament of the altar, which is above the pope, should meet kings by the way, and welcome them to the town? But this by the way of parenthesis. Let us now continue the text.

When this catholic king, Ladislaus, who had shewed himself before so stout and stern against Rochezana and his company, had seen these catholic priests with their procession, and especially with their blessed sacrament, to come with all reverence and much devotion he lighted down from his horse, he embraced the cross and kissed it, and with cheerful countenance saluted the priests in order. All this while his young wife was not yet come out of France, but legates were sent in the most sumptuous way to conduct her. Other legates also were sent at the same time to the Emperor Frederick for conclusion of peace. The third legacy was directed likewise to Pope Calixtus about religion, how to reduce the Bohemians to the church of Rome. The author of this history (which was Pope Pius himself) declares further the opinion of some to be, that King Ladislaus the same time had intended to make a final end and destruction of all that sect in Bohemia, who held with the doctrine of John Huss and Jerome, by the assembly and concurrence of the catholic princes, and popish prelates, who were appointed there to meet together at that marriage in Prague. For there were to have been first the Emperor Frederick, Elizabeth the king's mother, and his sisters Elizabeth and Anna, the princes of Saxony, Bajoria, Silesia, Franconia, the Palatine, and other princes of the Rhine. Many also of the lords of France, besides the pope's cardinals, legates, prelates, and other potentates of the pope's church, who if they had assembled altogether in Bohemia, no doubt but some great mischief had been wrought there against the Hussites; but when man has purposed, yet God disposes as pleaseth him.

And, therefore, it is truly written by Aeneas Sylvius, in the same place, saying, "De regimine civitatum, de mutatione regnorum, de orbis imperio, minimum est quod homines possint (tum vero de religionis constitutione multo minus) magna magnus disponit Deus." That is, in the government of cities, in alteration of kingdoms, in ruling and governing the world, it is less than nothing that man can do; it is the high God that ruleth high things. Whereunto then I may well add this moreover, and say, that if the governance of worldly kingdoms standeth not in man's power, but in the disposition of God, much less is it then that man's power can do in the ordering and governing of religion. Example whereof in this purposed device of princes doth evidently appear. For as this great preparation and solemnity of marriage was in progress, and the princes ready to set it forth, with a little turn of God's holy hand, all these great purposes were suddenly turned and dashed. For in the midst of this business, about the twenty-first day of November, A.D. 1461, this great adversary of Christ's people, King Ladislaus, king of Bohemia, of Hungary, and prince of Austria sickened, and within six and thirty hours died. As it came not without the just judgment of God, revenging the innocent blood of Ladislaus Huniades' son, so by the opportune death of this king the poor churches of Bohemia were graciously delivered. And this was the end of Ladislaus, one of the mightiest princes at that time in all Europe, in whom three mighty kingdoms were conjoined and combined together, Austria, Hungary, and Bohemia.

After the death of Ladislaus, the kingdom of Bohemia fell to George Pogiebracius, whom Pope Innocent VIII. excommunicated and deposed for his religion.

The kingdom of Hungary was given to Matthias, son of Huniades, who was in captivity (as is said) under King Ladislaus, and would have been put to death after his brother had not the king been overtaken by death.

The noble acts of John Huniades, and of this Matthias his son, were not only great stays to Hungary, but almost to all Christendom, in repelling the Turk. For beside the other victories of John Huniades the father, this Matthias his son succeeding no less in valiantness than in the name of his father, so recovered Sirmium, and the confines of Illyria, from the hand of the Turks, and so vanquished their power, that both Mahomet and also Bajazet his son were forced to seek for truce.

Matthias, conducting his army into Bosnia, recovered again Jaitza, the principal town of that kingdom from the Turks' possession, and if other christian princes had joined their help withal, he would have proceeded farther into Thrace. But behold here the malicious subtlety of Satan, working by the pope; for while Matthias was thus occupied in this expedition against the Turks, wherein he should have been set forward and aided by christian princes and bishops, the bishop of Rome wickedly and sinfully ministers matter of civil discord between him and Pogiebracius, in removing him from the right of his kingdom, and transferring it to Matthias; by which not only the tide of victory against the Turks was stopped, but also great war and bloodshed followed in christian realms, as well between this Matthias and Pogiebracius, with his two sons Victorinus and Henry, as also between Casimir Uladislaus, and Matthias warring about Uratislav, till at length the matter was taken up by the princes of Germany.

Notwithstanding all the execrable excommunication of the pope against Pogiebracius, a great part of Bohemia would not be removed from the obedience of their king, whom the pope had cursed and deposed; yet Matthias took from him Moravia, and a great portion of Silesia, and adjoined it to his kingdom of Hungary, A.D. 1474.

Where this by the way is to be noted, that the religion in Bohemia, planted by John Huss, could not be extinguished or suppressed with all the power of four mighty princes, Vinceslaus, Sigismund, Albert, and Ladislaus, although with the popes they did all they possibly could; but still the Lord maintained the same, as we see by this Pogiebracius, king of Bohemia, whom the pope could not remove out of the kingdom of Bohemia.

This Matthias, beside his other memorable acts of chivalry, is no less also commended for his singular knowledge and love of learning and of learned men, whom he with great salaries brought into Pannonia, where by the means of good letters, and supplies of learned men, he reduced in a short time the barbarous rudeness of that country into a flourishing commonwealth. Moreover, he there erected such a library, and replenished it with all kinds of authors, sciences, and histories, which he caused to be translated out of Greek into Latin, that its equal is not to be found next to Italy, in all Europe beside.

Immediately after this there was contention and war in every part of Europe; almost no angle or portion of all Christendom (whether we consider the church, or civil government) was free from discord, tumults, and dissensions. This cankered worm of ambition so mightily creeps, and every where prevails in these later ends of the world, that it suffers neither rest in commonwealths, nor peace in the church, nor scarcely any spark of charity to remain in the life of men. And what marvel then, if the Lord seeing us so far to degenerate, not only from his precepts and counsels, but almost from the sense and bond of nature, that brother with brother, uncle with nephew, blood with blood, cannot agree, in striving, killing, and fighting, for worldly dominions, do send these cruel Turks upon us, to scourge and devour us? of whose bloody tyranny and daily spilling of christian blood hereafter (by the grace of Christ) we will discourse more at large, when we come to the peculiar consideration of the Turkish histories. In the meantime this shall be for us to note and observe, not so much the scourge how grievous it is; but rather to behold the causes which bring the whip upon us, which is our own miserable ambition and wretched wars among ourselves.

And yet if this christian peace and love, left and commended so heartily unto us by the mouth of the Son of God, being now banished out of christian realms, and civil governance, might at last find some refuge in the church, or take sanctuary among men professing nothing but religion, and we should have less cause to mourn. Now, however, we see little peace and amity among civil potentates; so we find less in the spiritual sort of them, who chiefly take upon them the administration of Christ's church. So that it may well be doubted whether the scourge of the Turk, or the civil sword of princes have slain more in the fields, or the pope's keys have burnt more in towns and cities. And although such as are professed to the church do not fight with sword and target for dominions and revenues, as warlike princes do; yet this ambition, pride and avarice, appears in them nothing inferior to other worldly potentates; especially if we behold the doings and insatiable desires of the court of Rome. Great arguments and proof hereof are neither hard to be found, nor far to be sought; what realm almost through all Christendom has not only seen with their eyes, but have felt in their purses the intolerable ambition and insatiable avarice of that devouring church, and also have complained of the grievance, but never could obtain redress! What exactions and extortions have been here in England out of bishopricks, monasteries, benefices, deaneries, archdeaconries, and all other offices of the church, to fill the pope's coffers! and when they had done all, yet every year brought almost some new invention from Rome to fetch in our English money; and if all the floods in England (yea in all Europe) run into the see of Rome, yet were that ocean never able to be satisfied.

In France likewise what floods of money were swallowed up into this see of Rome! It was openly complained of in the council of Basil, as is testified by Henry Token, canon and ambassador of the archbishop of Maidenburg, that in the council of Basil, A. D. 1436, the archbishop of Lyons declared that in the time of Pope Martin, there came out of France to the court of Rome, nine millions of gold, which was gathered by the bishops and prelates, besides those which could not be counted of the inferior clergy, who daily without number ran to the court of Rome, carrying with them all their whole substance. The archbishop of Tours said also at Basil, A. D. 1439, that three millions of gold came to Rome in his time, within the space of fourteen years, from the prelates and prelacies, besides the inferior clergy who daily ran to that court.

And what made Pope Pius II. labour so earnestly to Lewis XI. the French king, that he should promise to abolish and utterly extinguish the constitution established at the council of Bourges, by King Charles VII. his predecessor, called the Pragmatic Sanction; but only the ambition of that see, which had no measure, and their avarice which had no end? The story is this: King Charles VII. willing to obey and follow the council of Basil, summoned a parliament at Bourges; where by the full consent of all the states in France, both spiritual and temporal, a certain constitution was decreed and published, called the Pragmatic Sanction; wherein was comprehended briefly the pith and effect of all the canons and decrees concluded in the council of Basil. Which constitution King Charles commanded through all his realm to be observed inviolably and ratified for the honour and increase of christian religion for ever. This was A. D. 1438.

It followed that after the decease of Charles, succeeded King Lewis XI. who had promised before, while he was dauphin, to Pope Pius, that if he ever came to the crown, the pragmatic sanction should be abolished. Pius hearing of his being crowned, sent to him John Balveus, a cardinal, with his letters patent, desiring him to be mindful of his promise. The king, either willing, or else pretending a will to perform, and accomplish what he had promised, directed the pope's letters patent, with the cardinal, to the council of Paris, requiring them to consult upon the cause.

Thus the matter being brought and proposed in the parliament, the king's attorney named John Romane, a man well spoken, singularly witty, and well reasoned, stepping forth, with great eloquence, and no less boldness, proved the sanction to be profitable, holy, and necessary for the wealth of the realm, and in no case to be abolished. To whose sentence the university of Paris adjoining their consent, appealed from the attempts of the pope to the next general council. The cardinal understanding this, was not a little indignant at it, fretting and fuming, and threatening many terrible things against them; but notwithstanding all his threatening words, he returned again to the king, not having obtained his purpose, A. D. 1438.

Thus the pope's purpose in France was disappointed, which also in Germany had come to the like effect, if Frederick the emperor had there done his part toward the Germans; they, bewailing their miserable estate, went with humble suit to persuade the emperor, that he should no longer be under the subjection of the popes of Rome, unless they first obtained certain things as touching the charter of appeals; declaring their state to be far worse than the French or Italians. The nobles and commonalty of Germany intreat with most weighty reasons, to have the emperor's aid and help as he was bound to them by an oath; alleging also the great dishonour and ignominy in that they alone had not the use of their own laws, declaring how the French nation had not made their suit to their king in vain against the exactions of popes. The emperor being moved, and partly overcome by their persuasions, promised that he would provide no less for them, than the king of France had done for the French, and to make decrees in that behalf. But the grave authority of Æneas Sylvius, as Platina writes in the history of Pius II. brake off the matter; who by his subtle and pestiferous persuasions, so bewitched the emperor, that he, contemning the equal, just and necessary requests of his subjects, chose Æneas to be his ambassador to Calixtus, the newly chosen pope, to swear to him in his name, and to promise the absolute obedience of all Germany.

And here ceasing with the history of Frederick, we will now proceed to the reign of Maximilian, his son.

I must not pass over such christians as were condemned, and suffered the pains of fire for the testimony of Christ and his truth. Of whom one was John, a pastor or a neat-herd; who was a keeper of cattle: the other was John de Wesalia, although not burned, yet persecuted near to death, under the reign of this emperor, Frederick III.

And first, touching this John the neat-herd, thus writes Munster, that the bishop of Herbitopolis condemned and burned for an heretick one John, who was a keeper of cattle at a town called Nicholas Hausen in Franconia, because he taught and held that the life of the clergy was ignominious and abominable before God.

The other was doctor John de Wesalia, who was complained of to Dietherus the archbishop of Mentz, by the Thomists, upon certain articles and opinions gathered out of his books. Wherefore Dietherus directs commissions to the universities of Heidelburgh and Cologne, to take the matter in examination; who called this Doctor de Wesalia before them, making him to swear that he should present and give up all his treatises, works and writings, whatever he had made or preached; that being done, they divided his books among themselves, severally, every man to find out what heresies and errors they could. His articles and opinions are these:

"That all men be saved freely, and through mere grace by faith in Christ. Free will to be nothing. That we should only believe the word of God, and not the gloss of any man, or the fathers. That the word of God is to be expounded by the collating one place with another. That prelates have no authority to make laws, nor to expound the scriptures, by any peculiar right given to them more than to another. That men's traditions, as fastings, pardons, feasts, long prayers, pilgrimages, and such like, are to be rejected. Extreme unction and confirmation to be reprov'd; confession and satisfaction to be reprehended. The primacy of the pope also he affirmed to be nothing."

Certain other articles also were gathered out of his books by his adversaries, but in such sort, that they may seem rather to follow their own malicious gathering, than the true intention of his mind.

Thus when Wesalia was commanded to appear, there was the archbishop, the inquisitor, the doctors of Cologne, and the doctors of Heidelberg, with the masters of the same, and the rector of the university of Mentz, the dean of faculties, bachelors of divinity, and many other masters of the same university, canons, doctors, with the bishop's chancellor, and his counsellors, besides many religious prelates, scholars, with a doctor of Frankfurt, the somner and beadles, who all met together in the great hall of the minorites, for the examination of this John de Wesalia.

Friar Elton, the inquisitor, first sits in the highest place, then after him, others according to their degree. In the beginning of the examination, first the inquisitor begins with these words, "Most reverend fathers and honourable doctors, &c. Our reverend father and prince elector has caused this present convocation to be called, to hear the examination of Master John de Wesalia, in certain suspected articles concerning the catholic faith. But something I will say before, that may do him good, and desire that two or three of them that favour him, or some other, will rise up and give him counsel to forsake and leave his errors, to acknowledge himself, and to ask pardon; which, if he will do, he shall have pardon; if he will not, we will proceed against him without pardon." And thus Wesalia being cited, and brought in the midst betwixt two minorites, being very aged, and having a staff in his hand, was set before the inquisitor. Beginning to answer for himself with a long protestation, he was not suffered to go on with his oration, but was cut off, and required briefly to make an end, and to tell them in a few words, whether he would stand to his opinions, or to the determination of the church. To this he answered, that he never spake any thing against the determination of the church, but said, "That he had written several treatises, in which, if he had erred, or were found to say otherwise than well, he was contented to revoke and call back the same, and do all things that were requisite." Then said the inquisitor, "Do you ask then pardon?" The other answered, "Why should I ask pardon, when I know no crime or error committed?" The inquisitor said, "Well, we will call you to the remembrance thereof, and proceed to the examination."

In the mean time, others called upon him instantly to ask pardon. Then said Wesalia, "I ask pardon." Notwithstanding which, the inquisitor proceeded to the examination, reading there two instruments, declaring that he had authority from the apostolic see; after this, he cited John to appear to his examination. Thirdly, he commanded him under pain of disobedience, in the virtue of the Holy Ghost, and under pain of excommunication of the greater curse (from which no man could absolve him, but only the pope, or the inquisitor, except only at the point of death) to tell plainly the truth upon such things as should be demanded of him concerning his faith, without doubts and sophistication of words. And so being demanded first whether he believed upon his oath, that he was bound to tell the truth, although it were against himself or any other; to this he answered, "I know it." Then the inquisitor bid him say, "I believe it." To which he answered again, "What need I say that I believe the thing which I know?" There the inquisitor, something stirred with the matter, cried with a loud voice, "Master John, Master John, Master John, say I believe, say I believe;" then he answered, "I believe."

Many other interrogatories were ministered unto him, whereof some were vain, some false.

Being demanded whether he was a favourer of the Bohemians, he said, he was not. Also, being demanded concerning the sacrament of the holy body and blood of our Lord, whether he thought Christ there to be contained really, or only spiritually, and whether he believed that in the sacrament, the substance of bread remained, or only the form of it; to this he answered, not denying but the body of Christ was there really contained, and also that with the body of Christ the substance of bread remained.

After this, he was demanded his opinion concerning religious persons, as monks and nuns, whether he thought them to be bound to the vow of chastity, or to the keeping of any other vow, and whether he said to the friars Minorites any such word in effect, "I cannot save you in this your state and order." This he confessed that he had said, "how that not your religion saveth you, but the grace of God," &c. not denying but they might be saved.

Being required whether he believed, or had written, that there is no mortal sin, but which is expressed to be mortal in the canon of the holy Bible; to this he answered, "that he did so believe as he hath written, till he was better informed." Likewise, being required what he thought of the vicar of Christ in earth, he answered, "That he believed that Christ left no vicar in earth;" for the confirmation of which he alleged and said, "That Christ ascending up to heaven, said, 'Behold I am with you,' &c. In which words he plainly declared, that he would substitute under him no vicar here in earth;" and said, moreover, "if a vicar signified any man who in the absence of the principal hath to do the works of the principal, then Christ hath no vicar here in earth."

In like manner, concerning indulgences and pardons, they demanded of him, whether they had any efficacy, and what he thought of them; he answered "That he had written a certain treatise of that matter, and what he had written in that treatise he would persist therein, which was thus, 'That he believed that the treasure-box of the merits of saints could not be distributed by the pope to others, because that treasure is not left here in earth, for so it is written in the book of Revelations, 'their works follow them;' and that their merits could not be applied to other men, for the satisfaction of their pain due unto them; and therefore that the pope and other prelates, cannot distribute that treasure to men.'"

Also, being demanded what he thought of the hallowing and blessing of altars, chalices, vestments, wax-candles, palms, herbs, holy-water, and other divine things, &c. He answered, "That they had no spiritual virtue and power in them to drive away devils, and that holy-water has no more efficacy than other water not hallowed, as concerning remission of venial sins, and driving away devils, and other effects, which the school doctors attribute to it."

He believed, "That God may give grace to a man, having the use of reason, without all motion of free will." Also, he thought, "that St. Paul, in his conversion, did nothing of his own free will for his conversion." He believed, moreover, "That God may give such grace to a man having the use of reason, not doing that which is in him."

He affirmed, "That nothing is to be believed which is not contained in the canon of the Bible."

Also, "That the elect are saved only by the grace of God."

This examination being ended, and the articles condemned by the inquisitor and his assistants, then he said after this manner. "As you do with me, if Christ himself were here, he might be condemned as a heretic." After this they sent several to him to have communication with him, and to persuade him; at length, within three or four days after, he was content to yield to them, and to submit himself to their holy mother church, and the information of the doctors.

Although this aged and feeble old man, by weakness was constrained to give over to the Romish clergy, by outward profession of his mouth, yet, notwithstanding, his opinions and doctrine declared his inward heart, of what judgment he was, if fear of present death had not forced him to say otherwise than he thought.

In the year 1484, in the Emperor Maximilian's time, died Pope Sixtus IV., who was rather a monster of nature than a prelate of the church. Of him Platina writes, that he unjustly vexed all Italy with war and dissension and openly countenanced and encouraged gross vice and immorality.

Of the said pope it is recorded, that he was a special patron and tutor to all begging friars, granting them to have and enjoy revenues in this world, and in the world to come everlasting life. Among which friars there was one named Alanus de Rupe, a black friar, who made the rosary of our lady's psalter.

Concerning the institution of this rosary, there was a book set forth (about A. D. 1480). In the beginning whereof is declared, "That the blessed virgin entered into the cell of this Alanus, and espoused him to herself as her husband." For the truth of which story Alanus did swear deeply, cursing himself, if it were not even as he had made relation!

But leaving here Pope Sixtus with his vices, let us now proceed to the history of Maximilian, keeping also the order of our kings here in England. For a little before the reign of Maximilian, King Edward IV. died, (A. D. 1483), after he had reigned twenty-two years.

KING EDWARD V.

This King Edward left behind him by his wife Elizabeth, two sons, Edward and Richard, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Cecilia. Which two sons Edward and Richard, as they were under age, and not ripe to govern, a consultation was called among the peers, to debate whether the aforesaid young prince and king, should be under the government of his mother, or else that Richard, duke of Gloucester, brother to King Edward IV., and uncle to the child, should be governor of the king, and protector of the realm. There was then among other noble peers of the realm, the duke of Buckingham, a man of great authority, who had married King Edward's wife's sister. Because the duke being so near allied to the king, had been unkindly, as he thought, treated by the king, having no advancement by him, nor any great friendship shewed to him, he took part with Richard, duke of Gloucester, both against the queen and her children, to make the duke the chief governor and protector. Which being brought to pass, by the aid, assistance, and working of the duke of Buckingham, the queen took sanctuary with her younger son; the elder brother, who was the king, remaining in the custody of the duke of Gloucester, his uncle, who, being now in a good towardness to obtain that which he had long looked for, sought all the means, and soon compassed the matter, by false colour of dissembled words, by perjury, and the labour of friends, namely of the duke of Buckingham, and the cardinal archbishop of Canterbury, that the other brother also should be committed to his care. Thus the ambitious protector and unnatural uncle, having the possession of his two nephews, and innocent babes, thought himself almost up the wheel where he would climb, although he could not walk in such mists and clouds, but his purposes began to be seen, which caused him more secretly to remove from him all suspicion, and to blind the people's eyes. But before he could accomplish his execrable enterprise, there were some whom he thought must first be rid out of the way, namely the Lord Hastings, and the Lord Stanley, who as they were sitting together in council within the Tower, the protector suddenly rushed in among them, and after a few words there communed, he suddenly basted out again, his mind being full of mischief and fury; and within the space of an hour he returned again into the chamber, with a stern countenance and a frowning look, and so sat down in his place. Shortly afterwards he charged them as traitors, and had them both arrested without any cause whatever.

The Lord Hastings was commanded to speed and confess his sins apace, for before dinner the protector swore by St. Paul that he should die; and so without further judgment, his head was struck off.

After this tyrannous murder, the mischievous protector aspiring still to the crown, to set his devices forward, first through gifts and fair promises, suborned Doctor Shaw, a famous preacher then in London, at St. Paul's Cross, to insinuate to the people, that neither King Edward with his sons, nor the duke of Clarence, were the lawful children of the duke of York, but that they were the children of the duchess their mother, by some other person, and that he alone was the true and only lawful heir of the duke of York. Moreover, to declare and to signify to the audience that King Edward was never lawfully married to the queen, but his wife before was dame Elizabeth Lucy, and that so the two children of King Edward were illegitimate, and therefore the title of the crown most rightly pertained to the lord protector. Thus this false flatterer, and loud lying preacher, to serve the protector's humour, was not ashamed most impudently to abuse that holy place, that reverend auditory, and the sacred word of God, whereupon such disdain of the people followed him, that for shame of the people crying out against him, in a few days after he pined away.

When this sermon would take no effect with the people, the protector, unmercifully drowned in ambition, rested not thus, but within a few days after excited the duke of Buckingham, first to break the matter in private talk to the mayor and certain heads of the city picked out for the purpose; that done, to come to the Guildhall, to move the people by all flattering and lying persuasions to the same, which shameless Shaw before had preached at St. Paul's Cross. Which the duke, with all diligence and helps of eloquence, being a man both learned and well spoken, endeavoured to accomplish, making to the people a long and artificial oration, supposing no less, but that the people, allured by his crafty insinuations, would cry, King Richard, King Richard! But there was no King Richard in their mouths, less in their hearts. Whereupon the duke looking to the lord mayor, and asking what this silence meant, contrary to the promise of the one, and the expectation of the other, it was then answered of the mayor, that the people peradventure understood him not; wherefore the duke, reiterating his narration in other words, declared again what he had done before. Likewise the third time he repeated his oration again and again. Then the commons who before stood mute, being now in amaze, seeing this opportunity, began to mutter softly among themselves, but yet no king Richard could sound in their lips, save only that in the nether end of the hall, certain of the duke's servants, with one Nashfield, and other belonging to the protector, thrusting into the hall among the press, began suddenly to cry King Richard, King Richard! throwing up their caps, whereat the citizens turning back their heads, marvelled not a little, but said nothing.

The duke and lord mayor taking this for sufficient testimony, came to the protector, who was then at Baynard's castle. Where the matter being arranged before, was now so contrived, that humble petition was made in the name of the whole commons, to the protector, that he, although it was utterly against his will to take it, yet would of his humility stoop so low as to receive the heavy kingdom of England upon his shoulders. At this their tender request and suit of the lords and commons made, the mild duke, seeing no other remedy, was contented at length to yield, although sore against his will (ye must so imagine), and to submit himself so low, as of a protector to be made king; not much herein unlike to our prelates in the popish church, who when they have before well compounded for the pope's bulls, yet must they for manner sake make courtesy, and thrice deny that for which they so long before have gaped, and so sweetly have paid for.

KING RICHARD III. USURPER.

And thus Richard duke of Gloucester took upon him to be made and proclaimed king of England, in the month of June, A.D. 1483.

The triumph and solemnity of his usurped coronation being finished, this unquiet tyrant yet could not think himself safe, so long as young Edward the right king and his brother were alive; wherefore the next enterprise which he did set upon was this, how to rid those innocent babes out of the way, that he might reign king alone.

In the meantime, while all this ruffing was in hand, what dread and sorrow the tender hearts of these fatherless and friendless children were in, what little joy of themselves, what small joy of life they had, it is not so hard as grievous for tender hearts to understand. As the younger brother lingered in thought and heaviness, so the prince, who was eleven years old, was so out of heart, and so fraught with fear, that he never tied his points, nor enjoyed good day, till the traitorous impiety of their cruel uncle had delivered them of their wretchedness. After King Edward their uncle had first attempted to compass his devilish device by Robert Brakenbury, constable of the Tower, and could not win him to such a cruel act, then he got one James Tyril, and with him John Dighton, and Miles Forrest, to perpetrate this heinous murder. Dighton and Forrest, about midnight entering into the princes' chamber, so wrapped and entangled them amongst the clothes, keeping down the feather-bed and pillows hard to their mouths, that within a while they smothered and stifled them in their bed.

And thus these two young princes ended their lives, through the wretched cruelty of these tormentors, who, for their detestable and bloody murder, escaped not long unpunished by the just hand of God. For first Miles Forrest miserably rotted away by piece meal. John Dighton lived at Calais long after, so disdained and hated, that he was pointed at by all men, and died there in great misery. Sir James Tyril was beheaded at Tower Hill for treason. Also King Richard himself, within a year and half after, was slain in the field, hacked and hewed by his enemies' hands.

Furthermore, the justice of God's hand let not the duke of Buckingham escape free; for within less than a year after God so wrought, that he was beheaded for treason by the king, whom he so unjustly before had advanced.

Doctor Morton, bishop of Ely, had devised bringing Henry, earl of Richmond, to England, and marrying him to Elizabeth, King Edward's daughter, thereby joining the two houses of York and Lancaster together. This device was first broken to the duke of Buckingham, which soon after cost him his life. But that bishop, more crafty to save himself, fled into Brittany; the device however once being broached, was so plausible and took such effect, that a message was sent over the sea to Henry, earl of Richmond, by his mother, and by the queen, mother to the Lady Elizabeth, that if he would make his return, and promise to marry with the Lady Elizabeth, King Edward's daughter, he should be received.

Embracing this offer, the earl of Richmond takes the seas at Harfleur, in the month of August, (A.D. 1485), accompanied only with two thousand men, and a small number of ships, arrived at Milford Haven, in Wales, and first came to Dale, then to Harford West, where he was joyfully received, and also by the coming in of Arnold Butler, and the Pembroke men, was increased in power. From thence he removing by Cardigan to Shrewsbury, and then to Newport, and so to Stafford, from thence to Lichfield, his army still more and more augmented. As a great flood, by coming in of many small rivers, gathers more abundance of water; so to this earl, many noble captains and men of power joined themselves, as Richard Griffith, John Morgan, Rice ap Thomas; then Sir George Talbot, with the young earl of Shrewsbury, his ward; Sir William Stanley; Sir Thomas Burchier; and Sir Walter Hungerford, knights. At last the earl, hearing of the king's coming, conducted his whole army to Tamworth.

King Richard, hearing of the arrival of the Earl Henry in the parts of Wales with so small a force, gave little or no regard to it. But understanding that he was come to Lichfield, without resistance or incumbrance, he was sore moved, cursing and crying out against them who had so deceived him, and in all speed sent for John duke of Norfolk, Henry earl of Northumberland, Thomas earl of Surrey, with other friends of special trust. Robert Brakenbury also, lieutenant of the Tower, was sent for, with Sir Thomas Burchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, with certain other knights and esquires, whom he partly misdoubted. Thus, King Richard, well fortified and accompanied, leaving nothing undone that diligence could require, set forward toward his enemies. The earl by this time was come to Tamworth, to whom secretly in the evening, resorted Sir John Savage, Sir Bryan Sanford, Sir Simon Digby, and many others, forsaking the part of King Richard, whom all good men hated, as he indeed deserved. The king, having perfect knowledge of the earl being encamped at Tamworth, embattled himself in a place near a village called Bosworth, not far from Leicester, determining there to encounter his adversaries. Here the matter lay in great doubt and suspense concerning the Lord Stanley, (who was the earl's father-in-law, and had married his mother) to whose part he would incline. For although his heart went (no doubt) with the earl, and he had secret conference with him the night before, yet because of his son and heir, George Lord Strange, being then in the hands of King Richard, lest the king should attempt any thing against him, he durst not be seen openly to go that way where in heart he favoured, and therefore, closely kept himself between both, till the push came that his help might be of signal service.

The number of the earl's party was not more than one half of the side of King Richard. When the time and place was appointed, where the two battles should encounter and join together, sore stripes and great blows were given on both sides, and many slain. If number and multitude might govern the success of battle, King Richard had double the earl. But it is God, not man, that giveth victory, by what means it seemeth best to his divine providence. In what order, and by what occasion this field was won and lost, the certain intelligence we possess not, only the history of Polydore Virgil, whom Sir Thomas More follows word for word. In which history it appears, that as these two armies were coupling together, King Richard understanding by his spies where the earl of Richmond was, and how he was but slenderly accompanied, and seeing him approach more near to him, rather carried with courage, than ruled with reason, set spurs to his horse, and ranging out of the compass of his ranks, pressed toward the earl, and set upon him so sharply, that first he killed Sir William Brandon, the earl's standard-bearer, father to the Lord Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, then after overthrew Sir John Cheinie, thinking likewise to oppress the earl. But as the Lord by his secret providence disposeth the event of all things, as the earl with his men about him, being overmatched, began to despair of victory, suddenly and opportunely came Sir William Stanley, with three thousand well-appointed able men, whereby King Richard's men were driven back, and he himself, cruelly fighting in the thick of his enemies, was slain, and brought to his confusion and death, which he worthily deserved.

In the meantime, the earl of Oxford, who had the guiding of the forward, discomfited the forefront of King Richard's host, and put them to flight, in which chase many were slain, of noblemen especially above others, John duke of Norfolk, Lord Ferrers, Sir Richard Radcliff, and Robert Brakenbury, lieutenant of the Tower, &c. Lord Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, there submitted himself, and although he was not received at first to grace, but remained long in the Tower, yet at length, for his fidelity, he was delivered and advanced to his recovered honour and dignity again.

This King Richard had but one son, who, shortly after the cruel murder of King Edward's sons, was taken with sickness and died.

Moreover, as to the Lord Stanley, thus reports the history, that King Richard being in Bosworth field, sent for Lord Stanley by a pursuivant, to advance with his company, otherwise he swore by Christ's passion, that he would strike off his son's head before dinner. The Lord Stanley sent word again, that if he did, he had more sons alive. The king immediately commanded the Lord Strange to be beheaded; at the very time when both the armies were within sight, and were ready to join together. Wherefore the king's councillors, pondering the time and the case, persuaded the king that it was now time to fight, and not to do execution, advising him to delay the matter till the battle was ended. And so (as God would) King Richard breaking his oath, or rather keeping his oath, for he himself was slain before dinner, the Lord Strange was committed to be kept prisoner within the king's tent; who then, after the victory was gotten, was sought out and brought to his joyful father. And thus you have the tragical life and end of this wretched King Richard.

Henry, the earl of Richmond, after hearty thanks given to Almighty God for his glorious victory, proceeded to the town of Leicester, where the crown was brought to him by the Lord Strange, and put on the earl's head.

In the meantime the dead corpse of King Richard was shamefully carried to the town of Leicester, being naked and despoiled to the skin; and being trussed behind a pursuivant of arms, was carried like a hog or a dog, having his head and arms hanging on the one side of the horse, and the legs on the other side, all sprinkled with mire and blood. And thus ended the usurped reign of King Richard, who reigned two years and two months.

KING HENRY THE SEVENTH.

When King Henry, by the providence of God, had obtained this triumphant victory and diadem of the realm, first sending for Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, son to George duke of Clarence, and committing him to safe custody within the Tower, from Leicester he removed to London, and not long after, according to his oath and promise made before, he espoused the young Lady Elizabeth, heir of the house of York; whereby both the houses of York and Lancaster were joined together, to the no little rejoicing of all English hearts, and no less quiet unto the realm, which was A.D. 1485. This king reigned twenty-three years and eight months, and being a prince of great policy, justice, and temperance, kept his realm in good tolerable rule and order. And here, interrupting a little the course of our English matters, we will now (the Lord willing) enter the history above promised, of Maximilian the emperor, and matters of the empire, especially such as pertain to the church.

MAXIMILIAN THE EMPEROR.

So happy was the education of this emperor in good letters, so expert he was in languages and sciences, but especially such was his dexterity and promptness in the Latin tongues, that he, imitating the example of Julius Cæsar, did write and comprehend in Latin histories his own acts and feats. Moreover, as he was learned himself, so he was a singular patron and advancer of learned students, as may well appear by the erecting and setting up the university of Wittenburgh. By this emperor many in those days were excited to embrace as well other liberal arts, as also the searching out of old histories, by which several persons were induced to exercise their diligence in collecting and explaining matters pertaining to the knowledge of history, as well of ancient as also of later times, as Cuspinianus, Nauclerus, Conradus, Peutingerus, Manlius, and others.

Here now it began to appear, what great benefit was conferred on the world by the art and faculty of printing. Through means of which the church and commonwealth of Christ began now to be replenished with learned men.

Among the many learned men of this time, must be numbered Weselus Groningensis, otherwise named Basilus. He was so notable and worthy a man, that the people called him "The Light of the World."

Concerning his doctrine, he reprehended the opinion of the papists, as touching repentance, which they divided into three parts, of which three parts, satisfaction and confession he disallowed. Likewise purgatory and supererogation of works and pardons he disproved, both at Rome and at Paris. He spake against the pope's indulgences, by occasion of which several of the pope's court, being persuaded by him, began to speak more freely against the matter, than he himself had done.

The abuses of masses, and praying for the dead he disallowed; and likewise the supremacy of the pope he utterly rejected, denying utterly that any supreme head or governor ought to be in the world over all other; affirming also, and saying many times, "That the pope had no authority to do any thing by commandment, but by truth, that is, so far as truth goes with him, so far his sentence to stand; neither that he ought to prevail by commanding, but only by teaching, as every true christian bishop may prevail over another." Also in some places in his writings he denies not, "but that pope's and their spiritual prelates, proceeding against Christ's doctrine, are plain antichrists."

Also, Weselus witnesses, that the fathers who were before Albert and Thomas, did resist and withstand the pope's indulgences, calling them in their writings, plain idolatry, mere fraud and error; adding moreover, that unless the severity of some good divines had withstood these pardons and indulgences of the pope, innumerable errors had overthrown the church.

By this it may be seen and noted, how, by the grace of God and gift of printing, first came forth learning, and by learning came light to judge and discern the errors of the pope from the truth of God's word.

About the very same time, when the gospel began thus to branch and spring in Germany, the host of Christ's church began also to muster and to multiply here in England. For not long after the death of this Weselus, A.D. 1494, and in the ninth year of the reign of Henry VII., on the twenty-eighth of April, a very old woman named Joan Boughton, widow, and mother to the Lady Young, was burned, which lady was also suspected to be of that opinion which her mother was. Her mother was fourscore years of age or more, and held eight of Wickliff's opinions (which opinions my author does not shew) for which she was burnt in Smithfield. Our author says she was a disciple of Wickliff, whom she accounted for a saint, and held so fast and firmly eight of his ten opinions, that all the doctors of London could not turn her from one of them; and when it was told her that she should be burnt for her obstinacy and false belief, she set nothing by their menacing words, but defied them; for she said she was so beloved of God, and his holy angels, that she cared not for the fire, and in the midst thereof she cried to God to take her soul into his holy hands. The night following that on which she was burnt, the most part of her ashes were taken away by such as had a love to the doctrine that she died for.

Shortly after the martyrdom of this godly aged mother, on the seventeenth of January, A.D. 1497, being Sunday, two men, the one called Richard Milderale, and the other James Sturdy, performed the penance of carrying fagots before the procession of St. Paul's, and afterwards stood before the preacher in the time of his sermon. And upon the Sunday following two other men stood at Paul's Cross all the sermon time; the one garished with painted and written papers, the other having a fagot on his neck. After that in Lent season, upon Passion Sunday, one Hugh Glover bore a fagot before the procession of St. Paul's, and after with the fagot stood before the preacher all the sermon time at Paul's Cross. And on the Sunday next following four men stood, and did their open penance at Paul's Cross in the sermon time, and many of their books were burnt before them at the cross.

The next year following, which was in the beginning of May, A.D. 1498, the king then being at Canterbury, a priest was burnt, who was so strong in his opinion that all the clerks and doctors then there being could not remove him from his faith. Whereof the king being informed, he caused the priest to be brought before his presence, who by his persuasion caused him to revoke, but still he was burnt immediately.

In the same year above mentioned, which was A.D. 1498, after the beheading of Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, and son to the duke of Clarence, the king and queen being removed to Calais, a certain godly man and a constant martyr of Christ, named Babram, in Norfolk, was burnt in the month of July.

About which year likewise, or in the year next following, the twentieth day of July, was an old man burnt in Smithfield.

In the year 1499, the martyrdom and burning of Jerome Savanarola took place, a man no less godly in heart than constant in his profession. Who being a monk in Italy, and singularly well learned, preached against the evil living of the spirituality, and especially of his own order, complaining against them as the springs and authors of all mischiefs and wickedness. Whereupon, by the help of certain learned men, he began to seek reformation in his own order. The pope perceiving this, and fearing that Jerome, who was now in great reputation among all men, should diminish or overthrow his authority, he ordained his vicar or provincial to see reformation of these matters, which vicar with great superstition began to reform things; but Jerome always withstood him, whereupon he was complained of to the pope, and because contrary to the pope's commandment he withstood his vicar, he was accused. But for all that Jerome left not off preaching, but threatened Italy with the wrath and indignation of God, and prophesied to them, that the land should be overthrown for the pride and wickedness of the people, and for the untruth, hypocrisy, and falsehood of the clergy, which God would not leave unrevenge, as it afterwards came to pass, when King Charles came into Italy and to Rome, and so straightly beset Pope Alexander, that he was forced to make composition with the king.

Now as Jerome would not leave off preaching, he was commanded to appear before the pope, to give account of his new learning (for so then they called the truth of the gospel), but he made his excuse that he could not come. Then he was again forbidden by the pope to preach, and his learning pronounced and condemned as pernicious, false, and seditious.

This Jerome, as a man worldly wise, foreseeing the great perils and dangers that might come unto him, for fear left off preaching; but when the people, who sore hungered and longed for God's word, were urgent on him that he would preach again, he began again to preach A.D. 1496, in the city of Florence; and although many counselled him that he should not do so without the pope's commandment, yet he did not regard it, but went forward freely of his own good-will. When the pope and his shavelings heard news of this they were grievously incensed and inflamed against him, and now again cursed him, as an obstinate and stiff-necked heretic. But for all that, Jerome proceeded in teaching and instructing the people, saying that men ought not to regard such curses, which are against the true doctrine and the common advantage, whereby the people should be taught and amended, Christ's kingdom enlarged, and the kingdom of the devil utterly overthrown.

In all his preaching he desired to teach no other thing than only the pure and simple word of God, making often protestation that all men should certify him if they had heard him teach or preach anything contrary thereto, for upon his own conscience he knew not that he had taught anything but the pure word of God. What his doctrine was all men may easily judge by his books that he has written.

After this (A.D. 1498,) he was taken and brought out of St. Mark's cloister, and two other friars with him, named Dominic and Sylvester, who favoured his learning, and was carried into prison, where he wrote a godly meditation upon that most comfortable thirty-first Psalm: "In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust, let me never be ashamed: deliver me in thy righteousness." Wherein he doth excellently describe and set forth the continual strife between the flesh and the spirit.

After this the pope's legates came to Florence, and called forth these three good men, threatening them marvellously; but they continued still constant. Then came the chief counsellors of the city, with the pope's commissioners, who had gathered out certain articles against these men, whereupon they were condemned to death; the tenour of which articles hereafter ensue:—

1. The first article was as touching our free justification through faith in Christ.
2. That the communion ought to be ministered under both kinds.
3. That the indulgences and pardons of the pope were of no effect.
4. For preaching against the filthy and wicked living of the cardinals and clergy.
5. For denying the pope's supremacy.
6. Also that he had affirmed that the keys were not given to Peter alone, but unto the universal church.
7. Also, that the pope did neither follow the life nor doctrine of Christ, for that he attributed more to his own pardons and traditions, than to Christ's merits, and therefore he was antichrist.
8. Also, that the pope's excommunications are not to be feared, and that he who doth fear or flee them is excommunicated of God.
9. That auricular confession is not necessary.
10. That he had moved the citizens to uproar and sedition.
11. That he had neglected and condemned the pope's citation.
12. That he had shamefully spoken against and slandered the pope.
13. That he had taken Christ to witness of his naughtiness and heresy.
14. Also, that Italy must be cleansed through God's scourge, for the manifold wickedness of the princes and clergy.

These and such other articles were laid against them and read before them. Then they demanded of Jerome and his companions, whether they would recant and give over their opinions. They answered, that through God's help they would steadfastly continue in the manifest truth, and not depart from the same. Then were they degraded one after another by the bishop of Vasion, and so delivered over to the secular rulers of Florence, with commandment to carry them forth, and handle them as obstinate and stiff-necked heretics.

Thus was this worthy witness of Christ, with the other two, first hanged up openly in the market-place, and afterward burnt to ashes, and the ashes gathered up, and cast into the river of Aron, the 24th of May, A.D. 1499. This Savanarola suffered under Pope Alexander VI.

Now to return to the order of popes, where we left off with Innocent VIII. After Innocent succeeded Pope Alexander VI. In Alexander, among other horrible things, this is to be noted, that when Gemes, brother to Bajazet the great Turk, was committed by the Rhodians to the safe custody, first of Pope Innocent, then of Alexander VI., (for whose keeping, the pope received every year forty thousand crowns); yet, when Pope Alexander was compelled to send Gemes to Charles VIII., the French king, as a pledge, he, being hired by the Turk, caused Gemes to be poisoned at Terracina.

Moreover, it appears that this Alexander taking displeasure with Charles the French king, about the winning of Naples, sent to Bajazet the Turk, to fight against Charles.

Munsterus declaring the history of Gemes something otherwise, saith that he was first committed by the Rhodians to the French king. And when Alexander the pope, through his fraudulent flattery, got him out of the hands of the French king into his own, then by his means Gemes afterward was poisoned, as is before expressed.

To these poisoning acts of the pope, let us also add his malicious wickedness, with like fury exercised upon Antonius Mancinellus, a man of excellent learning, because he wrote an eloquent oration against his wicked manners and filthy life, with other vices; he therefore commanded both his hands and his tongue to be cut off, playing with him, as M. Antonius the tyrant before did with M. Cicero, for writing against his horrible life. At length, as one poison requires another, this poisoning pope, as he was sitting with his cardinals, and other rich senators of Rome at dinner, his servants unawares brought to him a wrong bottle, by which he was poisoned, and some of his cardinals who were about him.

In the time of this Pope Alexander also it happened, that the angel, which stood in the high top of the pope's church, was beaten down with terrible thunder. After this pope, succeeded Pius III., (A. D. 1503.) After whom came Julius II., a man so far passing all other in iniquity, that Wigelius, and such other of his own friends, are compelled to say of him, "that he was more given to war and battle, than to Christ." Concerning the madness of this man, it is most certainly known, that when he was going to war, he cast the keys of St. Peter into the river Tiber, saying, that as the keys of St. Peter would not serve him to his purpose, he would betake himself to the sword of St. Paul.

Of this Julius it is certainly reported, that partly with his wars, and partly with his cursings, in the space of seven years, as good as two hundred thousand christians were destroyed. First, he besieged Ravenna against the Venetians, then Servia, Imolia, Faventia, Forolivium, Bononia, and other cities, which he got out of princes' hands, not without much bloodshed. The chronicles of John Sleidan make mention, that when this Julius was made pope, he took an oath, promising to have a council within two years; but when he had no leisure, being occupied with his wars in Italy among the Venetians, and with the French king, and in Ferrara, and in other countries, nine of his cardinals departing from him, came into Milan, and there appointed a council at the city of Pisa; among whom, the chief were Bernard, Crucellus, William Frenestinus, Francis, Constantine, with others; to whom also were added, the proctors of Maximilian the emperor, and of Charles the French king. So the council was appointed (A. D. 1511) to begin in the kalends of September. The cause why they called this council was, that the pope having broken his oath, gave no hope of having any council; and also because there were other crimes of which they had to accuse. Their purpose was to remove him out of his seat, which he had procured through bribes and ambition. Julius hearing this, commands, under great penalties, that no man should obey them, and himself calls another council against the next year, to be begun the nineteenth day of April. The French king understanding that Pope Julius had joined with the Venetians, to take their part against him, assembled a council at Turin, in the month of September; in which council these questions were proposed.

Whether it was lawful for the pope to wage war against any prince without cause?

Whether any prince in defending himself, might invade his adversary, and deny his obedience?

To which questions it was answered, that the bishop ought not to invade, and also that it was lawful for the king to defend himself. Moreover, that the pragmatistical sanction was to be observed through the realm of France, and that excommunications ought not to be feared, if they were found to be unjust. After this the king sent to Julius the answer of his council, requiring him either to agree to peace, or to appoint a general council somewhere else, where this matter might be more fully decided. Julius would do neither of these, but forthwith accursed Charles, the French king, with all his kingdom. At length at Ravenna, in a great battle, he was overcome by the French king, and at last, after much slaughter, and great bloodshed, and mortal war, this pope died the twenty-first day of February, A. D. 1513.

If it were not that I am afraid of filling this volume with foreign histories, when I have professed chiefly to treat of Acts and Monuments done here at home, I would add after these popes something also of the Turks' history, of their rise and cruel persecution of the saints of God, to the great peril of Christendom; yet there are certain causes which necessarily require their wicked proceedings, their cruel tyranny, and bloody victories, the ruin and subversion of so many christian churches, with the horrible murders and captivity of infinite christians, to be made known, as well to this our country of England, as also to other nations.

The great victories of the Turks, and the want of success of our men fighting against them, may admonish and teach us, following the example of the old Israelites, how to seek for greater strength to encounter with these enemies of Christ than hitherto we have done. First, we must consider that the whole power of Satan, the prince of this world, goes with the Turks, to resist which no strength of man's arm is sufficient, but only the name, spirit, and power of our Lord Jesus the Son of God going with us in our battles, as among the old Israelites the ark of God's covenant and promise went with them also fighting against the enemies of God. For so are we taught in the scripture, that we christian men have no strength but in Christ only. Whether we war against the devil, or against the Turk, it is true what the scripture saith, "without me you can do nothing." There is no power to stand against the devil, or to conquer the world, unless our faith only, to which all the promises of God (touching salvation) are annexed, beyond which promises we must not go, for the word must be our rule. He that presumes beyond the promises in the word expressed, goes not, but wanders, he cannot tell whither. Neither must we appoint God how to save the world, but must take that way which he hath appointed. Let us not set God to school, nor comprehend his Holy Spirit within our knowledge. He that made us without our counsel, did also redeem us as pleased him. If he be merciful, let us be thankful. And if his mercies surmount our capacity, let us therefore not resist but search his word, and thereto apply our will, which if we will do, all our contentions will be soon at a point. Let us, therefore, search the will of our God in his word; and if he wills his salvation to stand free to all nations, why do we make merchandise thereof? If he has graciously offered his waters to us, without money, or money's worth, let us not hedge in the plenteous springs of his grace so freely given us.

And if God has determined his own Son to stand alone, let us not presume to mix with his majesty any of our trumpery. He that brings St. George or St. Dennis as patrons to the field to fight against the Turk, leaves Christ (no doubt) at home. Now how we have fought these many years against the Turk, though history keeps silence, yet the success declares. We fight against a persecutor, being no less persecutors ourselves. We wrestle against a bloody tyrant, and our hands are as full of blood as his. He kills Christ's people with the sword, and we burn them with fire. He observing the works of the law, seeks his justification by the same, the like also do we. But neither he nor we seek our justification as we should, that is, only by faith in the Son of God.

And what marvel then, our doctrine being almost as corrupt as his, and our conversation worse, if Christ fight not with us, fighting against the Turk? The Turk hath prevailed so mightily, not because Christ is weak, but because Christians are wicked, and their doctrine impure. Our temples are polluted with images, and our hearts with idolatry; our priests sin before God in adultery, being restrained from lawful matrimony. The name of God is in our mouths, but his fear is not in our hearts. We war against the Turk with our works, masses, traditions, and ceremonies, but we fight not against him with Christ, and with the power of his glory, which if we did the field were won.

I do believe, that when the church of Christ with the sacraments thereof shall be so reformed, that Christ alone shall be received to be our justifier, all other religions, merits, traditions, images, patrons and advocates set apart, the sword of the christians, with the strength of Christ, shall soon vanquish the Turks' pride and fury. But of this I will treat more largely in the process of this history.

As to the time when this sect of Mahomet first began, history does not fully consent, but it is generally reckoned from his flight from Mecca, (A. D. 622), which they call the Hegyra, and in the eleventh year of Heraclius the emperor of Constantinople.

In this all writers agree, that this damnable Mahomet was born in the country of Arabia, bordering on the east part of Judea, (A. D. 571.) His father was an Arabian of the tribe of Koreish, and his mother was an Ishmaelite, which Ishmaelites being a people of Arabia, were called the Hagarens, which term Mahomet afterwards turned to the name of Saracens. Of this wretched Mahomet mention was made before, where we shewed, how he making himself the highest prophet of all other, yet denies not Christ to be an holy prophet, and next to him, and Moses also to be another. Moreover, he denies not Mary the mother of Christ to be a virgin, and to have conceived Christ by the Holy Ghost: affirming farther, that Christ in his own person was not crucified, but another called Judas for him. He greatly commends John the son of Zachary for a chaste man, when he himself permits a man to have four wives, and as many concubines as he is able to find, and saith that whereas Christ and other prophets had the gift given them to work miracles, he was sent by force of the sword, to compel men to his religion.

The prodigious vanities, lies, and blasphemies contained in his law, called The Alkoran, are rather to be laughed at than recited.

It is thought that Sergius, a Nestorian, assisted Mahomet, in contriving this Alkoran, and so it appears by the scope, which especially tends to this end, to take the divinity from the person of Christ, whom he grants notwithstanding to be a most holy man, and also that he is received up to God, and shall come again to kill antichrist, &c.

Moreover, this ridiculous Alkoran is so intermingled with mixtures of the Christian, Jewish, and the Gentile laws, giving such liberty to all the lusts of the flesh, setting up circumcision, abstaining from swine's flesh, and Jewish washings, and so much stands upon father Abraham, that it is supposed by some that this filthy Alkoran was set out in the days of Mahomet, but that certain Jews had some handling also in the matter, and put it out after his death.

After Mahomet had thus seduced the people, teaching them that he came not by miracles, but by the sword to give his law, and that they who will not obey it must either be put to death, or else pay tribute (for so are the words of the Alkoran); and after he had gathered the strength of the Arabians about him, which Arabians had then occasion to rebel against the emperor, because their stipends were not paid them by the emperor's officers, he began to range with force and violence in parts of Syria, and subdued Mecca, then Damascus, and further increasing in power he entered Egypt, and subdued the same. From thence he turned against the Persians. Chosroes, the king of Persia, encountered him with a powerful army, and overthrew the Saracens, and put Mahomet to flight. Of these Persians came the Turks, who afterward joining with the Saracens, maintained them against the christians.

After the death of this beast, (A. D. 632), who, as some say, was poisoned in his house, he was succeeded by his father-in-law, Abubeker, who took upon him the government of their followers, and got the city Gaza, and besieged also Jerusalem. He reigned two years at Damascus.

After him followed Omar, who conquered a great part of Syria, Egypt, and Persia.

The fourth king of the Saracens, after Mahomet, was Othman, then followed Ali the son-in-law of Mahomet, and after him Mahuvias, or Moawiyah, who, after a siege of seven years, obtained the christian city of Cesarea; also overcame the Persians, and subdued that country to his law.

Thus the wicked Saracens, in the space of thirty years, subdued Arabia, got Palestine, Phoenicia, Syria, Egypt, and Persia.

Not long after Heraclius, emperor of Constantinople, succeeded Constans his nephew, who, in the sixteenth year of his empire, fighting unluckily against the Saracens in Lycia, was overthrown by Mahuvias, A. D. 657. The Saracens after this victory spoiled all Rhodes.

These cursed Saracens, in these great victories and conquests, were not without domestic sedition and divisions, yet the princes of the Saracens, then called Sultans, had in their possession the government of Syria, Egypt, Africa, and of a great part of Asia, about four hundred years, till at length the Saracen king who ruled in Persia, fighting against the Saracen of Babylon, sought aid of the Turks to fight with him against the sultan of Babylon. The Turks by little and little surprised the sultan of Persia, and not long after usurped the kingdom of Persia; and this is the first beginning of the Turkish dominion.

These Turks, after they had thus overcome many countries and provinces, and made their power large and mighty both in Asia and Europe, began to divide their kingdoms and countries among themselves. But when they could not agree, but with deadly war contended for the bounds of those kingdoms and dominions, four of the principal families conquering and subduing all the rest, parted the whole empire among themselves. And yet they also were not contented, but fell to such cruel hatred, contention, war, and slaughter (no doubt by the just judgment of God against his blasphemous enemies), that there was no end of it, until the remnant of the ancient Turks was utterly rooted out.

These four families, with their captains and armies, about A. D. 1330, went raging throughout all Asia and Europe, and every one of them conquered some part of the countries where they passed.

The causes of these great invasions and victories, were the dissension and discord, falsehood, idleness, unconstancy, greedy avarice, lack of truth and fidelity among christian men of all states and degrees, both high and low. For by the wilful defection and backsliding of the christians, the Turkish power exceedingly increased, in that many desiring the licentious life and liberty of war and allured with the prosperous success of things, forsook the church of God, and made themselves bond-slaves to Mahomet and his devilish sect, both because liberty is delightful to all men, and partly also because as fortune favours, so commonly the wills of men incline. And again, such as are profane and without the fear of God (of whom there is an infinite number in the church) in all ages are wont commonly to judge of religion, according to the success of realms and kingdoms. For many, not only for the variety of opinions, but also for the diversity of events and fortune among men, have inquired, and do inquire whether there is any church of God distinct from other nations, what it is, and where it is; especially as the greatest part of men, both in the old time when the four monarchies flourished, was ignorant of this doctrine, which is peculiar to the church alone, and now also the barbarity of Mahomet prevails and reigns in the most part of the world. And how stands this with man's reason, that a small number, both miserable and also feeble and broken with many battles, should be regarded and loved of God, and the other flourishing in all wealth, prosperity, victory, authority, and power, should be rejected and despised of God, seeing there is no power and authority, but by the ordinance of God? Although therefore the power of the Turks has been, for these two hundred years, of greater force than any other monarchy of the world besides, yet is there no imperial dignity to be regarded in that Turkish tyranny, but among those nations only, where the heavenly doctrine of the gospel is preached, and other disciplines necessary for the church of God, and the common life of man maintained and regarded, where the laws of God, and other honest and civil ordinances agreeable to the same, flourish and reign; where lawful judgment is exercised; where virtue is honoured and rewarded; where sin and wickedness is punished; where honest families are maintained and defended.

These things are not regarded among the Turks, the enemies of the Son of God, and all lawful empires, because they dissolve and reject all godly societies, honest discipline, good laws, politics, righteous judgment, the ordinance of matrimony, and godly families. For what has the empire of the Turks been hitherto, but most deadly, cruel, and perpetual war, to work all mischief, destruction, and desolation? To subvert good laws, cities, kingdoms, policies, and to enlarge their cruel power and dominion? The stay and strength whereof is not love and favour proceeding of virtue and justice, as in lawful and well governed empires; but fear, violence, oppression, swarms and infinite thousands of barbarous and most wicked people, ministers of Satan's malice and fury. Which kind of dominion and tyranny has been condemned by the voice of God many years ago; the testimonies whereof the Lord would have to remain in the church, lest the godly, being moved with the power and success thereof, should fall away and forsake the Son of God.

Wherefore, let us not seek for any imperial state in that barbarity; but let us be thankful, and acknowledge the great benefit of God, that he hath reserved to us certain remnants of the Roman empire; and let us call upon him daily with hearty petitions and groans, and with zeal and love to the house of God, that this Turkish power joined with the malice of Satan against the Son of God, prevail not against the poor congregations and little remnant of his church, as it has hitherto done against those strong and noble christian kingdoms and churches, where now we see the Turkish tyranny to reign, and Satan to have taken full possession. Whose state was once far better than ours is now, and more likely to continue without such horrible overthrows and desolation. O that we might foresee a little the great danger that hangs over our heads! For though the Turk seems to be far off, yet do we nourish within our breasts at home, that which may soon cause us to feel his cruel hand and worse, if worse may be; to overrun us; to lay our land waste; to scatter us among the infidels, the enemies and blasphemers of the Son of God.

Now, although these four families above-mentioned long continued together in bloody wars, deadly hatred, yet one of them passed the rest in all cruelty and tyranny, and subduing the other three families, took upon him the government alone, and so became the first monarch, or emperor, that reigned amongst them, called Ottoman, of whom all that reigned after him were called Ottomans, who succeeding in the order of his line, have occupied the same dominion and seat of the Turks, from A. D. 1300, to this present time, to the number of twelve, of which twelve, in such order as they lived and reigned, I intend (Christ so permitting) severally and compendiously shortly to treat, briefly abstracting, out of prolix and tedious writers, such particulars as for us christians shall be briefly requisite to be known.

THE TWELVE GREAT EMPERORS OF THE TURKS.

I. OTTOMAN.—This man was at first of poor estate, and obscure among the common sort of men, coming of a base progeny, and of rustic parents; but through his valiantness and activity in war, he got him a great name among the Turks. For he being a man of fierce courage, refusing no labour, delighting in war, and gathering together by great subtlety a multitude of common soldiers, began to make war, and by conquest and victories to advance himself and his family. First, he began to rob and spoil with a great band of rovers, and afterward he attempted to set upon all men. Neither did he vex and destroy the christians only, but set upon his own nation also, and sought all occasion to subdue them wholly to him. For now the princes and captains of the Turks, inflamed with ambition and desire of rule, began to fall out and contend among themselves, insomuch that they fell to domestic war, with all the power they could.

Ottoman considering this occasion very fit and meet to accomplish that which he had long sought for, gathered to him all such as he thought given to robbing and spoiling, and set them upon mischief, and in a short time he began to grow in authority, and set upon certain towns, as he saw opportunity. Of which towns some he took by force, some by surrender, others he spoiled and overthrew to terrify the rest, thus laying the first foundation of his rising. In the meantime, the discord which was among the christians was no small advantage to this Ottoman, by occasion whereof, he within ten years' space subdued Bithynia, and all the provinces about Pontus; also Natolia, which comprehends all the dominion of the Greeks within Asia; Ancyra, a city in Phrygia; Synope, a city in Galatia; and Sebastia, a city in Cappadocia: and thus still prevailing, he increased in a short time to a mighty power, either through the secret judgment of God against that nation, or else because God would have them so far and so cruelly to prevail, for the punishment of the sins of other nations.

This Ottoman, after he had reigned twenty-eight years, died A. D. 1328, leaving behind him three sons, of whom Orchanes, being the youngest, killed his two brethren, whilst they were at variance between themselves.

II. ORCHANES after he had slain his two brethren, took the government of the Turks after his father, who, after he had drawn to him the hearts of the multitude, such as had their dispositions set upon the licentious life of war, applied his power further to enlarge his father's dominion, winning and subduing Mysia, Lydia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Caria; all which countries, being within the compass of Asia, to the seaside of Hellespont, and the Euxine sea, he added to the Turkish empire. Also he won Prusa, which was the metropolitan city of Bithynia, which then he made the chief seat of the Turks' empire. Besides these, he conquered Nice, and got Nicomedia; all which were before christian cities and regions. And yet all this could not make the christian princes in Greece to cease their civil wars, and to join and accord among themselves. By reason of which the Turk's aid was sent for out of Asia to help our christians one to kill another, and at length to get all those parts of Europe from them both. Orchanes, after these victories, when he had reigned two-and-thirty years, was struck, some say, with a dart in the shoulder, at the siege of Prusa. The opinion of others is, that fighting against the Tartarians, where he lost a great part of his army, he was there also slain himself, (A. D. 1359.)

III. AMURATH.—The Greek writers inform us that Orchanes had two sons, Soliman and Amurath; but Soliman, who was very distinguished, died shortly before his father. After him followed Amurath, who, after Asia was subdued by his predecessors, sought by all means and ways how to proceed further, and to invade Europe. To whose ambitious purpose the domestic wars of the christians gave most prosperous occasion, which occasion is thus declared. Certain discord fell between the princes of Greece, and John Paleologus emperor of Constantinople. Whereupon Paleologus, as he was not able to make his party good with the Grecians, most unwisely sent for Amurath to help him, who, being glad to have such an occasion offered, which he so long had sought, sent to aid him twelve thousand Turks into Thrace; but first he used all the delays he could of crafty policy, to the intent that the Greeks should waste their strength and power upon themselves, by which he might be more able afterward to set upon them, and to accomplish his conceived desire.

The Turks thus being called into Europe, by the christians, whether they tasting the sweetness of the soil, induced Amurath their emperor to make invasion, or whether Amurath of his own head thought good to use the time, in A. D. 1363, became himself over into Europe with sixty thousand Turks, falling upon the Greeks, being wasted and spent with their long wars and battles before. The pretence of the devilish Turk was, to aid and assist the emperor Paleologus, whether he would or no, and to subdue as had fallen from him.

Thus the Turks' army being conveyed over by the Grecian sea, called the Hellespont, first got Calipolis, with other towns and cities bordering about the sea, and there planting themselves, and preparing ships of their own for transporting their munitions out of Asia, advanced their power further into Thrace, and there won Philipopolis, then got Adrianople, which was not far from Constantinople, and there Amurath made his chief seat. Then began Paleologus, the emperor, at length to bewail his offer and covenant made with Amurath. When the Turks had thus conquered a great part of Thrace, they extended forth their army to Mysia, which they soon subdued; from thence proceeding and conquering the Bessos and Triballus, they entered into Servia and Bulgaria, where they joining battle with the prince of Servia, and with other dukes of Dalmatia and Epirus, won the field, and defeated them, where the prince being taken, and committed to prison, ended his life. This prince had a certain faithful client or servant, who to revenge his master's death, with a bold courage, although seeing death before his eyes, yet ventured his life so far, that he came to the tyrant and thrust him through with his dagger. This Amurath reigned thirty years, and was slain A. D. 1389.

IV. BAJAZET.—The power of the Turks began to increase in Europe, when Bajazet, the first of that name, after the death of his father, entered on the possession of the Turkish kingdom. This Bajazet had two brethren, Soliman and Saucos: Saucos had his eyes put out by his father, for striving for the kingdom. Soliman was slain of his brother. Thus Bajazet, beginning his kingdom with the murder of his brother, brought his imperial seat from Prusa, a city of Bithynia, to Adrianople, intending, with himself to subdue both Asia and Europe to his own power. First he set upon the Servians and Bulgarians, thinking to revenge his father's death, where he gave the overthrow to all the nobility of the Servians and Bulgarians, and put all those parts under his subjection, to the borders of the Illyrians. All Thrace he brought likewise under his yoke, only Constantinople and Pera excepted. That done, he invaded the rest of Grecia, prevailing against the countries of Thessaly, Macedonia, Phocia, and Attica, spoiling and burning as he passed without any resistance; and so, returning with innumerable spoil of the christians to Adrianople, laid siege to Constantinople for the space of eight years, and would have taken it, but that Paleologus, being brought to extremity, was driven to crave aid of the French, and of Sigismund the emperor, who, being accompanied with a sufficient power of French and Germans, came down to Hungary, and towards Servia, against the Turk. Bajazet hearing of their coming, raised his siege from Constantinople, and with sixty thousand horsemen came to Nicopolis, where he encountering with them, overthrew all the christian army, and took John, the captain of the French, prisoner, (A. D. 1392.) Sigismund, who before in the council of Costance had burned John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, hardly escaped by flying. Bajazet, after the victory, carried away duke John, with five others in bands, into Prusa, where before his face he caused all the other christian prisoners to be cut in pieces. Afterward John, being ransomed with two hundred thousand crowns, was delivered up. Some authors refer this history to the time of Calpurnius.

Bajazet, the cruel tyrant, after this victory, and the tyranny shewed upon the christians, returned again to the siege of Constantinople, fully determined to conquer and subdue the same, which he would have no doubt accomplished, but that the providence of God had found such a means, that Tamerlane, king of Parthia, with a hundred thousand horsemen, and swarms of footmen, like a violent flood overrunning Asia, and pressing upon Syria and Sebastia, had taken Orthobule, the son of Bajazet prisoner, and afterwards slew him, exercising the like cruelty upon his prisoners, as Bajazet had done before upon the christians, inasmuch that he spared neither sex nor age of the Turkish multitude, of whom he caused twelve thousand at one time to be overridden and trodden down under his horses' feet. By this, Bajazet, the tyrant, was forced to raise the siege of Constantinople, and to return with his army into Asia, where, near the hill called Stella, he pitched his tent to encounter Tamerlane.

The fight between these two was long and great on both sides, (A. D. 1402,) and the second year after the slaughter of our christians at Nicopolis in Pannonia; but the victory of this battle fell to Tamerlane at length. In which battle, as Munster writes, two hundred thousand Turks were slain. Among whom Bajazet, the tyrant, having his horse slain under him, was taken prisoner; and to make a spectacle of his wretched fortune, he was bound in golden fetters, and so being enclosed in an iron cage (whom before all Greece could not hold) was led about and shewn through all Asia, to be scorned and laughed at; and, moreover, was used instead of a footstool to Tamerlane, or a block, as often as he mounted upon his horse. Some add also that he was made like a dog to feed under Tamerlane's table. The tyranny of this Bajazet against the christians, as it was not much unlike to the cruelty of Valerian, the Roman emperor, so neither was the example of his punishment much different, for as Sapor, king of the Persians, did then with Valerian in the time of the eighth persecution of the primitive church, so likewise was Bajazet the persecutor worthily handled by Tamerlane, king of the Parthians, as is above mentioned.

Tamerlane, after this conquest, passed with his army into Mesopotamia, into Egypt, and into Syria, where he victoriously subduing the cities and munitions of the Turks, at length also conquered Damascus. In his sieges his manner was, the first day to go all in white attire, the second day in red, and the third day in black, signifying thereby mercy the first day to them that yielded; the second day the sword; the third day fire and ashes. At last, after having gotten great victories, and spoils of the Turks, he returned to his own country, and there died, (A. D. 1405.)

In writing of this Tamerlane, it is recorded that he had in his army eight hundred thousand men; and that he overcame the Parthians, Scythians, Iberians, Albans, Persians, Medes, and conquered all Mesopotamia; and after he had also subdued Armenia, passing over the river Euphrates he invaded all Asia Minor, conquering and subduing from the river Tanais to the Nile in Egypt, and was called the terror of the world. He left behind him two sons, who, falling into discord for their possessions, lost all again that their father had got.

In the mean time Bajazet, in the second year of his captivity, died, (A. D. 1403) leaving behind him four sons: Isa, the eldest, Musa, Soliman, and Mahomet, who disputed with the second the right of succession to the remainder of his empire. This civil war ended in the triumph of Mahomet, and in the death of his brothers. In these discords and divisions among the Turks, an occasion was given to the christians to have recovered again of the Turks that which they had lost, if they had not been either negligent, or in their own private wars otherwise occupied with themselves.

V. SOLIMAN CALEPINUS.—Calepinus or Chelebi, was the second son of Bajazet. This Calepinus, encouraged by the sloth and negligence of the princes of Europe, and by the discord of the Greeks among themselves and other nations, near about them, long troubled and vexed the Bulgarians, Servians, and Macedonians, even to the time of Sigismund. Which Sigismund seeing that Bajazet was now overcome and taken of Tamerlane, and the power of the Turks weakened in Europe, and having such occasion offered him, as it were from heaven, to destroy and utterly to root out, not only out of Asia, but also out of all Europe, that barbarous nation, and cruel enemies to the name and religion of Christ; and also to revenge the great slaughter and discomfiture of his army, when fighting before with Bajazet at Nicopolis a city in Mysia; with great power made war against Calepinus at Columbatium a town in Servia, as is also before mentioned, but as unluckily and with as little success as he did before against Bajazet his father. For in that battle were slain of the christians to the number of twenty thousand, and the rest utterly discomfited, the king himself escaping so hardly, that he entered not again into his kingdom for the space of eighteen months after. After this, Soliman was overcome by his brother Musa, in the civil contention which was still raging among the brothers, and was killed (A.D. 1409), after having reigned nearly eight years.

VI. MUSA CHELEBI.—After the captivity of Bajazet above mentioned, histories vary. The Greek writers, making no mention at all of Calepinus, only mention the sons of Bajazet generally, and of the contention among them, until the time of Mahomet. The Latin histories, writing of the children of Bajazet and of their succession, do not agree, some affirming that Bajazet had only two sons, others that he had more. After the death of Soliman, Musa was saluted emperor by the European army, but shortly after was attacked by his brother Mahomet, and killed in battle, after he had reigned about eight years.<sup>1</sup>

VII. MAHOMET.—This Mahomet, the last of the sons of Bajazet, secured to himself alone the kingdom, or tyranny rather of the murdering Turks (A.D. 1413). He afflicted the christians with sore wars within Europe, especially the country called Wallachia, lying not far from the river Danube, between Hungary and Thrace. From thence he removed into Asia, where he recovered divers parts in Galatia, Pontus, Cappadocia, Cilicia, which before Tamerlane had alienated from the Turks. This Mahomet planted his chief imperial seat in Adrianople not far from Constantinople, within the country of Thrace. In some writers the conflict between Sigismund and the great Turk, wherein the christians were so discomfited, is referred rather to this Mahomet, than to Calepinus; of which conflict mention is above made in the history of Sigismund. This Mahomet reigned, after the death of Musa, eight years, and died A.D. 1421.

VIII. AMURATH the Second, was the son of Mahomet; he proved a wretched tyrant, and was permitted as a scourge of God, to correct the sins of the christians. Soon after Amurath began his reign, a person sprung up calling himself Mustapha, the son of Bajazet; but it would seem he was an impostor, as the real Mustapha was supposed to have been killed in battle before the death of Bajazet. However the Greeks supported this man, and set him up with sufficient materials and supplies of war, to fight against Amurath. But in conclusion he not being able to make his party good, came into the hands of his enemy, and had his neck broke with a bow-string, after the manner of the Turkish execution.

The Greeks, then terrified with this sinister adversity, required truce of the Turk; but when that would not be granted, they set up another Mustapha, who, likewise being armed by the Greeks, got the city of Nice in Bithynia, from Amurath. Although it was not long before he was overcome in the same city, and brought to Amurath; who caused him likewise to taste of the same death, as the other Mustapha had done before. Amurath being now out of all fear and doubt of brethren and kinsfolk to rise against him, collected all his power against the Greeks; and first ranging throughout Thrace, where many cities surrendered to them, which before belonged to the emperor of Constantinople, from thence he set forward to the noble and famous city of Thessalonica, being then under the liege and protection of the Venetians. After Thessalonica was subdued, Phocis with all the country about Athens, Boetia likewise, Aetolia, Acarnania, with all the region beyond Peloponnesus, to the coast of Corinth, were brought in bondage and slavery unto the Turk.

In Epirus, and in that quarter that adjoins Macedonia named Albania, one John Castriot then reigned; who, perceiving himself too weak to match with the Turk's power, made with the Turk this convention, that he should have Croya, a famous city in Greece, and also gave to him his three sons for hostages, to wit, Constantine, Reposius, and George.

In this George there appeared such noble courage, such vigour of mind, and strength of body, that the Turk caused him more freely to be instructed after the Turkish religion and manner in his own court; where being trained up, he so excelled as well in feats of activity, as in strength of body, that he excelled all his companions, so that he was named Scanderbeg, which means as much as Alexander the Great.

After this Alexander was grown up to mature ripeness of age, and was well trained up in feats of war, he was sent out by the Turk to war against Caraman of Cilicia, the Turk's enemy. In which expedition he sped himself most manfully, fighting hand to hand, first with a footman of Scythia, then with an horseman of Persia, being challenged by them both to encounter, first with the one, after with the other; whom he so valiantly overthrew, that he won great renown with the Turk: insomuch that he, trusting to the Turk's favour, when he heard of the decease of his father, durst ask of the Turk the grant of his father's dominion to be given to him. Which request, although Amurath the Turk did not deny him; yet notwithstanding, he perceiving the matter to be dallied out with fair words, by subtle means and policy slipped out of the Turk's court, and came to Epirus his own inheritance, where first by forged letters he recovered Croya. The other cities voluntarily yielded themselves to him; then gathering to him the people of Epirus and Macedonia (who though not many in number, yet with good willing minds they stuck to him) he so manfully and valiantly behaved himself, that against all the power both of Amurath, and also of Mahomet, he maintained his own, repelled their violence, and put to flight their armies many years together. But to return again to the course of Amurath's victories, after he had prevailed against the eastern parts of Europe and Greece, and had treated thus for the dominion of Epirus, he invaded Illyricum, (now called Sclavonia) containing in it Dalmatia, Croatia, Istria, and Liburnia; which countries he spoiled and wasted, and then continued his course to Albania and Bosnia. In which regions, when he had subdued a great part, and had led away an innumerable multitude of captives, he moved further to Wallachia and Servia, hoping to conquer all Pannonia.

There reigned at the same time in Servia, a certain prince named George Despota, who made great suit to the Turk for truce and peace, promising to give him his daughter in marriage; for by the Turks' law they marry as many wives as they please. It was not long after Amurath had married the daughter of Despota, that he, contrary to his league and promise, made war upon Despota his father-in-law, and expelled him out of his kingdom, taking from him divers cities, as Scopia, Novomonte, Sophia, and all Mysia. George himself fled into Hungary, leaving behind him his son to defend the town of Sinderonia. Amurath understanding of the flight of Despota his father-in-law, compassed the city of Sinderonia with a strong siege, which when he had taken he took his wife's brother, the son of Despota, and without all regard of mercy and affinity, after the barbarous tyranny of the Turks, put out his eyes, with a bason red hot set before his eyes, and after that led him about with him in derision and in despite of his cowardly father.

(1) The period from the death of Bajazet to the accession of Mahomet is usually styled "The Interregnum," the kingdom being divided by the contention of the brothers, but it was again united under Mahomet.—[ED.]

Servia being thus won, Amurath, thinking to go further into Hungary, besieged the city called Belgrade, and no doubt would have also destroyed it, had not the Providence of God found means, that partly through slaughter of his men, partly for lack of victuals and other forage, he was compelled to raise his siege and retire.

In the mean time John Huniades (of whom mention was made before) had got great victories against the Turkish power, and had recovered part of Servia, and all Moldavia; against whom Amurath the Turk, with a mighty army, moved into Pannonia. But Huniades with the power and aid of Ladislaus king of Poland, (and more especially by the power of the Lord) did soon weaken the power of the Turk, and gave him the overthrow, recovering to the christians the greatest part of Servia and Bulgaria.

In this battle Huniades had five conflicts with the Turks upon one day, and with five victories put them to the worse, and toward night did so discomfit and overthrow the great captain of Amurath, called Bassa, the duke of Anatolia, (which is otherwise named Asia Minor) that he slew of the Turks that day to the number of thirty thousand. Amurath, although he was not a little discouraged thereat, yet dissembling his fear, with stout countenance sent for Carambeius his principal stay and captain, with a new army brought out of Asia to assist him in his wars. This Carambeius, having arrived in the downs of Transylvania, Ladislaus the king of Poland (the Lord so working) through the industry of John Huniades, so received and with such celerity overcame him, that all his stout and sturdy army either was slain downright, or else put to flight, Carambeius the captain being himself taken prisoner in the same field.

These victories of Huniades struck no little terror to Amurath, so that for distress of mind he was ready to destroy himself (as some write) but being confirmed by Helibeus Bassa his counsellor, he kept himself within the straits of Mount Rhodope. Who then hearing that Caramannus invaded the country of Bithynia and Pontus in Asia, was glad to make truce with Ladislaus and Huniades upon such conditions as they pleased to make themselves; which conditions were these, that Amurath should depart from all the region of Servia, and should remove from thence all his garrisons; also he should restore George Despota, prince of Servia, to his possession, and set his children free, whom he had in captivity, and restore them to their inheritance. And that he should make no more claim nor title to the country of Moldavia above mentioned, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had lost; and that he should desist hereafter from all wrongs and injuries against the christians. Upon these conditions the Turk being agreed, truce was concluded on both parts for ten years, and confirmed with a solemn oath between them.

This done, Amurath the tyrant addresseth himself toward Asia, to resist the invasion of Caramannus. At which time Pope Eugenius so soon as he heard the Turk to be returned into Asia, sent Julian Cæsarian his cardinal to Ladislaus, with full dispensation and absolution to break his oath and league with the Turk, promising moreover great hope and aid, if he would go in arms stoutly against the tyrant.

Where by the way is to be noted, that as there is no truth of promise in that pestilent see of Rome, neither was there ever any war prospered, which was taken in hand by the pope's council; so was there never any council of the pope that brought with it more detriment to christianity, than this. But the pope belike thought that as he might lawfully break promise with John Huss, and with other christians, so also he need not to observe any league or truce taken with the Turk: but it turned much otherwise than the pope imagined, as is to be seen by the sequel. For Ladislaus, being thus excited by the unadvised and sinister instigation of Pope Eugenius, contrary to the truce established a little before, set out with his army, and proceeding to Wallachia and Bulgaria, came to Varna, where he fell sick.

It was not long, but the Turk, having intelligence of this, left his wars in Asia, and made haste into Europe, passing over by the straits near to Callipolis, where all the Italian navy was looking on, but whether on purpose, or whether for cowardliness, they would not stir one oar to stop the passage of the Turkish army. When Amurath was come to Adrianopole in Thrace, using such celerity as no man looked for, within eight days he was in Bulgaria, and there encamped himself against Ladislaus. The day of battle being set, the armies joined on both sides. Huniades was himself present, but all the matter was ruled by Julian the cardinal, and the pope's clergy. The fight continued three days and three nights together, with great courage and much bloodshed on each side; so that the field was covered with lakes of blood. It seemed at the first to incline to the christians, by breaking the first ranks of the Turks. But the priests and prelates who were at the field (who had been more fit to have been in the church) seeing the Turks to begin to fly, unskillfully left their array to pursue the enemy, so that they leaving the other parts of the christians naked, gave great advantage to the Turks with their darts and shot to disturb the christian ranks. By which occasion Amurath, enclosing the christians with his army round about, obtained the victory. In which field, Ladislaus, the young king of Poland, having his horse killed under him, was struck down and slain. The pope's bishops flying to save themselves, fell into the marshes, and were there destroyed, sustaining a death worthy of their filthy falsehood and untruth. Julian the cardinal, who, with the pope, was the chief doer in breaking the league, was found dead in the way, full of wounds, and spoiled to naked skin. Of the rest of the army that escaped by flying, part was drowned in the marshes, some perished miserably for hunger, some for cold, watching and wandering in the woods. Huniades hardly escaped the danger, by the merciful providence of God, being reserved to the further profit of Christendom. This battle of Amurath against the christians was fought at Varna, A. D. 1444.

This John Huniades, the worthy warrior, was born in Wallachia, being earl of Bistice, of all captains that ever went against the Turks he was most famous and singular, prudent and discreet in council, expert and politic in war, prompt of hand, circumspect before he attempted, quick in expedition: in whom was wanted almost no good property requisite in a warlike captain. Against two most mighty and fierce tyrants, Amurath and Mahomet, through the Lord's might, he defended all Pannonia, and therefore was called the thunderbolt and terror of the Turks. As Achilles was to the Grecians, so was he set up of God to be as a wall or bulwark of all Europe against the cruel Turks and enemies of Christ and of his christians. Neither was there any king or prince that ever achieved such noble victories, either so many in number, or so profitable for the public utility of all Europe, as did he, and that not only in the days of this Amurath, but also of Mahomet his successor, as hereafter remains further to be seen.

Amurath, by reason of this victorious overthrow of the christians, being filled with no small pride, directed his journey immediately toward the Greeks, where Castriot was, otherwise called Scanderbeg.

And first coming to Peloponnesus, and breaking down the wall about the straits of Corinth, encountered the brother of the emperor of Constantinople, whom, with his sudden coming, he oppressed, with all the Greeks' army, ere they were provided. Paleologus, the emperor, after that, built up the wall again, but at the Turk's bidding, he was compelled to undo it again: which wall afterwards the Venetians repaired. After the demolition of the wall, Amurath entering into Peloponnesus, took several towns and cities, and made all the parts of Thessaly and Achaia tributaries.

In the following year, the Turk bent all his force against the country of Epirus, which the noble and victorious Scanderbeg valiantly defended against all the power of Amurath; so that he discomfited and vanquished seven of the most expert dukes of the Ottoman emperor, one after another, with all their armies of most picked and chosen soldiers, and expelled them utterly out of all Epirus.

After this discomfiture, the saying is, that Amurath gave himself to a religious order, living a contemplative life with certain other priests, in the forests of Bithynia, renouncing the government of his realm to the hands of Haly, one of the princes (for the reader must understand, that the Turks also be not without their sundry sects of religion, no more than we christians are without our friars and monks.)

While Amurath was cloistered in his monkish religion, John Huniades, in the kingdom of Hungary; and Castriot Scanderbeg in Greece, kept a great stir against the Turks. By reason of which Amurath was taken again from his monkish vow and profession, and brought again into the field: for Huniades had rescued the whole country of Hungary, and had repulsed all the army of the Turks far from Servia. And although the peevish practice of George, prince of Servia, had often-times disclosed his councils unto the Turks, whereby twice he was brought in danger, yet, notwithstanding, (through the Lord's gracious protection) he was preserved and delivered by the said George unto the Hungarians again, and after that manfully vanquished the Turks, so that they had no resting place about those parts of Servia and Bulgaria, so long as he lived.

Castriot Scanderbeg so foiled the Turk, and kept Amurath so short, that, coming from Epirus in the straits, he was so entangled by Castriot, that he was forced to give battle. In which battle he was so vanquished, and most part of his army slain, that, for grief and sorrow, falling into a raving sickness, he was transported out of his pavilion to Adrianople, and there in fury and madness died, after he had reigned thirty years, which was about the year 1451.

This Amurath first established the order of the Janizaries, who were the male children of such christians as he conquered and took captive; whom he forced to renounce the faith of Christ, wherein they were baptized, and brought them up in Mahomet's law, and exercised them in the same feats of war as he did his own people, and after they came to man's estate, he named them Janizaries (that is to say) soldiers of a strange country, and made them guard his person. They wear on their head, instead of a helmet, a white attire made of the coarsest sort of wool, and in so many folds about their head that it cannot be pierced with a sword. It hangs down on the back with a tail, and before, on the forehead, it is garnished with gold and silver. They formerly used bows and lances in the field, but now they use sabres and fire-arms as our cavalry do.

At the first institution there were but eight thousand, but now there are twice as many. This, of all bondage and servitude that the christians suffer under the Turks, is most intolerable, and greatly to be lamented by all true christians. For what can godly minds behold more to their grief, than to see their children pulled from the faith of Christ wherein they were baptized, and by whose blood they should eternally be saved, and to be instructed and nourished with the blasphemous doctrine of Mahomet, and so be professed enemies of Christ and his church, to make war against heaven, and to perish everlastingly? And, finally, what a lamentable thing is it, to see and behold our own children born of our own bodies, to become our mortal and cruel enemies, and to cut our throats with their own hands! This servitude of mind is far greater than death itself: which, if our princes would well consider, it would cause them the rather to agree, and bend their whole force and power against this cruel enemy.

IX. MAHOMET the Second.—Amurath left behind him three sons,—Mahomet, born of the daughter of Despota, being twenty years of age; the second son, called Turcines; the third, named Calepinus. This Turcines, being an infant, and but eighteen months old, was strangled at the commandment of the Turk, by his servant Moses, himself being there present and beholding the horrible murder. And when Moses, the executioner of the murder had desired him not to pollute his hands with the blood of his brother, he answered, that it was the manner of all the Ottoman Turks, that all the other brethren being destroyed, none should be left alive but one to govern the empire. Wherefore, Moses was commanded by the tyrant, there presently, and in his sight, to kill the infant. This horrible fact, when the mother of the child understood, she cried out, and almost mad for sorrow, cursed the tyrant to his face. But he, to mitigate the rage of his mother, at her request, being desirous to be revenged upon the executioner of her son's death, delivered Moses bound into her hands, who then, in the presence of the tyrant, thrust him to the heart with a knife, and opening his side, took out his liver, and threw it to the dogs to be devoured.

The third son, called Calepinus, who was but six months old, and who had been commended, by his father Amurath, to the custody of Halibassa, one of his nobles, who, to gratify and please the tyrant, betrayed the infant, and brought him to him, and he, at the tyrant's commandment, was strangled. Some affirm, that instead of Calepinus another child was offered to the tyrant, and that Calepinus was conveyed to Constantinople, and after the taking of Constantinople was carried to Venice, and then to Rome to Pope Calixtus, where he was baptized, and afterward came into Germany to Frederic the emperor, and there was honourably entertained, and kept in Austria during his life. Where note, how the merciful providence of God can fetch out of the devil's mouth. And note, moreover, Halibassa, the betrayer of the infant, how he escaped not. For Mahomet, understanding him to be a man of great substance and riches, through forging of false crimes, with great torments, put him to death to have his riches; for this tyrant was given to insatiable avarice. Thus this bloody Mahomet began his reign with horrible murder, after the example of other cursed tyrants his predecessors.

Although this Mahomet came of a christian mother, being the daughter of Despota, prince of Servia, and by her was brought up and instructed from his childhood in the precepts of christian religion and manners, yet, he soon forgetting all, gave himself to Mahomet's religion, and yet so, that he being addicted to neither religion, became an atheist, believing and worshipping no God at all, but only the goddess of good fortune, mocking the minds and judgments of men, who believe that God, by his providence, governs and regards the state of human things on earth.

After this Mahomet having heard of the victories and conquests of his predecessors, and having understood how Bajazet lay eight years about Constantinople, and could not win it; he dispraising Bajazet, and disdaining that so long time should be spent about the siege and yet no victory gotten, bent all his study and device how to subdue the same. But first, having a privy hatred against the city of Athens, and having his hands lately imbrued with the blood of his brethren, this murdering Mahomet first of all takes his voyage to subvert and destroy that famous school of all good learning and discipline. Against which city he so furiously raged for the hatred of good letters, that he thought he ought not to suffer the foundation thereof to stand, because that city was a good nurse and fosterer of good arts and sciences; wherefore he commanded the city to be razed and utterly subverted; and wherever any monuments or books could be found, he caused them to be cast into dirty sinks, and the filthiest places of the city, or put to the most vile uses that could be devised, for extirpating and abolishing all good literature; and if he understood that any lamented the loss, and ruin of that noble place, those he grievously punished and put to death.

Thus the famous and ancient school of Athens being destroyed, he turned his army into Thrace, where in all haste he, gathering his power both by sea and land, with a mighty multitude compassed the city of Constantinople, and began to lay his siege against it, in the year 1453; and in the four-and-fiftieth day of the siege it was taken, sacked, and the Emperor Constantine slain. As touching the cruelty and fierceness of the Turks in getting of this city, and what slaughter there was of men, and women, and children, what calamity and misery was there to be seen, as sufficient relation, with a full description, hath been made before, it would be superfluous now to repeat the same. This only is not to be omitted touching the principal causes of the overthrow of this city; whereof the first was the filthy avarice of those citizens, who, hiding their treasures in the ground, would not employ the same to the necessary defence of their city. For so I find it in history, that when the Turk, after the taking of the city, had found not so much treasure as he looked for, suspecting with himself (as the truth was) the treasures and riches to be hidden under the ground, commanded the earth to be dug up, and the foundations of the houses to be searched: where he then found treasures incredible. "What (quoth he) how could it be that this place could ever lack ammunition and fortification, which did flow and abound with such great riches, and plenty of all things?" The second cause was the absence of the navy of the Venetians, which, if they had been ready in time, might have been a safeguard against the invasion of the enemies.

Joannes Ramus, writing of the destruction of this city, amongst other matters makes relation of the image of the crucifix, being there in the high temple of Sophia; which image the Turk took, and writing this superscription upon the head of it, "This is the God of the christians," gave it to his soldiers to be scorned, and commanding the image, with a trumpet, to be carried through all his army, made every man to spit at it most contumeliously. Wherein the reader by the way may note, what occasion of slander and offence we christians give to the barbarous infidels by this our ungodly superstition, in having images in our temples, contrary to the express commandment of God in his word. For if St. Paul, writing to the Corinthians, saith, "We know Christ now no more after the flesh;" how much less then is Christ to be known by us in blind stocks and images set up in our temples, serving for no other purpose, but for the infidels to laugh both us and our God to scorn, and to provoke God's vengeance?

To make the history short, such was the cruelty of these Turks in winning the city, that when Mahomet had given license to the soldiers three days together, to spoil, to kill, and to do whatever they pleased, there was no corner in all Constantinople, which did not either flow with christian blood, or else was the scene of abomination and cruelty. Of which citizens, some they murdered, some they roasted upon spits, some they flayed off their skin, hanging them up to consume with famine, others they put salt into their wounds, the more terribly to torment them, so that one contended with another, who could devise most strange kinds of new torments and punishments, exercising such cruelty, that the place where the city was before, seemed now to be no city, but a slaughter-house or shambles of christian men's bodies. Among the dead bodies, the body also of Constantine the emperor was found; whose head, being brought to Mahomet, he commanded it to be carried upon a spear through the whole city, for a public spectacle and derision to all the Turkish army. And because he would diminish the number of the captives, who seemed to him to be very great, he never rose from his table, but he put every day some of the nobles to death, in order to fill his cruel mind with blood, as his body was filled with wine; which he used to do so long as any of the nobles of that city were left alive. And of the other sort also, as histories credibly report, there passed no day in which he did not slay more than three hundred persons, the rest he gave to his soldiers to kill, and to do with them what they would. It is here to be noted, that as Constantine, the son of Helena, was the first emperor of Constantinople, so Constantine, the son also of Helena, was the last emperor.

Not far from the city of Constantinople, there was another little city, called Pera, and once called Galata, situated by the sea-side, who, hearing of the miserable destruction of Constantinople, and seeing the city flaming with fire, sent certain of the chief men with speed to Mahomet, declaring to them, that they neither had sent any help to the city of Constantinople, neither yet wrought any injury to any of his army; wherefore they desired and prayed him, that as they would gladly yield unto him, so he would be favourable to them, and spare them, and not to punish the guiltless with the guilty. Mahomet, although he was not ignorant that for fear, rather than of any good-will, they submitted themselves, and that they would rather resist him if they had been able, yet received for that time the submission of the messengers: but sending with them his ambassadors into the city, he commanded also his army to follow withal, and to enter with him into the city, which, although it was greatly suspected and disliked by the citizens, yet they durst not otherwise do but suffer them to enter; which being done, the ambassador gave a sign to the soldiers, every man to do whatever he was bidden; of whom, some ran to the walls, some to the temples and churches, some to the streets and houses of the city, plucking all things down to the ground, sacking and ranging with no less fury and abomination than they had done at Constantinople before, saving only that they abstained from murder: but the same day, letters came from Mahomet to the ambassador, that he would spare none, but destroy and murder all that were in the city; which message, because it seemed to the ambassador to be too cruel, as they had yielded themselves, he stayed his hand a little until night came. In the mean time, drunken Mahomet, coming something to himself, (whom drunkenness had before overcome) sent his second letters to revoke the first. Where again is to be noted the merciful providence of God towards his people in their deserved plagues, by staying the hands, and bridling the fury many times of their enemies, when otherwise the case seems to be past all remedy.

Mahomet thus being in himself not a little advanced and elevated by the winning of Constantinople, which he had now made the imperial seat of the Turkish dominion, on the third year following set out to the siege of Belgrade, a city of Hungary, lying near the banks of the Danube, thinking to have the like success there, as he had in the winning of Constantinople, although through the Lord's disposing, it fell out much otherwise. Within the city of Belgrade, at the time of the siege, was John Huniades, the valiant captain, of whom mention has been made before; who with a sufficient strength of picked soldiers, although in number nothing equal to the Turk's army, valiantly defended the city with great courage, and no less success. In which siege great diligence was bestowed, and many of the Turks slain. Among whom also Mahomet himself, being wounded under the left arm, was carried out of the field half dead, and the rest so put to flight, that of the Turks were destroyed to the number, or not much under the number of forty thousand, besides the loss of all their ordnance, which the Turks, in haste of their flight, were forced to leave behind them.

Jerome Zieglerus, writing of the siege of this Belgrade, adds, that when Mahomet was at the siege, seeing the town so small and weak of itself, that it could not be won with all his great multitude, commanded all his brazen pieces to be laid, to batter down the walls and towers of the town: so that the christians within the walls were vehemently distressed: for the siege continued both night and day without intermission. Among the rest of the christians who defended the town, was a certain Bohemian much worthy of commendation, who being upon the walls, and seeing that a Turk with a banner or ensign of the Turks had got up, by the sight whereof the whole town was in danger to be conquered and taken, runs to the Turk, and clasping him about the middle, speaking to John Capistranus standing below, asking him whether it were any danger of damnation to him, if he, of his voluntary mind, did cast himself with that dog (so he termed him) down headlong from the wall, to be slain with him; what would become of his soul, and whether he might be saved or not? To whom when the other had answered, that he should be saved without doubt, he forthwith tumbles himself with the Turk down off the wall, where by his death, he saved at the same time the life of all the city. Mahomet being so wounded, and in despair of winning the city, was carried, as he heard, out of the field; who at length coming again to himself, partly for fear, and partly for shame, was ready to kill himself. And thus was the town of Belgrade at that time rescued through God's providence, by the means of John Huniades and this Bohemian.

This siege of Belgrade began A. D. 1456, and endured six-and-forty days. At which siege were two hundred thousand Turks; of whom forty thousand were slain, where the victory fell to the christians through the prosperous success given of God to John Huniades. Which Huniades, not long after the victory, through the labour and fatigue in defending the town, was taken with a sore sickness, and died; to whose valiant prowess and singular courage, histories give great praise and commendation.

Mahomet after this done in Europe, returned into Asia to war with Usumcassanes, a Persian, with whom he had three battles; the first was about the river Euphrates, where the Turk lost ten thousand men, and was put to the worse. In the second field likewise, he was discomfited. The third battle at Arsanga, where through the terrible noise of the brazen pieces, the Persian horses disturbed the camp, and so was Usumcassanes overcome.

From thence the Turk reduced again his power against the christians, and first subdued unto him Synope, and all Paphlagonia; also the kingdom of Trebizond, which he besieging both by land and water, won from the christians, and sent David the king with his two sons, and Calus his uncle, to Constantinople, where they were miserably and cruelly put to death, and all the family of the Comneni, which were of the king's family, were destroyed by the Turk; which was about A. D. 1461, at which time this mischievous Mahomet was first saluted emperor.

Not long after he got from the Grecians, Corinth and Mitylene, not without great slaughter of christian men; insomuch that the whole city of Mitylene was destroyed almost to the ground. The isles also of Lemnos and Lesbos he won from the Venetians; in which island of Lesbos is the city of Mitylene.

Not far from this isle of Lesbos and Mitylene, there is a country in Asia toward the sea-side, bordering next to Europe, called Mysia, or of some called Mæsia, wherein stood the city of Troy. This country Mahomet coveting to win rather by policy and falsehood, than by doubtful danger of war, secretly sent for the prince to come to speak with him for certain causes (as he pretended) which would concern the profit and commodity of them both. When the king of Mysia, either for shame would not, or for fear durst not deny, he came to him as to confer upon necessary affairs in common to them appertaining. Mahomet caused the king to be apprehended, and cruelly slain, or rather torn in pieces; and so invading the land of Mysia, he exercised the like tyranny upon his kindred and affinity.

This Mysia by fraud being taken and lost, Mahomet flies again towards Europe, where he assailed the island Eubœia, otherwise called Nigropont, making a bridge of marvellous fame over the sea Euripus, to convey over his army out of Greece, and there laid his siege to the city Chalcis, which at length in thirty days he overcame, not without a great slaughter of his army, who in the siege is said to have lost forty thousand of the Turks. But the slaughter of the christians was greater, for when the city was won, the tyrant commanded, most cruelly, none to be spared within the whole city, but to be put to the sword, whoever was above the age of twenty years. This cruelty was shewed of the barbarous tyrant for anger and fury, because such a number of his Turks were slain at the siege thereof, being reckoned (as is said) to forty thousand. In the fierce siege of this city it is memorable that is in histories recorded, how that the women of that city, seeing the men begin to faint, and the city to lie in present danger, took the matter themselves in hand, and playing the men, went to the walls, and there defended the city with no less trouble to the enemy than the men had before done, and so for a space continued, so long as any man's strength and diligence could do any good. A great cause of the loss of this city and island, is imputed to the cowardly timidity of the Venetian navy; who being there present, and having prosperous wind, yet durst not, or would not adventure upon the Turks' bridge, which if they had done, the island of Eubœia and Chalcis had not so soon been overmatched of the Turks.

Thus all the east parts of Greece being subdued to the Turkish tyrant, with all Achæia, Attica, Acarnenia, and Eubœia, shortly after followed also Peloponnesus, brought in like subjection to the Turk. Within Peloponnesus were these provinces contained, Achæia, Messenia, Laconia, Argolica and Archadia, &c. The Venetians in this Peloponnesus had great possessions, and had made up the wall again toward the sea-side, near to the straits of Corinth, where for the more speed of the work, they had thirty thousand workmen in the building; which, when it came to the knowledge of the Turk, he broke into the country of Peloponnesus, with an army of eight thousand, and first wasted the regions of the Coroneans and Methoneans, and making a great slaughter of the Venetians, in short time he brought the whole dominion of Peloponnesus under his yoke and tribute.

It is long and more lamentable to recite all the victories of Mahomet against the christians, both by land and sea. Before was declared how truce was taken between Georgius Scanderbeg, and the Turk for ten years; which truce being expired, Mahomet leaves no time unspent, no diligence unsought, but makes with all his power to Epirus and Albania, which he, after long siege, at length overcame and subdued. When Scanderbeg the valiant captain had done against the Turk what in man's strength did lie, yet being overmatched with power and multitude, seeing no possibility to make his party good, he was forced to depart his country as an exile, and went to Italy, and there being sent for by the pope's letters, openly declared that it was not possible otherwise to resist the furious rage of the barbarous Turks by the strength of any one king or prince, unless all Europe with one consent should join their power and force together. And thus, Scanderbeg, a man of puissant courage, being driven out of his country, continued his life in exile. His courage and vehemency is reported to have been such, that in fighting against the barbarous enemy, for very eagerness of spirit, his blood was seen to burst out of his lips. It is testified also of him, that being challenged he never refused to fight, and in fighting, never turned his back, neither yet was he ever wounded but only once with a light shaft in his foot, neither did he ever set against the Turk with more than six thousand horsemen and three thousand footmen. He is said with his own hand to have slain above two thousand Turks, whom with such violence he did strike, that many of them he did cleave asunder, from the head to the middle.

Neither yet was the insatiable greediness of this Turkish hell-hound satisfied with all this, but still he conceived greater things in his mind, thinking to conquer the whole world; and so passing forward towards Europe, he subdued all Illyria. Then passing into Wallachia, set upon Dracula, the prince thereof. Dracula, although he had no great power of soldiers, yet so enclosed and environed the Turk, that he had almost lost his whole army, of whom a great part was destroyed, and many of his ensigns taken. Shortly afterwards he sent Ahmet with one hundred ships into Italy, and he, passing along by the coast, spoiled and wasted several places, till at length he came to Hydruntum (Otranto) a city in Calabria in Italy, which after a long siege he overcame and subdued, and brought such a terror into all Italy, that the pope, forgetting all other things, yet mindful of himself, with all haste fled out of Rome. After the city of Hydruntum was taken, which was A. D. 1481, Matthias Corvinus, Huniades's son, was sent for by the Italians, to set upon the city, for its rescue, when Ahmet was about to make his return with five-and-twenty thousand Turks, in the meantime news came that Mahomet the great Turk was dead; the siege brake up, and the city was delivered to the Italians again, and so Italy was delivered at that time out of peril and danger. This Mahomet won from the christians two hundred cities, and twelve kingdoms, and two empires, which he joined both together. He died A. D. 1481, after having reigned fifty years.

X. BAJAZET the Second.—Mahomet had three sons; of which Mustapha, the eldest, through voluptuousness, died before his father. The other two were Bajazet and Demes; about whom great controversy arose amongst the Turks, which of them should succeed in their father's kingdom. For neither of them was present at Constantinople when Mahomet died; Bajazet being in Cappadocia, and Demes, in Lycosonia, when great dissension was among the nobles for the succession, and great strife and bloodshed for the matter, the janizaries, who were the Turk's guard, proclaimed Bajazet emperor. Bajazet coming at length from Cappadocia, partly through yielding, partly by corrupting with money, got the wills of the janizaries, and was made emperor. Demes, the other brother, being in Lycosonia more near, although he made no less speed in his coming, yet was prevented by Bajazet, and excluded out of Constantinople. Wherefore, he being put back from all hope of his kingdom, incited by some of his friends, moved war against his brother; but being overcome in three battles by Ahmet, Bajazet's captain, fled to the great master of Rhodes, leaving in a place called Carræ, his mother and two young children, whom Bajazet slew.

This Demes being with the master of the knights of Rhodes, was sent to the bishop of Rome, where being kept, and afterwards sent to Charles VIII., for an hostage of Pope Alexander VI. was poisoned by the way by Pope Alexander, as is before declared. After whose death, Bajazet, to requite Ahmet for his good service, put him to the halter, partly suspecting his power, partly for lucre sake, to have his treasure: his death was of great profit to the christians, as he was ever an utter enemy to the religion and name of Christ.

Bajazet thus being confirmed in his tyranny, made his expedition against Wallachia, where he subdued two great forts. From thence he removed his power, taking his voyage into Asia, thinking to be revenged of the sultan of Egypt, where he lost two great battles, the one fought at Adena, the other at Tarsus; but especially at Tarsus, the army of the Turk was so overthrown, that of an hundred thousand brought into the field, scarce the third part remained unslain.

Thus Bajazet being overthrown and terrified with evil luck, fighting against the sultan of Egypt, removed from Asia, and directed his army into Europe. Leading his army against the Venetians, he had with them many and doubtful conflicts, where the Turk was sometimes put to the worse, and sometimes again prevailed; out of Jadera and other cities about Dalmatia, he carried away great multitudes of christians into captivity, about A. D. 1498.

Two years after this, which was A. D. 1500, Bajazet with one hundred and fifty thousand armed men, entered into Peloponnesus; which although Mahomet had overrun before, yet the Venetians had defended Methone, or Modon, all this while against the Turks. The Turk besieged this city with three armies, having about the walls five hundred great brazen cannons, wherewith he battered the city both day and night: but the citizens, who were within the city committing themselves to God, defended their city as well as they could, rather choosing to die than to yield unto the Turk's tyranny. But the Turk prevailing, and they not able to withstand the siege, the christians assembled together into a certain house prepared for the purpose, both men, women, and children; where they setting the house on fire, gave themselves rather to be burned than to come into the tyrant's hands. Certain women also, with their children, cast themselves headlong into the sea, by that means to avoid the Turkish captivity. Some writers affirm that the Methonians, seeing five great ships of the Venetians coming with men and provisions toward them, issued down from the walls to the sea side to receive them; but were all taken captives, being above the number of a thousand: and all being tied with long ropes, were brought before the tyrant, and in his sight were cruelly slain, except certain nobles, whom Chersogles, son-in-law to Bajazet, got pardoned, amongst whom was Andreas Gritto.

The Turk had to maintain war in Asia against Ismail Sophi or king of Persia. Which Sophi was stirred up by God's providence to war with this Bajazet, whereby the christian churches in Europe might have some breathing time, and freedom from the Turk's cruel tyranny and bloodshed. This Sophi was a valiant Turk, who with great power and victories had overrun a great compass of the eastern parts of Asia; and defeated many of the generals of Bajazet.

Thus, through the admirable example of God's justice and providence, were these Turks kept occupied, and so came it to pass, that these barbarians being blasphemous against the Son of God, should thus horribly run on to the destruction one of another, being worthily punished with mutual slaughter and bloodshed for their impiety and blasphemy against Christ and his religion, whereby in the meantime some rest was given to the christians.

Bajazet, partly by these victories discouraged, partly diseased and languishing of the gout, and partly also broken with age, finding himself unequal to the government of that tumultuous kingdom, began to talk with his nobles about the choosing of one to succeed him. The occasion whereof ministered much matter of inward wars among the Turks. This Bajazet had in all six sons, whereof three died before him, and three were yet left alive; to wit, Ahmet, Korkud, and Selim. Bajazet himself had most mind to Ahmet, but the chief of his nobles rather favoured Selim; and provoked him to stir up war against his father: and though that he was overcome in war, yet through intercession he was reconciled to his father, and is afterwards proclaimed emperor again against his father's will, through the help and favour of the soldiers, entering the first beginning of his kingdom, with the murdering of his own father. The story in some authors is thus declared.

After the janizaries had persuaded Bajazet that as he himself was unwieldy, he should therefore do well to constitute some successor, and having assigned Ahmet to succeed him; the janizaries being offended with Ahmet, because he would not enlarge their stipends, and bribe them, compassing about the king's palace with their privy swords which they had under their garments, with a mighty cry, required Selim to be appointed for their emperor. When Bajazet had answered, that he had assigned Ahmet, they refused him, because he was fat, gross, and unable thereto; but needs would have Selim, who was stout and warlike, as their emperor: and withal they drew out their swords, crying Selim, Selim! Then Bajazet, giving place to their fury, shewed himself content to give them Selim; whom the janizaries receiving, brought into the palace: Bajazet his father giving place to him, desires him not to be so hasty and furious in his doings, but to be modest and take heed what he did, and not to follow his fury, but to give place to time, which reveals all things, and think himself to be a man subject to dangers and jeopardies as other men are: and thus speaking, he resigned his imperial throne and seat to him, and went away all heavy, entering into a certain order of their religion. Whereupon followed great acclamations of the people, saluting Selim as emperor. Who then taking the rule upon him, began to govern with great cruelty, destroying many of his nobles, such as had stood against him, some with poison, some by other cruel means, and advancing his own side, with great honours and promotions.

Not long after Selim was thus settled in his kingdom, Bajazet his father, intending to see and prove how he behaved himself in his government, first entered into his treasure-house, where he found all his riches to be scattered and gone. Afterward he came into his armory, where all the spoils gotten by war were likewise wasted; then he entered into the jewel-house, where all his plate and gifts sent from kings and princes were kept, which likewise were dispersed and given away. At length he came into the stable, where also he seeing his principal horses to be wanting, sighing with himself, and crying vengeance upon him, he prepared himself, with the rest of the treasure which was remaining, to sail over into Natolia to his eldest son; and passing by an orchard near the sea-side, where he had appointed to take ship, he sat down under a tree, and began to curse his son, and to ask vengeance upon him, for that he had so despised his father, and was become so impious a wretch.

Selim hearing of his father's departure came into the orchard where he was, and seeming to be very heavy, and much lamenting that his father would so depart and go away, seeing that he desired not the government of the empire, but was contented only with the title thereof. "O father, (said he) do not thus privily depart away; do not procure this shame to your son, who so tenderly loves you. Let me have but the name only, and be you the emperor indeed. The end of your natural life most patiently I shall expect, which I pray God may long continue." And thus using many fair and flattering words to his father, he commanded a banquet with many dainty delicacies to be brought to him, but tempered and infected with poison. Which as soon as Bajazet had begun to taste, and felt the strength of the poison working in his body, he took his last farewell of his son, and going out of the city accompanied with a great retinue of men, yelling and crying out in the streets, in the middle of his journey he fell down and miserably died, (A. D. 1512.) Here mayest thou see, good reader, a cursed brood of this Turkish generation, where the father dies in cursing the son, and the son reigns by poisoning his father.

XI. SELIM I.—After this wretched Selim had exercised his barbarous cruelty upon his father, with like impiety he seeks the destruction of his brethren and their children, first beginning his murder with the five children his nephews, which were the sons of his three brethren who had previously died, then remained his other two brethren yet alive, Ahmet and Korkud with their children, likewise to be destroyed. Of whom the one had three sons, whom the father sent to Selim his brother, and their uncle, with fair and gentle words, to entreat him to be good to their father, offering to him their duty and service in all things, honouring him also as emperor. But cruel Selim commanded forthwith his nephews to be strangled. The father hearing of the cruel murder of his sons, leaving house and home, went and hid himself in the mountains, where he lived for a space with herbs and wild honey; but being betrayed by one of his men, he was brought to Selim, and so was strangled.

The wars and conquests of this Selim were very many in various parts of Asia. From thence triumphing he departed to Constantinople, intending to spend the rest of his time in persecuting the christians; but in that mean space he was stricken with a cankered sore inwardly, and died after he had reigned about eight years (A. D. 1520.)

The reign of this Turk was but short in number of years; but in number of his murders and cruel bloodshed it might seem exceedingly long, which lived more like a beast than a man, for he never spared any of his friends or kindred. His father first he poisoned, his brethren and all his cousins he quelled, leaving none of all his kindred alive. Moreover, his chief and principal captains for small occasions he put to death, as Mustapha, Calogere, Chendame, Bostang his son-in-law, and Juno Bassa.

It is said that he intended the poisoning of his own son Solyman, sending to him a shirt infected with a poison, because he seemed something freely to speak against the cruel demeanour of his father; but by means of his mother, the gift being suspected, was given to another who was his chamberlain, who putting on the shirt was struck with the poison, and died.

As to this Turk Selim, by the way here may be noted how the secret providence of the Lord kept him occupied with his Turkish wars at home, while the reformation of christian religion here in Europe, begun by Martin Luther, might the more quietly take some root without disturbance or interruption. For so it appears, that in the days of this Selim, Martin Luther first began to write against the pope's indulgences, which was A. D. 1516.

XII. SOLYMAN—the only son of Selim, succeeded after his father's death. In the beginning he seemed to some to be simple and sheepish, and not meet for the Turkish government. Wherefore certain of his nobles, consulting how to depose him, intended to set up another emperor. In which conspiracy especially are named Cajebeius and Gazelli. This Cajebeius was he that betrayed Campson the sultan of Egypt to Selim, who now also being in consultation with Gazelli and others about this matter, detected them also to Solyman. Wherefore Gazelli and his fellows being thus detected, were put to death by Solyman, proving that he was not so sheepish as he was thought of them to be, and as by his acts afterwards more fully appeared.

Solyman, after this execution of the conspirators, taking his voyage into Europe, first besieged Belgrade, which being a city in Hungary, was the strongest fort of all the Roman empire, and the chief defence at that time of all Christendom. The kingdom of Hungary at that time was under the government of Lewis, a young king without experience or knowledge. Whom other princes, and especially the covetous churchmen, so plundered, that they left him nothing but the bare name and title of his kingdom, by which, he being unsupplied both with men and money, was unable to match with such an enemy.

Another advantage also which the Turks had in besieging Belgrade, was that the christian princes at that time were in civil dissension and variance among themselves, and the pope with his churchmen also were so busy in suppressing Luther, and the gospel then newly springing, that they minded nothing else, except it were to maintain their wealth: which pope if he had set his care (as his duty was) so much in stirring up princes against the common enemy, as he was bent to deface the gospel, and to persecute the true professors thereof, it might have brought to pass that Belgrade might have been defended against the Turk.

Certainly whatever the pope then did, this had been his duty, setting all other things aside, to have had an earnest compassion of so many miserable and lost captives, who were fallen from their faith and religion into the misery and slavery of the Turk, and thralldom of the devil, and to have sought all means possible to have brought them, as lost sheep, into the fold again; which might have been done, if prelates and princes, joining together in christian concord, had loved so well the public glory of Christ, and souls of christians, as they regarded their own private, worldly, and frivolous quarrels. And even supposing that the pope had conceived never so much malice against Luther, and supposing his quarrel also to be good, yet the public church standing in such danger, as it then did by the invasion of the Turk, reason would, nature led, religion taught, time required, that a good prelate, forgetting lighter matters, should rather have laid his shoulder to the excluding of so great a danger, as was then imminent to himself and the universal church of Christ; but now his quarrel being unjust, and the cause of Luther being most just and godly, what is to be said or thought of such a prelate, who forbearing the Turk, whom in a time so dangerous he ought chiefly to have resisted, persecuted the truth which he should specially have maintained?

Solyman therefore taking this occasion, while our princes were thus at variance, without any resistance or interruption brought his army to Belgrade (A.D. 1521); which city being but slenderly defended, the Turk through his underminers, guns, and other engines of war, without great difficulty, and with little loss of his soldiers, soon subdued and overcame it.

After this victory Solyman resting himself a whole year, and casting in his mind how to make all sure behind him, thought it expedient for his purpose if he might obtain the island of Rhodes, for that was the only christian place that remained between him and Asia; wherefore the next year he brought his army of four hundred and fifty ships, and three hundred thousand men, to the besieging thereof. This Rhodes was a mighty and strong island. The inhabitants at the first manfully resisted the Turk, sparing no labour nor pains for the defence of themselves and of all Christendom; but afterwards being brought to extremity, and pinched with penury, seeing also no aid come from the christians, they began to languish in themselves. The Turks in the meantime casting up two great mountains with strength of hand, two miles off from the city, like rolling trenches carried them before them near to the city, in the tops whereof they planted their ordnance and artillery to batter the city. The master of the knights of Rhodes was then one Philip Villadamus, a Frenchman, in whom no diligence was wanted requisite to the defence of the city. The Rhodians likewise so valiantly behaved themselves upon the walls, that with their shot all the ditches about the city were filled with the carcasses of dead Turks. Besides this, such a disease reigned in the Turk's camp, that thirty thousand of them died; and yet for all this Solyman would not cease from his siege. At length, by underminers casting down the ramparts, and outermost parts of the city, he won ground still more and more upon the Rhodians, and with mortar-pieces so battered the houses, that there was scarcely a free place standing in all the city. And thus the siege continued for the space of five or six months, and yet all this while no help came to them from the christians. Wherefore they being out of all hope, through the advice of Villadamus, yielded themselves to the Turk, upon condition that he would spare them with life and goods, which convention the Turk kept with them faithfully and truly.

Thus Solyman to his great glory, and to the utter shame of all christian princes, and to the ruin of all Christendom, got the noble Isle of Rhodes, although not without great loss of his army, so that at one assault twenty thousand Turks about the walls were slain with fire, sword, stones, and other engines. Whereby it may be conjectured what these Rhodians might or would have done, if succour had come to them from other christian princes as they looked for. This city was won upon Christmas-day, A.D. 1522.

This conquest of Rhodes being secured, Solyman the fourth year after brings back his army into Hungary, where he found none to resist him but Lewis the young king, who being accompanied with a small army, and not able to match with the Turk, yet of a hasty rashness and vain hope of victory, would needs set upon him, who if he had staid but a little had prospered the better. For John Vaivoda, a captain well exercised in Turkish wars before, was not far off, coming with a sufficient force of able soldiers; but Paulus the archbishop of Colosse, a Franciscan friar, a man more bold than wise, with his temerity and rashness troubled all their doings. For the whole sum of the army of the Hungarians contained in all but only twenty-four thousand horsemen and footmen, who at length coming to the battle, and being compassed about with a great multitude of the Turk's army, were brought into great distress. The Turks twice shot off their pieces against the christian army, yet scarce was any christian touched, which was thought to be done on purpose, because they were christians who had the ordering of the guns, for then the special gunners of the Turks were christians, whom for the sake of their gunnery they spared. Then the Turk's horsemen, coming upon the rear of the christian army, compassed them about, and by reason of their multitude overcharged their horsemen. Among whom was slain at the same time the archbishop of Colosse, with the bishops of Strigone and Varadine, and many other nobles beside. Also the king himself was compelled to fly into a marsh, where falling from his horse, being heavy laden with the harness, he was not able to rise again, but there miserably perished.

Solyman the Turk marvelled at the foolishness of Lewis, who with so small an army would presume to encounter with such a great host of two hundred thousand. This battle in Hungary was fought A.D. 1526.

After the decease of Lewis, Ferdinand succeeded in the kingdom, being duke of Austria and king of Hungary. Then Solyman, setting contention between John Vaivoda and Ferdinand for the kingdom of Hungary, marched to the city of Buda, which also in short time he made to surrender upon condition that they should escape with their lives and goods.

In the year 1529, Ferdinand, king of Hungary, recovered several holds, and warring against John Vaivoda his enemy, expelled him out of his kingdom. Whereupon Vaivoda, flying to the Turk, desired his aid. The Turk, glad to take that occasion, with great preparation addressed himself to return into Hungary, where recovering again the city of Buda, which Ferdinand had got from him a little before, he removed his army into Austria, spoiling and destroying by the way all that came to his hands, shewing many examples of great cruelty and tyranny most lamentable to hear and understand. For of some he put out their eyes, of some he cut off their hands, of some their ears and noses. And these examples of horrible and barbarous tyranny this wretched Turk perpetrated by the way coming toward Vienna, a noble city in Austria, besides the captives which he took by the way and led into most miserable slavery, amounting to the number of thirty thousand.

Among other holds by the way as the Turks came, there was a castle called Altenburgh, strongly situated by nature, and defended by art; which castle the Turk intending not to pass, because he would make all things sure behind him, began to make his assault, and lay his ordnance against it. The wardens and keepers of the castle, so soon as the Turk began to lay siege against them, making no resistance, of a womanly cowardliness sent their messengers to the Turk, to yield themselves ready to do his commandment, and farther him with their supplies. Among whom were three hundred Bohemians, who were commanded to follow the army, that the Turk by them might learn what strength was in the city of Vienna; also where the king was, and what was to be done for the winning thereof.

Of whom when the Turk had understanding how all things stood, and how there were but twenty thousand men in Vienna able to bear armour, and that other cities of Austria would soon yield if that were taken, and that Vienna was victualled but for two months, and that the king was of late in Bohemia; the Turk being certified of all things, having no doubt in his mind of victory, made speed toward Vienna; and first coming to Neapolis, a city but eight miles distant from Vienna, he required them to yield themselves; who notwithstanding withstood, and repulsed them valiantly. Then the Turks assigned a place for the pitching of their tents and because it seemed somewhat too little for such a great multitude, they took in more ground to the compass of seven miles circuit. The multitude of his army, which he there planted, is accounted of some to extend to two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers. The Turk thus being planted, made daily excursions over all the country of Austria, especially about the city of Vienna, wasting and spoiling with great cruelty and murder among the poor christians.

Moreover, to make all things more sure toward the preparation of the siege, scouts were sent abroad and ambushments were laid about the side of the river Danube, to provide that no aid nor provisions should be brought to Vienna. It so pleased the Providence of the Lord (who disposes all things) that three days before the coming of the Turk, Frederick the earl palatine, who was then assigned by the empire to take the charge of Vienna, was come down by the river Danube, with fourteen thousand men, and with a certain troop of horsemen, well appointed and picked for the purpose. After the coming of this Frederick, provision also was appointed to follow shortly after by the river.

In the mean time, they who had the carriage and transport, hearing how the ways were laid, and all the passages ten miles about Vienna stopped by the Turks, although they knew the city to stand in great need of provisions, yet seeing there was no other remedy, rather than it should come to the enemy's hand, thought it best to sink their boats with their carriage, and so they did. Whereby although the christians wanted their relief, yet were the Turks disappointed of their prey and purpose.

The captains who had the keeping of the city, were chiefly Frederick the earl palatine, William Rogendorff, and Nicolas earl of Salme, they seeing themselves so straightened contrary to their expectation, although they had great causes to be discouraged, yet calling their courage to them, they consulted together for the best way to be taken; and seeing that the little city of Neapolis (above mentioned) being eight miles distant from them, so valiantly withstood the Turks, that in one day they sustained seven assaults against all the main force of the Turkish army; by their example and manful standing being the more animated and encouraged, they determined to abide the utmost before they would give over; and first plucking down all the suburbs and buildings without the walls whereby the enemy might have any succour, they commanded all the farmers and inhabitants about the city to save themselves, and to bring in their goods within the walls. Such places as were weak within the walls, they made strong. About the towers and munition of the walls they provided ramparts and bulwarks distant eighty feet one from another, to keep off the shot; and every man had his place and standing awarded to him upon the wall, and his office appointed what to do; but especially that side of the city which lies to the river Danube, they fortified after the best manner; for that way only now remained for victuals to be transported from the Bohemians to them. Wherefore eight ensigns were assigned to the keeping of the bridge, and in the plain, which was like an island enclosed within the river, a sufficient garrison of horsemen were placed, lying within the gunshot of the city, that if any grain or victuals were sent from the Bohemians, they might provide the same safely to be brought into the city.

These things thus being disposed and set in order, Lord William Rogendorff, to try the strength of the Turks, made divers sallies out with his horsemen, although much against the minds of the Austrians; who, knowing the manner of the Turks, thought it better to suffer them, while either they might be wearied with time, or consumed for lack of victuals. Among many skirmishes which the christians had with the Turks, one especially was unfortunate to our men; in which certain of the horsemen spying a small troop of the Turks scattering abroad from their company, made out after them, who suddenly and guilefully were enclosed by the Turks, before they could recover the gates of the city, and so were all taken alive; of whom three were sent from the Turks into the city, to declare to the Viennians what strength they had seen in the camp of their adversaries, and to solicit them to yield their city for fear of punishment which would follow. The rest they reserved to torments and punishment, whom in the sight of the whole army, and of the christians (who should tell the same to the citizens) they caused every man to be drawn with four horses a-pieces, and so to be dismembered and plucked asunder.

After this was done, the barbarous Turk immediately sent his herald to talk with the captains of the city, whether they would yield the city upon honest conditions, or else would abide the arbitrement of war. If they would gently submit themselves, they should have all gentleness shewed to them. If they would be stubborn, and stand to their defence, he would also stand to his siege, so that he would spare neither man, woman, or child. To this the captains answered again, that they were contented that Solyman should stand to his siege, and do his utmost, what he would, or what he could. As for them, they were resolved to defend themselves and their city so long as they could; the event and issue of victory, they said, was doubtful, and many times it happens, that they who begin the war, are wearied sooner than they who are challenged.

Solyman, disdaining this answer, first burning and consuming all the villages, houses and places round about the city, poisoning the springs and fountains which gave water to the city, and so stopping all passages that no relief should have way to them, began to approach the city, with three great camps; sending word in scorn and contumely by one of his captains, that if they stood in need of soldiers, he would send to them the three hundred Bohemians (mentioned a little before) to aid them in their defence. To whom the palatine directed answer again, that they had more soldiers in the city than they needed. As for the Bohemians who had yielded, he might do with them what he would, for Vienna stood in no great need of them.

In the mean time a messenger coming from Ferdinand was privately let in by night into the city, he brought word that they should occupy the men in keeping out the enemy awhile; for it would not be long, but both Ferdinand and Charles his brother, with the strength of all Germany, would be ready to rescue them. At this message the hearts of the soldiers began somewhat to be cheered, and to contemn the multitude of the adversaries, whose army extended in compass seven miles round the city walls.

In the meantime Solyman beat down to the ground the ramparts, with all the suburbs of the city, and in such a short time, that the hearts of the inhabitants were appalled with fear, lest the Turk with celerity and violence should prevail against the walls, as he did in beating down the ramparts. And no doubt the Turk had put the city in great hazard, had not night coming on broken off the siege for that day.

In the mean time the citizens laboured all night in repairing and refreshing the walls, to make all things sure against the next assault. The next day early in the morning, the Turks approaching the city again for a new assault, thinking to scale the walls, were so repulsed and manfully resisted by the Germans, that the ditches about the walls could not be seen for the bodies of the dead Turks that filled them; so that the Turks were obliged to fight standing upon the bodies of the slain.

It happened at the same time, that a company of the Turks being seen wandering out of order, the Captain Rogendorff with two legions of horsemen issuing out of the city gate called Salmaria, and passing closely under the hill's side, so set upon them, that they slew a great number of them; the rest driven to take the river, they destroyed, and so retired back to the city again. By this victory the Captain Rogendorff began to be terrible to the Turks. For in the skirmish (as afterwards was known) were slain so many, that of five thousand and three hundred horsemen and footmen, scarce one hundred and forty escaped alive.

Solyman thought to try this matter another way, and so bringing his forces toward the gate called the King's Gate, there making his trenches and bulwarks, planted his ordnance, with the violence whereof the walls were so battered and shaken, that no man was able to stand there. The Turk, seeing two great breaches made in the wall, commanded his soldiers in the dark smoke of the gunpowder, to press into the city. The same also was done at the Scottish Tower, by which the city was invaded in two places at one time. The inhabitants at first began to withstand them, new soldiers still coming in the place of them that were slain; and so this assault continuing more than six hours together, our men began at length to languish and faint, not only in strength but also in courage, by which the city was in great danger, had not the two captains, Rogendorff in one place, and the earl of Salme in the other, manfully encouraged the soldiers to abide the brunt, and to bear out awhile the violence of the Turks, promising that immediately they should have aid from Ferdinand.

In the mean time the Turks came so thick for greediness of victory, scaling, climbing, and fighting upon the walls, that had it not been for the press and throng of the great multitude of the Turks, coming so thick that one of them could not fight for another, Vienna had been taken and utterly lost. But by the policy of the captains giving a sign within the city, as though new soldiers were called for, our men began to be encouraged, and the Turks' hearts to be discomfited.

When Solyman saw his army the second time repulsed, he began to attempt a new way, purposing by undermining to overthrow the city; in which work especially, he used the help of the Illyrians, of whom he had a great number in his camp, expert in that kind of feat. These Illyrians beginning to break the earth at the gate Carinthia, and coming near the foundations of the tower, which they had attempted to burst into, could not work so closely under the ground, but that they were perceived by certain men above; who, countermine against them, and filling their trenches as they went with gunpowder, so conveyed their train, that when fire should be set to it, the violence should burst out by the trenches of the enemies; which done, suddenly the ground beneath made a great shaking, so that the tower did cleave asunder, and all the underminers of the Turks, working in their trenches, were smothered and destroyed, which came to the number (as it was supposed afterward) of eight thousand persons.

When Solyman saw that this way also would not serve, and had private intelligence that the walls about the gates of Suburium were negligently kept, and that he might have there more easy entrance; he secretly moved about ten garrisons of fresh soldiers, so as the townsmen should not perceive them: who came so suddenly upon them, that they had filled their ditches, and were upon the top of the fortresses, before our men were aware of them, or could make themselves ready to resist them. For although there was no lack of soldiers within the city, yet the whole brunt of the siege lay especially at the two gates, from whence the soldiers could not be well removed; men however were sent to the spot now attacked. And thus the assault continued terrible and doubtful until (the dark night coming upon them) they could not well know the one from the other. In this affair there were counted of the Turks to be slain more than five thousand.

Then the Captain Rogendorff, commending the valiant standing of his soldiers, providing with all diligence against another assault, made up the breaches of the walls, and prepared all things necessary for resistance. The next morning, which was dark and misty, the Turks thinking to anticipate our men with their sudden coming, began again busily to mount upon the top of the walls.

It would require a long treatise here to describe the great distress and danger that the city was in those three days following. During all which time there was no rest, no intermission, nor diligence wanting either in the enemy's fighting against the city, or in our men in defending the same. For the Turks, besides the great ordnance, wherewith (as with a great tempest of gun-shot) they never ceased battering the walls, and beating the fortifications of the city, sent also such heaps and multitudes of the Turks, to the scaling and climbing of the walls, that notwithstanding all the defeats, the number of them never seemed diminished; till at last the soldiers of the Turks, perceiving themselves able by no means to prevail, but only run in danger of life, and to do no good, began to wrangle amongst themselves, repining against their dukes and captains, imputing the whole cause to them, that the city was yet untaken, and so the siege ceased for that time.

After this, when Solyman had purposed with his last and strongest siege to try the city the utmost that he was able to do, and had encouraged his soldiers to prepare themselves: the soldiers shewed themselves very unwilling to return again from whence they were so often repulsed before; so that a great commotion began to rise in the Turk's camp. When the rumor came to Solyman's ears, he sends his grand captain to keep all the soldiers in order and obedience, or if they would be stubborn, to compel them, whether they would or not, to accomplish his commandment, who coming to the soldiers shewed to them the great Turk's message, and to animate and encourage them, declared that the opportunity was not to be neglected, neither could they now without great shame give over, after so many assaults, who, if they would sustain but one brunt more, the victory were in their own hands. The townsmen, he said, were wasted, and their victuals spent; and the more to inflame their minds, he promised them not only great thanks and reward of their emperor, but also the whole spoil of the city.

But when all this could not stir up the tired Turks, using compulsion where persuasion would not serve, he appointed a number of horsemen to be set at their backs to force them either to go forward, or if they refused to destroy them with guns and spears. The Turks seeing themselves in such a straight, that whether they went or tarried it was to them the same peril, yet they would not set forward except the captain would take the lead before them, who thus spake: "Forsake your faith and allegiance, and betray the emperor of Constantinople to the christians if you will; but I will discharge my duty towards the commonwealth and my emperor;" and with that word advanced his ensign, making toward the city walls. When others followed him, and still more and more pressed after him, it came to pass that whole bodies of them were overthrown and slain by our men upon the walls, before it was known what they meant. Others terrified by their example gave back and left their array, and winding themselves by by-ways and under covert of the hills, returned again to their tents, and so came it to pass, that the strength of the enemies daily more and more decreasing, they had less hope every day of obtaining the city. For besides the innumerable slaughter of Turks upon the walls, the townsmen also watching the forages and purveyors of the Turks, as they ranged about for victuals for the camp, as occasion served them encompassed them, and encountered with them, so that of a whole legion scarcely the tenth part returned alive, by which the courage of the enemy began greatly to faint. As our men began to receive more hope and courage, so the Turks began still more to droop and to languish with despair, so that at length they scarce durst appear without the bounds where they were entrenched, but only in light skirmishes, when they were challenged by our men to come out and to shew themselves.

Solyman perceiving his soldiers thus daily to go to wreck, of whom he had lost already more than eighty thousand, and that with long tarrying he could do no good, being also in lack of forage, for the country about him was wasted, he began to consult with his captains and counsellors, what remained best to be done. The most part advised him to raise his siege, and provide for himself. The chief motive was, that he heard Frederick, the Palatine, was coming with a great army at Ratisbon towards Vienna. When Solyman had intelligence of this, thinking it not best to wait the coming of the Palatine, made haste with bag and baggage to remove his camp, and to retire; and first sending his carriage before him, he made speed himself with his army to follow shortly after.

The Viennians, when they heard of the departure of the Turks, although at the first they scarcely believed it to be true, being afterward certified of their removing, and how it was in a manner of a flight, were greatly desirous to make out of the city after them. In which, although the presence of the Palatine with his army, if he had been there, might have stood them in great stead, yet they took the opportunity, and issuing out of the city, set after them with their horsemen, and first passing the tents (where the Turks had pitched their pavilions) they made such pursuit after them, that within a little time they overtook the rearward of the army; they made such havoc and destruction, that, as the author reports, there was not a shot discharged, nor weapon drawn, nor stroke struck, by the pursuers, which did not tell on the enemy.

Thus through the merciful protection of Almighty God, Austria was delivered from the fierce and barbarous hostility of the cruel Turks. Notwithstanding, that neither Ferdinand, the king, nor the emperor his brother, were present, but only the power of God, through the valiancy of the worthy Germans, defended that city; in defence of which consisted the safety and deliverance of all these west parts of Christendom. For the which immortal praise and thanks be unto our immortal God in Christ our Lord, according as he hath most graciously and worthily deserved of us. Wherein by the way take notice, gentle reader, how and after what manner God's blessing goes with the true followers of his religion; for the Turks in so many battles and sieges heretofore were never so repelled and foiled, as at this time in encountering with the protestants and defenders of sincere religion. This city of Vienna was besieged and delivered, A. D. 1529. The assaults of the Turk against the city are numbered to be twenty, and his repulses as many. The number of his army which he first brought, was two hundred and fifty thousand, whereof were slain eighty thousand and above.

In the year 1537, Solymán, who could not be quiet at home, nor rest in peace, returning out of Asia from his wars there into Europe with two hundred and seventy ships, great and little, set upon Corcyra, another island belonging to the Venetians, which he besieged ten days, wasting and burning the towns and fields as he went, beside the destruction of much people therein, whom partly he slew, partly led away captives. From thence he sailed to Zacynthus and Cythera, another island not far from Corcyra, bordering near to the coasts of Epirus and Greece. Where he suddenly by night invading the husbandmen in villages and fields, sleeping and mistrusting no harm, drew them out of their houses and possessions, men and women, besides children, to the number of nine hundred, whom he made his bondslaves; burning moreover their houses, and carrying away all the goods and cattle being without the said city of Zacynthus and Cythera.

From thence they turned their course to the siege of Egina, a rich and populous island, lying between Greece and Asia. Where at first the Eginians did manfully resist them in battle, and were likely to have prevailed; but wearied at length, and oppressed with innumerable thousands of fresh Turks, who still were sent in, to rescue the others who were overcome before, they were compelled to fly to the city of Egina. Which city the cruel Turks, with much labour, and violence of their great ordnance brought out of their ships, subdued and cast down to the ground; the citizens and inhabitants which the Turk after he had burned their houses, and ransacked their goods, commanded to be slain and killed every one. The women both noble and unnoble, with their infants, were shipped to Constantinople, and led away to perpetual misery and slavery, which was A. D. 1537.

In the year 1540, the restless Turk making his return toward Hungary, by the way passing by Dalmatia, laid siege to the town called Novum Castellum, defended by the Spaniards. In which town, because they refused to yield themselves, all the inhabitants and soldiers were put to the sword, and slain every one. This Novum Castellum, or Newcastle, was a strong fort of the christians, which being now in the Turk's power, he had great advantage over all those quarters of Dalmatia, Stiria, Carinthia, and Hungaria. From thence he proceeded further, keeping his course into Hungary, where he planted his forces against the city of Buda.

This Buda was a principal city in Hungary, under the government of George Monachus, who quarrelled with Ferdinand, and said that he would never any more trust the promises of christians, and immediately upon the same, sent to Solymán the Turk, for aid against the christians, promising that he would surrender to him free possession of Hungary, if he would come and vanquish the army of Ferdinand lying about the siege of Buda. The Turk made no long tarrying, but glad of the occasion, with a mighty army came into Hungary, and soon overpowering the host of Ferdinand, he got the city into his own hands, commanding George Monachus with his mother, to follow after his camp.

In the history of Joannes Ramus, it follows, that when Solymán the Turk had thus prevailed against the city of Buda, and against other parts of Hungary; by the assent of the empire, one Joachim, duke of Brandenburg, prince elector, was appointed with a puissant army of chosen soldiers of all nations, to recover the city of Buda from the Turk, and to deliver the other parts of Christendom from the fear of the Turk, A. D. 1542. Which Joachim, at his first setting forth, appeared so courageous and valiant, as if he would have conquered the whole world: but this great heat was so cooled in a short time by the Turk, that before any great danger was offered to him, he was glad to be discharged of the voyage, and with shame enough returned home again. And would God he had left behind him in the fields no more but his own shame. For the enemies having intelligence of his cowardly departure, thinking to work some point of mastery or victory before his going, set upon the right wing of his army, out of which they took away with them above five hundred strong and valiant soldiers, not killing them, but carrying them away alive. For whom it had been much better to have stood to their weapon, and to have died manfully upon the Turks, than by yielding themselves to be deprived of weapons and armour, and so to be left to the cursed courtesy of the foul Turks. What courtesy was shewed in the sequel, soon appeared. For after the Turks had led them out of Hungary into their own dominions, after a most horrible sort they disfigured and mangled them, and so sent them abroad through all Greece, to be witnesses of the Turkish victory. Their kind of punishment was thus: first, they had their right arm thrust through with an iron red hot, by which they would be unable and unfit to all labour and warfare; secondly, their heads were shaven to the very skulls, after the manner of our friars and monks, when they are newly shaven; thirdly, they had all their limbs cruelly and shamefully mangled and mutilated.

But to return again to the city of Buda, from whence we have digressed, here we must not omit what falsehood and what cruelty the Turks used towards the christians there after their victory. For after Solymán the Turk, upon the yielding and submission of the men of Buda, had given to them his promise of safety and life, within a short time, he picking a quarrel with him for selling oxen to the christians, and for bargaining with them, slew all the magistrates of the city of Buda; as in all other cities wherever the christians yielded to him, he never, or very rarely kept his promise with them, nor did ever any christians speed better with the Turk, than they who most valiantly resisted him.

And as his promise with the magistrates of Buda was false and wretched; so his cruelty with the soldiers was much more notorious and abominable; for two cohorts or bands of christian soldiers came alive to his hands; to whom, when he seemed at first to grant pardon of life, he commanded that they should put on their armour again, and to dispose themselves in order and battle array, after the warlike manner of the christians; which, when they had accomplished readily, according to his commandment, and when he, riding about the ranks, had diligently viewed and beheld them a certain space, at length he commanded them to put off their armour again; which done, certain of the tallest and strongest of them he picked out, the rest he commanded by his soldiers coming behind them with swords, to be cut in pieces and slain. Of the others, whom he had elected and chosen, some he set for marks and butts to be shot at; some he appointed to his two sons, for them to slash with their swords and try their strength, which of them could give the deeper wound, and (as they termed it) the fairer blow, by which the most blood might flow out of their christian bodies.

After the winning of Buda, the Turk, purposing not to cease till he had subdued and brought under his obedience all Hungary, proceeding further with his army, first brought under a strong hold of the christians, named Pestum or Pesta, where a great number of christian soldiers were slain, and many were led away to more cruel affliction.

Then he came to another castle called Walpo, situate in the confines of Bosnia, Croatia, and Hungary; which fort or castle he besieged three months; no rescue or aid was sent to them, either from Ferdinand, king of Hungary, or from any other christian prince or princess. At length the fort was given up to the Turk; but more through the false treachery or cowardly heart of the soldiers than of the captain. Wherein is to be noted an example not unworthy of memory. For when the cowardly soldiers, either for fear or flattery, would needs surrender themselves and the place to the Turk, contrary to the mind of the captain, who in no case would agree to their yielding: they, thinking to find favour with the Turk, apprehended their captain, and gave him to Solyman. But see how the justice of God, sometimes by the hand of the enemy, disposes the end of things to the rewarding of virtue, and punishing of vice. For where they thought to save themselves by the danger of the faithful captain, the event turned clean contrary; so that the Turk was bountiful and very liberal to the captain, and the soldiers, notwithstanding that they had all yielded themselves, yet were all commanded to be slain.

The Turk proceeding from one fortified town to another, took them, and greatly and cruelly extended his conquests through all Hungary till he came to Alba; there, the Turks, using the occasion of a misty darkness, approached the walls, and got up to a certain fortress where the Germans were, before our men could well perceive them: where they pressed in so thick, and in such number, that although the christian soldiers, standing strongly to the defence of their lives, did what valiant men in cases of such extremity were able to do; yet being over-matched by the multitude of the Turks, and the suddenness of their coming, gave back, seeking to retire unto the inward walls. There was between the outward walls and inward gate of the city, a strait, or narrow passage, cast up in the manner of a bank or causeway, which passage happened to be barred and stopped. By reason of which the poor soldiers were forced to cast themselves into the ditch, thinking to swim as well as they could into the city: many of them sticking in the mud were drowned, one pressing upon another; many were slain by their enemies coming behind them. A few who could swim out were received into the city, but the chief captains and warders of the town were slain there.

The citizens being destitute of their principal captains and warriors, were in great perplexity and doubt among themselves what to do, some thinking good to yield, some counselling the contrary. Thus, while the citizens were distracted, the magistrates thinking to depend on the Turk's gentleness, sent out one of their heads to the Turk, who in the name of them all should surrender to him the city, and become to him tributaries, upon condition they might enjoy liberty of life and goods; which being granted, after the Turkish faith and assurance: the soldiers who were within the city, putting off their armour, were discharged and sent away.

Now see what happened to the yielding citizens. When the Turk had entered the town, and had visited the sepulchre of the kings, for three or four days he pretended much clemency toward the citizens, as though he came not to oppress them, but to be revenged of Ferdinand their king, and to deliver them from the servitude of the Germans. On the fourth day, all the chief and head men of the city were commanded to appear before the Turk, in a plain not far from the city where the condemned persons before were wont to be executed, as though they should come to swear to the Turk. At this command of the Turk, when the citizens in great number, and in their best attire were assembled, the Turk, contrary to his faith and promise, commanded suddenly a general slaughter to be made of them all. And this was the end of the citizens of Alba.

As the false and cruel Turk was thus raging in Hungary, and intended further to rage without all mercy and pity of the christians, and might easily then have prevailed and gone whither he would, for Charles the emperor, and Francis the French king, were at the same time in war and hostility, and also other christian princes, as Henry, duke of Brunswick against John Frederick, duke of Saxony; also princes and rulers were contending among themselves: behold the gracious providence of our Lord and God towards us, who seeing the misery, and having pity of his poor christians, suddenly reined this raging beast, and brought him out of Europe into his own country again, by occasion of the Persians, who were then in great preparation of war against the Turks, and had invaded his dominion. By which the Turks were kept there occupied, fighting with the Persians for a long time. Which wars at length being achieved and finished, (wherein the said Turk lost great victories, with slaughter of many thousands of his Turks) he was not only provoked by the instigation of certain evil-disposed Hungarians, but also induced by the discord of christian princes to return again into Europe, in hopes to subdue all parts to his dominion. When he had levied an army, incredible in multitude, see again the merciful providence and protection of our God toward his people. As the Turk was thus intending to set forward with his innumerable multitude against the christians, the hand of the Lord sent such a pestilence through all the Turk's army and dominions, reaching from Bithynia, and from Thrace to Macedonia, and also to Hungary, that all the Turk's possessions seemed almost nothing else but as an heap of dead corpses, whereby his voyage for that time was stopped, and he almost compelled to seek a new army.

Besides this plague, which was worse to them than any war, other domestic calamities, through God's providence, happened to Solyman, the great rover and robber of the world, which kept him at home from vexing the christians, especially concerning his eldest son Mustapha.

This Mustapha being hated, and feared by Rostanus, the chief counsellor about the Turk, and by Rosa, the Turk's concubine, and afterwards his wife, was complained of to his father, accused, and at length so brought into suspicion and displeasure of the Turks, that his father caused him to be sent for to his pavilion, where six Turks with masks were appointed to put him to death: they put (after their manner) a small cord or bow-string full of knots about his neck, and so throwing him down upon the ground, not suffering him to speak one word to his father, with the twitch thereof strangled him to death, his father standing in a secret corner by, and beholding the same. Which fact being perpetrated, afterwards when the Turk would have given to another son, called Gianger, the treasures, horse, armour, ornaments, and the province of Mustapha his brother; Gianger crying out for sorrow at his brother's death, said he to his father, "Shame on thee, thou impious and wretched dog, traitor, murderer, I cannot call thee father, take the treasures, the horse and armour of Mustapha to thyself;" and with that, taking out his dagger, thrust it through his own body. And thus was Solyman murderer and parricide of his own sons; which was A. D. 1552.

Wherein is to be noted the singular providence and love of the Lord towards his afflicted christians. For this Mustapha, as he was courageous and greatly expert and exercised in all practise of war, so had he a cruel heart, maliciously set to shed the blood of the christians: wherefore, we have great cause to congratulate, and to give thanks to God, for the happy taking away of this Mustapha. And no less hope also and good comfort we may conceive of our loving Lord, to think that our merciful God, after these sore afflictions of his christians under these twelve Turks afore recited, now, after this Solymán, intends some gracious good work to Christendom, to reduce and release us out of this long and miserable Turkish captivity, as may be hoped now, by taking away of these young imps of this impious generation, before they should come to work their conceived malice against us: the Lord, therefore, be glorified and praised. Amen.

Moreover, as I was in writing hereof, opportunely came to my hands a certain writing out of Germany, certifying us of such news and victory of late achieved against the Turk, as may not a little increase our hope and comfort us, touching the decay and ruin of the Turk's power and tyranny against us. Which news are these: that after the Turkish tyrant had besieged, with an army of thirty thousand men, the famous and strong town and castle of Jula in Hungary, lying forty Dutch miles beyond the river Danube, which city had by the space of six weeks sustained many grievous assaults: God, through his great mercy and goodness so comforted the said town of Jula, and the poor christians therein, at their earnest prayers, that the Turk, with all his host was driven back by the hands of the general, called Karetshim Laslaw, and his valiant company: who not only defended the town, but also constrained the Turks to retire, to their great shame and confusion, with a great slaughter of the Turkish rabble; for which, the everlasting God be praised for ever.

The manner of the overthrow was this. As the general saw his advantage, with Captain George, and other horsemen of the Silesians and Hungarians, they set on the rearward of the Turks and killed about eight thousand of them, and took also some of their artillery, and followed them so fast, that the Turks were constrained to fly into a marshy ground, and to break the wheels of the rest of their artillery to save themselves, and therewith they got a very rich booty, rescuing besides, and taking from the Turks, a great number of christian prisoners.

This Solymán reigned forty-six years; he began the same year in the which the Emperor Charles V. was crowned, which was A. D. 1520, and so has continued by God's permission, for a scourge to the christians, to the year 1566. This Solymán, by one of his concubines, had his eldest son called Mustapha. By another concubine called Rosa, he had four sons, Mahomet, Bajazet, Zelymus, and Gíanger. Of which sons, Mustapha and Gíanger were slain (as ye heard before) by means of their own father. And thus much concerning the wretched tyranny of the Turks.

Thus from time to time the church of Christ has had little or no rest in this earth; what for the heathen emperors on the one side; what for the proud pope on the other side; on the third side, what for the barbarous Turk: for these are and have been from the beginning, the three principal and capital enemies of the church of Christ. The cruelty and malice of these enemies against Christ's people has been such, that to judge which of them did most exceed in cruelty of persecution, it is hard to say; but it may be thought that the bloody and beastly tyranny of the Turks, incomparably surmounts all the afflictions and cruel slaughters that ever were seen in any age, or read of in any history; so that there is neither history so perfect, nor writer so diligent, who writing of the miserable tyranny of the Turks, is able to express or comprehend the horrible examples of the unspeakable cruelty and slaughter, exercised by these twelve Turkish tyrants upon poor christian men's bodies, within the compass of these later three hundred years. Whereof although no sufficient relation can be made, nor number expressed; yet to give to the reader some general guess or view thereof, let us first consider what dominions and empires, how many countries, kingdoms, provinces, cities, towns, strong holds, and forts, these Turks have surprised and won from the christians. In all which victories, that there is almost no place which the Turks ever came to and subdued, where they did not either slay all the inhabitants, or lead away the most part into such captivity and slavery, that they continued not long after alive, or else so lived, that death almost had been more tolerable.

As in the time of the first persecutions of the Roman emperors, the saying was, That no man could step with his feet in all Rome, but he would tread upon a martyr: so here may be said, That almost there is not a town, city, or village in all Asia, Greece, also in a great part of Europe and Africa, whose streets have not flowed with the blood of the christians, whom the cruel Turks have murdered. Of whom are to be seen in histories, heaps of soldiers slain, of men and women cut in pieces, of children stuck upon poles and stakes, whom those detestable Turks most spitefully (and that in the sight of their parents) use to gore to death: some they drag at their horse tails, and famish to death; some they tear in pieces, tying their arms and legs to four horses; others they make marks to shoot at; upon some they try their swords how deep they can cut and slash. The aged and feeble they tread under their horses: sex is not regarded, but women and children are barbarously murdered. Whether the christians yield to them, or yield not, it is all the same. As in their promises there is no truth, so in their victories there is no sense of manhood or mercy, but they make havoc of all.

So the citizens of Croja, after they had yielded and were promised their lives, were all destroyed, and that horribly. In Mysia, after the king had given himself to the Turks, having promise of life, Mahomet the Turk slew him with his own hands. The princes of Rasia had both their eyes put out, with basons red hot set before them. Theodosia, otherwise called Capha, was also surrendered to the Turk, having the like assurance of life and safety; and yet, contrary to the league, the citizens were put to the sword and slain. At the winning and yielding of Lesbos, what a number of young men and children were put upon sharp stakes and poles, and so thrust through! At the winning of the city of Roda, what tyranny was shewed and exercised against the poor christians who had yielded themselves, and against the two dukes, Christopher Bissere and John Tranbinger, contrary to the promise and hand-writing of the Turk, is to be seen in the history of Melchior Soiterus.

The like also is to be read in the history of Bernard de Breydenbach, who, writing of the taking of Hydruntum, a city in Apulia, testifies of the miserable slaughter of the young men there slain; of old men trodden under the horses' feet; of matrons and maidens horribly outraged and murdered; of women with child cut and rent in pieces; of the priests in the churches slain; and of the archbishop of that city, who, being an aged man, and holding the cross in his hands, was cut asunder with a wooden saw, &c. The same Bernard, also writing of the overthrow of Nigropontus, otherwise called Chalcedes, (A. D. 1471,) describes the like terrible slaughter which was exercised there, where the Turk, after his promise given to the contrary, most cruelly caused all the youth of Italy to be pricked upon sharp stakes; some to be dashed against the hard stones, others to be cut asunder in the midst, and others with various kinds of torments to be put to death: insomuch, that all the streets and ways of Chalcedes did flow with the blood of them which were there slain. In which history the writer records one memorable example of maidenly courage, worthy of all christians to be noted and commended. The history is told of the pretor's daughter of that city, who, being the only daughter of her father, and noted to be of an exceeding singular beauty, was saved out of the slaughter, and brought to Mahomet the Turk. But she refusing to join the Turk's seraglio, or to embrace the Mahometan faith, was commanded to be slain and murdered, and so died she a martyr.

The like cruelty also was shewed upon them who kept the castle and afterwards yielding themselves upon hope of the Turk's promise, were slain every one. What should I speak of the miserable slaughter of Methone, and the citizens thereof dwelling in Peloponnesus: who, seeing no remedy, but that they must needs come into the Turks' hands, set the barn on fire where they were gathered together, men, women, and children; some women also voluntarily cast themselves into the sea, rather than they would sustain the Turks' captivity.

It is miserable to behold, long to recite, incredible to believe, all the cruel acts and horrible slaughters wrought by these miscreants against the christians through all places of the world, both in Asia, in Africa, but especially in Europe. Who is able to recite the innumerable societies and companies of the Grecians martyred by the Turks' sword in Achaia, Attica, Thessaly, Macedonia, Epirus, and all Peloponnesus? besides the island of Rhodes, and other islands, in the adjacent sea numbered to about two-and-fifty; of which also Patmos was one, where St. John wrote his Revelations. Where did ever the Turks set any foot, but the blood of christians was shed there, without pity or measure? and what place or province is there almost through the world, where the Turks either have not pierced, or are not likely shortly to enter? In Thrace, and through all the coasts of the Danube, in Bulgaria, Dalmatia, in Servia, Transylvania, Bosnia in Hungaria, also in Austria, what havoc has been made by them of christian men's bodies, it will pain any christian heart to remember. At the siege of Moldavia and many other places; also at the battle of Varna, where Ladislaus, king of Poland, with almost all his army, through the rashness of the pope's cardinal, were slain; at Xabiacchus, Lysus, Dynastrum; at the siege of Gunza, and of the faithful town Scord, where the number of the shot against their walls, at the siege, were reckoned to two thousand five hundred and thirty-nine. Likewise at the siege of Vienna, where all the christian captives were brought before the whole army and slain, and many drawn in pieces with horses; but especially at the winning of Constantinople, above mentioned: also at Creja and Methone, what beastly cruelty was shewed, it is unspeakable. For as in Constantinople, Mahomet, the drunken Turk, never rose from dinner, but he caused every day, for his sport, three hundred christian captives of the nobles of that city to be slain before his face; so in Methone, after his captain Omar had sent to him at Constantinople five hundred prisoners of the christians, the cruel tyrant commanded them all to be cut and divided in sunder by the middle, and so being slain, to be thrown out into the fields.

What christian heart will not pity the incredible slaughter done by the Turks in Euboea, where Faber testifies, "That innumerable people were stuck and gored upon stakes; divers were thrust through with a hot iron; children and infants, not yet weaned from the mother, were dashed against the stones, and many cut asunder in the midst?"

But never did country taste and feel more the bitter and deadly tyranny of the Turks, than did Rasia, called Mysia Inferior, and now Servia. Where (as writes Wolfgang Drechterus) the prince of the same country being sent for, under fair pretence of words and promises, to come and speak with the Turk, after he was come of his own gentleness, thinking no harm, was apprehended, and wretchedly and falsely put to death, and his skin flayed off, his brother and sister brought to Constantinople for a triumph, and all the nobles of his country had their eyes put out.

Briefly to conclude, by the vehement and furious rage of these cursed caitiffs, it may seem that Satan the old dragon, for the great hatred he bears to Christ, has stirred them up to be the butchers of all christian people, inflaming their beastly hearts with such malice and cruelty against the name and religion of Christ, that they degenerating from the nature of men to devils, will neither by reason be ruled, nor by any blood or slaughter satisfied. Like as in the primitive age of the church, and in the time of Dioclesian and Maximilian, when the devil saw that he could not prevail against the person of Christ who was risen again, he turned all his fury upon his servants, thinking by the Roman emperors utterly to extinguish the name and profession of Christ out from the earth: so in this later age of the world, Satan being let loose again, rages by the Turks, thinking to make no end of murdering and killing, till he have brought (as he intends) the whole church of Christ, with all the professors thereof, under foot. But the Lord (I trust) will once send a Constantine to vanquish proud Maxentius, a Moses to drown indurate Pharaoh, a Cyrus to subdue the stout Babylonian.

And thus much, touching our christian brethren who were slain and destroyed by these blasphemous Turks. Now, many others were torn away violently from their country, from their wives and children, from liberty, and from all their possessions, into wretched captivity and extreme penury: it remains likewise to treat somewhat also concerning the cruel manner of the Turks' handling of the said christian captives. And first, here is to be noted, that the Turk never comes into Europe to war against the christians, but there follow after his army a great number of brokers or merchants, such as buy men and children to sell again, bringing with them long chains in hope of great bargains. In which chains they link by fifty and sixty together, such as remain undestroyed by the sword, whom they buy of the soldiers as part of the spoils of them that rob and spoil the christian countries.

Such as belong to the Sultan's share, i. e. a tenth of the whole, are sold to the use of husbandry or keeping of beasts. If they are young men or women, they are sent to certain places, there to be instructed in their language and arts, as shall be most for their advantage; and the first care of the Turks is this, to make them deny the christian religion; and after that they are appointed, every one as he seems most apt, either to the learning of their laws, or else to learn the feats of war. Their first rudiment of war is to handle the bow; first beginning with a weak bow, and, as they grow in strength, coming to a stronger bow; and, if they miss the mark, they are sharply beaten; and their allowance is twopence or threepence a-day, till they come and take wages to serve in war. Some are brought up for the purpose to be placed in the number of the wicked Janizaries.

Such as are young maidens and beautiful, are deputed for seraglios. They who are of little beauty, serve for matrons to do the drudgery work in their houses and chambers, or else are put to spinning, and such other labours; but so, that it is not lawful for them either to profess their christian religion, or ever to hope for any liberty.

The others who are bought and sold among private subjects, first are allured with fair words and promises to embrace Mahometanism, which, if they do, they are more favourably treated, but all hope is taken from them of returning again into their country; if they attempt that, the penalty is burning. And if such coming at length to liberty will marry, they may; but then their children remain bond to the master for him to sell at his pleasure; and, therefore, such as are wise amongst them will not marry. They who refuse to become Mahometans are miserably handled; for example whereof, the author who gives testimony hereof adduces his own experience. Such captives as are expert in any manual art or occupation, can better shift for themselves; but they who have no handicraft to live upon, are in worse case. And, therefore, such as have been brought up in learning, or be priests or noblemen, and such others whose tender education can abide no hardness, are the least reputed, and most of all others neglected by him that has the sale or keeping of them, because he sees less profit to rise of them than of the other; and therefore no cost of raiment is bestowed upon them, but they are carried about barehead and barefoot, both summer and winter, in frost and snow. And if any faint and be sick in the way, there is no resting for him in any inn, but first he is driven forward with whips, and if that will not serve, he is set peradventure upon some horse; or, if his weakness be such that he cannot sit, then is he laid overthwart the horse upon his belly like a calf; and if he chance to die, they take off his garment, such as he has, and throw him in a ditch.

They are brought forth to the market for sale, where the buyer, if he be disposed, plucking off their garments, vieweth all the bones and joints of their body: and if he like them he gives his price, and carries them away into miserable servitude, either to tilling of their ground, or to pasture their cattle, or to some other strange kind of misery incredible to speak of: insomuch that the author reports that he hath seen himself certain of such christian captives yoked together like horse and oxen, and to draw the plough. The maid servants likewise are kept in perpetual toil and work in close places, where neither they come in sight of any man, neither are they permitted to have any talk with their fellow-servants, &c. Such as are committed to keep beasts, lie abroad day and night in the wild fields, without house and harbour, and so changing their pasture go from mountain to mountain, of whom, also beside the office of keeping the beasts, other handy labour is exacted at spare hours, such as pleases their masters to put unto them.

Out of this misery there is no way for them to fly, especially for them that are carried into Asia beyond the seas, or if any do attempt so to do, he taketh his time chiefly about harvest, when he may hide himself all the day-time in the corn, or in woods or marshes, and find food, and in the night only he flies, and had rather be devoured of wolves and other wild beasts, than to return again to his master. In their flying they use to take with them an hatchet and cords, that when they come to the sea-side, they may cut down trees, and bind together the ends of them, and so where the sea of Hellespont is narrowest, about the Sestos and Abydos, they take the sea, sitting upon trees, where, if the wind and tide do serve luckily, they may run over in four or five hours. But the most part either perish in the floods, or are driven back again upon the coasts of Asia, or else are devoured of wild beasts in woods, or perish with hunger and famine. If any escape over the sea alive into Europe, they enter into no town by the way, but wander upon the mountains, following only the North Star for their guide.

As touching such towns and provinces which are won by the Turk, and wherein the christians are suffered to live under tribute: first, all the nobility there they kill and make away, the churchmen and clergy hardly they spare. The churches, with the bells and all the furniture, either they cast down, or else they convert to the use of their own blasphemous religion, leaving to the christians certain old blind chapels, which when they decay, it is permitted to our men to repair them again for a great sum of money given to the Turk. Neither are they permitted to use any open preaching or ministration, but only in silence and by stealth to frequent together. Neither is it lawful for any christian to bear office within the city province, nor to bear weapon, nor to wear any garment like to the Turks. And if any contumely or blasphemy, be it never so great, be spoken against them, or against Christ, yet must thou bear it, and hold thy peace. And then if thou speak one word against Mahomet, thy punishment is fire and burning. And if it chance a Christian being on horseback meet, or pass by a Mussulman, that is, a Turkish priest, he must light from his horse, and with a lowly look devoutly reverence and adore the Mussulman, or if he do not he is beaten down from his horse with clubs and staves.

Furthermore, for their tribute they pay the fourth part of their substance and gain to the Turk, beside the ordinary tribute of the christians, which is to pay for every poll within his family a ducat unto the Turk, which if the parents cannot do, they are compelled to sell their children into bondage. Other being not able to pay, go chained in fetters from door to door begging, to make up their payment, or else must lie in perpetual prison.

And thus have ye heard the lamentable afflictions of our christian brethren under the cruel tyranny and captivity of the Turks, passing all other captivities that ever have been to God's people, either under Pharaoh in Egypt, or under Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon, or under Antiochus in the time of the Maccabees. Under which captivity, if it so please the Lord to have his spouse the church to be nurtured, his good will be done and obeyed. But if this misery come by the negligence and discord of our christian guides and leaders, then have we to pray and cry to our Lord God, either to give better hearts to our guides and rulers, or else better guides and rulers to his flocks.

And these troubles and afflictions of our christian brethren suffered by the Turks, I thought good and profitable for our country people here of England to know, for so much as by the ignorance of these, and such like histories worthy of consideration, I see much inconvenience follows. Whereby it cometh to pass, that because we Englishmen being far off from these countries, and little knowing what misery is abroad, are the less moved with zeal and compassion to tender their grievances, and to pray for them whose troubles we know not. Whereupon also it follows that we not considering the miserable state of other, are the less grateful to God, when any tranquillity is granted to us. And if any little cloud arise upon us, be it never so little, as poverty, loss of living, or a little banishment out of our country for the Lord's cause, we make a greater matter of it, and all because we go no further than our own country, and only feeling our own cross, do not compare that which we feel with the great crosses to which the churches of Christ commonly in other places abroad are subject. Which if we rightly understood, and earnestly considered and pondered in our minds, neither would we so excessively forget ourselves in the time of our prosperity, nor yet so impatiently be troubled, as we are in time of our adversity, and all because either we hear not, or else we ponder not the terrible crosses which the Lord layeth upon our other brethren in other nations.

The Prophecies of the Holy Scriptures considered, touching the coming up and final ruin and destruction of this wicked kingdom of the Turk, with the revelations and foreshewings also of other authors concerning the same.

As you have sufficiently heard to what largeness the dominion of the Turks has increased, and understand what cruel tyranny these wretched miscreants have and do daily practise most heinously, wherever they come against the servants and professors, it shall not be unprofitable, but rather necessary, and to our great comfort, to consider and examine in the scriptures, with what prophecies the Holy Spirit of the Lord has forewarned us before of these heavy persecutions to come upon his people by this horrible antichrist. For as the government and constitution of times and states of monarchies and policies fall not to us by blind chance, but are administered and allotted to us from above, so it is not to be supposed, that such a great alteration of kingdoms, such a terrible and general persecution of God's people almost through all Christendom, and such a terror of the whole earth as is now moved and gendered by these Turks, comes without the knowledge, sufferance, and determination of the Lord, for such ends and purposes as his divine wisdom doth best know. For the better evidence and testimony of which he has left in his scriptures sufficient instruction and declaration, by which we may plainly see to our great comfort how these grievous afflictions and troubles of the church, though they are sharp and heavy to us, yet they come not by chance or by man's working only, but even as the Lord himself has appointed it.

In the later years of the Jewish kingdom, what troubles and afflictions that people sustained three hundred years together, but chiefly the last one hundred and sixty-six years before the coming of Christ, by Antiochus and his fellows, the history of the Maccabees can report. Wherein we have also notoriously to understand the miserable vexations and persecutions of christian churches in these later ends of the world by antichrist.

We read that this Antiochus, in the eighth year of his reign, in his second coming to Jerusalem, first gave forth in commandment, that all the Jews should relinquish the law of Moses, and worship the idol of Jupiter Olympius which he set up in the temple of Jerusalem.

The books of Moses and of the Prophets he burned. He set garrisons of soldiers to ward the idol. In the city of Jerusalem he caused the feasts and revels of Bacobus to be kept, full of all filth and wickedness. Old men, women, and virgins, such as would not leave the law of Moses, he murdered with cruel torments. The mothers that would not circumcise their children he slew. The children that were circumcised he hanged up by the necks. The temple he spoiled and wasted. The altar of God, and candlestick of God, with the other ornaments and furniture of the temple, partly he cast out, partly he carried away. Contrary to the law of God he caused them to offer and to eat swine's flesh. Great murder and slaughter he made of the people, causing them either to leave their law, or to lose their lives. Among whom, besides many others, with cruel torments, he put to death a godly mother with her seven sons, sending his cruel proclamations through the whole land, that whoever kept the observances of the Sabbath, and other rites of the law, and refused to condescend to his abominations, should be executed. No kind of calamity, nor face of misery could be shewed in any place, which was not there seen. Of the tyranny of this Antiochus it is storied at large in the book of Maccabees; and Daniel prophesying before of the same, declares that the people of the Jews deserved no less for their sins and transgressions.

By consent of all writers, this Antiochus bears a figure of the great antichrist, which was to follow in the latter end of the world, and is already come, and worketh what he can against us. Although, as St. John saith, there have been, and be many antichrists, as parts and members of the body of antichrist, which are fore-runners, yet to speak of the head and principal antichrist, and great enemy of Christ's church, he is come in the latter end of the world, at what time shall be such tribulation as never was seen before; whereby is meant (no doubt) the Turk, prefigured by this Antiochus. By this antichrist I do also mean all such, as following the same doctrine of the Turks, think to be saved by their works, and not by their faith only in the Son of God, of what title and profession soever they be; especially if they use the like force and violence for the same as he doth, &c.

Of the tyranny of this Antiochus, and of the tribulations of the church in the latter times, both of the Jews' church, and also of the Christian church to come, let us hear and consider the words of Daniel in the eleventh chapter, and also in his seventh chapter, prophesying of the same as follows:—

"For the ships of Chittim shall come against him: therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant: so shall he do; he shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall be corrupt by flatteries: but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. And they that understand among the people shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help: but many shall cleave to them with flatteries. And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed. And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done. Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all. But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces: and a God whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things. Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory: and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain. And at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him: and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over. He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown: but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon. He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries: and the land of Egypt shall not escape. But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt: and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps. But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." (Dan. xi. 30—45.)

To this place of Daniel, might also be added the prophecy written in the seventh chapter, and tending to the like effect; where he treating of his vision of four beasts (which signify the four monarchies), and speaking now of the fourth monarchy, has these words:—

"After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns. I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things,—whose look was more stout than his fellows. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." (Dan. vii. 7, 8; 20—22.)

Thus have you the plain words of Daniel; in which as he manifestly describes the coming of Antiochus the great adversary, towards the latter end of the Jews, so by Antiochus is figured also to us the great adversary of Christ, which is the Turk.

Although some there are, who with great learning and judgment apply this place of Daniel not to the Turk, but to the pope, and that for six or seven special causes herein touched and noted.

The first is this, that the wicked transgressors of the covenant shall join with him deceitfully and hypocritically, who shall pollute the tabernacle of strength, and take away the perpetual sacrifice, and bring in the abomination of desolation.

The second note is, that the prophet declares, how the learned among the people shall teach many, and that they shall fall upon the sword, into fire and captivity, and shall be banished, whereby they shall be tried, chosen, and made bright and pure, &c. All which (say they) is not among the Turks, but only in the pope's church, where the faithful preachers and teachers of the people are slain and burned, &c. Where likewise it follows, that they shall be helped against antichrist, and that many false brethren should join them dissemblingly, &c. To this they allege, that the christians have no such help against the Turk, whereto such false brethren should join themselves, as is and has been commonly seen among the Christians against the pope, from time to time, almost in all countries.

Thirdly, that the king shall exalt himself above all that has the name of God, and shall lift up his mouth to speak presumptuously against God.

Fourthly, that he cares not for the desires of women, which may seem to note how the pope's doctrine shall forbid the honest and lawful marriage in churchmen.

The fifth specialty which they apply to the pope, is that which follows in the prophet, saying, "Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor any god; but instead of him shall set up his god Muhuzzim, and shall worship him with silver and gold, and precious stones," &c. which they apply to the pope, setting up his god of bread, and worshipping him with glistening golden ornaments, and most solemn service.

Sixthly, it follows, "And he shall increase them with much glory and riches, and shall divide unto them lands and possessions," &c.; meaning that the pope, having dominion over treasures of gold and silver, and all precious things of the land, shall endue his cardinals, prelates, his flattering doctors, with friars, monks, and priests, and all such as shall take his part, with great privileges, liberties, revenues, and possessions. And thus I say, some there are who apply this prophecy of the seventh and eleventh chapters of Daniel to the bishop of Rome. Whom although I take to be an extreme persecutor of Christ's church, yet I judge rather those two chapters of Daniel concerning the little horn in the middle of the ten horns, and the great destroyer of the pleasant land and glorious holy mountain, to mean first Antiochus; and by him, secondly, to mean the great antichrist the Turk, who has now set already the tabernacles of his palace between the seas, according to the prophecies of Daniel.

Let us come now to the prophecies of the New Testament, and mark the words of St. Paul, writing to the Thessalonians, who then were christian, and now either are Turkish, or under the Turk, whose words are these: "That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." (2 Thess. ii. 2-4.) Although this falling away and departing may have a double understanding, as well of the pope's sect (which is gone and departed from the free justification by faith only in Christ through the promise of grace) as of the Turks; yet leaving a while to speak of the pope, because it appears more notoriously in the Turk, we will chiefly apply it to him, in whom so aptly it agrees, that unless this great apostasy from the faith in so many churches had happened by the Turk, it had been hard to understand the apostle's mind, which now by the history of the Turks is easy and evident to be known, considering what a ruin has happened to the church of Christ by these miserable Turks, what empires, nations, kingdoms, countries, towns, and cities, he has removed from the name and profession of Christ, how many thousands, and infinite multitudes of christian men and children, in Asia, in Africa, and in Europe, are carried away from Christ's church to Mahomet's religion, some to serve for the Turk's guard among the janisaries, some for soldiers, some for miners, some for gunners, to fight and war against the christians; so that the most part of all the churches, planted once by the apostles, are now degenerated into Turks, only a small handful of christians reserved yet in these western parts of Europe, of which small remnant, what shall also become shortly, except Christ himself do help, Christ only himself knows.

Notwithstanding this text of the holy apostle may be verified also with no less reason upon the bishop of Rome, than upon the Turk, because he is a man of sin, that is, his seat and city is a great maintainer of wickedness, and also for that he is an adversary, that is, contrary in all his doings and proceedings to Christ.

Thirdly, for he sits in the temple of God, and so did not Mahomet.

Fourthly, because he is an exalter of himself, and sitteth more like a god than a man in Rome.

Fifthly, because he seduces, and has seduced by his apostasy, the most part of all Christendom from the doctrine and free promises of God, into a wrong and strange way of salvation, which is not to be justified freely before God but only by our faith in Christ his well-beloved Son (to which faith the promise of God freely and graciously has annexed all our salvation only, and to no other thing); but the pope has taught us to work out our salvation by an infinite number of other things; so that he binds the necessity of our salvation also to this, that we must believe (if we will be saved) and receive him to be the vicar of Christ in earth, &c.

But to return again to the Turks. Among all the prophecies, both of the Old Testament and of the New, there is none that points out the antichristian kingdom of the Turks better than doth the Revelation of St. John, whose words let us weigh and consider. Who speaking of opening the seventh and last seal (which signifieth the last age of the world), and there writing of the seven trumpets of the seven angels, at the sounding of the sixth angel, he saith, "Loose the four angels which are bound in the great river Euphrates. And the four angels were loosed, which were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to slay the third part of men. And the number of the army of the horsemen were two hundred thousand thousand: and I heard the number of them. And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone: and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths issued fire, and smoke, and brimstone. By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths." (Rev. ix. 14-18.)

By the seventh seal is meant the seventh and last age of the world, which last age of the world is from Christ to the judgment and resurrection of the dead.

By the seven angels with their seven trumpets is signified the seven plagues that come in this seventh and last age of the world.

By the sixth trumpet of the sixth angel is meant the sixth plague coming last and next before the plague of the great judgment-day, which sixth plague is here described to come by the eastern kings, that is, by the Turks.

By loosing the angels who had rule of the great river Euphrates, is signified the letting out of the east kings, that is, the Turks out of Scythia, Tartary, Persia, and Arabia, by whom the third part of Christendom shall be destroyed, as we see it this day has come to pass.

It follows in the prophesy, "For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt." (Rev. ix. 19.) Meaning that these Turks with the words of their mouths shall threaten great destruction of fire and sword, to them that will not yield to them, and in the end, when the Christians shall yield to them, trusting to their promises, they, like serpents, shall deceive them in the end, and kill them.

The like prophesy also, after the like words and sense, is to be seen and read in the sixteenth chapter of the Revelations, where St. John, treating of seven cups filled with the wrath of the living God, given to the hands of seven angels by one of the four beasts (that is, in the time of one of the four monarchies, which was the monarchy of Rome), speaks likewise of the sixth angel, "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared." (Rev. xvi. 12.)

By the sixth angel with the sixth vial is meant, as before the last plague save one that shall come upon the christians. By the kings of the east are meant the Saracens, and twelve Ottoman Turks. By drying up the river Euphrates, is signified the way of these Turks to be prepared by the Lord's appointment, to come out of the eastern to the western parts of the world, to molest and afflict the christians. It follows more in the text:—"And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." And it follows shortly after, "And be gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." And immediately it followeth in the same place, "And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done." (Rev. xvi. 13, 16, 17.) Whereby it is to be understood, that towards the last consummation of the world great force shall be seen, and a mighty army of the enemies shall be collected and gathered against the people and saints of the Highest, and then comes the consummation.

Wherefore, it is not for nought that the Holy Spirit of God, in the same place, a little before the sixth angel pours out his vial, exhorts all the faithful, saying, "Behold, I come like a thief in the night; blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and men see his filthiness," &c.

Nicholas de Lyra; and Paul, bishop of Burdens; and Matthias Dorinke, writing upon the thirteenth chapter of the Apocalypse, and expounding the mystery of the second beast rising out of the earth, having the horns of a lamb, &c. apply it to Mahomet and the Turks, with a solemn declaration made upon the same. Which interpretation of theirs, although in some points it may seem to have some appearance of probability, yet, as touching the proper and natural meaning of the apostle in that place, speaking of the false Lamb, &c. if we consider well all the circumstances of that beast, and mark the consequence of the text, both of that which goes before and follows after, we must grant, that the description and interpretation of that false horned lamb must necessarily be applied only to the bishop of Rome, and none other, which is to be proved by six principal causes or arguments.

The first is, for that this beast is described to bear the horns of a Lamb; by which Lamb, no doubt, is meant Christ. By the horns of the Lamb is signified the outward shew or resemblance of Christ our Saviour; which shew or resemblance can have no relation to Mahomet, for he takes himself to be above Christ, and Christ as an excellent prophet of God sitting at his feet. Wherefore, seeing Mahomet comes neither as equal to Christ, nor as vicar under Christ, this prophecy cannot agree to him, but only to him who openly in plain words protests, that all Christ's lambs and sheep, not singularly, but universally, through the whole world, are committed to him as vicar of Christ, and successor of Peter, and that all men must confess the same of necessity, or else they are none of Christ's sheep, &c. Wherein it is easy to see where the pretended horns of the lamb grow.

The second argument, "And he spake like a dragon," &c. A lamb's horns and the mouth of a dragon do not agree together. And as they do not agree together in nature, so neither can they be found in any person, either Turk or other, so lively, as in the bishop of Rome. When thou hearest him call himself "The apostolical bishop, the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, the servant of God's servants," &c. thou seest in him the two horns of a lamb, and wouldst think him to be a lamb indeed, and such a one as would wash your feet for humility; but hear him speak, and you shall find him a dragon. See and read the epistle of Pope Martin V., charging, commanding, and threatening emperors, kings, dukes, princes, marquises, earls, barons, knights, rectors, consuls, proconsuls, with their shires, counties, and universities, of their kingdoms, provinces, cities, towns, castles, villages, and other places. See the answer of Pope Urban II., and his message to King William Rufus. Behold the works and doings of Pope Innocent III. against King John.

Note also the answer of another pope to the king of England, which, for the price of the king's head, would not grant to him the investing of his bishops. Mark well the words and doings of Pope Hildebrand against the Emperor Henry IV.; also of Pope Alexander II. treading upon the neck of Frederick Barbarossa, not like a lamb treading upon a dragon, but like a dragon treading upon a lamb.

It follows, moreover, in the same prophecy, Rev.

xiii. 12, for the third argument, "And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed," &c.

In this prophecy two things are to be noted; first, what the first beast is, whose power the second beast executes. Secondly, what this second beast is which so exercises his power in his sight. The first of these beasts having seven heads and ten horns, must needs signify the city of Rome, which may easily be proved by two demonstrations. First, by the exposition of the seventeenth chapter of Revelation, where is declared and described the beast to stand on seven hills, and to contain ten kings, having the whole power of the dragon given; and also the same city to be named "The whore of Babylon, drunken with the blood of the saints." All which properties joined together, can agree in no-wise to any kingdom but the heathen empire of Rome, which city, at that time of writing these prophecies, had the government of the whole world. The second demonstration or evidence may be reduced out of the number of the months assigned to this beast. For so it is written, that this beast had power to make, that is, to work his malice against Christ's people forty-two months, which months counted by Sabbaths of years, (that is, every month for seven years) makes up the just number of those years, in which the primitive church was under the terrible persecutions of the heathen emperors of Rome, as is before specified.

Which thing thus proved that the first beast must needs signify the empire and city of Rome, then must it necessarily follow that the second beast with the lamb's horns, must signify the bishop and pope of the same city of Rome. The reason whereof is evident by that which follows in the prophecy, where it is declared, that the second beast, having two horns of a lamb, received and exercised all the power of the first beast, before or in the sight of the said beast, which cannot be verified either in the Turks or in any other, but only in the pope of Rome, who (as you see) receives, usurps, and derives to himself all the power of that city and monarchy of Rome; so that he saith, that when Constantine or Ludovicus yielded unto him the rule and kingdom of that city, he gave him but his own, and that which of right and duty belonged to him before.

And this authority or power over all the empire of Rome he works not in Asia, or in Constantinople, as the Turk does, but in the sight of the beast which gave him the power, that is, in the city of Rome itself, which is the first beast here in this prophecy of the Revelation described.

Fourthly, It follows farther, "And he causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed," &c. The interpretation of this part, as also of all the other parts of the same chapter, stands upon the definition of the first beast; for it being granted, as cannot be denied, that the first beast signifies the city and empire of Rome; it must consequently follow, that the bishop (whom we call the pope) of the city of Rome, must be understood by the second beast; as neither Turk nor any other, but only the bishop of Rome has held up the estimation and dignity of that city, which began to be in ruin and decay by the Vandals, Goths, Herulians, and Lombards, about A. D. 456; but afterward, by the bishop of Rome, the pristine state and honour of that city revived again, and flourished in as great veneration as ever it did before. And that is it which the Holy Ghost seems here to mean of the first beast, saying, "That he had a wound of the beast, and was cured." For so it follows:

Fifthly, "Saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live. And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed. And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads: and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name," &c. (Rev. xiii. 14—17.)

By giving life to the image of the beast, and making it speak, it is presupposed that the beast was at the point of death, and lay speechless; inasmuch as the city of Rome began to lose and change name, and was called for a while Odacris, from Odoacer king of the Hेरulians, who by dint of sword surprised the Romans; and yet, notwithstanding, by the means of its prelates, the city of Rome, which was then ready to give up the ghost, recovered its majesty and strength again. It is even hard to say, whether Rome did ever ruffle and rage in tyranny, more tragically in the time of Nero, Dominian, Dioclesian, and other emperors, than it has done under the pope; or whether that Rome had all kings, queens, princes, dukes, lords, and all subjects more under obedience and subjection, when the emperors reigned, or now in the reign of the pope. And therefore it is said not without cause by the Holy Ghost, That it is given to him, to give life and speech to the image of the beast, causing all them to be slain which will not worship the image of the beast, &c. As for example, who sees not what multitudes of christian men, women, and children in all countries have been put to fire and sword? histories of all times will declare what havoc has been made of christian blood about the pre-eminence and majority of the see of Rome; what churches and countries, both Greeks and Latins, have been excommunicated; what kings have been deposed, and emperors stripped from their imperial seat, and all because they would not stoop and bend to the image of the beast, that is, to the majesty and title of Rome, advanced so highly now by its bishop, as it was never higher before in the reign of Nero or Dioclesian. Wherefore, taking the first beast to signify the empire of Rome, which cannot be denied, it is plain, that the second beast must necessarily be applied to the pope and not to the Turk, as the Turk seeks nothing so little as the advancement of that empire, but rather strives against it to pluck it down.

The sixth and last argument is grounded upon the number of the name of the beast, expressed by the Holy Ghost in the same prophecy, by the letters  $\chi \epsilon \varsigma$ . In which letters, although there lies great darkness and difficulty to be understood, yet certain ancient fathers which were disciples and hearers of them which heard St. John himself, as Irenaeus and others, expound the letters conjecturally, to contain the name of the beast, and to be the name of a man under this word  $\lambda α ρ ε ν ο ς$ . Whereas no other name lightly of any person, either in Greek or Latin, will agree to the same, save only the foresaid named  $\lambda α ρ ε ν ο ς$ . There are some other solutions of these numbers, but of all names properly signifying any man, none comes so near to the number of this mystery, (if it go by order of letters) as the word  $\lambda α ρ ε ν ο ς$ .

Let us come to the twentieth chapter of the Revelation, wherein the holy scripture seems plainly and directly to notify the Turks. The words of the prophecy are these:—

"And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season."

And it follows after, "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city," &c. (ver. 7, 8, 9.)

To the perfect understanding of this prophecy, three things are necessary to be known. First, what is meant by binding up, and loosing out of Satan as the old dragon. Secondly, at what time and year first he was chained up and sealed for a thousand years. Thirdly, at what year and time these thousand years did end, when he should be loosed out again for a little season. Which three points being well examined and marked, the prophecy may easily be understood directly to be meant of the Turk.

First, by binding and loosing of Satan seems to be meant the ceasing and staying of the cruel and horrible persecution of the heathen emperors of Rome against the true christians, as is to be seen in 'The Ten first Persecutions in the Primitive Church,' in which most bloody persecutions, Satan then raged without all measure, till the time it pleased Almighty God to stop this old serpent, and to tie him shorter. And thus have you to understand what is meant by the binding up of Satan for a thousand years; whereby is signified, that the persecution against the christians stirred up by the beast (that is, in the empire of Rome, through the instigation of Satan) shall not always continue, but shall break up after a certain time, and shall cease for a thousand years, &c.

Now at what time and year this persecution, that is, the fury and rage of Satan should cease, is also declared in the Revelation before; where in the eleventh and thirteenth chapters we read, that the beast before mentioned shall have power to work his malice and mischief for the space of forty-two months, and no more, and then that Satan should be locked up for a thousand years. The computation of which months, being counted by Sabbaths of years (after the example of the sixty-nine weeks of Daniel, chapter xi.) it brings us to the just year and time, when that terrible persecution in the primitive church should end, and so it did. For, if we allow to every month a Sabbath of years, that is, reckon every month for seven years, and that makes two hundred and ninety-four years, which embraces the period between the eighteenth year of Tiberius, (under whom Christ suffered) and the death of Maxentius the last persecutor of the primitive church in Europe, subdued by Constantine, as may appear by calculating the years, months, and days, between the year of the reign of Tiberius, and the death of Maxentius; and so you have the account of the period when Satan was first bound up, after he had raged in the primitive church two-and-forty months. Which months, as is said, being counted by Sabbaths of years, after the usual manner of scripture, amount to two hundred and ninety-four years; and so much was the full time between the passion of our Lord, which was in the eighteenth year of Tiberius, to the last year of Maxentius.<sup>(1)</sup>

And here by the way comes a note to be observed, that as by the number of these forty-two months specified in the Revelations, the empire of Rome must necessarily be confessed to be the first beast, therefore it must by like necessity follow, the bishop of Rome is the second beast, with the two horns of the lamb, because he only has and does cause the empire of Rome to revive and to be magnified, which the Turk does not, but rather labours to the contrary. Wherefore let every christian man be wise, and beware in time how he takes the mark of the beast, lest peradventure it follow upon him, that he drink of that terrible cup of wrath mentioned. (Rev. xiv.)

Thirdly, it remains to be discussed touching the third point in this prophecy, that as we have found out (through the help of Christ) the year and time of Satan's binding, so we search out likewise the time and season of his loosing out, which by the testimony of scripture was approved to be a thousand years after his binding up, and rightly according to the time appointed it came to pass. For if we number well by the scripture the year of his binding up, which was from the passion of our Lord two hundred and ninety-four years,

(1) The number of these letters in Greek, maketh the full number of six hundred and sixty-six.

(2) See note p. 69. [En].

and add thereto a thousand years, it amounts to one thousand two hundred ninety-four, which was about the time when Ottoman the first Turk began his conquests, which was the first spring and well-head of all these woful calamities that the church of Christ hath felt both in Asia, Africa, and Europe, almost these three hundred years past. For so we find in chronicles, that the kingdom of the Turks being first divided into four families, at length the family of Ottoman prevailed, and thereupon came those whom we now call Turks, which was about the same time when Pope Boniface VIII. was bishop of Rome.

In this long digression, wherein sufficiently has been described the grievous and tedious persecution of the Saracens and Turks against the christians, thou hast to understand, good reader, and to behold the image of a terrible antichrist evidently appearing both by his own doings, and also by the scriptures, prophesied and declared to us before. Now in comparing the Turk with the pope, if a question be asked, which of them is the truer or greater antichrist, it were easy to see and judge, that the Turk is the more open and manifest enemy against Christ and his church. But if it be asked which of the two has been the more bloody and pernicious adversary to Christ and his members, or which of them has consumed and spilt more christian blood, he with sword, or this with fire and sword together, neither is it a light matter to discern, neither is it my part here to discuss, who only write the history, and the acts of them both. Wherefore after the history of the Turks thus finished, we will now return to where we left off, in describing the domestic troubles and persecutions here at home under the bishop of Rome, after the burning of Babram in Norfolk.

In the days of King Henry VII. (A.D. 1506), in the diocese of Lincoln, in Buckinghamshire, one William Tylsworth was burned in Amersham, in a close, called Stanley, about sixty years ago. At which time one Joan Clerk, a married woman, who was the only daughter of William Tylsworth, and a faithful woman, was compelled with her own hands to set fire to her dear father; and at the same time her husband John Clerk did penance at her father's burning, and bear a fagot, as did also twenty-three other persons; and who afterwards were compelled to wear certain badges, and went abroad to certain towns to do penance, as to Buckingham, Aylesbury, and other towns. And also several of these men were afterwards burned in the cheek, as William Page, who at this present day is alive, and likewise carried a fagot with the others. Agnes Wetherly, who is still alive, testifies that at the burning of this William Tylsworth, were above sixty others who were obliged to carry fagots for their penance, of whom some were enjoined to bear and wear fagots at Lincoln the space of seven years, some at one time, some at another, &c. In which number was also one Robert Bartlet, a rich man, who for his professions' sake was put out of his farm and goods, and was condemned to be kept in the monastery of Ashryge, where he wore on his right sleeve a square piece of cloth, the space of seven years together.

About the same time of the burning of William Tylsworth, was one Father Roberts burned at Buckingham. He was a miller, and dwelt at Missenden. At his burning there were about twenty persons that were compelled to carry fagots, and to do such penance as the wicked Pharisees compelled them to. After that, by the space of two or three years, was burned at Amersham, Thomas Bernard, a husbandman, and James Mordon, a labourer, they were both burned at one fire; and there was William Littlepage (who is yet alive) compelled to be burned in the right cheek, and Father Rogers, and Father Reive, who afterwards were burned. This Father Rogers was in the bishop's prison fourteen weeks together, night and day, where he was so cruelly handled with cold, hunger and irons, that after his coming out of the prison, he was so lame in his back, that he could never go upright as long as he lived, as several honest men that are now living can testify. Also there were thirty more burned in the right cheek, and obliged to carry fagots the same time. The cause was that they would talk against superstition and idolatry, and were desirous to hear and read the holy scriptures. The manner of their burning in the cheek was this; their necks were tied fast to a post, and their hands holden fast that they might not stir, and so the iron being hot, was put to their cheeks, and thus they bore about them the prints and marks of the Lord Jesus.

The cruel handling of Thomas Chase of Amersham, who was wickedly strangled and martyred in the Bishops' Prison at Woburn.

Among those who were so cruelly persecuted for the gospel and word of Christ, was one Thomas Chase of Amersham. This man by the report of such as knew him, was a man of a godly sober and honest behaviour (whose virtuous doings yet remain in memory) and could not abide idolatry and superstition, but many times would speak against it. Wherefore the ungodly and wicked did the more hate and despise him, and took him and brought him before the blind bishop, being at that time at Woburn in the county of Buckingham, and as it is written in the Acts that wicked Herod vexed certain of the church, and killed James, the brother of John, with the sword; and because he saw that it pleased the Jews, he proceeded farther, so this bishop had Thomas Chase before him, asking him many questions touching the Romish religion, with many taunts, checks, and rebukes, but what answer this godly man, Thomas Chase, made them is unknown. However it is to be supposed, that his answer was most zealous and godly in professing Christ's true religion and gospel, and to the extirpation of idolatry, and superstition, and hypocrisy, for that he was commanded to be put in the prison, in the bishop's house at Woburn, which had not been done to him, had not his answers been sound and upright. There Thomas Chase lay bound most painfully with chains, manacles, and irons, often pining with hunger, where the bishop's alms was daily brought to him by his chaplains, which alms were nothing else but checks, taunts, rebukes, and threatenings and mockings. All which cruelty the godly martyr took most quietly and patiently, remembering and having respect to Christ's promises: "Blessed are they which suffer for righteousness sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," Matt. v. And as follows: "Blessed are ye when men revile you and persecute you," &c. When the bishop, with his band of shavelings, perceived that by their daily practices of cruelty they could not prevail against him, but rather that he was the more fervent and earnest in professing Christ's true religion, and that he did bear most patiently all their wickedness and cruelty to him, they imagined how and which way they might put him to death, lest there should be a tumult or an uproar among the people. And as Richard Hunne shortly after was hanged or strangled in Lollards' Tower, about A.D. 1514, even so these blood-suckers most cruelly strangled and put to death this Thomas Chase in prison, who most heartily called upon God to receive his spirit, as witnesses a certain woman that kept him in prison.

After these rapiers of the wicked brood of antichrist had thus most cruelly and impiously murdered this faithful christian, they were at their wits' end, and could not tell what shift to make, to cloak their shameful murder; at last, to blind the ignorant silly people, these bloody butchers most slanderously caused it to be rumoured abroad by their dependents, that Thomas Chase had hanged himself in prison, which was a most shameful and abominable lie, for the prison was such, that a man could not stand upright, nor lie at ease. And besides, this man had so many manacles and irons upon him, that he could not well move either hand or foot, as the woman declares that saw him dead. And yet these holy catholics had not made an end of their wicked act in this both killing and slandering of this godly martyr: but to put out the remembrance of him, they caused him to be buried in the wood, called Norland-wood, in the highway betwixt Woburn and Little Marlow, to the intent he should not be taken up again to be seen; and thus commonly are innocent men laid up by these unworthy clergymen. But he that is true hath promised at one time or another, to clear his true servants, not with lies and fables, but by his own true word. No secret, saith he, is so close but it shall be opened; neither is any thing so hid, that shall not at the last be known clearly. Such a sweet Lord is God always to those that are his true servants. Blessed be his holy name for ever and ever. Amen.

Thomas Harding being one of this company, thus molested and troubled in the town of Amersham, for the truth of the gospel, after his abjuration and penance was again sought for, and brought to the fire in the days of King Henry VIII.

After the martyrdom of these two, I read also of one Thomas Norris, who for the same cause, that is, for the profession of Christ's gospel, was condemned by the bishop, and burnt at Norwich the last day of March, (A. D. 1507.)

In the next year following, which was A. D. 1508, in the consistory of London, was Elizabeth Sampson of the parish of Aldermanbury, upon certain articles, and especially for speaking against pilgrimage and adoration of images, especially the images of our lady at Wilsdon, at Stanings, at Crome, at Walsingham, and against the sacrament of the altar. For these and certain other articles, she was compelled to abjure before Master William Horsey, chancellor, the day and year above written.

Laurence Ghest.

It is lamentable to remember, and almost impossible to comprehend the names, times, and persons of all who have been slain by the pope's clergy, for the true maintaining of Christ's cause, and his sacraments. Whose memory being registered in the book of life, although it need not our commemoration, yet for the more confirmation of the church, I thought it not unprofitable to relate the suffering and martyrdom of them who innocently have given their blood to be shed in Christ's cause.

In the catalogue of whom, next in order comes the memorial of Laurence Ghest, who was burned in Salisbury for the matter of the sacrament, in the days of King Henry VII. He was of a comely and tall personage, and otherwise not unfriended, for which the bishop and the clergy were the more loath to burn him, but kept him in prison for the space of two years. This Laurence had a wife and seven children. Wherefore they thinking to influence and persuade his mind, by awakening his fatherly affection toward his children, when the time came which they appointed for his burning, as he was at the stake, they brought before him his wife and his seven children. At the sight of them, although nature is commonly wont to work in other men, yet in him religion overcoming nature, made his constancy remain unmoveable, so that when his wife exhorted and desired him to save himself, he again began to desire her to be content, and not to be a stumbling block in his way, for he was in a good course, running toward the mark of his salvation; and so fire being put to him, he finished his life, renouncing not only wife and children, but also himself to follow Christ. As he was burning one of the bishop's men threw a firebrand at his face. At this the brother of Laurence, who was standing by, ran at him with his dagger, and would have slain him, had he not been otherwise prevented.

But among all the examples of God, of whom so many have suffered from time to time for Christ and his truth, I cannot tell if ever there were any martyrdom more notable and admirable, or wherein the plain demonstration of God's mighty power and judgment has at any time been more evident against the persecutors of his flock, than at the burning of a certain godly woman put to death in Chipping Sodbury, about the same time, under the reign of King Henry VII.

The constancy of which blessed woman, as it is glorious for all true godly christians to behold, so the example of the bishop's chancellor, which cruelly condemned the innocent, may offer a terrible spectacle to the eyes of all papistical persecutors to consider, and to take example, which the living God grant they may. Amen. The name of the town where she was martyred, was, as is said, Chipping Sodbury. The chancellor who condemned, was Doctor Whittington. The time of her burning was in the reign of Henry VII.

After this godly woman, and manly martyr of Christ, was condemned by the wretched chancellor, for the faithful profession of the truth, which the papists then called heresy, and the time now come when she should be brought to the place and pains of her martyrdom, a great concourse of all the multitude, both in the town and country about was gathered to behold her end. Among whom was also Doctor Whittington, the chancellor, there present to see the execution. Thus this faithful woman, and true servant of God, constantly persisting in the testimony of the truth, committing her cause to the Lord, gave over her life to the fire, refusing no pains nor torments to keep her conscience clear and unreprieveable in the day of the Lord. The sacrifice being ended, the people began to return homeward, coming from the burning of this blessed martyr. It happened in the meantime, that as the popish executioners were busy in slaying this Lamb at the town's side, a certain butcher was as busy within the town slaying a bull, which bull he had fast bound in ropes ready to knock him on the head. But the butcher (belike not so skilful in his art of killing beasts, as the papists are in murdering christians) as he was lifting his axe to strike the bull, failed in his stroke, and smote a little too low, or else how he smit, I know not: this was certain that the bull, although somewhat grieved at the stroke, but yet not stricken down, put his strength to the ropes, and broke loose from the butcher into the street, at the very time when the people were coming in great crowd from the burning, who seeing the bull coming towards them, and supposing him to be wild, gave way for the beast, every man shifting for himself as well as he might. Thus the people giving back, and making a lane for the bull, he passed through the throng of them, touching neither man nor child, till he came where the chancellor was. Against whom the bull, with a sudden vehemency, ran full butt with his horns, and gored him through and through, and so killed him immediately, to the great wonder of all that saw it.

Although the carnal sense of man be blind in considering the works of the Lord, imputing many times to blind chance the things which properly pertain to God's only praise and providence; yet in this so strange and so evident example, what man can be so dull or ignorant as not to see a plain interposition of God's mighty power and judgment, both in the punishing of this wretched chancellor, and also in admonishing all other persecutors, by his example, to fear the Lord, and to abstain from the like cruelty?

And thus much concerning the state of the church. Wherein is to be understood, what storms and persecutions have been raised up in all quarters against the flock and congregation of Christ, not only by the Turks, but also at home within ourselves, by the bishop of Rome and his retinue. Where also is to be noted in the days and reign of this King Henry VII. how mightily the working of God's gospel has multiplied and increased, and what great numbers of men and women have suffered for the same with us in England.

Now these things declared relating to the church, it remains to treat likewise of the commonwealth, which commonly follows the state of the church. Where the church is quietly and modestly governed, and the flock of Christ defended by godly princes in peace and safety, from devouring and violence of bloody wolves; the success of the civil estate, there and then for the most part, flourishes, and the princes long continue through God's preservation, in prosperity and tranquillity. Contrarywise, where either the church of Christ through the negligence of princes, or through their instigation, the poor members of Christ are persecuted and devoured; shortly after comes some just recompence of the Lord upon those princes, that either their lives do not long continue, or else they find not that quiet in the commonwealth which they look for. Examples of this, as in all other ages, they are abundant, so in this present time are not lacking, whether we consider the state and condition of other countries far off, or else of our country near at home.

Not that I here affirm or define, as a general rule, that worldly success and prosperity of life always follow the godly, whom we see rather given over often to the wicked: yet, speaking of the duty of princes, I observe by examples of histories, that such princes as have most defended the church of Christ committed to their government, from injury and violence of the bishop of Rome, have not lacked at God's hand great blessing and felicity. Whereas contrariwise, they who either themselves have been persecutors of Christ's members, or have not shielded them by their protection from foreign tyranny and injuries, have lacked at God's hand that protection which the other had, as may appear by King Edward II., Richard III., King Henry IV., King Henry V., King Henry VI., &c., who, because either negligently they have suffered, or cruelly caused such persecuting laws to be made, and so much christian blood injuriously devoured, therefore have they been the less prospered of the Lord: so that either they were deposed, or if they flourished for a while, yet they did not long continue, almost not half the time of the other kings before named.

And therefore, as the state of the commonwealth commonly follows the state of the church, so it had been to be wished that this King Henry VII., being otherwise a prudent and temperate prince, had not permitted the intemperate rage of the pope's clergy so much to have their wills over the poor flock of Christ as they had. Although he reigned nearly twenty-four years, yet, notwithstanding, here comes the same thing to be noted of which I spake: that when the church of Christ begins to be injured with violence, and to go to wreck through disorder and negligence, the state of the commonwealth cannot long endure without some alteration and strokes of God's correction. But however this mark is to be taken, thus lies the history: that after the burning and vexing of these poor servants of Christ above recited, when the persecution began now in the church to be hot, God calls away the king the same year, which was 1509, after he had reigned nearly the term of twenty-four years; who if he had adjoined a little more compassionate respect, in protecting Christ's poor members from the fire of the pope's tyranny, to his other great virtues of singular wisdom, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality, so much had he been comparable with the best of those princes, as he had been inferior but to a few: but this defect which was wanted in him, was supplied most luckily (blessed be the Lord), by his posterity succeeding after him.

Among many other things incident in the reign of this King Henry VII., I have passed over the history of certain godly persons persecuted in the diocese of Coventry and Lichfield, as we find them in the registers of the diocese recorded, here following.

The year of our Lord, 1485, March 9, among other good men in Coventry, these nine here under-named, were examined before John bishop of Coventry and Lichfield in Saint Michael's church, upon the following articles:—

First, John Blomston was openly and publicly accused, reported and appeached, that he was a very heretic, because he had preached, taught, holden, and affirmed, that the power attributed to St. Peter in the church of God, by our Saviour Jesus Christ immediately, did not sit or pass from him, to remain with his successors.

That there was as much virtue in an herb, as in the image of the Virgin Mary.

That prayer and alms avail not the dead; for immediately after death, he goes either to heaven or hell, whereupon he concludes there is no purgatory.

That it was foolishness to go on pilgrimage to the image of our lady of Doncaster, Walsingham, or the tower of the city of Coventry; for a man might as well worship the blessed Virgin by fire-side in the kitchen, as in the aforesaid places, and as well might a man worship the blessed Virgin, when he sees his mother and sister, as in visiting the images, because they are no more but dead stocks and stones.

Richard Hegham of the same city was accused, &c., to be a very heretic, because he held that a christian man being at the point of death, should renounce all his own works, good and ill, and submit him to the mercy of God.

That it was foolishness to worship the images of our lady of Tower in the city, or of other saints, for they are but stocks and stones.

That if the image of our lady of Tower were put into the fire, it would make a good fire.

That it were better to deal money to poor folks, than to offer to the images of Christ and other saints, which are but dead stocks and stones.

Robert Crowther of the same city, was accused that he was a heretic, because he held, that whoso receives the sacrament of the altar in deadly sin, or out of charity, receives nothing but bread and wine.

That neither bishop, nor priests, nor curates of churches, have power in the market of penance to bind or loose.

That pilgrimage to our lady of Tower is foolishness; for it is but a stock on a stone.

John Smith was accused to be a very heretic, because he held, that every man is bound to know the Lord's prayer, and the creed in English.

That whoso believed as the churchmen believed, believes ill: and that a man had need to frequent the schools a good while, ere he can attain to the knowledge of the true and right faith.

That no priest has power to absolve a man in the market of penance from his sins.

Roger Brown of the same city, was also accused to be an heretic, because he held that no man ought to worship the image of our lady of Walsingham, nor the blood of Christ at Halies, but rather God Almighty, who would give him whatever he would ask.

That he held not up his hand, nor looked up, at the elevation of the Eucharist.

That he promised one to show him certain books of heresy, if he would swear that he would not utter them, and if he would credit them.

That he did eat flesh in Lent, and was taken in the act.

If any man were not confessed and absolved in his whole life long, and in the point of death would be confessed, and could not, if he had no more but contrition only, he should pass to joy without purgatory: and if he were confessed of any sin, and were enjoined only to say for penance one paternoster, if he thought he should have any punishment in purgatory for that sin, he would never be confessed for any sin.

Because he said all is lost that is given to priests.

That there was no purgatory, that would pardon all sins, without confession and satisfaction.

Thomas Butler of the same city was likewise openly accused as a very heretic, because he held that there were but two ways, that is to say, to heaven and to hell. That no faithful man should suffer any pain after the death of Christ, for any sin, because Christ died for our sins.

That there was no purgatory; for every man immediately after death passes either to heaven or hell.

That whoever departs in the faith of Christ and the Church, however he has lived, shall be saved.

That prayers and pilgrimages are nothing worth, and avail not to purchase heaven.

John Fawks was accused as a very heretic, because he did affirm, that it was a foolish thing to offer to the image of our lady, saying, what is it but a block? If it could speak to me, I would give it a halfpenny-worth of ale.

That when the priest carries to the sick the body of Christ, why carries he not also the blood of Christ?

That he did eat cow-milk upon the first Sunday of Lent.

That as concerning the sacrament of penance and absolution, no priest has power to absolve any man from his sins, inasmuch as he cannot make one hair of his head.

That the image of our lady was but a stone or a block. Richard Hilmin was accused that he was a very heretic, because he did say and maintain, that it was better to part with money to the poor, than to give tithes to priests, or to offer to the images of our lady; and that it were better to offer to images made by God, than to images of God painted.

That he had the Lord's prayer and the salutation of the angel and the creed in English, and another book he saw and had, which contained the epistles and gospels in English, and according to them he would live, and thereby believed he would be saved.

That no priest speaks better in the pulpit than that book. That the sacrament of the altar is but bread, and that the priests make it to blind the people.

That a priest while he is at mass, is a priest; and after one mass done, till the beginning of another mass, he is no more than a layman, and has no more power than a mere layman.

After they were forced to recant, they were absolved, and obliged to do penance.

In A. D. 1488, the third of April, Margery Coyt, wife of James Coyt of Ashburn, was brought before the foresaid John Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, who was there accused that she said, that that which the priests lifted over their heads at mass, was not the true and very body of Christ; for if it was so, the priests could not break it so lightly into four parts, and swallow it as they do; for the Lord's body has flesh and bones, which that which the priests receive has not.

That priests buying forty cakes for a halfpenny, and shewing them to the people, and saying, that of every one of them they make the body of Christ, do nothing but deceive the people and enrich themselves.

Seeing God in the beginning created and made man, how can it be that man should be able to make God?

This woman also was constrained to recant, and so was she absolved and did penance.

Thus much I thought good to insert here, touching these men of Coventry, especially for this purpose, because our cavilling adversaries are wont to object against us the newness of Christ's old and ancient religion. To the intent therefore they may see this doctrine, not to be so new as they report, I wish they would consider both the time and articles here objected against these persons.

I should also in the same reign of King Henry VII., have induced that story of Johannes Picus Earl of Mirandula, the mention of whose name partly is touched before. This Picus Earl of Mirandula, being but a young man, was so excellently witted, and so singularly learned in all sciences and in all tongues, both Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, that coming to Rome booted and spurred, he set up ninety conclusions, to dispute with any in all Christendom, whoever would come against him. Of which conclusions several were on the matter of the sacrament, &c. And when none was found in all Rome, nor in Europe, that openly would dispute with him, privately and in corners certain of the pope's clergy, prelates, lawyers, and friars, appointed by the pope, consulted together to inquire upon his conclusions, whereupon they articulated against him for suspicion of heresy. And thus the unlearned clergy of Rome privately circumvented and entangled this learned earl in their snares of heresy, against whom they durst never openly dispute. He died at the age of thirty-two years, of such wit and forwardness, as is hard to say whether ever Italy bred up a better. In his sickness Charles VIII., then French king, moved with the fame of his learning, came to visit him.

THE PROUD PRIMACY OF POPES DESCRIBED,

IN ORDER OF THEIR RISING UP BY LITTLE AND LITTLE, FROM FAITHFUL BISHOPS AND MARTYRS, TO BECOME LORDS AND GOVERNORS OVER KINGS AND KINGDOMS, EXALTING THEMSELVES IN THE TEMPLE OF GOD, ABOVE ALL THAT IS CALLED GOD, ETC. II THESSALONIANS, ii. 4.

IN the description of the primitive church, the reader has had set forth and exhibited before his eyes the grievous afflictions and torment, which, through God's secret sufferance, fell upon the true saints and members of Christ's church in that time, especially upon the good bishops, ministers, and teachers of the flock, of whom some were scourged, some beheaded, some crucified, some burned, some had their eyes put out, some one way, some another, miserably consumed; which days of woeful calamity continued for nearly three hundred years. During which time the spouse and elect church of God, being sharply assaulted on every side, had no rest, nor joy, nor outward safety in this world, but passed all their days in much bitterness of heart, in continual tears and mourning under the cross, being spoiled, imprisoned, contemned, reviled, famished, tormented, and martyred everywhere; they durst not tarry at home for fear and dread, and much less durst come abroad for the enemies, but only by night, when they assembled sometimes to sing psalms and hymns together. But notwithstanding, in all their dreadful dangers, and sorrowful afflictions, the goodness of the Lord left them not desolate; but the more their outward tribulations increased, the more their inward consolations abounded; and the farther off they seemed from the joys of this life, the more present was the Lord with them with grace and fortitude to confirm and rejoice their souls. And though their possessions and riches in this world were lost and spoiled, yet were they enriched with heavenly gifts above an hundred fold. Then was true religion really felt in heart. Then christianity was not merely shown in outward appearance, but was received in inward affection, and in the true image of the church, not in pretended outward shew, but in her effectual perfect state. Then was the name and fear of God engrafted in the heart, not only dwelling on the lips. Then faith was fervent, zeal ardent; prayer was not merely on the lips, but groaned out to God from the bottom of the spirit. Then there was no pride in the church, nor leisure to seek riches, nor time to keep them. Contention for trifles was then so far from christians, that they were happy when they could meet to pray together against the devil, the author of all dissension. Briefly, the whole church of Christ Jesus, with all its members, the farther it was from the type and shape of this world, the nearer it was to God's favour and support.

The first rising of the Bishops of Rome.

After this long time of trouble it pleased the Lord at length mercifully to look upon the saints and servants of his Son, to release their captivity, to relieve their misery, and to bind up the old dragon the devil, who so long vexed them, whereby the church began to aspire to some more liberty; and the bishops who before were as subjects utterly contemned by emperors, through the providence of God (who disposeth all things in his time after his own will) began now to be esteemed by emperors and had in honour; and, further, as emperors grew more in devotion, so the bishops were more and more exalted, not only in favour, but also preferred to honour, so that in a short space they became not quarter-masters, but rather half emperors with emperors.

After this, as riches and worldly wealth crept into the clergy, and the devil had poured his venom into the church, so true humility began to decay, and pride to step in, till at last they played as the ivy does with the oak-tree, which first beginning with a goodly green show, embraces it so long that at length it overgrows it, and so sucks all his moisture from him, setting its root fast in his bark, till at last it both stifles the stock, and kills the branches, and so comes to be a nest for owls and all unclean birds. Not untruly, therefore, it was said by Augustine, "Religion begat riches, and the daughter has devoured the mother." The truth of which may appear in the history of the church of Rome and her bishops. For after the church of Rome, through the favour of emperors, was endowed with lands, donations, possessions, and patrimonies, so that the bishops feeling the pleasure of wealth, ease, and prosperity, began to increase in pomp and pride. The more they flourished in this world, the more God's Holy Spirit forsook them, till at last the bishops, who at the first were poor, creeping upon the ground, and persecuted, every man treading upon them in this world, now, instead of being persecuted people, began to be the persecutors of others, and to tread upon the necks even of emperors, and to bring the heads of kings and princes under their girdle. And not only that, but through pride and riches, they were so far gone from all true religion, that in the end they became the great adversary of God (whom we call antichrist) prophesied of so long before by the Spirit of God to come, sitting in the temple of God, &c. Of whom we thus read in the epistle of St. Paul, where he saith, "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." (2 Thess. ii. 1-4.)

By which words of St. Paul, we have several things to note: First, that the day of the Lord's coming was not then near at hand. Secondly, the apostle giving us a token before, to know when that day shall approach, bids us to look for an adversary first to be revealed. Thirdly, to shew what adversary this shall be, he expresses him not to be as a common adversary, such as were then in his time. For although Herod, Annas, and Caiaphas, the high priests and pharisees, Tertullus, Alexander the coppersmith, Elymas and Simon Magus, and Nero the emperor, in St. Paul's time, were great adversaries: yet here he means another besides these, greater than all the rest, not such a one as should be like to priest, king, or emperor, but such as far exceeding the state of all kings, priests, and emperors, should be the prince of priests, should make kings stoop, and should tread upon the neck of emperors, and make them to kiss his feet. Moreover, where the apostle saith, that he shall sit in the temple of God, thereby is meant, not merely the personal sitting of the pope in the city of Rome, but the authority and jurisdiction of his see exalted in the whole universal church, equal with God himself. For let men give to the pope that which he requires in his pontifical laws and decrees, and what difference is there between God and the pope? If God sets laws and ordinances, so does he. If God have his creatures, so has he. If God require obedience, so does he. If the breach of God's commandments are punished, much more are his. God has his religion, the pope also has his: yea, for God's one religion he has an hundred. God has set up an advocate, he has an hundred. God has instituted but a few holy-days, for God's one he hath instituted forty. Christ is the head of the church, so is the pope. Christ gives influence to his body, so does the pope. Christ forgives sin, the pope does no less. Christ expels evil spirits by his power, so the pope pretends to do by his holy water. Furthermore, where Christ went barefoot upon the bare ground, he with his golden shoes is carried upon men's shoulders. Christ never used any but the spiritual sword, he claims both spiritual and temporal. Christ bought the church, he both buys and sells the church. And if it be necessary to believe Christ to be the Saviour of the world, so it is necessary to believe the pope to be the head of the church. Christ paid tribute to Cæsar, he makes Cæsar pay tribute to him. Finally, the crown of Christ was of sharp thorns, the pope has three crowns of gold upon his head, so far exceeding Christ the Son of God in glory of this world, as Christ exceedeth him in the glory of heaven; whose intolerable pride and exaltation, according as St. Paul describes him in his epistle, we have here set forth, not only in these tables, and by his own facts to be noted, but also declared in his own words and registers, clementines, extravagants, and pontificals, as (the Lord willing) shall follow in order.

First, after Italy and the city of Rome were over-run by the Goths and Vandals, so that the seat of the empire was removed to Constantinople, then began John, patriarch of Constantinople, to put himself forth, and would needs be called universal bishop of the world; but the bishop of Rome in no case would suffer that, and stopped it. After this came the emperor's deputy, and exarch of Ravenna to rule Italy, but the bishop of Rome, through the aid of the king of the Lombards, soon mastered him.

Not long after (A.D. 600,) came Phocas the murderer, who slew the emperor of Constantinople, his master Mauricius, and his children. By which Phocas the bishops of old Rome aspired first to their pre-eminence to be counted the head bishops over the whole church, and so together with the Lombards began to rule the city of Rome. Afterwards, when the Lombards would not yield to him, in accomplishing his ambitious desire, but would needs require of the bishop the city of Rome, he stirred up Pepin, but first deposed Childeric the king of France, (A.D. 751,) and so thrusting him into an abbey set up in his place Pepin and his son Charlemagne, to put down the king of the Lombards called Astolphus. And so he transferred the empire from Constantinople to France, dividing the spoil between him and them, so that the kings of France had all the possessions and lands which before belonged to the empire, and he received of them the quiet possession of the city of Rome, with such donations and lordships, which now they challenge to them under the name of St. Peter's patrimony, which they falsely ascribe to a donation of Constantine the Great.

It follows then in process of time, after the days of Pepin, Charlemagne, and Lewis (who had endowed these bishops of Rome, called now popes, with large possessions), that the kings of France were not so pliable to their beck, to aid and maintain them against the princes of Italy, who began then to pinch the bishops for their wrongfully usurped goods. The pope, therefore, practised with the Germans to reduce the empire to Otho, the first of that name, duke of Spain, referring the election to seven princes, electors of Germany, (A.D. 938,) notwithstanding, reserving still in his hands the negative voice, thinking thereby to enjoy what they had in quietness and security, and so he did for a good space.

At length, when some of these German emperors also, after Otho, began a little to spurn against the bishops and popes of Rome, some of them they accused, some they subdued and brought to the kissing of their feet, some they deposed, and placed other in their possessions.

Henry IV. was so accused by these bishops, that he was forced with his wife and child to wait attendance upon the pope's pleasure three days and three nights in winter, at the gates of Canosa, (A.D. 1077.) Besides all this, the pope raised up Rodolph to be emperor against him, who being slain in war, then Pope Gregory VII. stirred up his own son, Henry V. to fight against his own father, and to depose him; which Henry V. was also himself afterwards accused and excommunicated, and the Saxons at last set up by the bishops to fight against him.

After this the emperors began to be somewhat calmed and more quiet, suffering the bishops to reign as they liked, till Frederick I., called Barbarossa, came and began to stir contention against them. However, they hampered both him and his son Henry in such a way, that they obliged Frederick to submit to be trod upon, (A.D. 1177,) in the church of Venice; and afterwards the said bishops, crowning Henry VI. his son in the church of St. Peter, set his crown on his head with their feet, and with their feet spurned it off again, to make him know that the popes of Rome had power both to crown emperors and depose them again, (A.D. 1190.)

Then followed, (A.D. 1198,) Philip, brother to Henry, whom also the popes accused, and set up in opposition to him, Otho duke of Saxony. Upon the death of Philip, (A.D. 1209,) the pope conferred the imperial crown upon Otho IV., but this emperor, like his predecessors, was unwilling to submit to the pontiff's nod, and began to dispossess the bishops of their cities and lands which they had engrossed into their hands. This they could not bear, and immediately excommunicated him and put him aside; so that he was only suffered to reign four years, (A.D. 1212.)

At this time Frederick II., the son of Henry VI., was but young, whom the bishops of Rome supposing to find more mortified and tamed to their hand, advanced to be emperor. But that fell out much contrary to their expectation. For he perceiving the immoderate pomp and pride of the Roman bishops, which he could in no case abide, so nettled them and cut their combs, and waxed so stout against them, intending to extirpate their tyranny, and to reduce their pompous riches to the state and condition of the primitive church again, putting some of them to flight, and imprisoning some of their cardinals, that of three popes, one after another, he was accused, circumvented by treason, at last deposed, and after that poisoned, and at last forsaken and died, (A.D. 1250.)

After this Frederick followed his son Conrad, whom the bishops for his disobedience soon despatched, exciting against him in mortal war the landgrave of Turin, by which he was at length driven into his kingdom of Naples, and there died.

This Conrad had a son called Conradine, duke and prince of Suevia. When this Conradine, after the decease of his father, came to enjoy his kingdom of Naples, these bishops stirred up against him Charles the French king's brother, so, that through crafty conveyance, both Conradine, who descended from the blood of so many emperors, and also Frederick duke of Austria, were both taken, and after much wretched handling in their miserable endurance, unseemingly to their state, at length were both brought under the axe by the pope's procurement, and so both beheaded. And thus ended the imperial stock of Frederick I. surnamed Barbarossa.

The same that happened to Frederick the emperor, had almost also fallen upon Philip IV., the French king, by Pope Boniface VIII., who, because he could not have his commodities and revenues out of France after his will, sent out his bulls and letters patent to displace King Philip, and to place Albert king of the Romans in his room.

And thus hitherto in foreign histories. Now touching our own country princes here in England, to speak somewhat likewise of them: did not Pope Alexander III. presumptuously take upon him where he had nothing to do, to intermeddle with the king's subjects? for the death of Becket the rebel, although the king sufficiently cleared himself thereof, yet, notwithstanding, did he not wrongfully bring King Henry II. to such penance as it pleased him to enjoin, and also violently constrained him to swear obedience to the see of Rome? The like also was shewed before in this history to have happened to King John his son. For when the king like a valiant prince had held out against the tyranny of those bishops seven years together, were not all the churches in England barred up, and his inheritance with all his dominions given away by Pope Innocent III. to Lewis the French king, and he afterwards compelled to submit himself, and to make his whole realm feudatory to the bishops of Rome, and moreover the king himself driven also to surrender his crown to Pandolph the pope's legate, and so continued as a private person five days, standing at the pope's courtesy, whether to receive it again at his hands or no? And when the nobles of the realm rose afterwards against the king for the same, was he not then fain to seek and sue to the pope for succour?

And yet notwithstanding all this that King John so yielded to the pope, he was both pursued by the nobles, and also in the end was poisoned by a subject of the pope's own religion, a monk of Swinsted.

Besides this King Henry II. and King John his son, see what kings have here reigned in England since their time, until the reign of King Henry VIII., who although there were prudent princes, and did what they could in providing against the proud domination of these bishops, yet were forced at length sore against their wills, for fear, to subject themselves, together with their subjects under usurped authority, inasmuch as King Henry III. was fain to stoop and kiss the legate's knee.

The Image of Antichrist exalting himself in the Temple of God, above all that is named God, out of his own decrees, decretals, extravagants, pontificals, &c. word for word, as it is out of the said books here alleged and quoted.

(1) Forasmuch as it stands upon necessity of salvation, for every human creature to be subject to me the pope of Rome, it shall be therefore requisite and necessary for all men that will be saved, to learn and know the dignity of my see and excellency of my domination, as here is set forth according to the truth and very words of mine own laws, in style as follow: (2) First, my institution began in the Old Testament, and was consummated and finished in the New, in that my priesthood was prefigured by Aaron; and other bishops under me were prefigured by the sons of Aaron, that were under him.

(3) Neither is it to be thought that my church of Rome has been preferred by any general council, but obtained the primacy only by the voice of the gospel, and the mouth of the Saviour. (4) And has in it neither spot nor wrinkle, nor any such thing. (5) Wherefore as other seats are all inferior to me, and as they cannot absolve me; so have they no power to bind me or to stand against me, no more than the axe has power to stand or presume above him that hews with it, or the saw to presume above him that rules it. (6) This is the holy and apostolic mother church of all other churches of Christ; (7) from whose rules it is not meet that any person or persons should decline; but like as the Son of God came to do the will of his Father, so must you do the will of your mother, the church, the head of which is the church of Rome. (8) And if any other person or persons shall err from the said church, either let them be admonished, or else their names taken, to be known who they be that swerve from the customs of Rome. (9) Thus then as the holy church of Rome, of which I am governor, is set up to the whole world for a glass or example, reason would that whatever the church determines, or ordains, should be received by all men for a general and a perpetual rule for ever. (10) Whereupon we see it now verified in this church, that was prophesied by Jeremiah, saying, "Behold, I have set thee up over nations and kingdoms, to pluck up and to break down, to build and to plant." &c. (11) Whoso understands not the prerogative of this my priesthood, let him look up to the firmament, where he may see two great lights, the sun and the moon, one ruling over the day, the other over the night; so in the firmament of the universal church, (12) God hath set two great dignities, the authority of the pope, and of the emperor. Of which two, this our dignity is so much weightier, as we have the greater charge to give account to God for kings of the earth, and the laws of men. (13) Wherefore be it known to you emperors, who know it also right well, that you depend upon the judgment of us; we must not be brought and reduced to your will. (14) For, as I said, look what difference there is betwixt the sun and the moon, so great is the power of the pope ruling over the day, that is, over the spirituality, above emperors and kings ruling over the night, that is, over the laity. (15) Now seeing then the earth is seven times bigger than the moon, and the sun eight times greater than the earth, it follows that the pope's dignity fifty-six times doth surmount the estate of the emperors. (16) Upon consideration of which, I say and pronounce, that Constantine the emperor did naughtily in setting the patriarch of Constantinople at his feet on his left hand. (17) And although the emperor wrote to me, alleging the word of St. Peter, commanding us to submit ourselves to every human creature, as to kings, dukes, and others for the cause of God, &c. 1 Pet. ii. Yet in answering again my decretal, I expounded the mind and the words of St. Peter to pertain to his subjects, and not to his successors, commanding the emperor to consider the person of the speaker, and to whom it was spoken. For if the mind of Peter had been there to debase the order of priesthood, and to make us underlings to every human creature, then every aspirant might have dominion over prelates, which makes against the example of Christ, setting up the order of priesthood to bear dominion over kings, according to the saying of Jeremiah: "Behold, I have set thee up over kings and nations," &c. (18) And as I feared not then to write this boldly to Constantine, so now I say to all other emperors, that they receiving of me their approbation, unction, consecration, and crown imperial, must not disdain to submit their heads under me, and swear to me their allegiance. (19) For so you read in the decree of Pope John, how that princes heretofore have been wont to bow and submit their heads unto bishops, and not to proceed in judgment against the heads of bishops. (20) If this reverence and submission was wont to be given to bishops, how much more ought they to submit their heads to me being superior, not only to kings, but emperors? and that for two causes: first, for my title of succession, that I, pope of Rome, have to the empire, the room standing vacant; also for the fulness of power that Christ, the king of kings, and lord of lords, has given to me, though unworthy, in the person of Peter: (21) by reason of which, seeing my power is not of man but of God, who by his celestial Providence has set me over his whole universal church, master and governor, it belongeth therefore to my office to look upon every mortal sin of every christian man: (22) whereby all criminal offences, as well of kings as all others be subject to my censure, (23) in such sort, that in all manner of pleading, if any manner of person at any time, either before the sentence given, or after shall appeal to me, it shall be lawful for him so to do. (24) Neither must kings and princes think it much to submit themselves to my judgment, for so did Valentinian, the worthy emperor; so did Theodosius, and also Charles. (25) Thus you see all must be judged by me, and I of no man. Yea, and though I pope of Rome, by my negligence or evil demeanor, be found unprofitable, or hurtful, either to myself or others; yea, if I should draw with me innumerable souls by heaps to hell, yet may no mortal man be so hardy, so bold, or so presumptuous to reprove me, (26) or to say to me, Sir, why do you so? (27) For although you read that Balaam was rebuked of his ass, by which ass our subjects, by Balaam, we prelates are signified; yet that ought to be no example to our subjects to rebuke us. (28) And though we read in the scripture that Peter, who received power of the kingdom, and being chief of the apostles might by virtue of his office control all other, was content to come and give answer before his inferiors, objecting to him his going to the Gentiles; yet other inferiors must not learn by this example to be checkmate with their prelates, because that Peter so took it at their hands, shewing thereby rather a dispensation of humility, than the power of his office, by which power he might have said to them again in this wise, it becomes not sheep, nor belongs to their office to accuse their shepherd; (29) for else why was Dioscorus, patriarch of Alexandria, condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedon? Not for any cause of his faith, but only for that he durst stand against Pope Leo, and durst excommunicate the bishop of Rome; for who is he that has authority to accuse the seat of St. Peter? (30) Although I am not ignorant what St. Jerome writes, that St. Paul would not have reprehended St. Peter, unless he had thought himself equal to him. (31) Yet St. Jerome must thus be expounded by my interpretation, that this equality betwixt St. Peter and St. Paul consist not in like office of dignity, but in pureness of conversation. (32) For who gave St. Paul his licence to preach but St. Peter?

and that by the authority of God, saying, "Separate to me Paul and Barnabas," &c. (33) Wherefore be it known to all men, that my church of Rome is prince and head of all nations, (34) the mother of the faith, (35) the foundation cardinal, whereupon all churches do depend, as the door depends by the hinges, (36) the first of all other seats, without all spot or blemish. (37) Lady, mistress, and instructor of all churches, (38) a glass and a spectacle to all men, to be followed in all whatsoever she observes. (39) Which was never found yet to slide or decline from the path of apostolic tradition, or to be entangled with any newness of heresy; (40) against which church of Rome whoever speaks any evil, is forthwith an heretic, (41) yea, a very pagan, a witch, and an idolater or infidel, (42) having fulness of power only in her own hands in ruling, (43) deciding, absolving, condemning, casting out, or receiving in. (44) Although I deny not but other churches are partakers with her in labouring and carrying. (45) To which church of Rome it is lawful to appeal for remedy, from all other churches. Although it was otherwise concluded in the general council of Milevitane, that no man should appeal over the sea under pain of excommunication, yet my gloss comes in here with an exception: "Except the appeal be to the see of Rome," &c. (46) By the authority of which church of Rome all synods and decrees of councils stand confirmed. (47) And hath always full authority in her hands to make new laws and decrements, and to alter statutes, privileges, rights, or documents of churches; to separate things joined, and to join things separated upon right consideration, either in whole or in part, either personally or generally. (48) Of which church of Rome I am head as a king is over his judges, (49) the vicar of St. Peter, (50) yea, not the vicar of St. Peter properly, but the vicar of Christ properly, and successor of Peter, (51) vicar of Jesus Christ, (52) rector of the universal church, director of the Lord's flock, (53) chief magistrate of the whole world, (54) the head and chief of the apostolic church, (55) universal pope, and diocesan in all places exempt, as well as every bishop is in places not exempt, (56) most mighty priest, (57) a living law in the earth, (58) judged to have all laws in the chest of my breast, (59) bearing the room of no pure man, (60) being neither God nor man, but the admiration of the world, and a middle thing betwixt both. (61) Having both swords in my power, both of the Spiritual and Temporal jurisdiction, (62) so far surmounting the authority of the emperor, that I of mine own power alone without a council, have authority to depose him, or to transfer his kingdom, and to give a new election, as I did to Frederick and divers other. (63) What power then or potentate in all the world is comparable to me, who have authority to bind and loose both in heaven and in earth? (64) That is, who have power both of heavenly things, and also of temporal things. (65) To whom emperors and kings are more inferior, than lead is inferior to gold. our knees, yea and think themselves happy and well defended, if they may kiss our hands? (67) Wherefore the sauciness of Honorius the emperor is to be reprehended, and his constitution abolished, who, with his laity would take upon him to intermeddle, not only with the temporal order, but also with matters ecclesiastical, and the election of the pope. (68) But here perchance some will object, the examples and words of Christ, saying, "That his kingdom is not of this world," and where he being required to divide betwixt two brethren their heritage, did refuse it. But that ought to be no prejudice to my power. (69) For if Peter, and I in Peter, if we, I say, have power to bind and loose in heaven, how much more then is it to be thought, that we have power in earth to loose and to take away empires, kingdoms, dukedoms, and what else soever mortal men may have, and to give them where we will? (70) And if we have authority over angels, which be the governors of princes, what then may we do upon their inferiors and servants? (71) And that you may not marvel when I say angels are subject to us, you shall hear what my blessed clerk Antoninus writes of the matter, saying, "That our power is greater than the angels in four things;—1. In jurisdiction, 2. In administration of sacraments, 3. In knowledge, 4. In reward," &c. (72) And again in Bulla Clementis, do I not there command in my bull the angels of paradise, to absolve the soul of man out of purgatory, and to bring it into the glory of paradise? (73) And now besides my heavenly power, to speak of mine earthly jurisdiction, who did first transfer the empire from the Greeks to the Germans, but I? (74) And not only in the empire am I emperor, the place being empty, but in all ecclesiastical benefices have full right and power to give, to translate, and to dispose after my arbitrement. (75) Did not I, Zacharias, put down Childerick the old king of France, and set up Pepin? (76) Did not I, Gregory VII. set up Robert Wiscard, and make him king of Sicily, and duke of Capua? &c. (77) Did not I the same Gregory also set up Rodolph against Henry IV. emperor? (78) And though this Henry was an emperor of most stout courage, who stood sixty-two times in open field against his enemies, (79) yet did not I, Gregory, bring him before us, and make him stand at my gate three days and three nights bare-footed and bare-legged, with his wife and child, in the depth of winter, both in frost and snow, intreating for his absolution, and afterwards excommunicated him again, so that he was twice excommunicated in my days? (80) Again, did not I, Pascal, after Gregory, set up the son of Henry against his father in war, to possess the empire, and to put down his father, and so he did? (81) Did not I, Pope Alexander, bring under Henry II. king of England, for the death of Thomas Becket, and cause him to go bare-foot to his tomb at Canterbury with bleeding feet? (82) Did not I, Innocent III. cause King John to kneel down at the feet of Pandolph my legate, and offer up his crown with his own hands; also to kiss the feet of Stephen Langton, a bishop of Canterbury: and besides, fine him in a thousand marks by the year? (83) Did not I, Urban II., put down Hugo, earl in Italy, discharging his subjects from their oath and obedience to him? (84) Did not I, Pascal II., excommunicate also his son Henry V., and get out of his lands all his right and title of elections and donations of spiritual promotions? Did not I, Gelasius II., bring the captain of Cincius under, to the kissing of my feet? And after Gelasius, did not I, Calixtus II., quail the Emperor Henry V., and also bring in subjection Gregory, whom the emperor had set up against me as pope, bringing him into Rome upon a camel, his face to the horse tail, making him to hold the horse tail in his hand instead of a bridle? (85) Further, did not I, Innocent II., set up and make Lothaire to be emperor for driving out Pope Anacletus out of Rome? (86) Did not I, the said Innocent, take the dukedom of Sicily from the empire, and make Roger king thereof, whereby afterward the kingdom became the patrimony of St. Peter? (87) Did not I, Alexander III., suspend all the realm and churches of England for the king's marriage, (A.D. 1159?) (88) But what do I speak of kings? Did not Alexander bring the valiant emperor, Frederick I., to Venice, by reason of his son Otto there taken prisoner, and there in St. Mark's church made him fall down flat upon the ground while I set my foot upon his neck, saying the verse of the Psalm, "Thou shalt tread on the adder and the serpent," &c. (89) Did not I, Adrian IV., pope, an Englishman born, excommunicate the king of Sicily, and refuse his peace, which he offered? And had not he overcome me in plain field, I would have shaken him out of his kingdom of Sicily, and dukedom of Apulia. (90) Also, did not I, Adrian, control and correct the foresaid Frederic, emperor, for holding the left stirrup of my horse, when he should have holden the right? (91) And afterward did not I excommunicate and curse him, for he was so saucy to set his own name in writing before mine? (92) And although a poor fly afterward overcame and strangled me, yet I made kings and emperors to stoop. (93) Did not I, Innocent III., cast down Philip, brother to Frederic, from the imperial crown, being elected without my leave, and afterwards set him up again? And also set up Otho of Brunswick, and afterwards excommunicated and also deposed the same after four years, setting up the French king to war against him? (94) Then was Frederic II. set up by me, and reigned thirty-seven years; and yet five years before he died he was deposed. (95) Did not I, Honorius III., interdict him, for not restoring certain to their possessions at my request? (96) Whom also Gregory IX. excommunicated twice together, and raised up the Venetians against him. (97) And at length Innocent IV. spoiled him of his empire; after that he caused him to be poisoned, and at length to be strangled by one Manfred, and excommunicated his son Conrad after him, not only depriving him of his right inheritance, but also caused him, with Frederic, duke of Austria, to be beheaded. (98) Thus then, did not I excommunicate and depose all these emperors in order? Henry IV., Henry V., Frederic I., Philip, Otho IV., Frederic II., and Conrad his son? (99) Did not I interdict King Henry VIII.? (100) And all his kingdom of England? (101) And had not his prudence and power prevented my practice, I had displaced him from his kingdom also. Briefly, who is able to comprehend the greatness of my power and of my seat? (102) For by me only general councils take their force and confirmation, (103) and the interpretation of the councils, and of all other causes hard and doubtful, ought to be referred and stand to my determination. (104) By me the works of all writers, whatsoever they be, are either reprov'd or allowed. (105) Then how much more ought my writings and decrees to be preferred before all others? (106) So that my letters and epistles decretal be equivalent with the general councils. (107) And, whereas, God has ordained all causes of men to be judged by men, he has only reserved me, that is, the pope of Rome, without all question of men, unto his own judgment. (108) And, therefore, where all other creatures are under their judge, only I, who in earth am the judge of all, can be judged of none, either of emperor, nor the whole clergy, nor of kings, nor of the people. (109) For who has power to judge upon his judge? (110) This judge am I, and that alone, without any other resistance of any council joined to me. For I have power upon councils; councils have no power upon me. But if the council determine amiss, it is in my authority alone to infringe it, or to condemn whom I list without any council. (111) And all for the pre-eminence of my predecessor blessed St. Peter, which, by the voice of the Lord, he received, and ever shall retain. (112) Furthermore, and whereas all other sentences and judgments, both of councils, person or persons, may and ought to be examined, (113) for that they may be corrupted four ways, by fear, by gifts, by hatred, by favour, only my sentence and judgment must stand, (114) as given out of heaven by the mouth of Peter himself, which no man must (115) break or retract, (116) no man must dispute or doubt of. (117) Yea, if my judgment, statute, or yoke seem scarcely tolerable, yet for remembrance of St. Peter it must be humbly obeyed. (118) Yea, and moreover, obedience is to be given, not only to such decrees set forth by me in time of my popedom, but also to such as I do foresee and commit to writing before I be pope. (119) And although it be thought by some writers, to be given to all men to err, and to be deceived, (120) yet neither am I a pure man. (121) And again, the sentence of my apostolic seat is always conceived with such moderation, is concocted and digested with such patience and ripeness, and delivered out with such gravity and deliberation, that nothing is thought in it necessary to be altered or detracted. (122) Wherefore, it is manifest, and testified by the voice of holy bishops, that the dignity of this my seat is to be revered through the whole world, in that all the faithful submit themselves to it as to the head of the whole body; (123) whereof it is spoken to me by the prophet, speaking of the ark; if this be humbled, whither shall you run for succour, and where shall your glory become? Seeing then this is so, that so holy bishops and scriptures do witness with me, what shall we say then to such as will take upon them to judge of my doings, to reprehend my proceedings, or to require homage and tribute of me to whom all other are subject? (124) Against the first sort the scripture speaks, "Thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour's standing corn." Which thing to attempt against me, what is it but plain sacrilege? (125) According to my canonists, who thus define sacrilege to consist in three things; either when a man judges of his prince's judgment; or when the holy-day is profaned; or when reverence is not given to laws and canons. (126)

Against the second sort makes the place of the book of Kings, where we read the ark of God was brought from Gaza to Jerusalem, and in the way the ark inclining by reason of the unruly oxen, Ussah the Levite put forth his hand to help, and therefore was stricken of the Lord. By this ark is signified the prelates; by the inclination thereof, the fall of prelates, (127) who also are signified by the angels that Jacob saw going up and coming down the ladder: (128) also, by the prophet where he saith, "He bowed down the heavens and came down," &c. By Ussah and by the unruly oxen are meant our subjects. (129) Then, like as Ussah was stricken for putting his hand to the ark inclining, no more must subjects rebuke their prelates going awry. (130) Although here it may be answered again, that all are not prelates who are so called; for it is not the name that makes a bishop, but his life. (131) Against the third sort of such as would bring us under the tribute and exactions of secular men, makes the New Testament, where Peter was bid to give the groat in the fish's mouth, but not the head nor the body of the fish; no more is the head or body of the church subdued to kings, but only that which is in the mouth, that is, the external things of the church. And yet not they neither. (132) For so we read in the book of Genesis, that Pharaoh, in time of dearth, subdued all the land of the Egyptians, but yet he ministered to the priests, so that he took neither their possessions from them, nor their liberty. If then prelates of the church must be neither judged, nor reprehended, nor exacted, how much more ought I to be free from the same, (133) who am the bishop of bishops, and head of prelates? (134) For it is not to be thought that the case between me and other prelates; between my see and other churches, be like, (135) although the whole catholic and apostolic church make one bride-chamber of Christ; yet the catholic and apostolic church of Rome had the pre-eminence given over all other by the mouth of the Lord himself, saying to Peter, "Thou art Peter," &c. (136) Thus a discrepance and difference must be had in the church as it was betwixt Aaron and his children; (137) betwixt the seventy-two disciples, and the twelve apostles; betwixt the other apostles and Peter. (138) Wherefore it is to be concluded, that there must be an order and difference of degrees in the church between power, superior and inferior; without which order the universality of the whole cannot consist. (139) For, as among the angelical creatures above in heaven, there is set a difference and inequality of powers and orders, some be angels, some archangels, some cherubims, and seraphims: (140) so in the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the church militant in the earth, priests must not be equal with bishops, bishops must not be like in order with archbishops, with patriarchs or primates, (141) who contain under them three archbishops, as a king contains three dukes under him. In which number of patriarchs comes in the state of (142) cardinals or principals, so called, because as the door turneth by his hinges, so the universal church ought to be ruled by them. (143) The next and highest order above these is mine, who am pope, differing in power and majority, and honour reverential, from these and all other degrees of men. (144) For the better declaration of which, my canonists make three kinds of power in earth; immediate, which is mine immediately from God; derived, which belongeth to other inferior prelates from me; (145) ministerial, belonging to emperors and princes to minister for me. For which cause the anointing of princes, and my consecration differ; for they are anointed only in the arms or shoulders, and I in the head, to signify the difference of power betwixt princes and me. (146) This order, therefore, of priests, bishops, archbishops, patriarchs, and others, as a thing most convenient, my church of Rome has set and instituted through all churches, following therein, not only the example of the angelical army in heaven, but also of the apostles. (147) For among them also there was not a uniform equality or institution of one degree, (148) but a diversity or distinction of authority and power. Although they were all apostles together, yet it was granted notwithstanding to Peter (themselves also agreeing to the same) that he should bear dominion and superiority over all the other apostles. (149) And therefore he had his name given him Cephas, that is, head or beginning of the apostleship. (150) Whereupon the order of priesthood first in the New Testament began in Peter, to whom it was said, Thou art Peter, and upon thee I will build my church. (151) And I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and thou being converted confirm thy brethren. (152) I have prayed for thee that thy faith shall not fail. Wherefore seeing such power is given to Peter, (153) and to me in Peter, being his successor; (154) who is he then in all the world that ought not to be subject to my decrees who have such power in heaven, in hell, in earth, with the quick and also the dead? (155) Commanding and granting in my bull sent to Vienna, to all such as died in their pilgrimage to Rome, that the pain of hell should not touch them; and also that all such as took the holy cross upon them should every one at his request, not only be delivered himself, but also deliver three or four souls, whoever he would, out of purgatory. (156) Again, having such promise and assurance that my faith shall not fail, who then will not believe my doctrine? For did not Christ himself first pray for Peter that his faith should not fail? (157) Also have I not a sure promise of Paul's own mouth, writing to my church by these words, "God is my witness whom I serve with my spirit, in the gospel of his Son, that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers?" Rom. i. 9. (158) Wherefore as I condemn worthily all who will not obey my decrees, to be dispossessed of all their honour without restitution, (159) so all they that believe not my doctrine, or stand against the privilege of the church, especially the church of Rome, I pronounce them heretics. (160) And as the other before is to be called unjust, so this man is to be called a heretic. (161) For why? he goes against the faith who goes against her who is the mother of faith. (162) But here may rise perhaps a doubt or scruple, that if my faith and knowledge stand so sure by the promise of Christ, and by the continual prayer of Saint Paul, whether is it true, or is it to be granted, that any other should excel me in knowledge, or interpretation of holy scripture? (163) For see whose knowledge is grounded on most reason, his words should seem to be of more authority. (164) Wherefore I answer and grant, that many there are who have been more abundantly indowed with fuller grace of the Holy Ghost and greater excellency of knowledge; and therefore that the writings of Augustine, Jerome, and others ought to be preferred before the constitutions of some popes; yet I say in determination of causes, because they have not the virtue and height of that authority which is given to me, therefore in expounding of scriptures they are to be preferred, but in deciding of matters, they stand inferior to my authority. By virtue of which authority, (165) they themselves are allowed for doctors, and their works approved, but all other matters are ruled, through the power of the keys which were given to me immediately by Christ. Although I deny not but the same keys are also committed to other prelates, as they were to other apostles besides Peter. (166) Yet it is one thing to have the keys, and another thing to have the use of the keys. (167) Wherefore here is to be noted a distinction of keys, after the mind of my school doctors; one key which is called the key of order, having authority to bind and loose, but not over the persons whom they bind and loose, and this authority they take not immediately of Christ, but mediately by me the vicar of Christ. The other key is called the key of jurisdiction, which I the vicar of Christ take immediately of him, having not only authority to bind and loose, but also dominion over them on whom this key is exercised. By the jurisdiction of which key the fullness of my power is so great, that whereas all other are subjects; (168) yea and emperors themselves ought to subdue their executions to me; only I am subject to no creature, (169) no not to myself except I list, in foro penitentiae, to my ghostly father submitting myself as a sinner, but not as pope. So that my papal majesty ever remains unpunished. Superior to all men, (170) whom all persons ought to obey, (171) and follow, (172) whom no man must judge nor accuse of any crime, either of murder, adultery, simony, or such like. (173) No man depose, but I myself; (174) No man can excommunicate me, yea though I communicate with the excommunicate, for no canon bindeth me. Whom no man must lie to, (175) for he that lies to me is a church robber, (176) and who obeys not me is an heretic, and an excommunicated person. (177) For as all the Jews were commanded to obey the high priest of the Levitical order, of what state and condition soever they were, so are all christian men more and less bound to obey me Christ's lieutenant on earth. Concerning the obedience or disobedience of whom ye have in Deut. xvii. (178) Where the common Gloss saith, that he who denieth to the high priest obedience, lies under the sentence and condemnation, as much as he that denies to God his omnipotence. Thus then it appears, that the greatness of my priesthood (179) began in Melchisedeck, was solemnized in Aaron, continued in the children of Aaron, perfected in Christ, represented in Peter, exalted in the universal jurisdiction, and manifested in Silvester, &c. So that through this pre-eminence of my priesthood, having all things subject to me, (180) it may seem well verified in me that which was spoken of Christ, Psalm viii. "Thou hast put all things under his feet; all sheep and

and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea, &c. (181) Where is to be noted, that by oxen, Jews, and heretics, by beasts of the field, Pagans be signified. For although as yet they be out of the use of my keys of binding and loosing, yet they be not out of the jurisdiction of my keys, but if they return I may absolve them. (182) By sheep and all cattle are meant all christian men both great and less, whether they be emperors, princes, prelates, or others. By fowls of the air you may understand the angels and potentates of heaven, who will be all subject to me, in that I am greater than the angels; and that in four things, as is before declared; and in having power to bind and loose in heaven, (183) and to give heaven to them that fight in my wars. (184) Lastly, by the fishes of the sea, are signified the souls departed in pain or in purgatory, as Gregory by his prayer delivered the soul of Trajan out of hell, and I have power to deliver out of purgatory whom I please. (185) Lastly, by the fishes of the sea are signified such as are in purgatory; so that they stand in need and necessity of other men's help, and yet are in their journey. Passengers belonging to the court of the pope, therefore they may be relieved out of the storehouse of the church, by the participation of indulgence. And forasmuch as some object that my pardons cannot extend to them that are departed, for that it was said to Peter, "Whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth;" and therefore seeing they are not upon earth, they cannot be loosed by me. Here I answer again by my doctors, that this word, "Upon the earth," may be explained in two manner of ways; first, to him that is the looser, so that he who shall loose shall be upon the earth; and so I grant that the pope being dead, can loose no man. Also it may be referred to him that is loosed, so that whoever is loosed must be upon the earth, or about the earth; and so the souls in purgatory may be loosed, who, although they are not upon the earth, yet they are about the earth, at least they are not in heaven. And because oftentimes one question may rise upon another, and the heads of men now-a-days are curious, a man hearing now that I can deliver out of purgatory, will ask here a question, whether I am able also to empty all purgatory at once, or not? to whom my canonist answers by a triple distinction: Touching my absolute jurisdiction, he saith, I am able to rid out all purgatory together, for as many as be under my jurisdiction, as all be, except only infants unbaptized, in limbo, and men departed only with the baptism of the Spirit, and such as have no friends to do for them that for which my pardons are given; these only excepted. For all other besides, the pope, he saith, has power to release all purgatory at once, as touching his absolute jurisdiction. Although Thomas Aquinas (part 4), denies the same, forasmuch as Christ himself, he saith, when he came down, did not utterly at once release all purgatory. As touching my ordinary execution they hold, that I may if I will, but I ought not to do it. Thirdly, as concerning the divine acceptation, that is, how God would accept it if I did it, that, they say, is unknown to them, and to every creature, yea, and to the pope himself.

And to the intent I would all men to see and understand that I lack not witnesses more besides these, if I list to bring them out, you shall hear the whole quire of my divine clergy brought out, with a full voice testifying in my behalf in their books, transactions, distinctions, titles, glosses, and summaries, as by their own words here follows. The pope, say they, being the vicar of Jesus Christ through the whole world, is in the stead of the living God, has that dominion and lordship which Christ here in earth would not have, although he had it in habit, but gave it to Peter in act, that is, the universal jurisdiction both of spiritual things and also of temporal, which double jurisdiction was signified by the two swords in the gospel, and also by the offering of the wise men, who offered not only incense, but also gold, to signify not only the spiritual dominion, but also the temporal, to belong to Christ and to his vicar. For as we read, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" as Christ saith, "All power is given to him both in heaven and earth;" so it is to be affirmed inclusive, that the vicar of Christ hath power of things celestial, terrestrial, and infernal. Which he took immediately of Christ; all others take it immediately by Peter and the pope. Wherefore such as say that the pope has dominion only in spiritual things in the world, and not of temporal, may be likened to the councillors of the kings of Syria, (3 Reg. 20), which said "That the gods of the mountains be their gods, and therefore they have overcome us; but let us fight against them in the low meadows, and in valleys where they have no power, and so we shall prevail over them." So evil councillors now-a-days, through their pestiferous flattery, deceive kings and princes of the earth, saying popes and prelates are gods of mountains, that is, of spiritual things only; but they are not gods of valleys, that is, they have no dominion over temporal things, and therefore let us fight with them in the valleys, that is, in the power of the temporal possessions, and so we shall prevail over them. But what saith the sentence of God to them, let us hear. Because, saith he, "the Syrians say that the god of mountains is their god, and not the god of valleys, therefore I will give all this multitude into your hand, and ye shall know that I am the Lord." What can be more effectually spoken to set forth the majesty of my jurisdiction, which I received immediately of the Lord; of the Lord, I say, and of no man. For whereas Constantine the emperor gave to Silvester this possession and patrimony; that is so to be expounded and taken not so much for a donation, as to be counted for a restitution made of that which tyrannously was taken from him before. And again, whereas I have given at sundry times to Lewis the other emperors, of my temporal lands and possessions, yet that was done not so much for any recognising of homage to them, as for keeping peace with them. For I owe to emperors no due obedience that they can claim, but they owe to me as to their superior. And therefore for a diversity betwixt their degree and mine, in their consecration they take the unction on their arm, and I on the head. And as I am superior to them, so I am superior to all laws, and free from all constitutions. Who am able of myself, and by my interpretation, to prefer equity not being written before the law written; having all laws within the chest of my breast, as is aforesaid. And whatsoever this my see shall enact, approve, or disapprove, all men ought to approve or reprove the same, without either judging, disputing, doubting, or retracting. Such is the privilege given of Christ, in the behalf of Peter, to the church of Rome, (186) that what country soever, kingdom or province, choosing to themselves bishops and ministers, although they agree with all other Christ's faithful people in the name of Jesus, that is, in faith and charity, believing in the same God, and in Christ his true Son, and in the Holy Ghost, having also the same creed; the same evangelists and scriptures of the apostles; yet unless their bishops and ministers take their origin and ordination from this apostolic seat, they are to be counted not of the church. So that succession of faith only is not sufficient to make a church, except their ministers take their ordination by them who have their succession from the apostles. So their faith, supremacy, the chair of Peter, keys of heaven, power to bind and loose, all these are inseparable from the church of Rome: so that it is to be presumed, that God always providing, and St. Peter helping the bishoprick and diocese of Rome, it shall never fall from the faith. And likewise it is to be presumed and presupposed that the bishop of that church is good and always holy. Yea, and though he be not always good, or be destitute of his own merits, yet the merits of St. Peter, predecessor of that place, are sufficient for him, who has bequeathed and left a perpetual dowry of merits, with inheritance of innocency, to his posterity, (187) yea, though he fall into homicide or adultery, he may sin, but yet he cannot be accused, but rather is excused by the murders of Samson, the thefts of the Hebrews, the adultery of Jacob. (188) Furthermore, the pope, say they, has all the dignities, and all power of all patriarchs. In his primacy, he is Abel; in government, the ark of Noah; in patriarchdom, Abraham; in order, Melchisedec; in dignity, Aaron; in authority, Moses; in seat judicial, Samuel; in zeal, Elias; in meekness, David; in power, Peter; in unction, Christ. My power, they say, is greater than all the saints. For whom I confirm, no man may infirm: I may favour and spare whom I please, (189) to take from one and to give to another. And if I am an enemy to any man, all men ought to eschew that person forthwith, and not tarry and look while I bid them so to do. All the earth is my diocese, and I the ordinary of all men, having the authority of the king of all kings upon subjects. I am all in all, and above all, (190) so that God himself, and I the vicar of God, have both one consistory, (191) and I am able to do almost all that God can do. (192) It is said of me, that have an heavenly arbitrator, and therefore am able to change the nature of things, and of nothing to make things to be, and of a sentence that is nothing to make it stand in effect; in all things that I list my will is to stand for reason. For I am able by the law to dispense above the law, and of wrong to make justice, in correcting laws and changing them. You have heard hitherto sufficiently out of my doctors. Now you shall hear greater things out of mine own decrees. (193) Read there Dist. 96. Satie. (194) Also 12 Caus. 11. q. 1. cap. Sacerdotibus. (195) Also 12. q. 1. cap. Futuram. Do you not find there expressed how Constantine the emperor sitting in the general council of Nice, called us prelates of the church, all gods? (196) Again, read my canon, Decretal. De transl. Episc. cap. Quanto. Do you not see there manifestly expressed, how not man, but God alone separates that which the bishop of Rome dissolves and separates? Wherefore if those things that I do be said to be done not of man, but of God; what can you make me but God? Again, if prelates of the church be called and counted of Constantine for gods, I then being above all prelates seem by this reason to be above all gods. Wherefore no marvel, if it be in my power to change time and times, to alter and abrogate laws, to dispense with all things, yea, with the precepts of Christ. For where Christ bids St. Peter put up his sword, admonishing his disciples not to use any outward force in revenging themselves; (197) do not I, Pope Nicolas, writing to the bishops of France, exhort them to draw out their material swords in pursuing their enemies, and recovering their possessions. Where Christ was present himself at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, (198) do not I, Pope Martin, in my distinction inhibit the spiritual clergy to be present at marriage feasts, and also to marry themselves? Where matrimony by Christ cannot be loosed but only for adultery, (199) do not I, Pope Gregory, writing to Boniface, permit the same to be broken for infirmity of body? (200) Against the express caution of the gospel, does not Innocent IV. permit to repel force by force? (201) Likewise against the Old Testament I do dispense in not giving tithes. (202) Against the New Testament in swearing. (203) Wherein two kinds of oaths are to be noted. Whereof some promissory, some be assertions, &c. (204) In vows, and that ex toto toto, whereas other prelates cannot dispense ex toto a toto, I can deliver ex toto a toto, like God himself. (205) In perjury if I absolve my absolution stands. (206) Where also note, that in all swearing always the authority of the superior is excepted. (207) Moreover, where Christ bids us to lend without hope of gain, do not I, Pope Martin, give dispensation for the same? and notwithstanding the council of Turin enacted the contrary, yet with two bulls I disannulled that decree. (208) What should I speak of murder, making it no murder nor homicide to slay them that are excommunicated. (209) Likewise against the law of nature. (210) Against the apostle. (211) Also against the canons of the apostles I can and do dispense. For where they in their canon command a priest for fornication to be deposed, I through the authority of Silvester do alter the rigour of that constitution, (212) considering the minds and bodies also of men now to be weaker than they were then. (213) Briefly, against the universal state of the church I have dispensation. And for marriage in the second degree of consanguinity and affinity between the brother's children, so that the uncle may not marry his niece, unless for an urgent and weighty cause. As for all such contracts betwixt party and party, where matrimony is not yet consummated, it is but a small matter for me to dispense withall. In short, if ye list briefly to hear the whole number of all such cases as properly appertain to my papal dispensation, which come to the number of one and fifty points, that no man may meddle withal but only I myself alone, I will recite them in English, as they be set forth in my canonical doctors.

Dispensation to give orders to such as have been under the sentence of the greater curse or excommunication.

Dispensation with such as being suspended with the greater curse do minister in any holy order.

Dispensation with such as be unlawfully born to receive orders or benefices.

Dispensation for pluralities of benefices.

Dispensation to make a man bishop before he be thirty years old.

Dispensation to give orders under age.

The pope only hath power to make and call a general council.

The pope alone has power to deprive an ecclesiastical person, and give away his benefice being not vacant.

The pope alone is able to absolve him that is excommunicated by name.

The pope only is able to absolve him whom his legate excommunicates.

The pope both judges in the causes of them that appeal unto him, and where he judges, none may appeal from him.

He only has authority to make deacon and priest, whom he made subdeacon, either upon Sundays, or upon other feasts.

Only the pope, and none else, at all times, and in all places, wears the pall.

The pope only dispenses with a man, either being not within orders, or being unworthy to be made bishop.

He only either confirms or deposes the emperor when he is chosen.

A man being excommunicated, and his absolution referred to the pope, none may absolve that man but the pope alone.

The same hath authority in any election, before it be made, to pronounce it one, when it is made.

He canonizes saints, and none else but he.

Dispensation to have many dignities and personages in one church, and without charge and cure of soul, belongs only to the pope.

To make that effectual which is of no effect, and contrarywise, belongs only to the pope.

To pluck a monk out of his cloister both against his own will and the abbot's, pertains only to the pope.

His sentence makes a law.

The same day in which the pope is consecrated, he may give orders.

He dispenses in degrees in consanguinity and affinity.

He is able to abolish laws, quoad utrumque forum, that is, both civil and canon, where danger is of the soul.

It is in his dispensation to give general indulgences to certain places or persons.

To legitimate what persons soever he please, as touching spiritualities, in all places, as touching temporalities, as honors, inheritance, &c.

To erect new religions, to approve or reprove rules or ordinances, and ceremonies in the church.

He is able to dispense with all the precepts and statutes of the church.

To dispense and to discharge any subject from the bond of allegiance, or oath made to any manner of person.

No man may accuse him of any crime, except of heresy, and not even that, except he be incorrigible.

The same is also free from all laws, so that he cannot incur into any sentence of excommunication, suspension, irregularity, or into the penalty of any crime, but in the note of crime he may well.

Finally, he by his dispensation may grant, yea, to a simple priest, to minister the sacrament of confirmation to infants, also to give lower orders, and to hallow churches and virgins, &c.

These be the cases wherein I only have power to dispense, and no man else, neither bishop, nor metropolitan, nor legate, without a licence from me.

After that I have now sufficiently declared my power in earth, in heaven, and in purgatory, how great it is, and what is the fulness thereof, in binding, loosing, commanding, permitting, electing, confirming, deposing, dispensing, doing and undoing, &c. I will treat now a little of my riches likewise, and great possessions, that every man may see by my wealth and abundance of all things, rents, tithes, tributes, my silks, my purple mitres, crowns, gold, silver, pearls and gems, lands and lordships, how God here prospers and magnifies his vicar on the earth. For to me pertains first the imperial city of Rome, the palace of Lateran, the kingdom of Sicily is proper to me, Apulia and Capua be mine. Also the kingdom of England and Ireland, are they not, or ought they not to be tributaries to me? (214) To these I adjoin also, besides other provinces and countries, both in the west and the east, from the north to the south, these dominions by name; (215) as Ravenna, Corsica, Naples, &c. &c. &c. with divers other more, (216) which Constantine the emperor gave unto me, not that they were not mine before he gave them. (217) For in that I took them of him, I took them not as a gift but as a restitution. And that I rendered them again to Otho, I did it not for any duty to him, but only for peace sake. What should I speak here of my daily revenues of my first fruits, annats, palls, indulgences, bulls, confessionals, indults and rescripts, testaments, dispensations, privileges, elections, prebends, religious houses, and such like, which come to no small mass of money? Inasmuch, that for one pall to the archbishop of Mentz, which was wont to be given for ten thousand (218) florins, now it is grown to twenty seven thousand florins, which I received of James, the archbishop, not long before Basil council; besides the fruits of other bishoprics in Germany, coming to the number of fifty, whereby what advantage comes to my coffers, may partly be conjectured. But what should I speak of Germany, (219) when the whole world is my diocese, as my canonists do say, and all men are bound to believe, (220) except they will imagine (as the Manichæans do) two beginnings, which is false and heretical? For Moses saith, "In the beginning God made heaven and earth," and not in the beginnings. (221) Wherefore as I begun, so I conclude, commanding, declaring, and pronouncing, to stand upon necessity of salvation, for every human creature to be subject to me.

ACTS AND MONUMENTS.

BOOK VII.

BEGINNING WITH

THE REIGN OF KING HENRY THE EIGHTH.

KING HENRY VII. died in the year 1509, and had by Elizabeth his wife four sons, and as many daughters. Three only survived, to wit, Prince Henry, Lady Margaret, and Lady Mary: of whom King Henry the Eighth succeeded his father; Lady Margaret was married to James IV., king of Scotland; and Lady Mary was affianced to Charles king of Castile.

Not long before the death of King Henry VII., Prince Arthur his eldest son espoused Lady Catherine daughter to Ferdinand, when fifteen years of age, and she was about the age of seventeen; shortly after this marriage, within five months he died at Ludlow, and was buried at Worcester. After his decease, the succession to the crown fell to King Henry VIII., who at the age of eighteen years, commenced his reign A.D. 1509, and shortly after married Catherine, the widow of his late brother Prince Arthur, in order that her dowry which was great, should not be transported out of the land. For this marriage, which was more politic than scriptural, he received a dispensation from Pope Julius, at the request of Ferdinand her father. The reign of this king continued with great nobleness and fame the space of thirty-eight years. During his time there was great alteration of things, in the civil state of the realm, and especially in the ecclesiastical state, and in matters appertaining to the church. For by him the usurped power of the bishop of Rome was exiled and abolished out of the realm, idolatry and superstition somewhat repressed, images defaced, pilgrimages abolished, abbeys and monasteries pulled down, monkish orders rooted out, the scriptures translated into the vernacular tongue, and the state of the church and religion redressed. Concerning all which things, we will endeavour (Christ willing) to discourse particularly and in order, after we first touch on a few matters, which are to be noted in the beginning of his reign.

Then first comes to our hands a turbulent tragedy, and a fierce contention which had long before troubled the church, and now was renewed afresh in this present year 1509, between two orders of begging-friars, to wit, the Dominican and the Franciscan friars, about the conception of the Virgin Mary the mother of Christ.

The Franciscans held of St. Francis, and followed the rule of his testament, commonly called gray-friars or minorites. Their opinion was this, that the Virgin Mary, prevented by the grace of the Holy Ghost, was so sanctified, that she was never subject one moment in her conception to original sin. The Dominican friars holding of Dominick, were commonly called black-friars, or preaching-friars. Their opinion was this, that the Virgin Mary was conceived as all other children of Adam; so that this privilege only belongs to Christ, to be conceived without original sin: notwithstanding, the blessed Virgin was sanctified in her mother's womb, and purged from her original sin, as was also John the Baptist, Jeremiah, or any other privileged person. This frivolous question kindling and engendering between these two orders of friars, burst out into such a flame, that it occupied the heads and wits, schools and universities, almost through the whole church; some holding one part with Scotus, some the other part with Thomas Aquinas. The Minorites holding with Scotus their master, disputed and concluded, that she was conceived without all spot or stain of original sin; and thereupon caused the feast and service of the Conception of St. Mary the Virgin to be celebrated and solemnized in the church. On the other hand the Dominican friars taking part with Aquinas, preached, that it was heresy to affirm that the blessed Virgin was conceived without the guilt of original sin; and that they who celebrated the feast of her conception, or said any masses in honour of it, did sin grievously and mortally.

At the time when this fantasy waxed hot in the church, one side preaching against the other, Pope Sixtus the Fourth, A.D. 1476, who joining side with the Minorites or Franciscans, first sent forth his decree by authority apostolic, willing, ordaining, and commanding all men in holy church for evermore to solemnize this new-found feast of the Conception: offering to all men and women, who devoutly frequenting the church, would hear mass and service from the first evening of the feast, to the octaves of the same, as many days of pardon, as Pope Urban IV. and Pope Martin V. granted for hearing the service of Corpus Christi day. And this decree was given and dated at Rome, A.D. 1476.

Moreover, the pope, in order that the devotion of the people might be the more encouraged in the celebration of this feast of the conception, added a new clause to the Ave Maria, granting great indulgence and release of sins to all such as would invoke the blessed Virgin with the addition, saying thus: "Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee, blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus Christ; and blessed is Anna thy mother, of whom thy virgin's flesh hath proceeded without blot of original sin. Amen."

Wherein the reader may note for his learning three things: first, how the pope turns that improperly into a prayer, which was sent by God for a message or tidings. Secondly, how the pope adds to the words of the scripture, contrary to the express precept of the Lord. Thirdly, how the pope exempts Mary the blessed Virgin, not only from the seed of Abraham and Adam, but also from the condition of a mortal creature. For if there be in her no original sin, then she bears not the image of Adam, neither does she descend of that seed, of whose seed evil proceeds upon all men and women to condemnation, as St. Paul teaches, Rom. v. 14—16. Wherefore if she descend of that seed, then the infection of original evil must necessarily proceed to her. If she descend not thereof, then she comes not of the seed of Abraham, nor of the seed of David, &c. Again, seeing that death is the effect and wages of sin, by the doctrine of St. Paul, Rom. vi. 23. then she would not have had to suffer the curse and punishment of death, and so should never have died, if original sin had no place in her. But to return to our history: this constitution of the pope being set forth for the feast of the Conception of the blessed Virgin, A. D. 1476, it was not long after that Pope Sixtus, perceiving that the Dominican friars with their accomplices would not conform thereto, directed forth, by the authority apostolical, a bull in effect as follows:

"Whereas, the holy church of Rome hath ordained a special and proper service for the public solemnization of the feast of the Conception of the blessed Virgin Mary; certain orders of the Black Friars in their public sermons to the people in divers places, have not ceased hitherto to preach, and yet daily do, that all they who hold or affirm the glorious Virgin to have been conceived without original sin, be heretics; and they who celebrate the service of her conception, or do hear the sermons of them who so affirm, do sin grievously: also not contented herewith, do write and set forth books, maintaining their assertions to the great offence and ruin of godly minds. We, therefore, to prevent and withstand such presumptuous and perverse assertions which have risen, and more hereafter may arise, by such opinions and preachings, in the minds of the faithful; by the authority apostolical, do condemn and reprove the same; and by the motion, knowledge, and authority aforesaid, decree and ordain, That the preachers of God's word, and all other persons, of what state, degree, order, or condition soever they be, who shall presume to dare affirm or preach to the people these opinions and assertions to be true, or shall read, hold, or maintain any such books for true, having before intelligence hereof, shall incur thereby the sentence of excommunication, from which they shall not be absolved otherwise than by the bishop of Rome, except only in the time of death."

This bull, being dated A. D. 1483, gave no little heart and encouragement to the Gray-Friars Franciscans, who defended the immaculate conception of the holy Virgin against the Black Dominican Friars, holding the contrary side. By the authority of this bull, the Gray Order had got such a conquest over the Black Order of the Dominicans, that the Dominicans were compelled at length, for a perpetual memorial of the triumph, both to give to the glorious Virgin every night an anthem in praise of her conception, and also to subscribe to their doctrine; in which doctrine these, with other points, are contained.

1. That the blessed Virgin Mary suffered the griefs and adversities in this life, not for any necessity inflicted for punishment of original sin, but only because she would conform herself to the imitation of Christ.

2. That the Virgin, as she was not obliged to any punishment due for sin, as neither was Christ her son; so she had no need of remission of sins, but instead thereof had the divine preservation of God's help, keeping her from all sin, which was the only good she needed, and she had it.

3. That though the body of the Virgin Mary was subject to death, and died; this is to be understood to come not for any penalty due for sin, but either for imitation of and conformity to Christ, or else for the natural constitution of her body, being elemental, as were the bodies of our first parents: who, if they had not tasted of the forbidden fruit, would have been preserved from death, not by nature, but by grace, and the strength of other fruits and meats in paradise: which meats, because Mary had not, but did eat our common meats, therefore she died, and not for any necessity of original sin.

4. The universal proposition of St. Paul, who saith, "That the scripture hath concluded all men under sin," is to be understood thus, as speaking of all them who are not exempted by the special privilege of God, as is the blessed Virgin Mary.

5. If justification be taken for reconciliation of him that was unrighteous before, and now is made righteous: then the blessed Virgin is to be taken, not as justified by Christ, but just from her beginning by preservation.

6. If a Saviour be taken for him which saves men fallen into perdition and condemnation; then Christ is not the Saviour of Mary, but is her Saviour only in this respect, as saving her from not falling into condemnation, &c.

7. Neither did the Virgin Mary give thanks to God, nor ought to do so, for expiation of her sins, but for her preservation from sinning.

8. Neither did she pray to God at any time for remission of her sins, but only for the remission of other men's sins she prayed many times, and counted their sins for hers.

9. If the blessed Virgin had died before the passion of her Son, God would have reposed her soul not in the place among the patriarchs, or among the just, but in the same most pleasant place of paradise where Adam and Eve were before they transgressed.

These were the doting dreams and fantasies of the Franciscans, and of other papists, then commonly held in the schools, written in their books, preached in their sermons, taught in their churches, and set forth in pictures. So that the people was taught nothing else almost in the pulpits all this while, but how the Virgin Mary was conceived immaculate and holy, without original sin, and how they ought to call to her for help, addressing her with special titles as "The way of mercy, —The mother of grace, —The lover of piety, —The comforter of mankind, —The continual intercessor for the salvation of the faithful, and an advocate to the King her Son, who never ceases," &c. And although the greatest number of the school-doctors were of the contrary faction, as Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, Bernard, Bonaventure, and others: yet these new papists shifted off their objections with frivolous distinctions and blind evasions.

The Dominican Friars, for their part, were not all silent, having great authorities, and also the scripture on their side. But yet the others having the apostolical see with them, had the better hand, and got the victory triumphantly, to the high exaltation of their order. For Pope Sixtus, by the authority apostolic, after he had decreed the conception-day of the Virgin to be sanctified perpetually, and also with his terrible bull had condemned for heretics all who withstood the same; the Dominican friars were driven to two inconveniences: the one was, to keep silence; the other was, to give place to their adversaries the Franciscans. Although, where the mouth durst not speak, yet the heart would work; and though their tongues were tied, yet their good-will was ready by all means possible to maintain their quarrel and their estimation.

It happened in this year, 1509, after this dissension between the Dominican and the Franciscan Friars, that certain of the Dominicans, thinking, by subtle sleight, to work in the people's heads that which they durst not attempt by open preaching, devised a certain image of the Virgin made so artificially, that the friars by private springs made it move, make gestures, lament, complain, weep, groan, and give answers to those that asked it; so that the people were brought into a marvellous persuasion, till at length the fraud being detected, the friars were taken, condemned, and burnt at Berne in the year above-mentioned, 1509.

In the history of John Stumius, this story partly appears: but in the registers and records of the city of Berne, the order and circumstance is more fully expressed and set forth; and is thus declared.

In the city of Berne there were certain Dominican friars, to the number chiefly of four principal actors and chiefs of that order, who had inveigled a certain simple poor friar, who had newly planted himself in the cloister: when the friars had so infatuated him with sundry superstitions, and feigned apparitions of St. Mary, St. Barbara, and St. Katherine, and imprinted, moreover, in him the wounds of St. Francis, he believed fully, that the Virgin Mary had appeared to him, and had offered him a red host consecrated with the blood also of Christ miraculously, that the blessed Virgin also had sent him to the senators of Berne, with instructions, declaring to them from the mouth of the virgin, "That she was conceived in sin; and that the Franciscan Friars were not to be credited nor suffered in the city, who were not yet reformed from that erroneous opinion of her conception." He added, moreover, "That they should resort to a certain image there of the Virgin Mary, (which image the friars by engines had made to weep) and should do their worship, and make their oblations to the same."

This feigned device was no sooner forged by the friars, but it was believed by the people; so that a great while the red-coloured host was undoubtedly taken for the true body and blood of Christ, and certain coloured drops of it sent abroad to noble personages and states for a great relic, and that too not without considerable cost in return. Thus the deceived people came flocking in great numbers to the image, and to the red host, and coloured blood, with many gifts and oblations. In short, the Dominican friars so had managed the matter, and had so swept all offerings to their own order from the order of the Franciscans, that all the alms came to their box. The Franciscans seeing their reputation decaying, and their kitchen waxing cold, and their coffers becoming empty, not able to abide that misery, and being not ignorant or unacquainted with such counterfeited doings, (for, as the proverb saith, "It is all halting before a cripple,") soon discovered the crafty juggling, and detected the fraudulent miracles of the Dominicans. Whereupon the four chief leaders above-named were apprehended and burned, of whom the provincial of the order was one.

And thus much touching the beginning and end of this tumultuous and popish tragedy, wherein it may evidently appear to the reader, how these turbulent friars could not agree among themselves, and in what frivolous trifles they wrangled together. But to let these ridiculous friars pass with their trifling phantasies, which deserve to be derided by all wise men: this is, in the mean time, to be lamented, to behold the miserable times of the church, in which the devil kept the minds of Christ's people so attentive and occupied in such friarly toys, that scarcely any thing was taught or heard in the church, but the commendation and exaltation of the Virgin Mary: but of our justification by faith, of grace, and of the promises of God in Christ, of the strength of the law, of the horror of sin, of the difference between the law and the gospel, of the true liberty of conscience, &c. little mention was made. Wherefore, in so blind a time of darkness it was very needful and requisite, that the Lord of his mercy should look upon his church, and send down his gracious reformation, which he did. For shortly after, through God's gracious raising him up, came Martin Luther, of whom the order of history now requires that we should treat, and we will do so (Christ willing) after the history of Richard Hunne, and a few other things premised, for the better opening of the history to follow.

Mention was made before of the doings of Pope Julius II., and of his warlike affairs, for which he was condemned, and not unjustly, in the council of Tours in France, (A. D. 1510,) and yet all this could not assuage the furious spirit of this pope, but the same year he invaded the city of Mutina and Mirandula, in Italy, and took them by force of war. Pope Julius, not long after, in the year 1512, refusing the peace offered by Maximilian the emperor, was encountered by Lewis the French king about Ravenna, upon Easter-day, where he was vanquished, and had of his army slain to the number of sixteen thousand. And the year following, (A. D. 1513,) this apostolic warrior, who had resigned his keys to the river Tiber before, made an end together both of his fighting and living, after he had reigned and fought ten years. After him succeeded next in the see of Rome, Pope Leo X.; about this time great changes began to work, as well in the temporal states, as in the state of the church. At which time the following potentates were reigning in their several kingdoms:—

	Began to reign.	Reigned.
Pope Leo X. in Rome, —	A. D. 1513,	9 years.
Charles V., emperor of Germany, A. D. 1519,	39	—
Francis I., king of France, —	A. D. 1515,	32
Henry VIII., king of England, A. D. 1509,	38	—
James V., king of Scotland, —	A. D. 1513,	29

In the time of the above mentioned potentates, great alterations, troubles, and changes of religion were wrought in the church, by the mighty operation of God's hand, in Italy, France, Germany, England, and all Europe; such as have not been seen (although much groaned for) many hundred years before: as in the course of this history shall more manifestly appear.

But before we come to these alterations, taking the time as it lies before us, we will first speak of Richard Hunne, and certain other godly-minded persons here in England, who were afflicted for the word of Christ's gospel in great multitudes, as they be found and taken out of the registers of Fitzjames, bishop of London.

The History of some good Men and Women, who were persecuted for Religion in the City and Diocese of the Bishop of London; briefly extracted out of the Registers of Richard Fitzjames.

Beside the great number of the faithful martyrs and professors of Christ, that constantly, in the strength of the Holy Ghost, gave their lives for the testimony of his truth, I find recorded in the register of London, between the years 1509 and 1517, the names of many persons, both men and women, who, in the faleness of that dark and misty time of ignorance had also some portion of God's good Spirit, which induced them to the knowledge of his truth and gospel, and were troubled, persecuted, and imprisoned for the same: notwithstanding, by the proud, cruel, and bloody rage of the Romish see, and through the weakness and frailty of their own nature, (not then fully strengthened in God) they were for the time suppressed and kept under, as appears by their several abjurations made before Richard Fitzjames, then bishop of London, who was a most cruel persecutor of Christ's church, or else before his vicar-general deputed for that purpose. And, as many of the adversaries of God's truth have of late days disdainfully and braggingly cried out, and demanded in their public assemblies, asking, "Where was this your church and religion fifty or sixty years ago?" I have thought it not altogether vain, somewhat to stop such questioners, both by mentioning the names of those who suffered for the truth of this religion, and likewise opening some of the chief and principal matters for which they were so unmercifully afflicted: thereby to make known the continuance and consent of the true church of Christ in that age, touching the chief points of our faith, and also to shew what fond and frivolous matters the ignorant prelates in that time of blindness, were not ashamed to object against the poor and simple people, accounting them as heinous and great offences, yea, such as deserved death both of body and soul.

They were forty in number who were persecuted in the time between the years 1510 and 1527; and here follows the particular examination of them all.

There were several particular articles (besides the common and general sort used in such cases) privately objected, such as they were accused of either by their curate, or their neighbours. And as I think it superfluous to make any large recital of all and every part of their several processes, I purpose therefore only to touch briefly on so many of the articles as may be sufficient to induce the christian reader to judge the sooner of the rest.

The chief objection against Joan Baker was, that she would not only herself not reverence the crucifix, but had also persuaded a friend of hers lying at the point of death, not to put any trust or confidence in the crucifix, but in God who is in heaven, and not in the dead images, which are but stocks and stones, and therefore she was sorry that ever she had gone so often on pilgrimage to St. Saviour and other idols. Also, that she held that the pope had no power to give pardons, and that the Lady Young (who was not long before that time burned) died a true martyr of God, and therefore she wished of God that she herself might do no worse than the Lady Young had done.

Against William Pottier, besides other false and slanderous articles (as that he denied the benefit and effect of Christ's passion) it was alleged, that he affirmed there were six Gods: the first three were the holy Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; the fourth was a priest's concubine being kept in his chamber; the fifth was the devil; and the sixth, that thing that a man sets his mind most upon.

The first part of this article he utterly denied, confessing most firmly and truly, the blessed Trinity to be only one God in one unity of deity. As to the other three he answered, that a priest delighting in his concubine made her as his god; likewise a wicked person, persisting in his sin without repentance, made the devil his god; and lastly, he granted, that he once heard of certain men, who by the singing and chattering of birds superstitiously sought to know what things were to happen either to themselves or others, said, that those men esteemed their birds as gods.

Among the articles objected against Thomas Goodred, Thomas Walker, Thomas Forge, Alice Forge, John Forge, John Calverton, John Woodrofe, Richard Woolman, and Roger Hilliar, (as that they spoke against pilgrimages, praying to saints, and such like) this was principally charged against them, that they all denied the carnal and corporal presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar; and further, had concealed and consented to their teachers and instructors in that doctrine, and had not, according to the laws of the church, accused and presented them to the bishop or his ordinary. Also great and heinous displeasure was conceived against Richard Woolman, because he called the church of St. Paul a house of thieves, affirming, that the priests and other ecclesiastical persons there were not liberal givers to the poor (as they ought) but rather were takers away from them what they could get.

Likewise as Thomas Austy, Joan Austy, Thomas Grant, John Garter, Christopher Ravins, Dyonise Ravins, Thomas Vincent, Lewis John, Joan John, and John Web, were of one fellowship and profession of faith with those before recited, so they were almost all apprehended about one time, and chiefly charged with one opinion of the sacrament. Which declares evidently, that notwithstanding the dark ignorance of those corrupted times, yet God did ever in mercy open the eyes of some to behold the manifest truth, even in those things of which the papists now make the greatest vaunt, and boast of long continuance. Many of them were charged with having spoken against pilgrimages, and having read and used certain English books opposing the faith of the Romish church, as the four Gospels, Wickliff's Wicket, a Book of the Ten Commandments of Almighty God, the Revelation of St. John, the Epistles of St. Paul and St. James, with others, which those Romish divines could never abide; and good cause why, for as darkness could never agree with light, no more can ignorance, the maintainer of that kingdom, with the true knowledge of Christ and his gospel.

It was further objected against Joan John, the wife of Lewis John, that she learned and maintained, that God commanded no holy-days to be kept, but only the sabbath-day, and therefore she would keep none but it; nor any fasting-days, affirming, that to abstain from sin was the true fast. That she had despised the pope, his pardons and pilgrimages, so that when any poor body asked an alms of her in the name and for the sake of the lady of Walsingham, (i. e. the image of the Virgin Mary at Walsingham,) she would answer in contempt of the pilgrimage, "The lady of Walsingham help thee!" and if she gave anything to him, she would then say, "Take this in the name of our lady in heaven, and let the other go." Which shews, that for lack of better instruction and knowledge, she yet ignorantly attributed too much honour to the true saints of God departed, though otherwise she abhorred the idolatrous worshipping of the dead images. By which example, as also by many others, I have just occasion to condemn the wilful subtlety of those, that in this bright shining light of God's truth, would yet, under colour of godly remembrance, still maintain the having of images in the church, craftily excusing their idolatrous kneeling and praying to them, by affirming, that they never worshipped the dead images, but the things that the images represented. But if that were their only doctrine and cause of having those images, why then would their predecessors so cruelly compel these poor simple people thus openly in their recantations to abjure and revoke their speaking against the gross adoration of the outward images only, and not against the thing represented, which many of them (as appears partly by this example) in their ignorant simplicity confessed might be worshipped? However, God be thanked, their hypocritical excuses cannot now have such place in the hearts of the elect of God as they have done heretofore, especially seeing the word of God so manifestly forbids as well the worshipping of them, as the making or having them for purposes of religion.

It was alleged against William Cowper, and Alice Cowper his wife, that they had spoken against pilgrimages, and worshipping of images; but chiefly the woman, who having her child hurt by falling into a pit or ditch, and earnestly persuaded by some of her ignorant neighbours to go on pilgrimage to St. Lawrence for help to her child, said, that neither St. Lawrence, nor any other saint could help her child, and therefore none ought to go on pilgrimage to any image made with man's hands, but only to Almighty God; for pilgrimages were worth nothing worth, except to make the priests rich.

To John Houshold, Robert Rascal, and Elizabeth Stamford, the article against the sacrament of the altar was objected, as also that they had spoken against praying to saints, and had despised the authority of the bishop of Rome, and of his clergy; but especially John Houshold was charged with having called them antichrists, and the pope himself "the great whore," who with his pardons had drowned in blindness all christian realms for money.

Also among other articles against George Browne, these were counted very heinous and heretical. First, that he had said, that he knew no cause why the cross should be worshipped, seeing that the same was the cause of pain to our Saviour Christ in the time of his passion, and not any ease or pleasure to him; alleging for example, that if he had had a friend hanged or drowned he would never after have loved that gallows or water by which his friend died. Another objection was, that he had erroneously, obstinately, and maliciously said (for so are their words), that the church was too rich. This matter, I may tell you, touched somewhat the quick, and therefore no marvel that they counted it erroneous and malicious; for take away their gain, and farewell to their religion. They also charged him with having refused holy water to be cast about his chamber, and likewise with having spoken against priests.

The greatest matter with which they charged John Wikes, was, that he had often and for a long time kept company with persons suspected of heresy, and had received them into his house, and there did hear them read erroneous and heretical books, contrary to the faith of the Romish church; and did also himself consent to their doctrine, and had many times secretly conveyed them away from such as were appointed to apprehend them.

John Southake, Richard Butler, John Sam, William King, Robert Durdant, and Henry Woolman, were charged with speaking words against the literal and carnal presence of Christ's body in the sacrament of the altar, and also against images, and the rest of the seven sacraments. They charged them with the reading of certain English heretical books, naming most blasphemously the gospel of Jesus Christ, by the four evangelists, to be of that number, as appears evidently by the eighth article objected by Thomas Bennet, doctor of law, chancellor and vicar-general to Richard Fitzjames, then bishop of London, against Richard Butler, the very words of which article, for a more declaration of truth, I have thought good here to insert, which are these:—"Also we object to you, that divers times, and especially upon a certain night, about the space of three years last past, in Robert Durdant's house of Iwer Court, near unto Staines, you erroneously and damnably read in a great book of heresy of the said Robert Durdant's, all that same night, certain chapters of the gospels in English, containing in them divers erroneous and damnable opinions and conclusions of heresy, in the presence of the said Robert Durdant, John Butler, Robert Carder, Jenkin Butler, William King, and divers other suspected persons of heresy, then being present, and hearing your said erroneous lectures and opinions." To the same effect and purpose tended some of the articles propounded against the other four; whereby we may easily judge what reverence they, who yet desire to be counted the true and only church of Christ, bow to the word and gospel of Christ, when they are not ashamed to blaspheme it with most horrible titles of erroneous and damnable opinions and conclusions of heresy. But why should we marvel at this, when the Holy Ghost in several places of the scripture declares, that in the latter days there should come such proud and cursed talkers, who shall speak lies through hypocrisy, and have their consciences seared with an hot iron? Let us, therefore, now thank our heavenly Father for revealing them to us; and let us also pray him, that of his free mercy in his Son Christ Jesus, he would, if it be to his glory, either turn and soften all their hearts, or else, for the peace and quietness of his church he would in his righteous judgment take them from us.

About this time Richard Fitzjames ended his life, after whose death Cuthbert Tonstall (afterwards bishop of Durham), succeeded in the see and bishopric of London, who soon upon his first entry into the room, minding to follow rightly the footsteps of his predecessor, caused Edmund Spilman, priest, Henry Chambers, John Higgins, and Thomas Eglestone to be apprehended, and so to be examined upon articles; and in the end, either for fear of his cruelty, and the rigour of death, or else through hope of his flattering promises (such was their weakness), he compelled them to abjure and renounce their true professed faith touching the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood, which was, that Christ's corporal body was not in the sacrament, but in heaven; and that the sacrament was a figure of his body, and not the body itself.

Moreover, about the same time there were certain articles objected against John Higges, alias Noke, alias Johnson, by the bishop's vicar-general, among which were these:—First, that he had affirmed, that it was as lawful for a temporal man to have two wives at once, as for a priest to have two benefices. Also, that he had in his custody a book of the four evangelists in English, and often read therein; and that he favoured the doctrines and opinions of Martin Luther, openly pronouncing, that Luther had more learning in his little finger than all the doctors in England in their whole bodies; and that all the priests in the church were blind, and had led the people the wrong way. Likewise it was alleged against him, that he had denied purgatory, and had said, that while he was alive he would do as much for himself as he could, for after his death he thought that prayers and almsdeeds could little help him.

With these and such like matters these poor and simple men and women were chiefly charged, and were excommunicated and imprisoned as heinous heretics, and at last compelled to recant; and some of them in utter shame and reproach, besides the ordinary bearing of fagots before the cross in procession, or else at a sermon, were enjoined for a penance (as they termed it) to appear once every year before their ordinary, as also to wear the sign of a fagot painted upon their sleeves, or other part of their outward garment, during all their lives, or so often and long as it pleased their ordinary to appoint. By which long, rigorous, and open punishing of them, they meant utterly to terrify and keep back all others from the true knowledge of Jesus Christ and his gospel. But the Lord be evermore praised, what little effect their wicked purposes had, these our most light-some days of God's glorious gospel most joyfully declare.

Besides these, others more simple and ignorant were also troubled, who having but a very small taste of the truth, did yet at first gladly consent to the same; but being apprehended, they quickly again yielded, and therefore had only assigned them for their penance, the bearing of a little candle before the cross, without any further open abjuring or recanting. Among whom I find two especially; the one a woman, called Ellen Heyer, to whom it was objected, that she had neither confessed herself to the priest, nor yet received the sacrament of the altar for the space of four years, and had every year eaten flesh at Easter.

The other was a man named Robert Berkeway, who (besides most wicked blasphemies against God, which he utterly denied) was charged to have spoken heinous words against the pope's holy and blessed martyr, Thomas Becket, calling him thief, for that he wrought by craft and imaginations.

Thus have I, as briefly as I could, summarily collected the principal articles objected against these weak and infirm earthly vessels; not meaning hereby either to excuse or condemn them in these their fearful falls and dangerous defections, but leaving them to the immeasurable rich mercies of the Lord, I wish only to make manifest the insatiable bloody cruelty of the pope's kingdom against the gospel and true church of Christ, for nothing would mitigate their envious rage, which they showed even against the very simple idiots, and that sometimes in most frivolous and irreligious cases. But now leaving them, I will (by God's grace) go forward with other more serious matters.

The Death and Martyrdom of William Sweeting and John Brewster.

In searching and perusing the register, for the collection of the names and articles before recited, I find that within the compass of the same years there were also some others, who after they had once shewed themselves as frail and inconstant as the rest, (being either pricked in conscience, or otherwise overcome with the manifest truth of God's most sacred word) became yet again as earnest professors of Christ as they were before, and for the same profession were the second time apprehended, examined, condemned, and in the end were most cruelly burned. Of which number were William Sweeting and John Brewster, who were both burned together in Smithfield the eighteenth day of October, A.D. 1511. The chief case alleged against them in their articles, was their faith concerning the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, which because it differed from the absurd and gross opinion of the new schoolmen, was counted as the most heinous heresy. There were other things besides objected against them, as the reading of certain forbidden books, and accompanying with such persons as were suspected of heresy. But one great and heinous offence counted amongst the rest, was their putting and leaving off the painted fagots, which they were at their first abjuring enjoined to wear as badges during their lives, or so long as it should please their ordinary to appoint, and not to leave them off upon pain of relapse, until they were dispensed with for the same. The breach of this injunction was esteemed to be of no small weight, and yet, the matter well and thoroughly considered, it seems by their confessions, that they were by necessity forced to it. For Sweeting being, for fear of the bishop's cruelty constrained to wander about the country to get his living, came at length to Colchester, where he was appointed by the parson of the parish of Magdalen to be the holy water clerk, and in that consideration had that infamous badge taken away from him. Brewster left off his at the command of the controller of the Earl of Oxford's house, who hiring the poor man to labour in the earl's household business, would not suffer him to wear that badge any longer. So that necessity of living compelled both of them to break that injunction: and therefore if charity had borne as great sway in the hearts of the pope's clergy as did cruelty, this trifle would not have been so heinously taken as to be brought against them for an article and a cause of condemnation to death. But where tyranny once takes place, all godly love, and all human reason and duties are quite forgotten. But to be brief, for these causes, as also because they had already once abjured, and yet as they termed it fallen again into relapse, they were both together burned in Smithfield; although, as the register records, they again, before their death fearfully forsook their revived constancy, and submitting themselves to the discipline of the Romish church, craved absolution. However, as many of the registers' notes and records in such cases may well be doubted, I refer the knowledge thereof to the Lord, who is the trier of all truths. Not forgetting, however, if the report be true, to charge that priesthood and their wicked laws, with a more shameless tyranny and uncharitable cruelty than before; for if they cease, their bloody malice towards such as so willingly submit themselves to their mercies; what favour may the faithful and constant professors of Christ look for at their hands? I might here also ask of them, how they follow the pitiful and loving admonition, or rather precept, of our Saviour Christ (whose true and only church they so stoutly boast to be), who says, "If thy brother trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent, thou shalt forgive him." (Luke xvii. 4.)

John Browne, father to Richard Browne, which Richard was in prison in Canterbury, and would have been burned, with two more, the day after the death of Queen Mary, but by the proclaiming of Queen Elizabeth they escaped.

The occasion of the first trouble of this John Browne, was by a priest sitting in a Gravesend barge. John Browne, being at the same time in the barge, came and sat hard by him; after some communication, the priest asked him, "Dost thou know," said he, "who I am? thou sittest too near me, thou sittest on my clothes?" "No, Sir," said he, "I know not what you are." "I tell thee I am a priest." "What, sir, are you a parson, or vicar, or a lady's chaplain?" "No," quoth he again, "I am a soul-priest, I sing for a soul," saith he. "Do you so, sir," quoth the other, "that is well done; I pray you sir," quoth he, "where find you the soul when you go to mass?" "I cannot tell thee," said the priest. "I pray you, where do you leave it, Sir, when the mass is done?" "I cannot tell thee," said the priest. "Neither can you tell where you find it when you go to mass nor where you leave it when the mass is done, how can you then save the soul?" said he. "Go thy ways," said he, "thou art an heretic, and I will be even with thee." So at the landing, the priest taking with him Walter More, and William More, rode straightways to the Archbishop Warham, whereupon John Browne, within three days after, his wife being churched the same day, and he bringing in a mess of pottage to the table to his guests, was sent for, and his feet bound under his own horse, and so brought to Canterbury, neither his wife nor he, nor any of his, knowing where he was taken; and there continuing from Low-sunday till the Friday before Whitsunday, his wife not knowing all this while where he was. He was set in the stocks overnight, and on the morrow went to death, and was burned at Ashford, A.D. 1517. The same night, as he was in the stocks at Ashford, where he and his wife dwelt, his wife then hearing of him, came and sat by him all the night before he was burned: to whom he declaring the whole story of how he was handled, shewed and told, how that he could not set his feet to the ground, for they were burnt to the bones, and told her how, by the two bishops Warham and Fisher, his feet were heated upon the hot coals, and burned to the bones "to make me," said he, "to deny my Lord, which I will never do; for if I should deny my Lord in this world, he should hereafter deny me. I pray thee, therefore, good Elizabeth, continue as thou hast begun, and bring up thy children virtuously in the fear of God." And so the next day, on Whitsunday even, this godly martyr was burned. Standing at the stake, this prayer he made, holding up his hands:

"O Lord, I yield me to thy grace,
Grant me mercy for my trespass;
Let never the fiend my soul chace.
Lord, I will bow, and thou shalt beat,
Let never my soul come in hell beat.

"Into thy hands I commend my spirit; thou hast redeemed me, O Lord of truth."
And so he ended.

The History of Richard Hunne.

There was in the year 1514, one Richard Hunne, merchant-taylor, and freeman in the city of London, who was esteemed during his life, and taken not only for a man of true dealing and good substance, but also for a good catholic man. This Richard Hunne had a child at nurse in Middlesex, which died. Thomas Dryfield, the priest of the parish, sued Richard Hunne in the spiritual court for a bearing-sheet, for a mortuary for the son of Richard Hunne, who died at the age of five weeks. Hunne answered, "That as the child had no property in the sheet, he therefore would not pay it, nor ought the other to have it. The priest, moved with a covetous desire, and loth to lose his pretended right, cited him to appear in the spiritual court. Richard Hunne being troubled in the spiritual court, was forced to seek counsel of the learned in the law, and pursued a writ of procurator against Thomas Dryfield, which when the rest of the priestly order heard of, indignant that any layman should attempt such a matter against any of them, and fearing that if they should now suffer this priest to be condemned, there would be ever after a liberty to all of the laity to do the like with the rest of the clergy in such cases; they straightways, both to stop this matter, and also to be revenged of him, sought all the means they possibly could to intrap and bring him within the danger of their own cruel laws. And so making secret and diligent inquisition, and seeking all they could against him, at length they found means to accuse him of heresy to Richard Fitzjames, then bishop of London, who (desirous to satisfy the revenging and bloody affection of his chaplains) caused him to be apprehended and committed to prison in the Lollards' Tower at Paul's, so that none of his friends might be suffered to come to him. This Richard Hunne being clapt in the Lollards' Tower shortly after, at the earnest instigation of Dr. Horsey, the bishop's chancellor (a man more ready to prefer the clergy's cruel tyranny, than the truth of Christ's gospel) was brought before the bishop, at his manor of Fulham, the 2d day of December, where in his chapel he examined him upon these articles, collected against him by Horsey and his accomplices:—

1. That he had read, taught, preached, published, and obstinately defended, against the laws of Almighty God, that tithes, or paying tithes, was never ordained to be due, saving only by the covetousness of priests.

2. That he had read, taught, preached, published, and obstinately defended, that bishops and priests are the scribes and pharisees that crucified Christ and condemned him to death.

3. That he had read, taught, preached, &c., that bishops and priests are teachers and preachers, but no doers nor fulfillers of the law of God; but catching, ravening and taking all things, and ministering and giving nothing.

4. Where and when one Joan Baker was detected and abjured of many great heresies, as appears by her abjuration, the said Richard Hunne said, published, taught, preached, and obstinately took upon him to say, that he would defend her and her opinions, if it cost him five hundred marks.

5. Afterwards, when Joan Baker, after her abjuration, was enjoined open penance, according to her demerits, the said Richard Hunne said, published, taught, and obstinately defended her, saying, the bishop of London and his officers have done open wrong to Joan Baker in punishing her for heresy; for her sayings and opinions are according to the laws of God: wherefore the bishop and his officers are more worthy to be punished for heresy than she.

6. That the said Richard Hunne has in his keeping divers English Books, prohibited and condemned by the law; as the apocalypse in English, epistles and gospels in English, Wickliff's damnable works, and other books containing infinite errors, in which he has been for a long time accustomed to read, teach, and study daily.

Particular answer to these several objections in the register I find none, saving that under them there is written in his name, with a different hand, these words: "As to these articles, I have not spoken them as they are here laid; however I have unadvisedly spoken words somewhat sounding to the same effect, for which I am sorry, and ask God's mercy, and submit me to my Lord's charitable and favourable correction." Which they affirm to be written with Hunne's own hand: but how likely to truth that is, let the discreet wisdom of the reader judge by the whole sequel of this process. And further, if it were his own act, what occasion then had they so cruelly to murder him as they did, seeing he had already so willingly confessed his fault, and submitted himself to the charitable and favourable correction of the bishop?

This examination being ended, the bishop sent him back again the same day unto the Lollards' Tower; and then, by the appointment of Dr. Horsey his chancellor, he was committed from the custody of Charles Joseph the somner, to John Spalding the bell-ringer, a man by whose simpleness the subtle chancellor thought to bring his devilish homicide the easier to pass; which he most cruelly did, by his suborned ministers, within two nights after, as is proved, by the inquiry, and final verdict of the coroner of London and his inquest. But when this usual practice of the papists was once accomplished, there were wanted no secret shifts nor worldly-wiles for the crafty colouring of this mischief: and therefore the next morning after they had, in the night, committed this murder, Spalding got himself out of the way into the city, and leaving the keys of the prison with one of his fellows, desired him to deliver them to the somner's boy who used to carry to Hunne his meat and other necessities; thinking that the boy, first finding the prisoner dead, and hanged as they left him, they might by his relation be thought free from having any hand in this matter. Which happened in the beginning almost as they wished. For the boy the same morning, accompanied with two of the bishop's somners, went about ten o'clock into the prison, to serve the prisoner as he was wont to do; and when they came up, they found him hanged with his face towards the wall. They, astonished at this sight, immediately told the chancellor, who was then in the church, and watching, I suppose, for such news; he forthwith got certain of his colleagues, and went with them into the prison, to see that which his own wicked conscience knew full well before, as was afterwards plainly proved, although he then made a fair face to the contrary, blazing abroad among the people by their officers and servants, that Hunne had hanged himself. However the people having good experience of the honest life and godly conversation of the man, and also of the devilish malice of his adversaries the priests, judged rather, that he was secretly murdered by their procurement. On this there arose great contention; for the bishop of London on one side, taking his clergy's part, affirmed stoutly that Hunne had hanged himself: the citizens again on the other side, suspecting some secret murder, caused the coroner of London, according to law, to choose an inquest, and to take view of the dead body, and so to try the truth of the matter. As the bishop and his chaplains were then driven to extremity of shifts: and therefore wishing by some subtle show of justice to stop the mouths of the people, they determined, that while the inquest was occupied about their charge, the bishop should for his part proceed ex officio, in case of heresy against the dead person; supposing, that if the party were once condemned of heresy, the inquest durst not then but find him guilty of his own death, and so clearly acquit them from all suspicion of murder. This determination of theirs they immediately put in practice, in order as follows:

Besides the articles before mentioned, which they affirm were objected against him in his life-time, Dr. Horsey, the bishop of London's vicar general, now after his death collected others out of the prologue of his English Bible, which he diligently perused, not to learn any good thing, but to get thereout such matter as he thought might best serve their cursed purpose, as appears by the tenor of the articles, which are these:

1. The book condemns all holy canons, calling them ceremonies and statutes of sinful men, and calls the pope, Satan and antichrist.

2. It condemns the pope's pardons, saying they are but impositions.

3. The said book of Hunne saith, that kings and lords called christian in name, and heathen in conditions, defile the sanctuary of God, bringing clerks full of covetousness, heresy and malice, to stop God's law, that it cannot be known, kept, and freely preached.

4. The book saith, that lords and prelates pursue fully and cruelly them that would teach truly and freely the law of God, and cherish them that preach sinful men's traditions and statutes, by which he means the holy canons of Christ's church.

5. That poor and simple men have the truth of the holy scriptures, more than a thousand prelates, and religious men, and clerks of the school.

6. That christian kings and lords set idols in God's house, and excite the people to idolatry.

7. That princes, lords, and prelates so doing, are worse than Herod that pursued Christ, and worse than the Jews and heathen men that crucified Christ.

8. That every man, swearing by our lady, or any other saint or creature, gives more honour to the saints than to the Holy Trinity, and so they are idolaters.

9. He saith that saints ought not to be honoured.

10. He condemns adoration, prayer, kneeling, and offering to images, which he calls stocks and stones.

11. He saith, that the very body of the Lord is not contained in the sacrament of the altar, but that men receiving it shall thereby keep in mind that Christ's flesh was wounded and crucified for us.

12. He condemns the university of Oxford, with all degrees and faculties in it, as arts, civil and canon laws, and divinity; saying, that they hinder the true way to come to the knowledge of the laws of God and holy scripture.

13. He defends the translation of the Bible and holy scripture into the English tongue, which is prohibited by the laws of our holy mother church.

These articles thus collected, as also the others before specified, they caused, for a shew of their pretended justice and innocency, to be openly read the next Sunday, by the preacher at Paul's-Cross, and having now, as they thought, sufficient matter against him, they purposed to proceed to his condemnation.

Accordingly, the bishop of London, accompanied by the bishops of Durham and Lincoln, sat in judgment on Richard Hunne, the sixteenth day of December, taking as witnesses of their proceedings, six public notaries, his own register, and about twenty-five doctors, abbots, priors, and priests, with a great rabble of other common anointed catholics. Where after a solemn proclamation, that if there were any that would defend the opinions and books of Richard Hunne, they should presently appear and be heard according to law, he commanded all the articles and objections against Hunne openly to be read before the assembly: and then perceiving that none durst appear in his defence, by the advice of his assistants, he pronounced the sentence definitive against the dead carcase, condemning it of heresy, and therewith committed the same to the secular power, to be by them burned accordingly. Which ridiculous decree was accomplished in Smithfield the twentieth day of December, sixteen days after they had barbarously murdered him, to the great grief and indignation of all the people.

Notwithstanding after all this tragical and cruel handling of the dead body, and their fair show of justice, yet the inquest never stayed their diligent searching out of the true cause and means of his death. So that when they had been several times called before the king's privy council, (his majesty himself being sometimes present) and also before the chief judges and justices of the realm, and that the matter being thoroughly examined and perceived to be much bolstered up by the clergy, was wholly committed to their determination, they found by good proof and sufficient evidence, that Doctor Horsey, the chancellor; Charles Joseph, the somner; and John Spalding, the bell-ringer, had privily and maliciously committed this murder, and therefore indicted them all three as wilful murderers. However, through the earnest suit of the bishop of London to Cardinal Wolsey, means were found that at the next sessions of gaol delivery, the king's attorney pronounced the indictment against Doctor Horsey to be false and untrue, and him not guilty of the murder, who, having yet a guilty conscience, durst never after for shame come again to London. But now that the truth of all this may seem more manifest and plain to all men's eyes, here shall follow word by word, the whole enquiry and verdict of the inquest, exhibited by them to the coroner of London, and so given up and signed with his own hand.

The Minutes of the Inquest.

The fifth and the sixth day of December, in the sixth year of the reign of our sovereign lord King Henry VIII. William Barnwell, coroner of London, the day and year above said, within the ward of Castle Baynard of London, assembled an inquest, whose names afterwards appear, and hath sworn them truly to enquire concerning the death of one Richard Hunne, who lately was found dead in the Lollards' Tower within St. Paul's church of London: whereupon all we of the inquest together went up into the said tower, where we found the body of the said Hunne hanging upon a staple of iron, in a girdle of silk, with a fair countenance, his head fair combed, and his bonnet sitting right upon his head, with his eyes and mouth fair closed, without any staring, gaping, or frowning, also without any drivelling in any place of his body; whereupon by our assent we all agreed to take down the body of the said Hunne, and as soon as we began to heave the body it was loose, whereby we perceived that the girdle had no knot about the staple, but it was double cast, and the links of an iron chain, which did hang on the staple, were laid upon the girdle whereby he did hang: also the knot of the girdle that went about his neck, stood under his left ear, which caused his head to lean towards his right shoulder. Notwithstanding there came out of his nostrils two small streams of blood to the quantity of four drops, save only these four drops of blood, the face, lips, chin, doublet, collar, and shirt of the said Hunne was clean from any blood. Also we found that the skin both of his neck and throat, beneath the girdle of silk, was fretted away, with that thing which the murderers had broken his neck with. Also the hands of the said Hunne were marked in the wrists, whereby we perceived that his hands had been bound. Moreover, we found that within the said prison there was no means whereby a man might hang himself, but only a stool, which stool stood upon a bolster of a bed, so unsteady that any man or beast might not touch it so little, but it was ready to fall, whereby we perceived, that it was not possible that Hunne could have hanged himself, the stool so standing. Also all the girdle from the staple to his neck, as well as the part which went about his neck, was too little for his head to come out thereat. Also it was not possible that the soft silken girdle should break his neck or skin beneath the girdle. Also we found in a corner, somewhat beyond the place where he did hang, a great parcel of blood. Also we found upon the left side of Hunne's jacket, from the breast downward, two great streams of blood. Also within the flap of the left side of his jacket we found a great cluster of blood, and the jacket folded down thereupon, which thing the said Hunne could never fold nor do after he was hanged. Whereby it appeareth plainly to us all, that the neck of Hunne was broken, and the great plenty of blood was shed before he was hanged. Wherefore we all find, by God and our consciences, that Richard Hunne was murdered. Also we acquit the said Richard Hunne of his own death.

"Also there was an end of a wax candle, which, as John, the bell-ringer, saith he left in the prison burning with Hunne that same Sunday at night that Hunne was murdered, which wax candle we found sticking upon the stocks, fair put out, about seven or eight foot from the place where Hunne was hanged, which candle in our opinion was never put out by him, for many likelihoods which we have perceived. Also at the going up of Master Chancellor into the Lollards' Tower, we have good proof that there lay on the stocks a gown, either of murrey, or crimson in grain, furred with shanks, whose gown it was we never could prove, neither who carried it away. All we find, that Master William Horsey, chancellor to my lord of London, hath had at his commandment both the rule and guiding of the said prisoner. Moreover, we all find that the said Master Horsey, chancellor, hath put Charles Joseph out of his office, as the said Charles hath confessed, because he would not deal and use the said prisoner so cruelly, and do to him as the chancellor would have had him to do. Notwithstanding the deliverance of the keys to the chancellor by Charles on the Saturday at night before Hunne's death, and Charles riding out of the town on that Sunday in the morning ensuing, was but a convention made betwixt Charles and the chancellor to colour the murder. For the same Sunday that Charles rode forth, he came again to the town at night, and killed Richard Hunne, as in the depositions of Julian Little, Thomas Chicheley, Thomas Simonds, and Peter Turner, doth appear.

"After colouring of the murder betwixt Charles and the chancellor conspired, the chancellor called to him one John Spalding, the bell-ringer of St. Paul's, and delivered to the same bell-ringer the keys of the Lollards' Tower, giving to the said bell-ringer a great charge, saying, 'I charge thee to keep Hunne more straightly than he hath been kept, and let him have but one meal a day; moreover, I charge thee let no body come to him without my licence, neither to bring him shirt, cap, kerchief, or any other thing, but that I see it before it come to him.' Also before Hunne was carried to Fulham, the chancellor commanded to be put upon Hunne's neck a great collar of iron, with a great chain, which is too heavy for any man or beast to wear, and long to endure.

"Moreover, it is well proved, that before Hunne's death the said chancellor came up into the said Lollards'

Tower, and kneeled down before Hunne, holding up his hands to him, praying of him forgiveness of all that he had done to him, and must do to him. And on Sunday following the chancellor commanded the penitentiary of St. Paul's to go up to him, and say a gospel, and make for him holy water, and holy bread, and give it to him, which he did; and also the chancellor commanded that Hunne should have his dinner. And at the same dinner-time Charles' boy was shut up in prison with Hunne, which was never done so before; and after dinner, when the bell-ringer let out the boy, the bell-ringer said to the same boy, "Come no more hither with meat for him till to-morrow, for my master chancellor hath commanded that he should have but one meal a day;" and the same night following Richard Hunne was murdered, which murder could not have been done without consent and licence of the chancellor, and also by the witting and knowledge of John Spalding, the bell-ringer; for there could no man come into the prison but by the keys which were in John, the bell-ringer's keeping. Also, as by my lord of London's book appears, John, the bell-ringer, is a poor innocent man. Wherefore we all perceive, that this murder could not be done but by the commandment of the chancellor, and by the witting and knowing of John, the bell-ringer.

Then follows certain minutes of the evidence, and at last the following verdict:—

The Sentence of the Inquest subscribed by the Coroner.

¶ The inquisition intended and taken in the city of London, in the parish of St. Gregory, in the ward of Baynard Castle, in London, the sixth day of December, in the sixth year of the reign of King Henry VIII., before Thomas Barnwell, coroner of our sovereign lord the king, within the city of London aforesaid. Also before James Yarford and John Munday, sheriffs of the said city, upon the sight of the body of Richard Hunne, late of London, tailor, who was found hanged in the Lollards' Tower, and by the oath and proof of lawful men of the same ward, and of other three wards next adjoining, as it ought to be, after the custom of the city aforesaid, to enquire how, and in what manner the said Richard Hunne came by his death: and upon the oath of John Barnard, Thomas Stert, William Warren, Henry Abraham, John Aborow, John Turner, Robert Allen, William Marlet, John Burton, James Page, Thomas Pickhill, William Burton, Robert Bridgewater, Thomas Busted, Gilbert Howell, Richard Gibson, Christopher Crafton, John God, Richard Holt, John Palmere, Edmund Hudson, John Arunsell, Richard Cooper, John Tim: The which said upon their oaths, that whereas the said Richard Hunne by the commandment of Richard, bishop of London, was imprisoned and brought to hold, in a prison of the said bishops, called the Lollards' Tower, lying in the cathedral church of St. Paul, in London, in the parish of St. Gregory, in the ward of Baynard Castle aforesaid; William Horsey, of London, clerk, otherwise called William Heresie, chancellor to Richard, bishop of London; and one Charles Joseph, late of London, somner, and John Spalding of London, otherwise called John the bellringer, did feloniously, as felons to our lord the king, with force and arms against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, and dignity of his crown, on the fourth day of December, in the sixth year of the reign of our sovereign lord aforesaid, of their great malice, at the parish of St. Gregory aforesaid, upon the said Richard Hunne they made a fray, and the same Richard Hunne they feloniously strangled and smothered, and also the neck they did break of the said Richard Hunne, and there feloniously slew him and murdered him; and also the body of the said Richard Hunne, afterward the same fourth day, year, place, parish, and ward aforesaid, with the proper girdle of the same Richard Hunne, of silk, black of colour, of the value of twelve pence, after his death, upon a hook driven into a piece of timber in the wall of the prison aforesaid, made fast, and so hanged him, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, and the dignity of his crown: and so the said jury hath sworn on the holy evangelists, that the said William Horsey, clerk, Charles Joseph, and John Spalding, of their set malice, then and there feloniously killed and murdered the said Richard Hunne in manner and form above said, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

Subscribed in this manner:

Thomas Barnwell, Coroner of the city of London.

After the twenty four had given up their verdict, sealed and signed with the coroner's seal, the cause was then brought into the parliament house, where the truth was laid so plain before all men's faces, and the fact so notorious, that immediately certain of the bloody murderers were committed to prison, and should no doubt have suffered what they deserved, had not the cardinal by his authority, practised for his popish children, at the suit of the bishop of London. Whereupon the chancellor, by the king's pardon, and secret shifting, rather than by God's pardon and his deserving, escaped, and went, as is said, to Exeter, &c.

But I will trouble the reader no further in this matter of Richard Hunne, being of itself so clear, that no impartial judge can doubt thereof. Wherefore to return to the purpose of our history; among the number of those which about this time of Richard Hunne were forced to deny and abjure their professed opinions, were Elizabeth Stamford, John Household, and others, who abjured about the year of our Lord, 1517. It is painful to see their weakness, yet to consider the confession of their doctrine in those days, is not unprofitable. We can see the same doctrine then taught and planted in the hearts of our forefathers, which is now publicly received, as well touching the Lord's sacrament of his body, as also other specialties. And although they had not then public authority to maintain the open preaching and teaching of the gospel, which the Lord's merciful grace has given us now; yet in secret knowledge and understanding they seemed then little or nothing inferior to these our times of public reformation, as may appear by this confession of Elizabeth Stamford; which may suffice for example, to understand what ripe knowledge of God's word was then abroad, although not publicly preached in churches, for fear of the bishops, yet in secret taught and received by many.

Among the number of whom was this Elizabeth Stamford, who being brought and examined before Fitzjames, bishop of London, (A.D. 1517,) confessed that she was taught by one Thomas Beele, these words, eleven years before: that Christ feeds, and nourishes his church with his own precious body, that is, the bread of life coming down from heaven: this is the worthy word that is worthily received, and joined to man to be in one body with him. This is not received by chewing of teeth, but by hearing with ears, and understanding with your soul, and wisely working thereafter. Therefore, saith St. Paul, I fear, brethren, that many of us be feeble and sick; therefore I counsel you, brethren, to rise and watch, that the great day of doom come not suddenly upon us, as the thief doth upon the merchant. Also this Thomas Beele taught and shewed her, that the sacrament of the altar was not the very body of Christ, but very bread: and that the sacrament was the very body of Christ put upon the cross after a divine and mystical manner. And moreover he taught her this lesson, that she should confess her sins to God, and that the pope's pardons and indulgences were nothing worth, and that worshipping of images and pilgrimages ought not to be done.

To this confession of Elizabeth Stamford, may also be added, the doctrine and confession of Joan Sampson, wife of John Sampson, carpenter, of Aldermanbury, in London: who being cited and examined before the bishop of London, certain witnesses were produced against her, who, being sworn, denounced Joan Sampson in these articles and opinions following:

1. That she being in labour, and Joan Sampson the elder, who was alive, being with her, she, after the usual manner of women, called for the help of the virgin Mary; but Joan spake against it, and was so grieved at it that the other party was compelled to forsake the house.

2. Also, that she spake against pilgrimages, and the worshipping of the blessed Virgin, and of all saints, affirming that there is none holy but one.

3. Also, at another time, in the hearing of one Margaret Anworth, when she and other women were invoking the blessed Virgin, she stood against them, and spake against such invocations.

4. Also, that she speaking against the pilgrimage of our lady of Wilsden (as she was then called) and of St. Saviour at Barmsey, called the said St. Saviour, Sym Sawyer.

5. She was also accused of having two books in English, one bigger, and another lesser, which she committed to one John Anstead, a cook; which books are not named in the register.

6. She was also accused, that once, at a supper, in the hearing of certain men, and of a certain widow, named Joan White, she spake openly in contempt of the sacrament of the altar, saying, that the priests were idolaters, who did lift up the bread over their heads, making the people to worship it, and making the people to believe that it was the Lord's body; and that it was better to eat the altar cloth, if it might be eaten and digested as easily as the other.

Then follow, in the registers, the names of thirty-five persons who were compelled to abjure.

It was objected against one John Southwick, that when a man, named William Rivelay, coming from the church of the Gray-Friars, in London, had said to his wife that he had heard mass, and had seen his Lord God in form of bread and wine over the priest's head; John Southwick answered, "Nay, William, thou sawest not thy Lord God, thou sawest but bread and wine and the chalice." And when Rivelay answered again in the same words as before, saying, "I trust verily that I saw my Lord God in form of bread and wine, and this I doubt not." The other replying again, answered and said as before; "Nay, I tell thee thou sawest but only a figure or sacrament of him, which is in substance bread and wine," &c. This was A.D. 1520. In which year he was compelled to abjure.

All these persons above-named, held and agreed together in one doctrine and religion, against whom five or six special matters were objected, namely, for speaking against worshipping of saints, against pilgrimage, against invocation of the blessed Virgin, against the sacrament of the Lord's body, and for having scripture books in English: which books especially I find to be named, as these, the book of the four evangelists, a book of the epistles of Paul and Peter, the epistle of St. James, the book of the Revelation, and of antichrist, of the ten commandments, and 'Wickliff's Wicket,' with such like.

John Stilman, Martyr.

It would be tedious to recite the great multitude and number of good men and women who, in those days, recanted and abjured about the beginning of King Henry's reign and before: among whom there were some whom the Lord brought back again, and made strong in the profession of his truth, and constant to death; of which number John Stilman was one, who, about the twenty-fourth of September, A.D. 1518, was apprehended and brought before Richard Fitzjames, then bishop of London, at his manor of Fulham, (notwithstanding his former recantation, oath, and abjuration, made about eleven years then past, before Edmund, then bishop of Salisbury,) and was there examined and charged, as well for speaking against the worshipping, praying, and offering unto images; as also for denying the carnal and corporal presence in the sacrament of Christ's memorial: also, that since his former abjuration he had fallen into the same opinions again, and so into the danger of relapse: and further had highly commended and praised John Wickliffe, affirming that he was a saint in heaven, and that his book, called the Wicket, was good and holy. Soon after his examination, he was sent from thence unto Lollards' Tower, at London, and on the twenty-second of October next ensuing, was brought openly into the consistory of Paul's, and was there judicially examined by Thomas Hed, the bishop's vicar-general, upon the contents of these articles following:—

"I. I object unto you, that you have confessed before my lord of London and me, Dr. Hed, his vicar-general, that about twenty years, past, one Stephen Moone, of the diocese of Winchester, (with whom you abode six or seven years after) did teach you to believe that the going on pilgrimage and the worshipping of images, as that of the lady of Walsingham and others, were not to be used. And also that afterwards one Richard Smart, who was burned at Salisbury about fourteen years past, did read unto you 'Wickliff's Wicket,' and likewise instructed you to believe that the sacrament of the altar was not the body of Christ: all which things you have erroneously believed.

"II. You have often read the said book, called 'Wickliff's Wicket,' and another book of the ten commandments, which Richard Smart did give you, and at the time of your first apprehension you did hide them in an old oak, and did not reveal them unto the bishop of Salisbury, before whom you were abjured of heresy about eleven years since; where you promised, by oath upon the evangelists, ever after to believe and hold as the Christian faith taught and preached, and never to offend again in the said heresies, or any other, upon pain of relapse. And further, you there promised to perform all such penance as the bishop of Salisbury did enjoin you: who then enjoined you upon the like pain, not to depart out of his diocese without his special licence.

"III. It is evident that you are relapsed, as well by your own confession, as also by your deeds, in that about two years after your abjuration you went into the said place where you had hidden your books; and then taking them away with you, you departed from the diocese of Salisbury, without the licence of the bishop, and brought them with you to London, where now being attached and taken with them upon great suspicion of heresy, you are brought to the bishop of London: by reason of your demeanour, you have shewed both your impenitent and dissembled conversion from your errors, and also your unfaithful abjuration and disobedience to the authority of our mother holy church, in that you performed not the penance; in which behalf you are voluntarily perjured, and also relapsed, in that you departed the same diocese without licence.

"IV. You are not only impenitent, disobedient, voluntarily perjured and relapsed by this your heretical demeanour, but also since your last attachment upon suspicion of heresy, you have maliciously spoken erroneous and damnable words, affirming before my lord of London, your ordinary, and me, judicially sitting at Fulham, that you were sorry that you ever abjured your opinions, and had not at first suffered manfully for them, for they were, and are good and true; and therefore you will now abide by them to die for it. And furthermore, you have spoken against our holy father the pope, and his authority, damnably saying that he is antichrist, and not the true successor of Peter, or Christ's vicar on earth; and that his pardons and indulgences, which he grants in the sacrament of penance, are taught, and that you will have none of them. And likewise that the college of cardinals are limbs of antichrist: and that all other inferior prelates and priests are the synagogue of Satan. And moreover you said, that the doctors of the church have subverted the truth of holy scripture, expounding it after their own minds, and therefore their works be naught, and they in hell; but that Wickliff is a saint in heaven, and that the book called his Wicket is good, for therein he shews the truth. Also you did wish that there were twenty thousand of your opinion, against us scribes and pharisees, to see what you would do for the defence of your faith. All which heresies you did afterwards erroneously affirm before the archbishop of Canterbury, and then said that you would abide by them to die for it, notwithstanding his earnest persuasions to the contrary; and therefore for these premises you be evidently relapsed, and ought to be committed to the secular power."

After these articles thus propounded, and his constant persevering in the truth perceived, Dr. Hed, vicar-general, by his sentence definitive, did condemn him a relapsed heretic, on the twenty-fifth of October, and delivered him the same day to the sheriffs of London, to be openly burned in Smithfield.

Thomas Man, Martyr.

Next follows in this order of blessed martyrs, the persecution and condemnation of Thomas Man: who, March 29, A.D. 1518, was burned in Smithfield. This Thomas Man had been apprehended for the profession of Christ's gospel about six years before, (August 14, A.D. 1511,) and was examined upon these articles:—

1. That he had spoken against Auricular confession, and denied the corporeal presence of Christ's body in the sacrament of the altar.

2. That he believed that all holy men were priests.

3. That he had affirmed that the Father of heaven was the altar, and the Second Person the sacrament; and that upon Ascension-day the sacrament ascended to the altar, and there abides.

4. That he believed not aright in the sacrament of extreme unction.

5. That he had called certain priests, meanly arrayed knaves.

6. That he had said that pulpits were priest's lying stools.

7. That he had believed that images ought not to be worshipped, and that he neither believed in the crucifix, nor would worship it.

8. That he had affirmed that the word of God and God were all one, and that he that worthily receives the word of God, receives God.

9. That he had said that the popish church was not the church of God, but a synagogue: and that holy men were the true church of God.

For these matters he was a long time imprisoned, and at last, through frailty and fear of death, was content to abjure and yield himself to the judgment of the Romish church, and thereupon was enjoined, not only to make his open recantation, but also to remain as a prisoner within the monastery of Osney, and to bear a fagot before the first cross, at the next general procession in the university. All which, notwithstanding, he (being perhaps sorry for his offence in denying the truth, and also weary of his prison-like bondage) bethought himself how he might best escape; and therefore seeing a good opportunity, he fled, and seeking abroad in other counties for work, to sustain his life, he abode sometimes in Essex, sometimes in Suffolk; where he associated himself with such godly professors of Christ's gospel as he there could hear of. But within a few years after (such is the cruelty of Satan and his wicked members, who never suffer the godly long to continue untroubled) he was again accused of relapse by the inquisition of London, and thereupon was apprehended and brought before Richard Fitzjames, the bishop of London, February 9, 1518.

And although as the register notes (but how truly God only knoweth) he again forsook his profession of Christ's gospel, and yielded himself to the bishop of Rome, requiring to be absolved from his curse of excommunication, and consented to do such penance as they should enjoin him, he was yet delivered to the sheriff of London, to be burned. The bishop's chancellor who condemned him desired the sheriff that he would receive this person as relapsed and condemned, and yet not punish him by rigorous rigour. The words in the sentence are: "We desire, in the bowels of our Lord Jesus Christ, that the punishment and execution of due severity, on thee, and against thee, may be so moderate, that there be no rigid rigour, nor yet loose mildness, but to the health and safety of thy soul," &c.

Wherein these Romish churchmen do well shew, that the laws of their church are grounded upon Pilate and Caiaphas. For as Caiaphas with his court of Pharisees cried against Christ to Pilate: "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death; but if thou let him go, thou art not Cæsar's friend." Even so they, first condemning the saints of God to death, and then delivering them to the secular magistrate to be executed, would yet cover their malignant hearts with the cloak of hypocritical holiness and unwillingness to shed blood. But God be thanked, who, bringeth all things to light in his due time, and uncovereth hypocrisy at last, that she may be seen and known in her right colours.

Thus Thomas Man, the manly martyr of Jesus Christ, being condemned by an unjust sentence, was delivered to the sheriff of London sitting on horseback in Paternoster-row, before the bishop's door, A.D. 1518, he protesting to the said sheriff, that he had no power to put him to death, and therefore desired the sheriff to take him as a relapser and condemned, to see him punished. The sheriff immediately carried him to Smithfield, and there the same day in the forenoon caused him to become an angel in heaven.

In the deposition of one Thomas Risby, against this martyr it appears by the registers, that he had been in many places and counties in England, and had instructed many persons at Amersham, at London, at Chelmsford, at Stratford-Langthorn, at Uxbridge, at Burnham, at Henley upon Thames, in Suffolk and Norfolk, at Newbury, and many other places: where he testifies, that as he went westward, he found a great company of well-disposed persons, being of the same judgment touching the sacrament of the Lord's Supper that he was of, and especially at Newbury, where there was (as he confessed) a glorious and sweet society of faithful favourers, who had continued for the space of fifteen years together, till at last they were betrayed by a person, whom they trusted and made of their counsel, and then many of them, to the number of six or seven score, abjured, and three or four of them were burnt. From thence he came to the forest of Windsor, where he, hearing of the brethren who were at Amersham, removed there, where he found a godly and a great company, who had continued in that doctrine and teaching twenty-three years. Against these faithful Christians of Amersham, there was great trouble and persecution in the time of William Smith bishop of Lincoln, about the year 1507, at which time so many were abjured, that it was called, "the great abjuration." In this congregation of faithful brethren, were four principal instructors. One was Tilesworth, who was burned at Amersham. Another was Thomas Chase, who was murdered and hanged in the bishop of Lincoln's prison at Woburn. The third was this Thomas Man, burned as is here mentioned in Smithfield, A.D. 1518, who, as appears, by his own confession, and no less also by his labours, was God's champion, and suffered much trouble by the priests for the cause of God. He confesses himself in the same register, that he had turned seven hundred people to his religion and doctrine, for which he thanked God. He conveyed also five couples of men and women from Amersham, Uxbridge, Burnham, and Henley upon Thames, where they dwelt, to Suffolk and Norfolk, that they might be brought (as he then termed it) out of the devil's mouth.

This Robert Cosin seems to be the same who in the former part of this history is mentioned, as called by the name of Father Robert, and was burnt in Buckingham. Of this Robert Cosin, I find in the registers of Lincoln, that he, with Thomas Man, had instructed and persuaded one Joan Norman, about Amersham, not to go on pilgrimage, nor to worship any images of saints. Also when she had vowed a piece of silver to a saint for the health of her child, they dissuaded her from the same, and said, that she needed not to confess to a priest, but that it was sufficient to lift up her hands to Heaven. Moreover, they were charged by the bishop, for teaching Joan, that she might as well drink upon Sunday before mass, as any other day, &c. And thus you see the doctrine of these good men, for which they were in those days abjured or condemned to death.

Christopher Shoomaker, Martyr.

To these blessed saints we will add Christopher Shoomaker, of whom I find this briefly recorded in the register of Sir John Longland, that the said Christopher Shoomaker, a parishioner of great Missenden, came to the house of John Say, and after other matters, read to him out of a little book the words which Christ spake to his disciples. And thus coming to his house about four times, at every time he read something out of the same book to him teaching him not to be deceived in the priest's celebration of the mass, and declaring that it was not the same very present body of Christ, as the priests did fancy, but in substance bread in remembrance of Christ; and taught him moreover, that pilgrimage, worshipping, and setting up candles to saints, were all unprofitable. And thus the said John Say being taught by this Christopher, and also confirmed by John Okenden and Robert Pope, was brought to the knowledge of the same doctrine. Thus much briefly I find in that register concerning Christopher Shoomaker; declaring further, that he was burned at Newbury about this time, which was A. D. 1518. And thus much out of the registers of London.

Doctor Colet.

About this time, died Doctor John Colet, A. D. 1519. To whose sermons these men, about Buckinghamshire, had a great mind to resort. After he came from Italy and Paris, he first began to read the epistles of St. Paul openly in Oxford, instead of reading the works of Scotus and Thomas Aquinas. From whence he was called by the king, and made dean of St. Paul's: where he used to preach much with a great auditory, as well of the king's court, as of the citizens and others. His diet was frugal, his life upright, in discipline he was severe: so that his canons, because of their stricter rule, complained that they were made like monks. The honest and honourable state of matrimony he ever preferred before the unchaste singleness of priests. At his dinner commonly was read either some chapter of St. Paul, or of Solomon's proverbs. And although the blindness of that time carried him away after the common error of popery, yet in ripeness of judgment he seemed to incline from the common opinions of that age. The order of monks and friars he fancied not; neither could he favour the barbarous divinity of the school-doctors, so that, when Erasmus, speaking in the praise of Thomas Aquinas, commended him: Colet first supposing that Erasmus had spoken in jest, but afterwards finding that he was in earnest, burst out, saying, "Why tell you me of the commendation of that man, who unless he had been of an arrogant and presumptuous spirit, would not define and discuss things so boldly and rashly: and also, except he had been more worldly-minded than heavenly, would never have so polluted Christ's holy doctrine with man's profane doctrine, as he has done?"

The bishop of London at that time was Fitzjames. Who (bearing an old grudge and displeasure against Colet) with other two bishops, entered complaint against Colet to the archbishop of Canterbury, then William Warham. His complaint was divided into three articles: The first was for speaking against worshipping images: the second was about hospitality, that in treating of the words of the Gospel, "Feed,—feed,—feed;" John xxi. 15. when he had expounded the first two, as feeding with example of life, and with doctrine; in the third, which the schoolmen expound for feeding with hospitality, he left out the outward feeding of the belly, and applied it another way. The third crime with which they charged him, was for speaking against such as used to preach only by written sermons, preaching nothing to the people, but what they brought in their papers with them. And, because the bishop of London used much to do this, he took it as spoken against himself, and therefore bare this displeasure against Dr. Colet. The archbishop weighing the matter more wisely, and being well acquainted with Colet, took his part against his accusers, and at that time he was got out of trouble.

William Tindal, in his book in answer to Master More, testifies, that the bishop of London would have pronounced Colet, the dean of St. Paul's, an heretic, for translating the Lord's Prayer into English, had not the archbishop of Canterbury helped the dean.

But yet the malice of the bishop ceased not: being thus repulsed by the archbishop, he laid by another train how to accuse him to the king. It happened at the time, that the king was making preparation for war against France: so the bishop with his co-adjutors taking occasion upon certain words of Colet, in which he seemed to prefer peace before war, were it never so just; accused him of it in their sermons, and also in the presence of the king.

It so happened at this time, that on Good Friday Doctor Colet, preaching before the king, treated of the victory of Christ; exhorting all christians to fight under the standard of Christ, against the devil: adding moreover, what an hard thing it was to fight under Christ's banner, and that all they who upon private hatred or ambition took weapons against their enemy (one christian to slay another) did not fight under the banner of Christ, but rather of Satan: and therefore, he exhorted that christian men in their wars would follow Christ their prince and captain, in fighting against their enemies, rather than the example of Cæsar, or Alexander, &c. The king hearing Colet thus speak, and fearing lest the hearts of his soldiers might be withdrawn from his wars, which he had then in hand, took him aside and talked with him in secret conference, walking in his garden. Bishop Fitzjames, Bricot, and Standish, who were his enemies, thought now that Colet must needs be committed to the Tower, and waited for his coming out. But the king treating Doctor Colet with great gentleness, and bidding him familiarly to put on his cap, much commended him for his learning and integrity of life; agreeing with him in all points, only he required him (that the soldiers should not rashly mistake what he had said) more plainly to explain his words; which he did: and so after long communication and great promises, the king dismissed Colet with these words, saying, "Let every man choose what doctor he pleases, Colet shall be my doctor;" and so he departed. So that none of his adversaries durst ever trouble him after that time.

Among many other memorable acts left behind him, Colet erected a foundation of the school of St. Paul's (I pray God the fruits of the school may answer the foundation) for the cherishing of youth in good letters, providing a sufficient stipend as well for the master, as for the usher: whom he wished rather to be appointed out of the number of married men, than of single priests. The first moderator of this school, was William Lily, a man no less notable for his learning, than was Colet for his foundation.

In turning over the registers and records of Lincoln likewise, and coming to A. D. 1520, and 1521, I find that as the light of the gospel began the more to appear, and the number of professors to increase, so the vehemency of persecution, and stir of the bishops began also to increase. Upon which then ensued great trouble and grievous affliction in many quarters of this realm, especially about Buckinghamshire and Amersham, Uxbridge, Henley, Newbury, in the diocese of London, in Essex, Colchester, Suffolk, and Norfolk, and other places. And this was before the name of Luther was heard of in those countries among the people; so that they are much deceived and misinformed who condemn this kind of doctrine of novelty, asking where was this church and religion before Luther's time? To whom it may be answered, that this religion and form of doctrine was planted by the apostles, and taught by true bishops; it afterwards decayed, and is now reformed again; and although it was not received nor admitted by the pope's clergy before Luther's time, neither is now, yet it was received by others, in whose hearts it pleased the Lord secretly to work, and they a great number, who both professed and suffered for the same. And if they think this doctrine so new that it was not heard of before Luther's time, how then came such great persecution before Luther's time here in England? If these were of the same profession which the pope's clergy were of, then was their cruelty unreasonable, so to persecute their own fraternity. And if they were otherwise, how then is this doctrine of the gospel so new, or the professors of it so lately sprung up as they pretend to be? But this comes only of ignorance, and through not knowing and well considering the times and antiquities of the church which have been before us; which if they did, they would see and confess that the church of England has not wanted great multitudes who tasted and followed the sweetness of God's holy word almost in as ample a manner, for the number of well-disposed hearts as now. Although public authority then was wanting to maintain the open preaching of the gospel, yet the secret multitude of true professors was not much unequal: certainly the fervent zeal of those christian days seemed much superior to these our days and times, as may appear by their sitting up all night in reading and hearing, also by the expenses and charges they incurred in buying books in English, some of whom gave five marks, some more, some less, for a book; some gave a load of hay for a few chapters of St. James, or of St. Paul in English. In which time of scarcity of books, and want of teachers, this one thing I greatly marvel at, to note in the registers, and to consider how notwithstanding the word of truth multiplied so exceedingly as it did amongst them. Wherein is to be seen no doubt the marvellous working of God's mighty power; for I find and observe in considering the registers, how one neighbour resorting and conferring with another, soon with a few words, did win and turn their minds to the truth of God's word and his sacraments. To see their labours, their earnest seeking, their burning zeals, their readings, their watchings, their sweet assemblies, their love and concord, their godly living, their faithful marrying with the faithful, may make us now in these our days of free profession, to blush for shame.

There were four principal points in which they stood against the church of Rome; in pilgrimage, in adoration of saints, in reading scripture books in English, and in the carnal presence of Christ's body in the sacrament.

As they were simple, and yet not uncircumspect in their doings, so the crafty serpent, being more wily than they by fraudulent subtlety so circumvented them, that the popish clergy caused the wife to detect the husband, the husband the wife; the father the daughter, the daughter the father; the brother to disclose his brother, and the neighbour the neighbour. Neither were any assemblies nor readings kept, but both the persons and also the books were known, neither was any word so closely spoken, nor article mentioned, but it was discovered. So subtly did these prelates use their inquisitions and examinations, that nothing was done or said among these men, fifteen or twenty years before, so covertly, but it was brought at length to their intelligence. They had such captious interrogatories, and so many articles and suspicions; such spies and privy scouts were sent abroad by them; such authority and credit had they with the king, and in the king's name; such diligence they shewed; so violently and impudently they abused the book of the peaceable evangelists, wresting men's consciences upon their oath, swearing them upon the same to detect themselves, their fathers and mothers, and others of their kindred, with their friends and neighbours, and that to death.

For the better declaration of all which here first is to be noted touching the see of Lincoln, that after William Smith succeeded John Longland, Smith was not so bloody and cruel as Longland, who, for I find that in the time of "the great abjuration" and affliction of the Buckinghamshire men, where many were abjured, and some burned, yet he sent several quietly home without punishment and penance, bidding them go home and live as good christian men should do. And many who were enjoined penance he released. This Smith died about the year 1515. The college of Brazen Nose in Oxford was built by him.

After him followed John Longland, a fierce and cruel vexer of the faithful servants of Christ. He to renew again the old persecution, which were not yet utterly quenched, began with one or two of those who had abjured, and caused them by oath to detect and betray not only their own opinions, but also to discover all others who were suspected. By which an incredible multitude of men, women, and maidens, were brought to examination, and strictly handled. And such were found in relapse were burned.

The rest were so burdened with superstitions and idolatrous penance and injunction, that either through grief of conscience they shortly afterwards died, or else lived with shame.

One Robert Bartlet, and Richard his brother, were detected as having abjured before in the time of William Smith bishop of Lincoln.

They being sworn, and confessing nothing before the bishop, at last were convicted by witness. Wherefore they were constrained at their next examination to utter themselves, and confess what they had both done and said; that is, that Robert had read to Richard his brother a parcel of scripture beginning thus: "James the servant of God, to the twelve tribes," &c. That he heard Tilsworth say, that images of saints were but stocks and stones, and dead things; and that he taught the same to his brother Richard, and concealed the words of Tilsworth. That he partly believed Thomas Mastal, teaching him that the true presence of Christ was not in the sacrament; and likewise of images and pilgrimages: for receiving the communion at Easter without confession, &c.

Robert Bartlet was obliged to prove against Agnes Wellis, his own sister, that he had twice instructed her not to worship images, and also had taught her in the epistle of St. James.

The following interrogatories were put to this Agnes Wellis:—

1. Whether she knew that some of the parish of Amersham were brought before William Smith, late bishop of Lincoln, for heresy?
2. Whether she knew that some of them erred in the sacrament of the altar, or in other sacraments, and what errors they were, and wherein?
3. Whether she knew any others to be suspected of the same heresy besides those of Amersham, who they were, and how many?
4. Whether she had been in the same company, or held the same opinions with them.
5. Whether she at any time had any conversation with Thurstan Littlepage? and if she had, how often she had been in his company, how, what time, in what place, who else were present, for what causes, and whether she knew him to be suspected for heresy?
6. Whether she knew and at any time had any conversation with Alexander Mastal? and if she had, how, when, in what place, who were present, for what causes, and whether she knew him to be suspected for heresy?
7. Whether she was ever detected to the office of William Smith, late bishop of Lincoln, at what time? and whether she was then called before the bishop for heresy or not?
8. Whether she had been reputed to be of the same sect with Thurstan Littlepage?
9. Whether she had been present at any time at the readings or conferrings between Thurstan Littlepage and other convicts?
10. Whether Thurstan Littlepage did ever teach her the epistle of St. James, or the epistles of St. Peter or Paul in English? and whether she had repeated the epistle of St. James to Thurstan, in the presence of Richard Bartlet her brother?
11. Whether Richard Bartlet her brother did teach her at any time the epistle of St. James? and if he did, how often, and in what place?

12. Whether she had been instructed by Thurstan Littlepage, or by any other, that in the sacrament of the altar was not the true body of Christ, but only the substance of bread?

13. Whether she had been instructed by Thurstan Littlepage, or any other, that pilgrimage was not to be used, nor the images of saints to be adored?

14. Whether she credited Thurstan Littlepage, or any other, teaching her in the premises? and whether she believed or expressly agreed with them in these articles?

15. Whether Robert Bartlet her brother did ever teach her the epistle of St. James; and if he did, how often, and where?

16. Whether Robert Bartlet had taught her, that pilgrimage was not to be used, and that images were not to be adored?

17. Whether she knew such a law or custom among them, that such as were of that sort contracted matrimony only with themselves, and not with other christians?

18. Whether she ever heard Thurstan or any other say, that they only who were of their doctrine were true christians?

19. When she came to receive, and was confessed, whether she uttered and confessed her heresies to the priest?

These captious and cruel interrogatories Agnes Wellis answered negatively to almost all of them, refusing to name any person to the bishop. But soon after, being otherwise schooled, I cannot tell how, she was compelled to detect both herself, her brother Robert Bartlet, Thurstan Littlepage, and also Isabel Morwin, wife of John Morwin, and others.

By this system of examination, brother was compelled to inform against brother, sister, or neighbour, until evidence was thus craftily obtained against several hundred of godly men and women, that they used to assemble together and read portions of the holy scriptures in the English tongue.

The reader may thus learn the number of the good men and women, who were troubled and molested by the church of Rome, and all in one year; of whom few or none were learned, being simple labourers and artificers, but it pleased the Lord to work in them knowledge and understanding, by reading a few English books, such as they could get. And here is to be noted the blindness and uncourtious dealing of the bishops against them, not only by their violent oath and captious interrogatories, constraining the children to accuse their parents, and parents the children, the husband the wife, and the wife the husband, &c. But especially in most wrongfully afflicting them, only for believing God's word, and the reading of the holy scriptures.

Now it remains that we show the reasons and scriptures whereupon they grounded their views. And first, against pilgrimage, and against worshipping of images, they used this text of the Revelation, chap. ix., "I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone: and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions: and out of their mouths issued fire and smoke and brimstone. By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths. For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt. And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood," &c. (Ex Regist. Longland. fol. 72.) Also they alleged the first commandment, that there is but one God, and that they ought not to worship more gods than one.

And as to the sacrament, they had their instruction partly out of "Wickliff's Wicket," partly out of the "Shepherd's Calendar;" where they read that the sacrament was made in remembrance of Christ, and ought to be received in remembrance of his body, &c. They also alleged the words of Christ spoken at the supper, when sitting with his disciples, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave to his disciples, and said, "Eat: this (reaching out his arm, and showing the bread in his hand, and then noting his own natural body, and touching the same, and not the bread consecrated) is my body which is broken for you; this do in remembrance of me." And he likewise took the wine cup and bade them drink, saying, "This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." (1 Cor. xi. 24, &c.)

That Christ our Saviour sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and there shall be unto the day of judgment. Wherefore, they believed that in the sacrament of the altar the very body of Christ was not there.

Such reasons as these, taken out of the scripture, and out of the "Shepherd's Calendar," "Wickliff's Wicket," and out of other books they had among them. And although there was no learned man with them to ground them in their doctrine, yet they, communing and conferring together among themselves, converted one another, the Lord's hand working with them: so that in a short space the number of these men exceedingly increased; so that the bishop, seeing the matter almost past his power, was driven to make his complaint to the king, and require his aid for suppression of these men. Whereupon, King Henry, being then young, and inexperienced in the bloody practices and blind leadings of these apostolical prelates, directed down the following letter to the sheriffs, bailiffs, officers, and others, for the aid of the bishop in this behalf.

The Copy of the King's Letter for the aid of John Longland, bishop of Lincoln, against the Servants of Christ, then falsely called Heretics.

"Henry VIII., by the grace of God, king of England and of France, lord of Ireland, defender of the faith: to all mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, and constables, and to all other our officers, ministers, and subjects, hearing or seeing these our letters, and to every of them, greeting. Forasmuch as the right reverend father in God, our trusty and right well-beloved counsellor, the bishop of Lincoln, hath now within his diocese no small number of heretics, as it is thought, to his no little discomfort and heaviness: We, therefore, being in will and mind safely to provide for the said right reverend father in God and his officers, that they, or none of them, shall bodily be hurt or damaged by any of the said heretics or their favourers, in executing and ministering justice to the said heretics, according to the laws of holy church; do straightly charge and command you, and every of you, as ye regard our high displeasure, to be aiding, helping, and assisting to the said right reverend father in God, and his said officers, in the executing of justice in the premises, as they or any of them shall require you so to do; not failing to accomplish our commandment and pleasure in the premises, as ye intend to please us, and will answer to the contrary at your uttermost perils. Given under our signet at our castle at Windsor, the twentieth day of October, the thirteenth year of our reign."

The bishop thus being armed with the authority of the king's letter, and incited by his own fierceness, lost no time, but, to accomplish his violence upon the poor flock of Christ, he called before him all those in his diocese, who were suspected to incline toward those opinions: to such as had but newly been taken, and had not before abjured, he enjoined most rigorous penance. The others in whom he could find any relapse, yea, although they submitted themselves never so humbly to his favourable courtesy; and though also at his request, and for hope of pardon, they had shewed themselves great detectors of their brethren; yet, contrary to his fair words, and their expectation, he spared not, but read sentence of relapse against them, committing them to the secular arm to be burnt.

The books and opinions which these persons were charged with, and for the which they were abjured, are partly before expressed, partly here follow in a brief summary to be seen.

A brief Summary of their Opinions.

The opinions of many of these persons were, That he or she never believed in the sacrament of the altar, nor ever would.

That he was known of his neighbours to be a good fellow, meaning, that he was one of this sect or company.

For saying, that he would give forty pence on condition that such a one knew so much as he knew.

Some for saying, that they of Amersham, who had abjured before by Bishop Smith, were good men, and perfect christians, and simple folk who could not answer for themselves, and therefore were oppressed by the power of the bishop.

Some, for hiding others in their barns.

Some, for reading the scriptures, or treatises of scripture, in English: some, for hearing the same read.

Some, for defending; some, for marrying with them who had abjured.

Some, for saying that matrimony was not a sacrament.

Some, for saying that worshipping of images was mummery; some, for calling images carpenters' chips; some, for calling them stocks and stones; some, for calling them dead things.

Some, for saying that money spent upon pilgrimage, served but to maintain thieves and harlots.

Others, for saying, that nothing graven with man's hand was to be worshipped.

Another, for calling his vicar a poll-shorn priest.

Another, for calling a certain blind chapel in ruin, an old fair milk-house.

Another, for saying, that alms should not be given before it did sweat in a man's hand.

Some, for saying, that they who die, pass straight either to heaven or hell.

Isobel Bartlet was brought before the bishop and abjured, for lamenting her husband when the bishop's man came for him, and saying, that he was an undone man, and she a dead woman.

For saying that Christ, departing from his disciples into heaven, said, That once he was in sinners' hands, and would come there no more.

Some were condemned for receiving the sacrament at Easter, and doubting whether it was the very body of Christ, and not confessing their doubt to their ghostly Father.

Some, for reading the gospels—the epistles—and Revelation. Some, for having the creed and Lord's prayer in English.

Some for saying, that the pope had no authority to give pardon, or to release man's soul from sin; and that it was nothing but blinding of the people to get their money.

The penance enjoined to these parties, by this John Longland, bishop of Lincoln, was almost uniform, save that they were severally committed to several monasteries, there to be kept all their life, except they were otherwise dispensed with by the bishop.

And they were all at the same time compelled to abjure; by which word, "abjure," is meant, that they were constrained by their oath, swearing upon the evangelists, and subscribing with their hand, and a cross to the same, to say that they utterly and voluntarily renounced, detested, and forsook, and never should hold hereafter these opinions, contrary to the determination of the holy mother church of Rome: and, further, that they should detect to their ordinary, whomever they should see or suspect hereafter to teach, hold, or maintain the same.

Among the forenamed persons who thus submitted themselves, and were put to penance, there were some, who, because they had been abjured before, were now condemned for relapse, and had sentence read against them, and so were committed to the secular arm to be burned: whose names here follow:—Thomas Bernard,

James Morden, Robert Rave, John Scrivener, martyrs. (A. D. 1521.)

Of these, mention is made before, both touching their abjuration, and also their martyrdom. To whom we may add, Joan Norman, Thomas Holmes.

This Thomas Holmes, although he had disclosed and detected many of his brethren; thinking thereby to please the bishop, and to save himself, and was thought to be a man paid by the bishop for that purpose: yet, in the bishop's register appears the sentence of relapse and condemnation, written and drawn out against him; and most probable it is that he was also adjudged and executed with the others.

As touching the burning of John Scrivener, here it is to be observed, that his children were compelled to set fire to their father; and, in like manner, Joan Clerke also, daughter of William Tilseworth, was constrained to apply the fire to the burning of her own father.

The example of which cruelty, is not only contrary both to God and nature, but it has not even been seen or heard of in the memory of the heathen.

THE REFORMATION.

Although it cannot be sufficiently expressed with the tongue, or pen of man, into what miserable ruin and desolation the church of Christ was brought in those later days: yet partly, by the reading of these histories, some intelligence may be given to those who have judgment to mark, or eyes to see in what blindness and darkness the world was drowned during the space of upwards of four hundred years. By the viewing and considering of which times and histories, thou mayst understand (gentle reader) how the religion of Christ, which only consists in spirit and truth, was wholly turned into outward observances, ceremonies, and idolatry. We had so many saints, so many gods, so many monasteries, so many pilgrimages. We had as many churches, as many reliques forged and feigned. Again, we believed so many reliques, so many lying miracles. Instead of the only living Lord, we worshipped dead stocks and stones. In place of immortal Christ, we adored mortal bread. How the people were led, so that the priests were fed, no care was taken. Instead of God's word, man's word was set up. Instead of Christ's testament, the pope's testament, that is the cannon-law. Instead of St. Paul, Aquinas took place, and almost full possession. The law of God was little read, the use and end of it was less known; and as the end of the law was unknown, so the difference between the gospel and the law was not understood, the benefit of Christ not considered, the effect of faith not examined. Through this ignorance it cannot be told what infinite errors, sects, and religions crept into the church, overwhelming the world, as with a flood of ignorance and seduction. And no marvel; for where the foundation is not well laid, what building can stand or prosper? The foundation of all our christianity is only this; the promise of God in the blood of Christ his Son, giving and promising life to all that believe in him: Giving (saith the scripture) to us, and not bargaining or indenting with us. And that freely for Christ's sake, and not conditionally for our merits' sake.

Furthermore, freely (saith the scripture) by grace, that the promise might be firm and sure, and not by the works that we do, which always are doubtful. By grace (saith the scripture) through promise, to all and upon all them that believe, and not by the law upon those that deserve. For if it come by deserving, then it is not of grace: if it be not of grace, then it is not of promise; and contrariwise, if it be of grace and promise, then it is not of works, saith St. Paul. Upon the foundation of God's free promises and grace, first builded the patriarchs, kings, and prophets. Upon this same foundation also Christ the Lord builded his church. Upon which foundation the apostles likewise builded the apostolic or catholic church.

So long as the church retained this apostolical and catholic foundation, so long it continued pure and sound, which endured a long time after the apostles' time. But afterwards in process of years, through wealth and negligence, so soon as this foundation began to be lost, there came in new builders, who would build upon a new foundation a new church, which we call now the church of Rome; who being not content with the old foundation, and the head corner-stone, which the Lord by his word had laid, laid the groundwork upon the condition and strength of the law and works. Although it is not to be denied, but that the doctrine of God's holy law, and of good works according to the same, is a thing most necessary to be learned and followed by all men: yet it is not that foundation whereupon our salvation consists, neither is that foundation able to bear up the weight of the kingdom of heaven, but is rather the thing which is builded on the foundation, which foundation is Jesus Christ; according as we are taught by St. Paul, saying, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ," &c.

But this ancient foundation, which the old ancient church of Christ laid, has been now long forsaken, and instead of it a new church, with a new foundation, has been erected, not upon God's promise, and his free grace in Christ Jesus, nor upon free justification by faith, but upon merits and deserts of men's working. And here they have planted all their new devices, so infinite, that they cannot well be numbered; as masses, trentenaries, dirges, obsequies, matins, and hours-singing-service, vigils, midnight-rising, barefoot-going, fish-tasting, Lent-fast, Ember-fast, stations, rogations, jubilees, advocacy of saints, praying to images, pilgrimage-walking, works of supererogation, application of merits, orders, rules, sects of religion, vows of celibacy, wilful poverty, pardons, relations, indulgences, penance, and satisfaction, with auricular confession, founding of abbeys, &c. And who is able to recite all their laborious buildings, falsely framed upon a wrong ground, and all for ignorance of the true foundation, which is the free justification by faith in Christ Jesus the Son of God.

Moreover note, that as this new-found church of Rome was thus deformed in doctrine, so was it corrupt in order of life and deep hypocrisy, doing all things only under pretences and dissembled titles; so under the pretence of Peter's chair, they exercised a majesty above emperors and kings. Under the visor of their vowed celibacy, reigned adultery; under the cloak of professed poverty, they possessed the goods of the temporality; under the title of being dead to the world, they not only reigned in the world, but also ruled the world; under the colour of the keys of heaven to hang under their girdle, they brought all the states of the world under their girdle, and crept not only into the purses of men, but also into their consciences: they heard their confessions; they knew their secrets; they dispensed as they were disposed, and absolved what they chose; and finally, when they had brought the whole world under their subjection, their pride neither ceased, nor could their avarice be ever satisfied.

In these so blind and miserably corrupt days of darkness and ignorance, thou seest, good reader, how necessary it was, and high time, that the reformation of the church should come, which now most happily and graciously began to work, through the merciful providence of Almighty God; although he suffered his church to wander and start aside, through the seduction of pride and prosperity, for a long time, yet at length it pleased his goodness to have respect to his people, and to reduce his church to its pristine foundation and frame again, from whence it was piteously decayed. Of this I have now to treat, intending by the grace of Christ to declare how, and by what means first this reformation of the church began, and how it proceeded, increasing by little and little to this perfection which we now see.

And here we have first to behold the admirable work of God's wisdom. For as the first decay and ruin of the church began by rude ignorance, and lack of knowledge in teachers; so, to restore the church again by doctrine and learning, it pleased God to open to man the art of printing shortly after the burning of John Huss and Jerome. Printing opened to the church the instruments and tools of learning and knowledge, which were good books and authors who before lay hid and unknown. The science of printing being found, immediately followed the grace of God, which stirred up good understandings to conceive the light of knowledge and of judgment: by which light darkness began to be seen, and ignorance to be detected; truth to be discerned from error; and religion from superstition.

After these men, stirred up by God, there followed others, increasing daily more and more in science, in languages, and perfection of knowledge, who being so armed and furnished with the help of good letters, that they encountered the adversary, sustaining the cause and defence of learning against barbarity; of truth against error; of true religion against superstition. Here began the first assault against the ignorant and barbarous faction of the pope's church. After these men, by their learned writings and laborious travel, had opened a window of light to the world, and had made (as it were) a way more ready for others to come after them, immediately, according to God's gracious appointment, followed Martin Luther, with others after him, by whose ministry it pleased the Lord to work a more full reformation of his church.

Martin Luther, born at Isleben in Saxony, A.D. 1483, was sent to the university, first of Magdeburg, then of Erfurth. In this university of Erfurth there was an aged man in the convent of the Augustinians, with whom Luther, being of the same order, an Augustinian friar, had conference upon many things, especially touching the article of remission of sins; which article the aged father opened to Luther after this sort, declaring, that we must not generally believe only forgiveness of sins to be, or to belong, to St. Peter, to St. Paul, to David, or such good men alone; but that God's express commandment is, that every man should believe his sins individually to be forgiven him in Christ; and further said, that this interpretation was confirmed by the testimony of St. Bernard, and shewed him the place, in the Sermon of the Annunciation, where it is thus set forth:—"But add thou that thou believest this, that by him thy sins are forgiven thee. This is the testimony that the Holy Ghost gives thee in thy heart, saying, thy sins are forgiven thee. For this is the opinion of the apostle, that man is freely justified by faith."

By these words Luther was not only strengthened, but was also instructed in the full meaning of St. Paul, who repeats so many times this sentence, "We are justified by faith." And having read the expositions of many upon this place, he perceived, as well by the purpose of the old man, as by the comfort he received in his spirit, the vanity of those interpretations, which he had read before by the schoolmen. And so reading by little and little, comparing the sayings and examples of the prophets and apostles, and continual invocation of God, and exercise of faith and prayer, he perceived that doctrine most evidently. Then he began to read St. Augustine's books, where he found many comfortable things: among others, in the Exposition of the Psalms, and especially of the Book of the Spirit and Letter, which confirmed this doctrine of faith and consolation in his heart not a little. And yet he laid not aside the Sententiaries, as Gabriel and Cameracensis. Also he read the books of Occam, whose subtlety he preferred above Thomas Aquinas and Scotus. He read also Gerson; but, above all the rest, he perused St. Augustine's works all over, with attentive meditation; and thus he continued his study at Erfurth for the space of four years in the convent of the Augustines.

About this time one Staupitius, a famous man, was promoting the erection of an university in Wittenburg, and endeavouring to have schools of divinity founded in this new university: when he had considered the spirit and learning of Luther, he invited him from Erfurth, to place him in Wittenburg, (A.D. 1508,) at the age of twenty-six. There his learning appeared in the ordinary exercise, both of his disputations in the schools, and in preaching in churches, where many wise and learned men attentively heard Luther.

Dr. Mellarstad would often say, that Luther was of such a wonderful spirit, and so ingenious, that he was sure that he would introduce a more compendious, easy, and familiar manner of teaching.

There he expounded the logic and philosophy of Aristotle, and in the meanwhile omitted not his study in theology. Three years afterwards he went to Rome, about some contentions of the monks, and returning the same year he was graduated as a doctor, at the expense of the elector Frederick duke of Saxony, according to the solemn manner of the schools; for he had heard him preach, well understood the quietness of his spirit, diligently considered the force of his words, and held in high admiration those profound matters which he so exactly explained in his sermons.

After this he began to expound the Epistle to the Romans, and then the Psalms, where he shewed the difference betwixt the law and the gospel. He also overthrew the error that then reigned in schools and sermons, that men may merit remission of sins by their own works, and that they are just before God by outward discipline, as the pharisees taught. Luther diligently led the minds of men to the Son of God; and as John the Baptist pointed to the Lamb of God which took away the sins of the world, even so Luther shining in the church as a bright star after a long, cloudy, and obscure sky, clearly shewed, that sins are freely remitted for the love of the Son of God, and that we ought faithfully to embrace this bountiful gift.

These happy beginnings got him great authority, especially as his life corresponded to his profession. The consideration of which allured to him wonderfully the hearts of his auditors, and also many notable personages.

All this while Luther yet altered nothing in the ceremonies, but precisely observed his rule among his fellows; he meddled in no doubtful opinions, but taught this only doctrine as the principal of all others to men, opening and declaring the doctrine of repentance, of remission of sins, of faith, as the only true comfort in times of adversity. Every man received good taste of this sweet doctrine, and the learned conceived high pleasure to behold Jesus Christ, the prophets, and apostles, come forth into light out of darkness, by which they began to understand the difference between the law and the gospel; between the promises of the law and the promise of the gospel; between spiritual righteousness and civil things; which certainly could not have been found in Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, and such like authors, who were studied at that time.

It happened about this time, that many were induced by Erasmus's learned works, to study the Greek and Latin tongues; who perceiving a more gentle and ready order of teaching than before, began to have in contempt the monks' barbarous and sophistical doctrine; and especially such as were of a liberal nature and good disposition. Luther began to study the Greek and Hebrew tongue, that after he had learned the phrase and propriety of the language, and drawn the doctrine from the very fountains, he might give more sound judgment.

As Luther was thus occupied in Germany (A.D. 1516,) Leo X. having succeeded Julius II. was pope of Rome, who, under a pretence of war against the Turk, sent a jubilee with his pardons abroad through all christian realms and dominions, by which he gathered together innumerable riches and treasure. The gatherers and collectors persuaded the people, that whoever would give ten shillings, should at his pleasure deliver one soul from the pains of purgatory. For this they held as a general rule, that God would do whatever they would have him, according to the saying, "Whatsoever you shall loose upon earth, shall be loosed in heaven." But if it were but one jot less than ten shillings, they preached that it would profit them nothing.

This filthy kind of pope's merchandize, as it spread through all quarters of christian regions, so came also to Germany, through means of a certain Dominican friar named Tetzel, who most impudently caused the pope's indulgences or pardons to be carried and sold about the country. Luther, much moved with the blasphemous sermons of this shameless friar, and having his heart earnestly bent to maintain true religion, published certain propositions concerning indulgences, and set them openly on the temple that joins the castle of Wittenberg, on the 30th of September, A.D. 1517.

This friar, hoping to obtain the pope's blessing, assembled certain monks and divines of his convent, and forthwith commanded them to write something against Luther. And while he would not himself seem to be dumb he began not only to inveigh in his sermons, but to thunder against Luther crying, "Luther is an heretic, and worthy to be persecuted with fire." And besides this, he burned openly Luther's propositions, and the sermons which he wrote on indulgences. The rage and fury of this friar forced Luther to treat more amply of the cause, and to maintain his argument.

And thus arose the beginning of this controversy, wherein Luther, neither suspecting nor dreaming of any change that might happen, did not utterly reject the indulgences, but only required a moderation in them; and therefore they falsely accuse him, who blaze that he began with plausible matter, by which he might get praise, to the end that in process of time he might change the state of the commonweal, and purchase authority either for himself or others.

And certainly he was not stirred up by the court, for the Duke Frederick was offended that such contention and controversy should arise.

And as this Duke Frederick was one of all the princes of the time that most loved quietness and tranquillity, so he neither encouraged nor supported Luther, but often shewed the heaviness and sorrow which he bore in his heart, fearing still greater dissensions. But being a wise prince, and following the counsel of God, and well deliberating thereon, he thought with himself that the glory of God was to be preferred above all things. Nor was he ignorant what blasphemy it was, horribly condemned by God, obstinately to oppose the truth. Wherefore he did as a godly prince should do; he obeyed God, committing himself to his holy grace, and omnipotent protection. And although Maximilian the emperor, Charles king of Spain, and pope Julius, had given commandment to the Duke Frederick that he should prohibit Luther from all place and liberty of preaching; yet the Duke, considering with himself the preaching and writing of Luther, and weighing diligently the testimonies and places of scripture which he alleged, would not withstand the thing which he judged to be true and sincere. And yet he did not do this, trusting to his own judgment, but was very anxious to hear the judgment of others, who were both aged and learned. In the number of whom was Erasmus, whom the duke desired to declare to him his opinion touching the matter of Martin Luther; saying and protesting, that he would rather the ground should open and swallow him, than he would bear with any opinions which he knew to be contrary to manifest truth; and therefore he desired him to declare his judgment in the matter to him freely and friendly.

Erasmus, thus being intreated by the duke, began thus jestingly and merrily to answer the duke's request, saying, that, in Luther were two great faults; first, that he would touch the bellies of monks; the second, that he would touch the pope's crown; which two matters are in no case to be tampered with. Then, opening his mind plainly to the duke, he said, that Luther was occupied in detecting errors, and that a reformation was to be wished, and very necessary in the church; and he added, that the effect of his doctrine was true; but only he wished in him a more temperate moderation and manner of writing. Duke Frederick shortly after wrote to Luther seriously, exhorting him to temper the vehemence of his style. This was at the city of Cologne, shortly after the coronation of the new emperor.

Erasmus the next year wrote to the archbishop of Mentz an epistle touching the cause of Luther. In which epistle he signifies to the bishop "That many things were in the books of Luther condemned by monks and divines for heretical, which in the books of Bernard and Austin are read as sound and godly."

Also "That the world is burdened with men's institutions, with school-doctrines and opinions, and with the tyranny of begging friars; which friars, being nothing but the pope's servants and underlings, yet have they so grown in power and multitude, that they are now terrible both to the pope himself, and to all princes. Who so long as the pope makes with them, so long they make him more than God; but if he make any thing against their purpose or advantage, then they weigh his authority no more than a dream or phantasy."

"Once," said he, "it was counted an heresy when a man opposed the gospel or articles of the faith; now he that dissents from Thomas Aquinas is an heretic; whatever they like not, whatever they understand not, that is heresy. To speak Greek is heresy; or to speak more finely than they do, that is with them heresy." And thus much by the way concerning the judgment of Erasmus.

Now to return, and to treat of the acts and conflicts of Luther with his adversaries. After Tetzel, with his fellow-monks and friars, had cried out with open mouth against Luther, in maintaining the pope's indulgences; and after Luther, in defence of his cause, had set up propositions against the open abuses of indulgences, it was wonderful to see how soon those propositions were spread abroad in far places, and how greedily they were caught up in the hands of persons both far and near. And thus the contention increasing between them, Luther was compelled to write more largely and fully than otherwise he thought, which was in A.D. 1517.

Yet all this while Luther never thought of any alteration, much less such a reformation of doctrine and ceremonies as afterwards followed. But hearing that he was accused to the bishop of Rome, he wrote humbly to him, in which writing he declares the outrage of those pardon-mongers who so excessively cheated the simple people, to the great slander of the church, and shame to his holiness; and so proceeding, in the end of his writing thus submits himself.

"Wherefore," saith he, "most holy father, I offer myself prostrate under the feet of your holiness, with all that I am, and all that I have. Save me, kill me, call me, recall me, approve me, reprove me as you shall please. Your voice, the voice of Christ in your speaking, I will acknowledge. If I have deserved death, I shall be contented to die; for the earth is the Lord's, and all the fulness thereof, who is blessed for ever. Amen." This was in A.D. 1518.

After Martin Luther, provoked by Tetzel, had declared his mind in writing, lowly and humbly, and had set up certain propositions to be disputed; not long after, among other monks and friars, steps up Sylvester de Priore, a Dominican friar, who began to publish abroad an impudent and railing dialogue against him.

Next after this Sylvester stepped forth Eckius, and opposed the conclusions of Luther. Against whom D. Andrew Bedenstein, archbishop of Wittenberg, came forth, making his apology in defence of Luther.

Then was Martin Luther cited the 7th of August, by Jerome bishop of Ascalon, to appear at Rome. About which time Thomas Cajetan, cardinal, the pope's legate, was then at the city of Augsburg, having before been sent down with certain mandates of Pope Leo to that city. The University of Wittenberg hearing of Luther's citation, soon directed their letters, with their public seal, to the pope in Luther's behalf. Also another letter they sent to Charles Miltiz, the pope's chamberlain; also good Frederick ceased not for his part to solicit the matter with his letters and earnest suit with Cardinal Cajetan, that the cause of Luther might be removed from Rome to Augsburg, in the hearing of the cardinal. Cajetan, at the suit of the Duke, wrote to the pope, from whom he received this answer, 23d August: "That he had cited Luther to appear personally before him at Rome, by Jerome bishop of Ascalon, auditor of the chamber, which bishop had diligently done what was commanded him; but Luther, abusing and contemning the gentleness offered, not only refused to come, but also became more bold and stubborn, continuing, or rather increasing in his former heresy. Wherefore he desired that the cardinal should cite and call up the said Luther, to appear at the city of Augsburg before him, adjoining withal the aid of the princes of Germany, and of the emperor, if need required; so that when the said Luther should appear, he should lay hands upon him, and commit him to safe custody, and then he should be brought up to Rome; and if he perceived him to come to any knowledge or amendment of his fault, he should release him and restore him to the church again, or else he should be interdicted, with all his adherents, abettors, and maintainers, of whatever state or condition they were, whether they were dukes, marquises, earls, barons, &c. Against all which persons and degrees, he desired him to extend the same curse and malediction (only the person of the emperor excepted) interdicting, by the censure of the church, all such lands, lordships, towns, tenements, and villages, as should minister any harbour to Luther, and were not obedient to the see of Rome. Contrariwise, to all such as shewed themselves obedient, he should promise full remission of all their sins."

The pope directs other letters also at the same time to Duke Frederick, complaining with many grievous words against Luther.

The cardinal being thus charged with injunctions from Rome, according to his commission, sends with all speed for Luther, to appear at Augsburg, before him.

About the beginning of October, Martin Luther yielding his obedience to the church of Rome, came to Augsburg at the cardinal's message (at the charges of the noble prince elector, and also with his letters of commendation) where he remained three days before he came to his presence, for it was provided by his friends that he should not confer with the cardinal till a sufficient warrant or safe-conduct was obtained of the emperor Maximilian. Which being obtained, he soon entered, offering himself to the presence of the cardinal, and was there received by the cardinal very gently; who, according to the pope's command, propounded to Martin Luther three things, to wit:—

1. That he should repent and revoke his errors.
2. That he should promise, from that time forward, to refrain from the same.
3. That he should refrain from all things that might by any means trouble the church.

When Martin Luther required to be informed wherein he had erred, the legate brought forth a papal bull, called the Extravagant of Clement, which begins, "Unigenitus," &c., because that he, contrary to that canon, had held and taught in his fifty-eight propositions, "That the merits of Christ, are not the treasure of indulgences or pardons." Secondly, the cardinal, contrary to the seventh proposition of Luther, affirmed, that faith is not necessary to him that receives the sacrament.

Another day, in the presence of four of the emperor's council, having a notary and witnesses present, Luther protested for himself, in this manner following:—

"I Martin Luther, an Augustinian friar, protest, that I do reverence and follow the church of Rome in all my sayings and doings, present, past, and to come; and if any thing has been, or shall be said by me to the contrary, I count it, and am willing that it be counted and taken as though it had never been spoken. But because the cardinal has required at the command of the pope three things of me,

1. That I should return again to the knowledge of myself.
2. That I should beware of falling into the same again hereafter.
3. That I should promise to abstain from all things which might disquiet the church of God;

"I protest here this day, that whatever I have said, seems to me to be sound, true, and catholic; yet for the further proof of it, I offer myself personally, either here or elsewhere, publicly to give a reason of my sayings. And if this please not the legate, I am ready also in writing to answer his objections, if he have any against me; and to hear the sentence and judgment of the universities of the empire, Basil, Friburg, and Louvaine."

After this, Luther prepares an answer to the legate, teaching that the merits of Christ are not committed to men; that the pope's voice is to be heard when he speaks agreeably to the scriptures; that the pope may err, and that he ought to be reprehended. Moreover he shewed, that in matters of faith, not only the general council, but also every faithful christian is above the pope, if he depend on better authority and better reason: that the extravagant bull contains untruths: that it is an infallible truth that none is righteous: that it is necessary for him that comes to the receiving of the sacrament to believe: that faith in the remission of sins is necessary; that he ought not to decline from the truth of the scripture: that he sought nothing but the light of the truth, &c.

But the cardinal would hear no scriptures; he disputed without scriptures; he devised glosses and expositions out of his own head; and by subtle distinctions like a very Proteus he avoided all things. After this, Luther being commanded to come no more into the presence of the legate, except he would recant, abode there still, and would not depart. Then the cardinal sent for John Stupitius, vicar of the Augustinians, and moved him earnestly to bring Luther to recant. Luther tarried the next day also, and nothing was said to him. The third day also he tarried, and delivered his mind in writing; in which, first, "he thanked him for his courtesy and great kindness, which he perceived by the words of Stupitius, toward him, and therefore was the more ready to gratify him in whatever kind of office he could do him service, confessing that where he had been somewhat sharp and eager against the pope's dignity, that was not so much of his own mind, as it was to be ascribed to the importunity of some who gave him occasion. Notwithstanding as he acknowledged his excess, so he was ready to shew more moderation hereafter, and also promised to make amends to the bishop, and that in the pulpit, if he pleased. And as to the matter of pardons, he promised also to proceed no further, if his adversaries likewise were bound to keep silence. But as he was pressed to retract his sentence which he had previously defended, as he had said nothing but with a good conscience, and which was agreeable to the firm testimonies of the scripture, therefore he humbly desired the determination of it to be referred to the bishop of Rome; for nothing could be more grateful to him, than to hear the voice of the church speaking." &c.

Who does not see by this humble submission of Luther, that if the bishop of Rome would have been satisfied or contented with any reason, he had never been troubled any further by Luther? But the secret purpose of God had a further work to do; for the time was now come when God thought good that pride should have a fall. Thus while the unmeasurable desire of that bishop sought more than enough (like Esop's dog coveting to have both flesh and shadow) he not only missed what he gaped for, but also lost what he had.

This writing Luther delivered to the cardinal, the third day after he was commanded out of his sight. Which letter or writing the cardinal little regarded. When Luther saw that he would give no answer to the letter, he yet remained after the fourth day, and still nothing was answered: the fifth day likewise was passed with silence, and nothing done. At length, by the counsel of his friends, and especially because the cardinal had said before that he had a commandment to imprison Luther and John Stupitius; after he had made and set up his appeal where it might be seen and read, he departed, thinking that he had shewed obedience long enough. Luther himself records all this, and shews why he submitted himself to the church of Rome; declaring that even those things which are most truly spoken, yet ought to be maintained and defended with humility and fear; and he protests that he reverences and follows the church of Rome in all things, and that he sets himself only against those which, under the name of the church of Rome, go about to set forth and commend Babylon to us.

Thus Luther, being rejected from the presence of the cardinal Cajetan after six days' waiting, departed by the advice of his friends, and returned into Wittenberg, leaving a letter in writing to be given to the cardinal, wherein he declared sufficiently,—his obedience in his coming,—the reasons of his doctrine,—his reasonable submission to the see of Rome,—his long waiting after he was repelled from the cardinal's presence,—the charges of the duke,—and finally, the cause of his departing. Besides this letter to the cardinal, he left also an appeal to the bishop of Rome, from the cardinal, which he caused to be published before his departure.

After Luther had departed and returned again into his own country, Cajetan writes to Duke Frederick a sharp and biting letter, in which first he notices his gentle entreating and good will shewn to reduce Luther from his error. Secondly, he complains of the sudden departing of him, and of Stupitius. Thirdly, he declares the danger of Luther's doctrine against the church of Rome. Fourthly, he exhorts the duke, that as he tends his own honour and safety, and regards the favour of the high bishop, he will send him to Rome, or expel him out of his dominions, forasmuch as such a pestilence could not, and ought not by any means to be suffered.

To this letter of the cardinal the duke answers at large, clearing both Luther and himself; Luther, in that he following his conscience, grounded upon the word of God, would not revoke that for an error, which could be proved to be no error; and himself he excuses thus, that where it is required of him to banish him his country, or to send him up to Rome, it would be little becoming him to do so, and less conscientious, unless he knew just cause why he should do so, which if the cardinal would or could declare to him, there should lack nothing in him which was the duty of a christian prince to do. And therefore he desired him to endeavour with the bishop of Rome, that innocency and truth be not oppressed before the crime or error be lawfully convicted.

This done, the duke sends the letter of the cardinal to Martin Luther, who answered again to the prince, shewing first how he came obediently to Cajetan with the emperor's warrant, and what talk there was between them; how Cajetan pressed him, against his conscience and manifest truth, to revoke these errors. First, that the merits of Christ's passion were not the treasure of the pope's pardons. Secondly, that faith was necessary in receiving the sacraments. Although in the first he was content to yield to the cardinal; yet in the second, because it touched a great part of our salvation, he could not with a safe conscience retract, but desired to be taught by the scriptures, or at least, that the matter might be brought into open disputation in some free place of Germany, where the truth might be discussed and judged by learned men. The cardinal, not pleased with this, in great anger cast out many menacing words, and would not admit him any more to his presence; and yet he persisting in his obedience to the church of Rome, gave attendance, waiting upon the cardinal's pleasure a sufficient time.

At last, when no answer would come, after he had waited the space of five or six days, to his great loss and greater danger, by the persuasion of his friends he departed. At which, if the cardinal was displeased, he had most cause to blame himself. "And now, as the cardinal threatens me," saith he, "not to let the matter fall, but that the process shall be pursued at Rome, unless I either come and present myself, or else be banished your dominions, I am not so much grieved for mine own sake as that you should sustain on my account any danger or peril. And therefore seeing there is no place nor country, which can keep me from the malice of my adversaries, I am willing to depart hence, and to forsake my country, whithersoever it shall please the Lord to lead me, thanking God who has counted me worthy to suffer thus much for the glory of Christ's name."

At this time the cause of Luther was in great danger, and he himself was ready to fly the country, and the duke again was as much afraid to keep him, had not the marvellous providence of God provided a remedy where the power of man failed, by stirring up the whole university of Wittenberg, who seeing the cause of truth thus declining, with a full and general consent addressed their letters to the prince, in defence of Luther and of his cause, making their humble suit to him, that he of his princely honour would not suffer innocency and the simplicity of truth, so clearly exposed in the scriptures, to be foiled and oppressed by mere violence of certain malignant flatterers about the pope, but that the error may first be shewn and convicted, before the party be pronounced guilty.

By these letters the duke began more seriously to consider in his mind the cause of Luther, and to read his works, and also to hearken to his sermons. By which (through God's holy working) he grew to knowledge and strength, perceiving in Luther's quarrel more than he did before. This was about the beginning of December, A. D. 1518.

As this passed on, Pope Leo, playing the lion at Rome, in the month of November, to establish his seat against the defection which he feared was coming, had sent forth new indulgences into Germany, and all quarters abroad, with a new edict, wherein he declared this to be the catholic doctrine of the holy mother church of Rome, prince of all other churches, that bishops of Rome, who are successors of Peter, and vicars of Christ, have this power and authority given to release and dispense, also to grant indulgences available both for the living, and for the dead lying in the pains of purgatory; and this doctrine he charged to be received of all faithful christian men, under pain of the great curse, and utter separation from all holy church.

This popish decree and indulgence, as a new merchandise to get money, having been sent into all quarters of Christendom for the holy father's advantage, came also to be received in Germany about the month of December. Luther in the meantime, hearing that at Rome they were about to proceed and pronounce against him, provided a certain appeal in due form of law, wherein he appeals from the pope to the general council.

When Pope Leo perceived that his pardons would not prosper to his mind, and that Luther could not be brought to Rome, he sent his chamberlain, Charles Miltitz, who was a German, into Saxony to Duke Frederick, with a golden rose, after the usual ceremony, with secret letters also to certain noblemen of the duke's council, to solicit in favour of the pope's cause, and to remove the duke's mind, if it might be, from Luther.

But before Miltitz approached Germany, the Emperor Maximilian died in Jan. 1519. Then two candidates stood for the election, to wit, Francis the French king, and Charles king of Spain, who was also duke of Austria, and duke of Burgundy. To make this matter short, through the means of Frederick prince elector (who having the offer of the preferment, refused it) the election fell to Charles, called Charles V., about the end of August.

In the month of June previously, there was a public disputation at Leipsic, a city under the dominion of George duke of Saxony, uncle to Duke Frederick. This disputation first began through the occasion of John Eckius, a friar, and Andrew Carolostad, a doctor of Wittenberg. This Eckius had impugned certain propositions or conclusions of Martin Luther, which he had written the year before against the pope's pardons. Against him Carolostad wrote in defence of Luther. Eckius, to answer Carolostad, set forth an apology; which apology Carolostad confuted in writing. To this disputation Martin Luther came with Philip Melancthon, who not a year before had come to Wittenberg; Luther not thinking then of disputing any thing because of his appeal already mentioned, but only to hear what was said and done.

Before the entering into the disputation it was agreed that every thing should be penned by notaries, and afterwards published. But Eckius afterwards went back from that, pretending that the penning of the notaries would be an hinderance to them, by which their reasoning would be the more languid. But Carolostad would not dispute without notaries. The sum of their disputation was reduced to certain conclusions. Among which, first came in question to dispute of free will, that is, whether a man have of himself any election or purpose to do that which is good. When the question was to be discussed, what the will of man may do of itself, without grace; they, through heat of contention, fell into other matters little or nothing appertaining to that Carolostad proposed. Eckius affirmed that the pure strength to do good is not in man's will, but is given of God to man, to take interest and increase of man again, which at first he seemed to deny. Then being asked by Carolostad whether the whole and full good work that is in man proceeds of God? He answered, the whole good work, but not wholly, granting that the will is moved by God, but that to consent is in man's power. Against this Carolostad reasoned, alleging certain places of Augustine, and of St. Paul, who saith, "That God worketh in us both to will, and to do." And this opinion of Carolostad seemed to prevail. And thus a whole week was lost about this contentious and sophistical altercation between Eckius and Carolostad.

Luther, as was said, came not thinking at all to dispute, but having liberty granted by the duke, and under the pope's authority, was challenged, and forced against his will, to dispute with Eckius. The matter of their controversy was about the authority of the bishop of Rome. Luther had previously set forth in writing, that they who attribute the pre-eminency to the church of Rome, have no other foundation for it than the pope's decrees, which had been set forth not much more than four hundred years before; and these decrees he affirmed to be quite contrary to all ancient histories, for above a thousand years past, and also contrary to the holy scriptures, and to the Nicene council.

Against this assertion Eckius set up a contrary conclusion, saying, "That they who hold that the supremacy and pre-eminence of the church of Rome above all other churches was not before the time of pope Silvester I. do err, forasmuch as they who succeed in the see and faith of Peter, were always received for the successors of Peter, and vicars of Christ on earth."

Though this was the last of all the other points of Eckius, yet he thought to begin with this against Luther, in order to bring him into more displeasure with the bishop of Rome; but Luther refused to dispute, alleging that the subject was more unpleasant than necessary for that time, and also that for the bishop of Rome's sake, he had much rather keep silence on the point. But if he must needs be forced to it, he wished the fault should be understood to be where it really was, namely, in his adversaries who challenged him to it. Eckius again clearing himself, transfers all the fault to Luther, who first in his treatise on indulgences, asserted that before Pope Silvester's time the church of Rome had no pre-eminence above other churches.

Thus Luther being constrained to dispute, whether he would or no, the question began to be propounded as to the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, which supremacy, Eckius contended was found and grounded upon God's law. Luther on the other side denied not the supremacy of the bishop of Rome above other churches, neither did he deny it to be universal over all churches, but he only affirmed it not be instituted by God's law. Upon this question the disputation continued for the space of five days. During all which time Eckius very dishonestly and discourteously demeaned himself, studying by all means how to bring his adversary into hatred with the auditors, and into danger with the pope. The reasons of Eckius were these: "Forasmuch as the church, being a civil body, cannot be without a head, therefore as it stands with God's law, that other civil governments should not be destitute of a head; so it is requisite by God's law, that the pope should be the head of the universal church of Christ." To this Martin Luther answered, "That he confesses and grants the church not to be headless so long as Christ is alive, who is the only head of the church; neither does the church require any other head beside him, forasmuch as it is a spiritual kingdom, and not earthly." And he alleged for him the place of Coloss. i. 18. Eckius again produces certain places out of Jerome and Cyprian, which made very little way to prove the primacy of the pope to exist by the law of God. As to the testimony of Bernard, the authority of that author was not of any great force in this question.

Then he came to the place of St. Matthew, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church," &c. To this was answered, "That this was a confession of faith; and that Peter there represents the person of the whole universal church, as Augustine expounds it. Also, that Christ in that place means himself to be the rock, as is manifest both by his words, and the structure of the sentence, and many other conjectures. Also to the place of St. John, (xvi. 16.) "Feed my sheep" (Which words Eckius alleged were spoken, peculiarly to Peter alone). Luther answered, "That after these words were spoken, an equal authority was given to all the apostles, where Christ saith to them, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted,' &c. By these words (saith he) Christ, assigning to them their office, teaches what it is to feed, and what he ought to be who feeds." After this, Eckius came to the authority of the council of Constance; alleging this among others,—"That it stands upon necessity of our salvation, to believe the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the church: alleging, moreover, that in that council it was debated and discussed, that a general council could not err. To this Martin Luther answered discreetly, saying, 'That all the articles which John Huss held were not condemned in that council for heretical. Again, of what authority that council of Constance is to be esteemed, he left to other men's judgments. This is most certain (said he) that no council has authority to make new articles of faith.' Here Martin Luther was exclaimed against by Eckius and his accomplices, for diminishing the authority of general councils; although he meant to confirm their authority. Yet he was called a heretic and a schismatic, and one of the Bohemian faction, with many other terms of reproachful insult. Eckius then granted the authority of the apostles to be equal: and yet that it did not follow thence, that the authority of all bishops was equal. In conclusion, Eckius could not bear that any one should decline from any word or sentence of the pope's decrees, or the constitutions of the fathers. To this Luther answered, grounding himself upon the place in Gal. ii. 6, where St. Paul, speaking of the principal apostles, saith, 'And of them who seemed to be somewhat, whatever they were, it maketh no matter to me, for God accepteth no man's person: nevertheless, that they seemed to be somewhat added nothing to me,' &c. Eckius said to this "That as to the authority of the apostles, they were all chosen by Christ, but were ordained bishops by St. Peter." And when Luther brought forth the constitution of the decree, which saith, "Let not the bishop of Rome be called universal bishop," &c. Eckius answered, "That the bishop of Rome ought not to be called universal bishop; yet he may be called bishop of the universal church." And thus much touching the question of the pope's supremacy.

From this matter they entered next upon purgatory, where Eckius kept no order; for when they should have disputed what power the pope has in purgatory; Eckius turns the scope of the question, and endeavours to prove that there is purgatory; and alleges the place of Maccabees. Luther, leaning upon the judgment of Jerome, affirms the book of Maccabees to be not canonical. Eckius again replies, that the book of Maccabees was of no less authority than the gospels. Also, he alleges the place, 1 Cor. iii. 15, "He himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." Also, the place of Matthew v. 25, "Agree with thine adversary quickly while thou art in the way with him, lest he deliver thee to prison,—thou shalt not come out thence till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing," &c. To this he added also, Psal. lxxvi. 12, "We went through fire and water," &c. How these places are wrested to purgatory, let the reader discern and judge. Then was brought on the question of indulgences, of which Eckius seemed to make but a trifle, and a matter of nothing, and so passed it over.

At last they came to the question of penance: touching which, the reasons of Eckius digressed much from the purpose, and went to prove, that there are some pains of satisfaction, which Luther never denied; but that for every particular offence such particular penance is exacted of God's justice upon the repentant sinner, as is in man's power to remit or release; such penance neither Luther, nor any true christian would admit.

And thus ye have the chief effect of this disputation between Luther and Eckius at Leipsic, in the month of July, 1519.

About the beginning of the same year, 1519, Ulric Zuinglius came first to Zurich, and there began to teach. In the sixteenth article in his book of articles, he records, that Luther and he at the same time, one not knowing or hearing of the other, began to write against the pope's pardons and indulgences. Yet, if the time be rightly counted, I suppose we shall find that Luther began a year or two before Zuinglius. Notwithstanding, Sleidan testifies, that in this year, when Sampson, a Franciscan, came with the pope's pardons to Zurich, Ulric Zuinglius withstood him, and declared his pardons to be but a vain seducing of the people, to inveigle away their money.

In the next year, which was 1520, the friars and doctors of Louvaine, and of Cologne, condemned the books of Luther as heretical. Luther again effectually defended himself, and charged them with obstinate violence and malicious impiety. About this same time flashed out from Rome the thunderbolt of Pope Leo against Luther, although he had so humbly and obediently revered both the person of the pope, and the authority of his see, and had also dedicated to him the book intitled, "Of Christian Liberty." In which book he discusses and proves these two points principally.

1. That a christian man is free, and Lord over all things, and subject to none.

2. That a christian man is a diligent underling and servant of all men, and to every man subject.

Also, in the same year he set out a defence of all his articles, which the pope's bull had before condemned.

Another book also he wrote to the nobility of Germany, in which he impugns and shakes the three principal walls of the papists; the first whereof is this:—

1. Whereas the papists say, that no temporal or profane magistrate has any power over the spirituality, but that the spirituality have power over the other.

2. Where any place of scripture, being in controversy, it is to be decided, they say, "No man may expound the scripture, or be judge of it, but only the pope."

3. When any council is brought against them, they say, "That no man has authority to call a council, but only the pope."

Moreover, in this book he handles and discourses on other matters: That the pope can stop no free council; also what things ought to be handled in councils: That the pride of the pope is not to be suffered. What money goes out of Germany yearly to the pope, amounts to the sum of three millions of florins. Furthermore, in this book he proves and discusses, that the emperor is not under the pope; and that the donation of Constantine is not true, but forged: That priests may have wives: That the voices of the people ought not to be separated from the election of ecclesiastical persons: That interdicting and suspending of matrimony at certain times was introduced from avarice: what is the right use of excommunication: That there ought to be fewer holy-days: That liberty ought not to be restrained in meats: That wilful poverty and begging ought to be abolished: What damage and inconvenience have grown up by the council of Constance: and what misfortunes Sigismund the emperor sustained, for not keeping faith and promise with John Huss and Jerome of Prague: That heretics should be convinced not by fire and faggot, but by evidence of scripture, and God's word: How schools and universities ought to be reformed:

What is to be said and judged of the pope's decretals : That the first teaching of children ought to begin with the gospel.

In the month of October this year, the new emperor, Charles V. was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle; and about the month of November, Pope Leo sent again to Duke Frederick two cardinals, of whom the one was Jerome Leander, who, after a few words of high commendation, premised to the duke, touching his noble progeny and his other famous virtues, then they made two requests to him in the pope's name; first, That he would cause all the books of Luther to be burned. Secondly, That he would either cause Luther to be executed, or else would send him up to Rome to the pope.

These two requests seemed very strange to the duke: who, answering the cardinals, said, "That he having been long absent from thence, on other public affairs, could not tell what had been done, neither had he communicated on the doings of Luther. However, this he had heard, that Eckius was a great disturber not only of Luther, but of other learned and good men of his university. As for himself, he was always ready to do his duty; first, in sending Luther to Cajetan the cardinal at the city of Augsburg, and afterwards, at the pope's command, would have sent him out of his dominions, had not Meltitz, the pope's own chamberlain, given contrary counsel to retain him still in his own country, fearing lest he might do more harm in other countries than where he was better known: and so now also he was as ready to do his duty, wherever right and equity required. But as in this cause he sees much hatred and violence shewn on one side, and no error yet convicted on the other side, but that it had rather the approbation of many well learned and sound men of judgment; and as also the cause of Luther was not yet heard before the emperor, therefore he desired the legates to arrange with the pope's holiness, that certain learned persons of gravity and upright judgment might be assigned to have the hearing and determination of this matter, and that his error might first be known and proved, before he was made a heretic, or his books burned. And then when he should see his error by manifest and sound testimonies of scripture, Luther should find no favour at his hands; otherwise he trusted that the pope's holiness would exact nothing of him, which he might not with equity and honour of his place and estate, reasonably perform, &c.

Then the cardinals, declaring to the duke again, that they could do no otherwise, than according to the form of their commission, and so they took the books of Luther, and shortly after set fire upon them, and openly burnt them. Luther hearing this, in like manner called together all the students and learned men in Wittenberg, and there taking the pope's decrees, and the bull lately sent down against himself, openly and solemnly, accompanied with a great number of people following him, he set them likewise on fire, and burnt them, on the 10th of December.

A little before these things passed between the pope and Martin Luther, the emperor had commanded and ordained a sitting or assembly of the states of all the empire to be held at the city of Worms, on the sixth day of January next ensuing. In which assembly, through the means of Duke Frederick, the emperor gave forth, That he would have the cause of Luther there brought before him, and so it was. For when the assembly was commenced in the city of Worms, afterwards, upon the sixth day of March following, the emperor, through the advice of Duke Frederick, directed his letters to Luther; signifying, that for so much as he had set forth certain books, he therefore, by the advice of his peers and princes about him, had ordained to have the cause brought before him in his own hearing, and therefore he granted him licence to come, and return home again. And that he might safely and quietly do so, he promised to him by public faith and credit, in the name of the whole empire, his passport and safe conduct; as by the instrument which he sent to him, he might the more fully be assured. Wherefore, without all doubt or distrust, he desired him to repair to him, and to be there present the one-and-twentieth day after the receipt thereof.

Martin Luther being thus provided with his safe conduct by the emperor, and after having been accursed at Rome upon Maunday Thursday, by the pope; he, shortly after Easter, speeds his journey to Worms; where he appeared before the emperor and all the states of Germany; how constantly he stuck to the truth, and defended himself, and answered his adversaries, shall now be detailed.

The Acts and Doings of Martin Luther before the Emperor at the City of Worms.

In the year 1521, about seventeen days after Easter, Martin Luther entered Worms, having been sent for by the Emperor Charles V., &c. And whereas Luther having published three years before certain propositions to be disputed in the town of Wittenberg in Saxony, against the tyranny of the pope—which, notwithstanding, were torn in pieces, condemned and burned by the papists, and yet convinced by no manifest scriptures, or probable reason—the matter began to grow to a tumult and agitation; and yet Luther maintained all the while openly his cause against the clergy. Upon this it seemed good to some, that Luther should be summoned, assigning to him a herald-at-arms, with a letter of safe conduct by the emperor and princes. Being sent for, he came, and was brought to the house of the knights of Rhodes, where he was lodged, well treated, and visited by many earls, barons, knights of the order, gentlemen, priests, and the commonalty, who frequented his lodging until night.

To conclude, he came, contrary to the expectation of many; for although he was sent for by the emperor's messenger, and had letters of safe conduct, yet, as a few days before his books had been condemned by public proclamation, it was much doubted by many whether he would come: especially as his friends deliberated together in a village nigh at hand, (where Luther was first advertised of these occurrences) and many persuaded him not to venture himself into such danger. When he had heard their whole persuasion and advice, he answered in this wise:—"As, since I am sent for, I am resolved and certainly determined to enter Worms, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; yea, although there were so many devils to resist me, as there are tiles to cover the houses in Worms."

The fourth day after his arrival, a gentleman, named Ulrich of Pappenheim, lieutenant-general of the men at arms of the empire, was commanded by the emperor, before dinner, to go to Luther, and to enjoin him to appear before his imperial majesty, the princes electors, dukes, and other estates of the empire, at four o'clock in the afternoon, to be informed of the cause of his being sent for; to which he willingly assented, as was his duty.

Therefore, at four o'clock, Ulrich of Pappenheim, and Caspar Sturm the emperor's herald, (who conducted Luther from Wittenberg to Worms,) came for Luther, and accompanied him through the garden of the knights of Rhodes, to the earl palatine's palace: and lest the people that thronged in should molest him, he was led by secret stairs to the place where he was appointed to have the audience. Yet, many who perceived this stratagem, violently rushed in, and were resisted, but in vain, and many ascended the galleries, because they desired to see Luther.

Thus standing before the emperor, the electors, dukes, earls, and all the estates of the empire assembled there, he was first advertised by Ulrich of Pappenheim to keep silence, until such time as he was required to speak. Then John Eckius, above-mentioned, who was the bishop of Trier's general official, with a loud and intelligible voice, first in Latin, then in Dutch, according to the emperor's command, said and proposed this sentence:—

"Martin Luther, his sacred and invincible imperial majesty hath enjoined, by the consent of all the estates of the holy empire, that thou shouldst be appealed before the throne of his majesty, to the end, that I might demand of thee these two points.

"First, whether thou confessest these books here, (for he shewed a heap of Luther's books, written in the Latin and Dutch tongues), and which are in all places dispersed, entitled with thy name, be thine, and that thou dost affirm them to be thine, or not?"

"Secondly, whether thou wilt recant and revoke them, and all that is contained in them, or rather meanest to stand to what thou hast written?"

Then, before Luther prepared to answer, Jerome Scurffus, a lawyer of Wittenberg, required that the titles of the books should be read. Forthwith Eckius named some of the books, and those principally which were printed at Basil, among which he named his Commentaries upon the Psalms, his book on Good Works, his Commentary upon the Lord's Prayer, and others which were not controversial.

After this, Luther answered in Latin and in Dutch:—

"Two things are proposed to me by his imperial majesty: First, whether I will avow all those books that bear my name. Secondly, whether I will maintain or revoke anything that I have devised or published. I will answer as briefly as I can.

"In the first place, I can do no otherwise than recognise those books to be mine, which were named; and, certainly, I will never recant any clause of them. In the second place, to declare whether I will wholly defend, or call back any thing contained in them; as there are questions of faith and the salvation of the soul, (and this concerns the word of God, which is the greatest and most excellent matter that can be in heaven or earth, and which we ought duly and evermore to reverence,) this might be accounted a rashness of judgment in me, and even a most dangerous attempt, if I should pronounce any thing before I were better advised, considering I might recite something less than the matter imports, and more than the truth requires, if I did not premeditate what I would speak. These two things being well considered, doth bring to my mind this sentence of our Lord Jesus Christ, where it is said, 'Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father, who is in heaven.' I require then for this cause, and humbly beseech his imperial majesty to grant me liberty and leisure to deliberate, so that I may satisfy the interrogation made to me, without prejudice of the word of God, and peril of mine own soul."

Whereupon the princes began to deliberate. Then Eckius, the prolocutor, pronounced their resolution, saying, "Although, master Luther, thou hast sufficiently understood, by the emperor's command, the cause of thy appearance here, and therefore dost not deserve to have any further respite given thee to determine; yet the emperor's majesty, of his mere clemency, grants to thee one day to meditate thy answer, so that to-morrow, at this hour, thou shalt exhibit thine opinion, not in writing, but pronounce the same with thy voice."

Then Luther was led to his lodging by the herald. But here I must not forget, that in the way as he was going to the emperor, and when he was in the assembly of the princes, he was exhorted by others to be courageous, and manly to demean himself, and not to fear them that can kill the body, but not the soul, but rather to dread him that is able to send both body and soul to everlasting fire.

He was encouraged too by the words of our Lord, that "When thou art before kings, think not what thou shalt speak, for it shall be given to thee in that hour what thou shalt say."

The next day, at four o'clock, the herald again came, and brought Luther from his lodging to the emperor's court, where he staid till six o'clock, for the princes were occupied in grave consultations; there he was surrounded with a great number of people, and almost smothered for the press that was there. Then, afterwards, when the princes were set, and Luther entered, Eckius, the official, began to speak in this manner:—

"Yesterday, at this hour, the emperor's majesty assigned thee to be here master Luther, for thou didst affirm those books that we named yesterday were thine. Further, to the interrogation made by us, whether thou wouldest approve of all that is contained in them, or retract and make void any part of them, thou didst require time for deliberation, which was granted, and is now expired. Although thou oughtest not to have had opportunity granted to deliberate, considering it was not unknown to thee wherefore we cited thee. And as concerning the matter of faith, every man ought to be so prepared, that at all times, whenever he shall be required, he may give certain and constant reason thereof; and thou, especially, being counted a man of such learning, and so long time exercised in theology. Then, go to, answer even now to the emperor's demand, whose clemency thou hast experienced in giving thee leisure to deliberate. Wilt thou now maintain all thy books which thou hast acknowledged, or revoke any part of them, and submit thyself?"

The official made this interrogation in Latin and in Dutch. Martin Luther answered in Latin and in Dutch, in this wise, modestly and lowly, and yet not without some stoutness of spirit, and christian constancy, so that his adversaries would gladly have had his courage more humbled and abased, but yet more earnestly they desired his recantation, of which they were in some hopes, when they heard him desire respite to make his answer:

His Answer was this:—

"Most magnificent emperor, and you most noble princes, and my most gentle lords, I appear before you here at the hour prescribed to me yesterday, yielding the obedience which I owe; humbly beseeching, for God's mercy, your most renowned majesty, and your graces and honours, that ye will minister to me this courtesy, to attend to this cause benignly, which is the cause, (as I trust,) of justice and truth. And if, by ignorance, I have not given to every one of you your just titles, or if I have not observed the ceremonies and countenance of the court, offending against them, it may please you to pardon me of your benignities, as one that hath frequented cloisters, and not courtly civilities. And first, as touching myself, I can affirm or promise no other thing, but only this; that I have taught hitherto in simplicity of mind, that which I have thought to tend to God's glory, and to the salvation of men's souls.

"Now, as concerning the two articles objected by your most excellent majesty, whether I would acknowledge those books which were named, and are published in my name, and whether I would maintain or revoke them, I have given a resolved answer to the first, in which I persist, and shall persevere for evermore, that these books are mine, and published by me in my name; unless it has since happened, by some fraudulent dealing of mine enemies, that there be any thing foisted into them, or corruptly altered. For I will acknowledge nothing but what I have written, and that which I have written I will not deny.

"Now, to answer the second article. I beseech your most excellent majesty, and your graces, to vouchsafe to give ear. All my books are not of one sort. There are some in which I have so simply and soundly declared, and opened the religion of christian faith, and of good works, that my very enemies are compelled to confess them to be profitable, and worthy to be read of all christians. And truly, the pope's bull, (how cruel and tyrannous soever it be,) judges some of my books to be blameless; although, with severe sentence he thunders against me, and with monstrous cruelty condemns my books; which books if I should revoke, I might worthily be thought to transgress the office of a true christian, and to be one that opposes the public confession of all people. There is another sort of my books, which contain invectives against the papacy, and others of the pope's retinue, who have, with their pestiferous doctrine, and pernicious examples, corrupted the whole state of our christianity. Nor can any deny or dissemble this, for universal experience, and common complaint of all bear witness to it, that the consciences of all faithful men are most miserably entrapped, vexed, and cruelly tormented by the pope's laws and doctrines of men. Also, that the goods and substance of christian people are devoured, especially in this noble and famous country of Germany, and even yet, in a most detestable manner, are suffered still to be devoured, without measure, by incredible tyranny; notwithstanding that they themselves have ordained to the contrary in their own proper laws, wherein they themselves have decreed, 'That all such laws of popes, as are repugnant to the doctrine of the gospel, and the opinions of the ancient fathers, are to be judged erroneous, and reprov'd.'

"If, then, I should revoke these, I do nothing but add more force to their tyranny, and open not only windows but wide gates to their impiety, which is likely to extend more wide and more licentious than ever; and by my retracting, their insolent assumptions shall be made more licentious, and less subject to punishment, intolerable to the common people, and more confirmed and established, especially if it be known that I have done this by the authority of your most excellent majesty, and the sacred Roman empire. O, Lord! what a cover or shadow shall I be then to cloak their naughtiness and tyranny!

"The rest, or third sort of my books, are such as I have written against some persons, to wit, against such as with tooth and nail labour to maintain the Romish tyranny, and to deface the true doctrine and religion which I have taught and professed. As to these, I plainly confess, I have been more vehement than my religion and profession required; for I make myself no saint, and I dispute not of my life, but of the doctrine of Christ.

"And these I cannot without prejudice call back; for, by this recantation it will come to pass, that tyranny and impiety shall reign, supported by my means, and so they shall exercise cruelty against God's people more violently and ragingly than before.

"Nevertheless, as I am a man, and not God, I can no otherwise defend my books, than did my very Lord Jesus Christ defend his doctrine; who being examined before Annas, and having received a buffet of the officials, said, 'If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil.'

"If the Lord, (who was perfect, and could not err,) refused not to have testimony given against his doctrine, yea of a most vile servant, how much the more ought I, who am but vile corruption, and can of myself do nothing but err, earnestly see and require if any will bear witness against my doctrine.

"Therefore, I require, for God's mercy, your most excellent majesty, your graces and right honourable lordships, or whatsoever he be of high or low degree, here to give his testimony to convict my errors, and confute me by the scriptures, either out of the prophets, or the apostles, and I will be most ready, if so instructed, to revoke any manner of error; yea, and I will be the first that shall consume mine own books, and burn them.

"I suppose it may seem, that I have well weighed beforehand the perils and dangers, the divisions and dissensions which have arisen throughout the whole world, by reason of my doctrine, whereof I was vehemently and sharply yesterday admonished. Concerning which divisions of men's minds, what other men judge I know not. As to myself, I conceive no greater delight in any thing, than when I behold discords and dissensions stirred up for the word of God; for such is the course and proceedings of the Gospel. Jesus Christ saith, 'I came not to send peace, but a sword; I came to set a man at variance with his father,' &c. (Matt. x. 34.)

"And, further, we must think, that our God is marvellous and terrible in his counsels; lest perhaps that which we endeavour with earnest study to achieve and bring to pass, (if we begin first with condemning his word,) may redound again to a sea of evil; and lest the new reign of this young and bounteous prince Charles, (in whom, next after God, we all conceive singular hope,) be lamentable, unfortunate, and miserably begun.

"I could exemplify this with authorities of the scriptures more effectually, as by Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, and the kings of Israel, who then most obscured the bright sun of their glory, and procured their own ruin, when by their counsels, and not by God's counsels, they attempted to pacify and establish their governments and realms; for it is he that entraps the wily in their wiliness, and subverts mountains before they be aware. Wherefore, it is good to dread the Lord.

"I speak not this, supposing that so politic and prudent heads have need of my doctrine and admonition, but because I would not omit to profit my country, and offer my duty or service. And thus I humbly commend myself to your most excellent majesty, and your honourable lordships, beseeching you that I may not incur your displeasure, or be contemned of you through the persecution of my adversaries. I have spoken."

Then Eckius, the emperor's prolocutor, with a stern countenance began, and said, "That Luther had not answered to any purpose. Neither behoved it him to call in question things concluded and defined by general councils; and, therefore, required of him a plain and direct answer, whether he would revoke or no?"

Then Luther.—"Considering, (said he,) your sovereign majesty and your honours require a plain answer, this I say and profess as resolutely as I may, without doubtfulness or sophistication, that if I be not convinced by testimonies of the scriptures, and by probable reasons, (for I believe not the pope, neither his general councils, which have erred many times, and have been contrary to themselves,) my conscience is so bound in these scriptures, and the word of God, which I have alleged, that I will not, and may not revoke any thing, considering it is not godly or lawful to do any thing against conscience. Hereupon I stand and rest. God have mercy upon me."

The princes consulted together upon this answer; and when they had diligently examined the same, the prolocutor began thus:—

"Martin," said he, "thou hast more immodestly answered than becometh thy person, and also little to the purpose. Thou dividest thy books into three sorts, in such a way as that all that thou hast said, makes nothing to the interrogation proposed; and, therefore, if thou hadst revoked those wherein the greatest part of thine errors is contained, the emperor's majesty, and the noble clemency of others, would have suffered the rest to sustain no injury. But thou dost revive, and bring to light again, all that the general council of Constance has condemned, which was assembled of all the nation of Germany, and now requirest to be convinced by the scriptures, wherein thou greatly errest. For what availeth it to renew disputation of things so long time condemned by the church and councils, unless it should be necessary to give a reason to every man of every thing that is concluded? Now if it should be permitted to every one that opposes the determination of the church and councils, that he must be convinced by the scriptures, we shall have nothing certain and established in Christendom.

"And this is the cause that the emperor's majesty requires of thee a simple answer, either negative or affirmative, whether thou mindest to defend all thy works as christian, or no?"

Then Luther turning to the emperor and the nobles, besought them not to force or compel him to yield against his conscience, confirmed with the holy scriptures, without manifest arguments alleged to the contrary by his adversaries.

"I have declared and rendered," said he, "mine answer simply and directly, neither have I any more to say, unless mine adversaries, with true and sufficient proofs, grounded upon the scripture, can reduce and resolve my mind, and refute mine errors which they lay to my charge. I am tied, as I said, by the scriptures; neither may I, or can I, with a safe conscience, assent to them. For as to general councils, with whose authority only they press me, I am able to prove, that they have both erred, and have defined many things contrary to themselves; and therefore the authority of them is not sufficient, for the which I should retract those things, the verity of which stands so firm and manifest in the holy scripture, that neither of me ought it to be required, nor could I do so without impiety."

The official again answered denying that any man could prove the councils could have erred. But Luther alleged that he could, and promised to prove it; and now night approaching, the lords rose and departed. And after Luther had taken his leave of the emperor, many Spaniards scorned and scoffed the good man in the way going to his lodging, hollowing and whooping after him a long while.

Upon the following Friday, when the princes electors, dukes, and other estates were assembled, the emperor sent to the whole body of the council a letter, containing in effect as follows:—

The Emperor's Letter.

"Our predecessors, who truly were christian princes, were obedient to the Romish church, which Martin Luther now opposes. And therefore inasmuch as he is not determined to retract his errors in any one point, we cannot, without great infamy and stain of honour, degenerate from the examples of our elders, but will maintain the ancient faith, and give aid to the see of Rome. And further, we are resolved to pursue Martin Luther and his adherents, by excommunication, and by other means that may be devised, to extinguish his doctrine. Nevertheless we will not violate our faith, which we have promised him, but mean to give order for his safe return to the place from whence he came."

The princes electors, dukes, and other estates of the empire, sat and consulted about this sentence, on Friday all the afternoon, and on Saturday the whole day, so that Luther had yet no answer from the emperor.

During this time, many princes, earls, barons, knights of the order, gentlemen, priests, monks, with others of the laity and common sort visited him. All these were present at all hours in the emperor's court, and could not be satisfied with the sight of him. Also there were bills set up, some against Luther, and some, as it seemed, with him. Notwithstanding many supposed, and especially such as well conceived the matter, that this was subtly done by his enemies, that thereby occasion might be offered to violate the safe conduct given to him. Which the Romish ambassadors with all diligence endeavoured to bring to pass.

The Monday following, the archbishop of Trier advertised Luther, that on Wednesday next he should appear before him, at nine of the clock, and assigned him the place. On St. George's day, a chaplain of the archbishop of Trier came to Luther, by the commandment of the bishop, signifying, that at that hour and place prescribed, he must on the morrow after appear before him.

The morrow after St. George's day, Luther obeying the archbishop's commandment, entered his palace, accompanied thither with his chaplain, and one of the emperor's heralds, and such as came in his company out of Saxony to Worms, with his chief friends. Then Dr. Voens, the Marquess of Baden's chaplain, began to declare and protest in the presence of the archbishop of Trier, Joachin Marquess of Brandenburg, George Duke of Saxony, the bishops of Augsburg and Brandenburg, and others, that Luther was not called there to be conferred with, or to a disputation, but only that the princes had procured licence of the emperor's majesty, through christian charity, to have liberty granted to them to exhort Luther benignly and brotherly.

He said further, that although the councils had ordained many things, yet that they had not determined contrary matters. And even though they had greatly erred, yet their authority was not therefore abased, or at the least they did not err so that it was lawful for every man to impugn their opinions.

He said moreover, that Luther's book would breed great tumult and incredible troubles; and that he abused the common sort with his book of christian liberty, encouraging them to shake off their yoke, and to confirm in them disobedience. The believers were all of one heart and soul, and therefore it was requisite and necessary to have laws. It was to be considered, said he, although he had written many good things, and, no doubt, of a good mind, as de triplice justitia, and other matters, yet how the devil now by crafty means goeth about to bring to pass, that all his works for ever should be condemned. For by these books which he wrote last, men, said he, would judge and esteem him, as the tree is known, not by the blossom, but by the fruit.

Here he added something of the noon devil, and of the spirit coming in the dark, and of the flying arrow. All his oration was exhortatory, full of rhetorical figures about honesty, the utility of laws, the dangers of conscience, of the commonwealth, repeating often, in his oration, that this admonition was given from a singular good will and great clemency. In concluding his oration, he added menaces, saying, that if Luther would abide in his intention, the emperor would proceed further, and banish him from the empire.

Martin Luther answered: "Most noble princes, and my most gracious lords, I render most humble thanks for your benignities and singular good wills, whence proceedeth this admonition; for I know myself to be safe, as by no means I can deserve to be admonished of so mighty estates."

Then he frankly pronounced, that he had not reprov'd all councils, but only the council of Constance; and for this principal cause, that it had condemned the word of God, which appeared in the condemnation of this article propounded by John Huss:—"The church of Christ is the communion of the predestinate." It is evident, said he, that the council of Constance abolished this article, and consequently the article of our faith; "I believe in the holy church universal;" and said, that he was ready to spend life and blood, if he were not compelled to revoke the manifest word of God; for in defence of it we ought rather to obey God than men. If Christ's sheep were fed with the pure pasture of the gospel: if the faith of Christ was sincerely preached, and if there were good ecclesiastical magistrates who duly would execute their office, we should not need, saith he, to charge the church with men's traditions. Further, he knew well we ought to obey the magistrates and higher powers, how unjustly and perversely soever they lived. We ought also to be obedient to their laws and judgment: all which he had taught, said he, in all his works; adding further, that he was ready to obey them in all points, so that they enforced him not to deny the word of God.

Then Luther was desired to stand aside, and the princes consulted what answer they might give him. This done, they called him into a parlour, where the aforesaid Dr. Voens repeated his former matters, admonishing Luther to submit his writings to the emperor, and to the princes' judgment.

Luther answered humbly and modestly, that he could not permit that men should say he would shun the judgment of the emperor, princes, and superior powers of the empire; he would not refuse to stand to their trial, and that he was contented to suffer his writings to be discussed, considered, and judged by the simplest, provided it were done by the authority of the word of God and the holy scriptures; and that the word of God made so much for him, and was so manifest to him, that he could not give place, unless they could confute his doctrine by the word of God. This lesson, said he, he learnt of St. Augustine, who writes, "That he gave this honour only to those books which are called canonical, that he believed the same only to be true. As touching other doctors, although in holiness and excellency of learning they surpassed, yet he would not credit them further than they agreed with the touchstone of God's word. Further, said he, 'St. Paul gives us a lesson, writing to the Thessalonians, 'Prove all things, hold fast that which is good;' and to the Galatians, 'Though an angel from heaven preach any other doctrine, let him be accursed.'"

Finally, he meekly besought them not to urge his conscience, which was bound by the word of God and holy scripture, to deny the same excellent word. And thus he commended his cause and himself to them, and especially to the emperor's majesty, requiring their favour that he might not be compelled to do any thing in this matter against his conscience: in all other causes he would submit himself with all kind of obedience and due subjection.

As Luther had thus ended his talk, Joachim the elector, Marquis of Brandenburg, demanded if his meaning was this, that he would not yield, unless he were convinced by the scripture. "Yea truly, right noble lord," quoth Luther, "or else by ancient and evident reasons." And so the assembly broke up, and the princes repaired to the emperor's court.

After their departure, the archbishop of Triers, accompanied with a few of his familiars, namely, John Eckius his official, and Cochleus, commanded Luther to repair into his parlour. With Luther was Jerome Scurfe and Nicholas Ambsdorff for his assistants.

They prayed him that he would submit his writing to the judgment of the next general council. Luther agreed to this, but with this condition, that they themselves should present the articles collected out of his books to be submitted to the council in such sort, as should be authorized by the scripture, and confirmed with the testimonies of the same.

They then leaving Luther, departed, and reported to the archbishop of Triers, that he had promised to submit his writings in certain articles, to the next council, and in the mean space that he would keep silence; which Luther never thought; who neither with admonitions, nor yet with menaces, could be induced to deny or submit his books to the judgment of men (he had so fortified his cause with clear and manifest authorities of scripture) unless they could prove by sacred scripture, and apparent reasons to the contrary.

It chanced then by the special grace of God, that the archbishop of Triers sent for Luther, thinking presently to hear him.

Then the archbishop intreated Luther, and conferred with him very gently, first removing such as were present. In this conference Luther concealed nothing from the archbishop; affirming that it was dangerous to submit a matter of so great importance to those who had already condemned his opinion, and approved the pope's bull.

Then the archbishop, bidding a friend of his draw nigh, required Luther to declare what remedy might be ministered to help this difficulty. Luther answered, "That there was no better remedy than such as Gamaliel alleged in the fifth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, saying, If this council, or this work, proceed of men it shall come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot destroy it. And so he desired that the emperor might be advertised to write to the pope, that he knew certainly that if this enterprise proceeded not of God, it would be abolished within three, yea within two years.

The archbishop inquired of him what he would do, if certain articles were taken out of his books to be submitted to the general council. Luther answered, "Provided that they be not those which the council of Constance condemned." The archbishop said, "I fear they will be the very same; but what then?" Luther replied, "I will not, and I cannot hold my peace on such matters, for I am sure by their decrees the word of God was condemned; therefore I will rather lose head and life, than abandon the manifest word of my Lord God."

Then the archbishop, seeing Luther would in nowise give over the word of God to the judgment of men, gently bid Luther farewell; who then prayed the archbishop to intreat the emperor's majesty to grant to him gracious leave to depart. He answered he would take order for him, and speedily advertise him of the emperor's pleasure.

Within a small while after, John Eckius the archbishop's official, in the presence of the emperor's secretary, said to Luther, by the command of the emperor, that since he had been admonished by his imperial majesty, the electors, princes, and estates of the empire, and notwithstanding would not return to unity and concord, it remained that the emperor, as advocate of the catholic faith, should proceed further; and it was the emperor's ordinance, that he should within twenty-one days return boldly under safe-conduct, and be safely guarded to the place from whence he came; provided that he raised no commotion among the people in his journey, either in conference or by preaching.

Luther hearing this, answered very modestly, and christianly; "Even as it hath pleased God, so is it come to pass, the name of the Lord be blessed." He said further, he thanked most humbly the emperor's majesty, and all the princes and estates of the empire, that they had given to him benign and gracious audience, and granted him safe-conduct to come and return. Finally he said, he desired none other of them, than a reformation according to the sacred word of God, and consonancy of holy scripture, which he desired in his heart: otherwise he was prepared to suffer all chances from his imperial majesty, as life, and death, goods, fame, and reproach; reserving nothing to himself, but the only word of God, which he would constantly confess to the end: humbly recommending himself to the emperor's majesty, and to all the princes and other estates of the sacred empire.

The morrow after, which was April 26, after he had taken his leave of such as supported him, and his benevolent friends that often visited him, he departed from Worms. The emperor's herald Casper Sturm followed and overtook him at Oppenheim, being commanded by the emperor to conduct him safely home.

The usual prayer of Martin Luther.

"Confirm in us, O God, what thou hast wrought, and perfect the work that thou hast begun in us, to thy glory. Amen."

Martin Luther thus being dismissed by the emperor, departed from Worms towards his country, accompanied with the emperor's herald, and the rest of his company, having only one-and-twenty days granted to him for his return. In the meantime he writes to the emperor, and to other nobles of the empire, repeating briefly to them the whole action and order of things there done, desiring of them their lawful good will and favour, which as he hath always stood in need of, so now he most earnestly craves, especially in this, that his cause, which is not his, but the cause of the whole church universal, may be heard with equity, and decided by the rule and authority of holy scripture: signifying moreover, that whenever they shall please to send for him, he shall be ready at their command, at any time or place, upon their promise of safety, to appear, &c.

During the time of these doings, the doctors and school-men of Paris were not behind hand, but to shew their cunning, condemned the books of Luther, extracting out of them certain articles as touching the sacraments, laws, and decrees of the church, equality of works, vows, contrition, absolution, satisfaction, purgatory, free-will, privileges of the holy church, councils, punishment of heretics, philosophy, school divinity, and other matters. Unto whom Philip Melancthon wrote an answer, and also Luther himself, though pleasantly and jestingly.

It was not long after this, that Charles the new emperor, to purchase favour with the pope (because he was not yet confirmed in his empire) provides and directs a solemn writ of outlawry against Luther, and all those that take his part; commanding Luther, wherever he might be got, to be apprehended, and his books burned. By which decree, proclaimed against Luther, the emperor procured no small thanks with the pope; so that the pope, ceasing to take part with the French King, joined himself wholly to the emperor. In the mean time Duke Frederick, to give some place to the emperor's proclamation, conveyed Luther a little out of sight secretly, by the help of certain noblemen whom he well knew to be faithful and trusty to him in that particular. There Luther being kept close and out of company, wrote several letters, and books to his friends; among which he dedicated one to his order of Augustinian friars, entitled, "The mass abolished:" the friars being encouraged by him, began at first to lay aside their private masses. Duke Frederick fearing lest it would breed some great stir or tumult, caused the judgment of the whole university of Wittenberg to be asked in the matter.

The opinion of the whole university being ascertained, it was shewn to the duke, that he would do well and godly, by the whole advice of the learned there, to command the use of the mass to be abolished through his dominions: and though it could not be done without tumult, yet that was no reason why true doctrine should be checked. Neither ought such disturbance to be imputed to the doctrine taught, but to the adversaries, who willingly and wickedly kick against the truth. For fear of such tumults therefore, we ought not to cease from that which we know should be done, but must go constantly forward in defence of God's truth however the world may esteem us, or rage against it. Thus they shewed their judgment to Duke Frederick.

It happened moreover about the same year and time, (A.D. 1521,) that King Henry VIII., pretending an occasion to impugn the book "On the Babylonish captivity," wrote against Luther. In which book,

1. He reproves Luther's opinion about the pope's pardons.

2. He defends the supremacy of the bishop of Rome.

3. He labours to refute all his doctrine of the sacraments.

This book, although it bore the king's name in the title, yet it was another that planned it, and another again who formed the style of it. But whoever had the labour of this book, the king had the thanks and also the reward. For the bishop of Rome gave to King Henry VIII., for the book against Luther, the style and title of "Defender of the Faith," and to his successors for ever.

Shortly after this, within the compass of the same year, Pope Leo, after he had warred against the French, and had got from them, through the emperor's aid, the cities of Parma, Piacentia, and Milan, sitting at supper, and rejoicing at three great gifts that God had bestowed upon him: said, 1. That he, being banished out of his country, was restored to Florence again with glory. 2. That he had deserved to be called apostolic. 3. That he had driven the Frenchmen out of Italy. After he had spoken these words, he was seized with a sudden fever, and died shortly after, being of the age of forty-seven years: some suspect that he died of poison. Adrian VI., schoolmaster to Charles the emperor, succeeded and lived not much above one year and a half in his papacy. This Adrian was a German, brought up at Louvaine; and as in learning he exceeded the common sort of popes, so in moderation of life and manners he seemed not so intemperate as some other popes. And yet like a right pope, nothing degenerating from his see, he was a mortal enemy to Martin Luther. In his time, shortly after the council of Worms was broken up, another meeting or assembly was appointed by the emperor at Nuremberg, of the princes, nobles, and states of Germany, A.D. 1522.

To this assembly Adrian sent his letters in manner of a brief, with an instruction also to his legate Cheregata, to inform him how to proceed, and what to allege against Luther, before the assembled princes. In this letter of instruction, among other matters, is the following admission by the pope himself, of the necessity of the reformation: he thus writes to his legate.

"This you shall say to them, that we confess ourselves, and deny not, but that God suffereth this persecution to be inflicted upon his church for the sins of men, especially of priests and prelates of the clergy. For certain it is, that the hand of the Lord is not shortened, that he cannot save; but our sins have divided between God and us, and therefore he hideth his face from us that he will not hear us. The scripture testifieth, that the sins of the people do issue out from the sins of the priests; and therefore, (saith St. Chrysostom) Christ, going about to cure the sick city of Jerusalem, first entered into the temple, to correct the sins of the priests like a good physician, who first begins to cure the disease from the very root. We know that in this holy see there have been many abominable things for a long time wrought and practised: as abuses in matters spiritual, and also excesses in life and manners, and all things turned clean contrary. And no marvel, if the sickness first beginning at the head, that is, at the high bishops, have descended afterward to inferior prelates. All have declined, every one after his own way; neither hath there been one that hath done good, no not one. Wherefore there is need that we all give glory to God, and that we humble our souls to him, considering every one of us from whence he hath fallen; and that every one do judge himself before he be judged of God in the rod of his fury. For the redress whereof you shall insinuate to them, and promise in our behalf, that in us shall be lacking no diligence of a better reformation, first beginning with our own court; that like as the contagion first from thence descended into all the inferior parts; so reformation and amendment of all that is amiss, from the same place again, shall take its beginning. To that they shall find us so much the more ready, because we see the whole world so desirous of the same. We ourselves, (as you know) never sought this dignity, but rather desired, if we otherwise might, to have led a private life, and in a quiet state to serve God: and also would utterly have refused the same, had not the fear of God, and the manner of our election, and mis-doubting of some schism to follow after, urged us to take it. And thus took we the burthen upon us, not for any ambition of dignity, or to enrich our friends and kinsfolks, but only to be obedient to the will of God, and for reformation of the catholic church, and for relief of the poor, and especially for the advancement of learning and learned men, with such other things more as appertains to the charge of a good bishop and lawful heir of St. Peter. And though all errors, corruptions, and abuses be not straightways amended by us, men ought not thereat to marvel. The sore is great, and far grown, and is not single, but of manifold maladies together compacted, and therefore to the curing of it we must proceed by little and little, first beginning to cure the greater and the most dangerous, lest while we intend to amend all, we destroy all. All sudden mutations in a commonwealth, (saith Aristotle) are perilous: and he that wringeth too hard, straineth out blood."

The Answer of the noble and reverend Princes, and States of the sacred Roman Empire, exhibited to the Pope's Ambassador.

"The noble and renowned prince Lord Ferdinand, Lieutenant to the emperor's majesty, with other reverend peers in Christ, and mighty princes electors, and other states and orders of this present assembly of the Roman empire in Nuremberg convened, have gratefully received, and diligently perused the letters sent in form of a brief, with the instructions also of the most holy father in Christ and Lord, Lord Adrian, the high bishop of the holy and universal church of Rome, presented unto them in the cause of Luther's faction.

"By the aforesaid letters and writings, they first understand his holiness to have been born, and to have had his native origin and parentage out of this noble nation of Germany, at which they do not a little rejoice. Of whose great virtues and ornaments, both in mind and body, they have heard great fame and commendation, even from his tender years: by reason whereof they are so much the more joyous of his advancement and preferment, by such consent of election, to the height of the apostolical dignity, and yield to God most hearty thanks for the same: praying also, from the bottom of their hearts, for his excellent clemency, and the perpetual glory of his name, and for health of souls, and the safety of the universal church, that God will give his holiness long continuance of felicity: having no misdoubt, but that, by such a full and consenting election of such a pastor of the universal catholic church, great profit and advantage will ensue. Which thing to hope and look for, his holiness openeth to them an evident declaration in his own letters, testifying and protesting what a care it is to him both day and night, how to discharge his pastoral function, in studying for the health of the flock to him committed: and especially in converting the minds of christian princes from war to peace. Declaring moreover, what subsidy and relief his holiness hath sent to the soldiers of Rhodes, &c. All which things they having considered with themselves, conceive exceeding hope and comfort in their minds, thus reputing and trusting that this concord of christian princes will be a great help and stay to the better quieting of things now out of frame; without which neither the state of the commonwealth, nor of the christian religion, can be rightly redressed, and much less the tyranny of the barbarous Turks repressed.

"Wherefore the excellent prince, lord lieutenant to the emperor's majesty, with the other princes electors, and orders of this present assembly, most heartily do pray, that his holiness will persist in this his purpose and diligence, as he hath virtuously begun, leaving no stone unremoved; so that the disagreeing hearts of christian princes may be reduced to quiet and peace; or if that will not be, yet at least some truce and intermission of domestic dissensions may be obtained for the necessity of the time now present, whereby all christians may join their powers together, with the help of God, to go against the Turk, and to deliver the people of Christ from his barbarous tyranny and bondage. Whereunto both the noble prince lord lieutenant, and other princes of Germany, will put to their helping hands, to the best of their ability.

"And whereas by the letters of his holiness, with his instruction also exhibited unto them by his legate, they understand that his holiness is afflicted with great sorrow for the prospering of Luther's sect, whereby innumerable souls, committed to his charge, are in danger of perdition, and therefore his holiness vehemently desireth some speedy remedy against the same to be provided, with an explication of certain necessary reasons and causes, whereby to move the German princes thereunto; and that they will tender the execution of the apostolic sentence, and also of the emperor's edict set forth touching the suppressing of Luther. To these the lord lieutenant, and other princes and states do answer, that it is to them no less grief and sorrow than to his holiness; and also they do lament as much for these impieties and perils of souls, and inconveniences which grow in the religion of Christ, either by the sect of Luther, or any otherwise. Further, what help or counsel shall lie in them for the extirpating of errors, and decay of souls' health, what their moderation can do, they are willing and ready to perform; considering how they stand bound and subject, as well to the pope's holiness, as also to the emperor's majesty. But why the sentence of the apostolic see, and the emperor's edict against Luther, hath not been put in execution hitherto, there hath been (said they) causes great and urgent, which have led them thereto; as first, in weighing and considering with themselves, that great evils and inconveniences would thereupon ensue. For the greatest part of the people of Germany have always had this persuasion, and now by reading Luther's books, are more therein confirmed that great grievances and inconveniences have come to this nation of Germany by the court of Rome; and therefore if they should have proceeded with any rigor in executing the pope's sentence, and the emperor's edict, the multitude would conceive and suspect in their minds, this to be done for subverting the verity of the gospel, and for supporting and confirming the former abuses and grievances, whereupon great wars and tumults, no doubt, would have ensued: which thing of the princes and states there hath been well perceived by many arguments. For the avoiding whereof, they thought to use more gentle remedies, serving more opportunely for the time.

"Again, whereas the reverend lord legate (said they) in the name of the pope's holiness, hath been instructed, to declare unto them, that God suffereth this persecution to rise in the church for the sins of men, and that his holiness doth promise therefore to begin the reformation with his own court, that as the corruption first sprang from thence to the inferior parts, so the redress of all again should first begin with the same: also, whereas his holiness, of a good and fatherly heart, doth testify in his letters that he himself did always dislike that the court of Rome should intermeddle so much, and derogate from the concordates of the princes, and that his holiness doth fully purpose in that behalf, during his papacy, never to practice the like, but so to endeavour, that every one, and especially the nation of the Germans, may have their proper due and right, granting especially to the said nation his peculiar favour: who seeth not by these premises, but that this most holy bishop omitteth nothing which a good father, or a devout pastor may or ought to do to his sheep? Or who will not be moved hereby to a loving reverence, and to amendment of his defaults; namely, seeing his holiness so intendeth to accomplish the same in deed, which in word he promiseth, according as he hath begun?

"And thus undoubtedly, both the noble lord lieutenant, and all other princes and states of the empire, well hope that he will, and pray most heartily that he may do, to the glory of our eternal God, to the health of souls, and to the tranquillity of the public state. For unless such abuses and grievances, with certain other articles also, which the secular princes (assigned purposely for the same) shall draw out in writing, shall be faithfully reformed, there can be no true peace and concord between the ecclesiastical and secular estates, nor can any true extirpation of this tumult and errors in Germany be expected; for partly by long wars, and partly by reason of other grievances and hindrances, this nation of Germany hath been so wasted and consumed in money, that it is scarcely able to sustain itself in private affairs, and necessary upholding of justice within itself; much less than to minister aid and succour to the kingdom of Hungary, and to the Croations, against the Turk. And whereas all the states of the sacred Roman empire do not doubt, but the pope's holiness doth right well understand how the German princes did grant and condescend for the money of annates to be levied to the see of Rome for a certain term of years, upon condition that the said money should be converted to maintain war against the Turkish infidels, and for the defence of the catholic faith: and whereas the term of these years having now long since expired, when the said annates should have been gathered, and yet that money hath not been so bestowed to that use for which it was first granted. Wherefore if any such necessity should now come, that any public contributions should be demanded of the German people against the Turk, they would answer again, Why has not that money of annates, which was reserved many years before, not been bestowed and applied to that use; and so they would refuse to allow any more such burthens to be laid upon them for that cause.

"Wherefore the said lord lieutenant, and other princes and degrees of the empire, make earnest petition, that the pope's holiness will with a fatherly consideration expend what had been collected, and cease hereafter to require such annates which are accustomed to be paid to the court of Rome, on the death of bishops, and other prelates or ecclesiastical persons, and suffer them to remain to the chamber of the empire, whereby justice and peace may be more commodiously administered, the tranquillity of the public state of Germany maintained, and also that by the same, due helps may be obtained and disposed to other christian potentates in Germany against the Turk, which otherwise without the same is not to be hoped for.

"1. Whereas the pope's holiness desireth to be informed in what way it may be best to take in resisting those errors of the Lutherans. To this the lord lieutenant, with other princes and nobles, did answer, that whatsoever help or counsel they can devise, with willing hearts they will be ready to give. Seeing therefore that the state, as well ecclesiastical as temporal, is far out of frame, and have so much corrupted their ways; and seeing not only of Luther's part, and of his sect, but also by divers other occasions besides, so many errors, abuses, and corruptions have crept in; it is requisite and necessary that some effectual remedy be provided, as well for redress of the church, as also for repressing the Turk's tyranny. Now the lord lieutenant and other estates and princes do not see that any more present or effectual remedy can be had than this, that the pope's holiness, by the consent of the emperor's majesty, do summon a free christian council in some convenient place of Germany, as at Strasburg, or at Mentz, or at Coblentz, and that it may be with as much speed as convenient, so that the congregation of the said council be not deferred above one year: and that in this council it may be lawful for every person that there shall have interest, either temporal or ecclesiastical, freely to speak and consult, to the glory of God, and health of souls, and the public wealth of Christendom, without impeachment or restraint, whatsoever oath or other bond to the contrary notwithstanding: yea, and it shall be every good man's part there to speak, not only freely, but to speak that which is true, to the purpose, and to edifying, and not to pleasing or flattering, but simply and uprightly to declare his judgment, without all fraud or guile. And as touching by what ways these errors and tumults of the German people may best be stayed and pacified in the meantime, until the council be set, the foresaid lord-lieutenant, with the other princes, thereupon have consulted and deliberated, that forasmuch as Luther, and certain of his fellows, be within the territory and dominions of the noble Duke Frederick, the said lord-lieutenant, and other states of the empire, shall so labour the matter with the afore-named prince, duke of Saxony, that Luther and his followers, shall not write, set forth, or print anything during the said mean space: neither do they doubt but that the said noble prince of Saxony, for his christian piety, and obedience to the Roman empire, as becometh a prince of such excellent virtue, will effectually condescend to the same.

(1) Annates was a certain portion of money wont to be paid to the court of Rome, out of the first year's fruits at the vacation of an ecclesiastical living.

"II. The said lord-lieutenant and princes shall labour so with the preachers of Germany, that they shall not in their sermons teach or blow into the people's ears such matter whereby the multitude may be moved to rebellion or uproar, or to be induced into error; and that they shall preach and teach nothing but the true, pure, sincere, and holy gospel, and approved scripture, godly, mildly, and christianly, according to the doctrine and exposition of the scripture, being approved and received of Christ's church, abstaining from all such things which are better unknown than learned of the people, and which to be subtly searched, or deeply discussed, is not expedient. Also, that they shall move no contention of disputation among the vulgar sort; but whatsoever hangeth in controversy, the same they shall reserve to the determination of the council to come.

"III. The archbishops, bishops, and other prelates within their diocese, shall assign godly and learned men, having good judgment in the scripture, which shall diligently and faithfully attend upon such preachers; and if they shall perceive the said preachers either to have erred, or to have uttered anything inconveniently, they shall godly, mildly, and modestly advertise and inform them thereof, in such sort as that no man shall justly complain of the truth of the gospel being impeached. But if the preachers, continuing still in their stubbornness, shall refuse to be admonished, and will not desist from their lewdness, then shall they be restrained and punished by the ordinaries of the place.

"Besides, the said princes and nobles shall provide and undertake, so much as shall be possible, that, from henceforth during the aforesaid time, no new book shall be printed, especially none of these famous libels, neither shall they be privily or openly sold. Also order shall be taken amongst all potentates, that if any shall set out, sell, or print any new work, it shall first be seen and perused of certain godly, learned, and discreet men appointed for that purpose; so that if it be not admitted and approved by them, it shall not be permitted to be published in print, or to come abroad. Thus by these means they hope, that the tumults, errors, and offences among the people, shall cease; especially if the pope's holiness himself shall begin with an orderly and due reformation, in the above-mentioned grievances, and will procure such a free and christian council as hath been said, and if so, then the people will be well contented and satisfied. Or if the tumult shall not so fully be calmed as they desire, yet the greater part will thus be quieted; for all such as are honest and good men, no doubt, will be in great expectation of that general council which will shortly be assembled. Finally, as concerning priests which contract matrimony, and religious men leaving their cloisters, whereof intimation was also made by the apostolical legate, the aforesaid princes do consider, that forasmuch as in the civil law there is no penalty for those that are ordained, they shall be referred to the canonical constitutions, to be punished thereafter accordingly, that is, by the loss of their benefices and privileges, or other condign censures, and that the said ordinaries shall in no case be stopped or inhibited by the secular powers from the correction of such; but that they shall add their help and favour to the maintenance of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and shall direct in their public edicts and precepts, that none shall impeach or prohibit the said ordinaries in their ecclesiastical castigation upon transgressors.

"To conclude, the redoubted prince lord-lieutenant, and other princes, estates, and orders of the empire, vehemently and most heartily do pray and beseech, that the pope's holiness, and the reverend lord his legate will accept and take all the premises to be no otherwise spoken and meant, than of a good, free, sincere, and a christian mind. Neither is there anything that all the aforesaid princes, estates, and nobles, do more wish and desire, than the furtherance and prosperous estate of the holy catholic church of Rome, and of his holiness. To whose wishes, desires, and obedience, they offer and commend themselves most ready and obsequious, as faithful children."

Thus hast thou, loving reader, the full discourse, both of the pope's letter, and of his legate's instructions, with the answer also of the states of Germany to the said letter and instructions, to them exhibited in the diet of Nuremburg. Also, what was concluded at the said diet, and what order and consultation was taken, first touching the grievances of Germany, which they exhibited to the pope, then concerning a general council to be called in Germany, also for printing, preaching, and for priests' marriage, hath been likewise declared, &c.

The disturbance about priests' marriage, was occasioned first by the ministers of Strasburg, who about this time began to take wives, and they therefore were cited by the bishop of Strasburg to appear before him on a certain day, as violaters of the laws of holy church, of the holy fathers, the bishops of Rome, and of the emperor's majesty, to the prejudice both of their own order of priesthood, and of the majesty of Almighty God; but they referred their cause to the hearing of the magistrates of the same city, who, being suitors for them unto the bishops, laboured to have the matter either released, or at least to be delayed for a time.

It would be tedious to recite all the circumstances following upon this diet or assembly of Nuremburg; how their decree was received of some, of some neglected, of divers diversely wrested and expounded. It may be enough to say that the states address the pope to convene a general council to settle and determine these matters, and they enact the Interim, which required that all persons should be silent, and all publications cease, and all changes of religion be unlawful until such general council should assemble and decide.

In the same session of Nuremburg mention was made of certain grievances to the number of an hundred, exhibited to the bishop of Rome. From these one hundred grievances, thus publicly complained of in the diet by the princes of Germany, the world may see and judge not only what abuses and corruptions, monstrous and incredible, lay hid under the glorious title of the holy church of Rome, but may also understand with what hypocrisy and impudence the pope takes upon him so grievously to complain against Luther and others, when in all the universal church of Christ there is none so much to be blamed in every way as he himself appears by these complaints of the German princes against the pope's intolerable oppressions and grievances. It would be too long to insert all these one hundred grievances thus solemnly objected to in the diet; but the few which follow will illustrate the then corrupt state of the church of Rome.

A Complaint for selling Remission of Sins for Money.

The burden and grievance of the pope's indulgences and pardons is most insupportable. The bishops of Rome, under pretence of building some church in Rome, or to war against the Turks, do make out their indulgences with their bulls, persuading and promising to the simple people strange and wonderful benefits of remission à pena et culpa, that is, from all their sins and punishment due for the same, and that not in this life only, but also after this life, to them that are burning in the fire of purgatory. Through the hope, of which true piety is almost extinct in all Germany, while every evil-disposed person promises to himself, for a little money, license and impunity to do what he pleaseth: whereupon followeth fornication, adultery, perjury, homicide, robbing, and spoiling, rapine, usury, with a whole flood of all mischiefs, &c.

A Complaint against the Immunities of Clergymen.

Whoever that hath received any ecclesiastical orders, great or small, thereby contends to be freed from all punishment of the secular magistrate, how great soever his offence may be: neither doth he unadvisedly presume thereupon, but is maintained in that liberty to sin, by the principal estates of the clergy. For it hath often been seen, that whereas by the canonical laws priests are forbidden to marry, they afterwards diligently labour and go about day and night to tempt matrons, virgins, and the wives, daughters, and sisters of the laymen; and through their continual importunity and labour, partly with gifts and rewards, and flattering words, partly by their secret confessions (as they call them) as it has been found by experience, they bring to pass that many virgins and matrons, which otherwise would be honest, have been overcome and moved to sin and wickedness: and it happeneth oftentimes, that they do detain and keep away the wives and daughters from their husbands and fathers, threatening them with fire and sword that do require them again. Thus, through their raging immorality, they heap and gather together innumerable mischiefs and offences. It is to be marvelled at, how licentious, without punishment they daily offend in robberies, murder, accusing of innocents, burning, rapine, theft, and counterfeiting of false coin, besides a thousand other kinds of mischiefs, contrary and against all laws both of God and man, not without great offence of others, trusting only upon the freedom and liberty of sin, which they usurp to themselves by the privilege of their canons.

Wherefore necessity and justice doth require, that the privileges of the clergy should be abrogated and taken away, and in their place it be provided, ordained, and decreed, that the clergy, of what order or degree soever they be, shall have like laws, like judgment and punishment as the laity have; so that they pretend no prerogative or freedom in like offence, more than the laymen; but that every one of the clergy offending, under the judge where the offence is committed, shall be punished for his act, according to the measure and quality of his offence, in such manner as other malefactors are, with the punishment appointed by the common laws of the empire.

Moreover, the common people are not a little oppressed with the great number of holy-days, for there are now so many holy-days, that the husbandmen have scarcely time to gather the fruits of the earth, which they have brought forth with so great labour and travel, being often in danger of hail, rain, and other storms, which fruits notwithstanding, if they were not prevented with so many holy-days, they would gather and bring home without any loss. Besides, upon these holy-days innumerable offences are committed and done, rather than God honoured or worshipped. Which thing is so manifest, that it needeth no witness. For that cause the estates of the sacred empire think it best and most profitable for the christian commonwealth, that this great number of holy-days should be diminished, which ought rather to be celebrated in spirit and truth, than with the external worship, and be better kept with abstinence from sin.

Baptizing of Bells.

Also the bishops have invented, that no other but themselves may baptize bells for the lay people, whereby the simple people upon the affirmation of the suffragans do believe that such bells so baptized will drive away evil spirits and tempests. Whereupon a great number of godfathers are appointed, especially such as are rich, which at the time of baptizing, holding the rope wherewithal the bell is tied, the suffragan speaking before them, as is accustomed in the baptizing of young children, they altogether do answer, and give the name to the bell. The bell having a new garment put upon it, as is accustomed to be done unto the christians; after this they go unto sumptuous banquets, whereunto also the gossips are bidden, that thereby they might give the greater reward; and the suffragans, with their chaplains and other ministers, are sumptuously fed. Yet doth not this suffice, but that the suffragan also must have a reward, which they do call a small gift or present; whereby it happeneth oftentimes, that even in small villages a hundred florins are consumed and spent in such christenings. Which is not only superstitious, but also contrary unto the christian religion, a seducing of the simple people, and mere extortion. Notwithstanding the bishops, to enrich their suffragans, do suffer these things, and others far worse. Wherefore such wicked and unlawful things ought to be abolished.

Complaint of Officials for maintaining unlawful Usury.

Furthermore, the officials being allured through the greedy and insatiable desire of money, do not only not forbid unlawful usuries and gains of money, but also suffer and maintain the same. Moreover, they taking a yearly stipend and pension, do suffer the clergy and other religious persons unlawfully to dwell with their concubines and harlots, and to beget children by them. Both which things how great peril, offence, and detriment they do bring both unto body and soul, every man may plainly see (so that it need not to be rehearsed) except he will make himself as blind as a mole.

Complaint of Officials permitting unlawful cohabitation with others, when the Husband or Wife are long absent.

Furthermore, where it so happeneth (as it doth oftentimes) that either the good man, or the good wife, by means of war, or some other vow, hath taken in hand some long journey, and so tarrieth longer than serveth the appetite of the other, the official, taking a reward of the other, giveth licence to the party to dwell with any other person, not having first regard, or making inquiry whether the husband or wife, being absent, be in health or dead. And because these their doings should not be evil spoken of, they name it a toleration of sufferance, not without a great offence to all men, and to the great contempt of holy matrimony.

Complaint against Incorporations or Impropriations, and other plundering of the People by Churchmen.

Many parish churches are subject unto monasteries, and to the parsons of other churches, by means of incorporations, as they call them, or otherwise, which they are bound also, according to the canon laws, to foresee and look unto by themselves, when as they do put them forth unto others to be governed, reserving for the most part unto themselves the whole stipend of the benefits and tithes; and moreover aggravate and charge the same with so great pensions, that the hiring priests, and other ministers of the church, cannot have thereupon a decent and competent living. Whereby it cometh to pass, that these hiring priests (for they must needs have whereupon to live) do with unlawful exactions miserably spoil and devour the poor sheep committed unto them, and consume all their substance. For when the sacraments of the altar and of baptism are to be administered, or when the first, the seventh, the thirteenth, and the year-day must be kept; when auricular confession cometh to be heard, the dead to be buried, or any other ceremony whatsoever about the funeral is to be done, they will not do it freely, but extort and exact so much money, as the miserable commonalty is scarce able to disburse; and daily they do increase and augment these their exactions, driving the simple poor people to the payment thereof, by threatening them with excommunication, or by other ways compelling them to be at such charge: which otherwise through poverty are not able to maintain obsequies, year-minds, and such other like ceremonies, as to the funerals of the dead be appertaining.

Also in many places the bishops and their officials do not only suffer priests to have concubines, so that they pay certain sums of money, but also compel continent and chaste priests, which live without concubines, to pay tribute for concubines, affirming that the bishop hath need of money, which being paid, it shall be lawful for them either to live chaste, or to keep concubines. How wicked a thing this is, every man doth well understand and know.

These, with many other burthens and grievances to the number of an hundred, the secular states of Germany delivered to the pope's legate, having, as they said, many more grievous grievances besides these, which had likewise much need of redress; but because they would not exceed the limits of reasonable brevity, they would content themselves, they said, with these hundred, reserving the rest to a more apt and more convenient opportunity, steadfastly trusting and hoping that when those hundred grievances should be abolished, the other would also decay and fall with them. This was about A. D. 1523. Which being done, the assembly of Nuremberg broke up for a time, and was prorogued to the next year.

In the meantime Pope Adrian died. After him succeeded Pope Clement VII., who, A. D. 1524, sent down his legate, Cardinal Campejus, to the council of the German princes assembled again at Nuremberg, with letters also to Duke Frederick, full of many fair petitions and sharp complaints, &c. But as to the grievances above-mentioned, no word nor message at all was sent, neither by Campejus, nor by any other. Thus, when any thing was to be complained of against Luther, either for suppression of the liberty of the gospel, or for upholding of the pope's dignity, the pope was ever ready with all diligence to call upon the princes; but when any redress was to be required for the public weal of christian people, or touching the necessary reformation of the church, the pope gives neither ear nor answer.

And having thus discoursed of what passed between the pope and princes of Germany, at the diet of Nuremberg, let us now proceed again to the history of Luther, of which you have heard before, how he was kept secret and solitary for a time, by certain nobles in Saxony, because of the emperor's edict. In the meantime, while Luther had thus absented himself from Wittenberg, Andrew Carolostad, proceeding more roughly and eagerly in matters of religion, had excited the people to throw down images in the temples. Luther, returning again to the city, greatly reproved the rashness of Carolostad, declaring that such proceedings were not orderly, but that pictures and images ought first to be thrown out of the hearts and consciences of men, and that the people ought first to be taught, that we are saved before God, and please him only by faith, and that images serve to to no good purpose. This being done, and the people being well instructed, there would be no danger in images, but they would fall of their own accord. Not that he would maintain images, or suffer them; but that their removal ought to be done by the magistrate, and not by every private man without order and authority.

The cause why Luther opposed that violent throwing down of images, and against Carolostad, seems partly to arise because Pope Adrian, in his letters to the princes and states of Germany, grievously complains and charges the followers of Luther with sedition and tumults, and rebellion against magistrates, as subverters and destroyers of all order and obedience. Therefore Luther, to stop the mouth of such slanderers, and to prevent such sinister suspicions, was forced to proceed as much as was possible, with order and authority.

But while Luther, for these causes differed from the more vehement proceedings of Carolostad, he also differed somewhat from Zuinglius. Now though Luther went a little astray, and dissented from Zuinglius in this one matter of sacrament; yet in all other doctrines they accorded, as appeared in the synod at Marburg, which was A. D. 1529, where both Luther and Zuinglius were present, and conferring together, agreed in these articles:

1. On the unity and trinity of God. 2. In the incarnation of the Word. 3. In the passion and resurrection of Christ. 4. In the article of original sin. 5. In the article of faith in Christ Jesus. 6. That this faith cometh not of merits, but by the gift of God. 7. That this faith is our righteousness. 8. Touching the external word. 9. Likewise they agreed in the articles of baptism. 10. Of good works. 11. Of confession. 12. Of magistrates. 13. Of men's traditions. 14. Of baptism of infants. 15. Lastly, concerning the doctrine of the Lord's Supper: this they did believe and hold; first, that both the kinds thereof are to be ministered to the people according to Christ's institution, and that the mass is not the means by which a man may obtain grace both for the quick and the dead. Also that the sacrament (which they call of the altar) is a true sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord. And that the spiritual eating of his body and blood is necessary for every christian man. And furthermore, that the use of the sacrament tends to the same effect as the word, given and ordained by Almighty God, that thereby infirm consciences may be stirred to belief by the Holy Ghost, &c.

In all these sums of doctrine Luther and Zuinglius consented and agreed, nor were their opinions so different in the matter of the Lord's Supper, but that in the principal points they accorded. For if the question be asked of them both, what is the material substance of the sacrament, which our outward senses behold and feel? they will both confess bread, and not the accidents only of bread. Further, if the question be asked, whether Christ be there present? they will both confess his true presence to be there, only in the manner of presence they differ. Again, ask whether the material substance laid before our eyes in the sacrament, is to be worshipped? they will both deny it, and judge it idolatry. And likewise for transubstantiation, and the sacrifice of the mass, they both do abhor, and do deny them; as also they agree that the communion in both kinds should be administered.

Only their difference is in this, concerning the sense and meaning of the words of Christ, Hoc est corpus meum. This is my body, &c. which words Luther expoundeth to be taken nakedly and simply as the letter standeth, without trope or figure, and therefore holdeth the body and blood of Christ truly to be in the bread and wine, and so also to be received with the mouth. Uldric Zuinglius, with John Oecolampadius, and others, do interpret these words otherwise, as to be taken not literally, but with a spiritual meaning, and to be expounded by a trope or figure, so that the sense of these words: "This is my body," is thus to be expounded: this signifieth my body and blood. With Luther the Saxons consented. The Helvetians coincided with Zuinglius. And as time went on, so the division of these opinions increased and spread farther; the one part being called from Luther, Lutherans; the other having the name of Sacramentaries. Notwithstanding, in this one unity of opinion, both the Lutherans and Sacramentaries accorded and agreed, that the bread and wine there present is not transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ, but is a true sacrament of the body and blood.

Luther lived until the age of sixty-three, and had continued writing and preaching about twenty-nine years. As to his death, the words of Melancthon are these:

"In the year of our Lord 1546, and on the 17th of February, Dr. Martin Luther sickened a little before supper of his accustomed malady, the oppression of humours in the orifice or opening of the stomach, of which I remember I have seen him often diseased in this place. This sickness became violent after supper, he struggling against it, and retired into his chamber, and there rested on his bed two hours, during all which time his pains increased. And as Dr. Jonas was lying in his chamber, Luther awakened, and prayed him to rise, and to call up Ambrose his children's schoolmaster, to make fire in another chamber. When he entered it, Albert earl of Mansfeld, with his wife, and others, at that instant came into his chamber. Finally, feeling his fatal hour approach, before nine o'clock in the morning, February 18th, he commended himself to God with this devout prayer.

The Prayer of Luther at his death.

"My heavenly Father, eternal and merciful God, thou hast manifested unto me thy dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; I have taught him, I have known him, I love him as my life, my health, my redemption; whom the wicked have persecuted, maligned, and with injury afflicted. Draw my soul to thee."

"After this he said, thrice: 'I commend my spirit into thy hands, thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life.' John iii. 16.

"Having repeated oftentimes his prayers, he was called to God, to whom he so faithfully commended his spirit, to enjoy, no doubt, the blessed society of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles in the kingdom of God, the Father, Son, and the Holy Ghost. Let us now love the memory of this man, and the doctrine that he taught. Let us learn to be modest and meek: let us consider the wretched calamities and marvellous changes, that shall follow this sorrowful event. I beseech thee, O Son of God, crucified for us, the risen Emmanuel, govern, preserve, and defend thy church."

Frederick Prince Elector died long before Luther, in the year of our Lord 1525, leaving no issue behind him, for he lived a single life, and was never married; and was succeeded by John Frederick duke of Saxony.

After this council of Nuremberg, immediately followed another sitting at Ratisbone, where were present Ferdinand, Campejus, the cardinal of Salisburg, the two dukes of Bavaria, the bishops of Trent and Ratisbone; also the legates of the bishops of Bamberg, Spire, Strasbourg, Augsburgh, Constance, Basil, Prising, Passame, and Brixime. By whom in the said assembly it was concluded:

That forasmuch as the emperor, at the request of Pope Leo, had condemned, by his public edict set forth at Worms, the doctrine of Luther as erroneous and wicked; and also as it was agreed upon in both the assemblies of Nuremberg, that the said edict should be obeyed of all men; they likewise, at the request of Cardinal Campejus, do will and command the aforesaid edict to be observed through all their fines and precincts: that the gospel, and all other holy scriptures, should be taught in churches according to the interpretation of the ancient fathers: that all they who revive any old heresies before condemned, or teach any new thing contumeliously, either against Christ, his blessed mother and holy saints, or which may breed any occasion of sedition, are to be punished according to the tenor of the edict aforesaid: that none be admitted to preach without the licence of his ordinary: that they who are already admitted, shall be examined how, and what they preach: that the laws which Campejus is about to set forth for reformation of manners, shall be observed: that in the sacraments, in the mass, and all other things, there shall be no innovation, but all things to stand as in before time they did: that all they which approach to the Lord's Supper without confession and absolution, or do eat flesh on days forbidden, or which do run out of their order; also priests, deacons, and sub-deacons, that be married, shall be punished: that nothing shall be printed without consent of the magistrate: that no book of Luther, or any Lutheran shall be printed or sold, &c. And lest it might be said, that this faction of Luther takes its origin in the corrupt life of priests, Campejus, with his assistants in the convocation of Ratisbone, charges and commands, that priests should live honestly, go in decent apparel, play not the merchants, haunt not the taverns, be not covetous, nor take money for their ministration; and that such as keep concubines should be removed; the number also of holy-days was to be diminished, &c.

These things Campejus wished to have had enacted in a full council, and with the consent of all the empire: but when he could not accomplish it, because the minds of many were gone from the pope; he was fain there to get it ratified in this conference, with the assents of the bishops above named.

The matters which have been discoursed upon may more fully be seen in the commentaries of John Sleidan; it now remains for us, after having finished the history of Martin Luther, to touch upon the history of Zuinglius, and the Helvetians.

The Acts and Life of Zuinglius; and of the receiving the Gospel in Switzerland.

In the treating of Luther's history, mention was made of Ulric Zuinglius, who first lived at Glarons, in a place then called our Lord's hermitage, from thence he removed to Zurich, about A. D. 1519, and there began to teach, dwelling in the Minster, among the canons or priests of that close, using with them the same rites and ceremonies during the space of two or three years, where he continued reading and explaining the scriptures to the people, with great pains and no less dexterity. And as Pope Leo the same year had renewed his pardons again through all countries, Zuinglius zealously withstood them, detecting such abuses by the scriptures, and such other corruptions as reigned then in the church, and so he continued for the space of two years and more, till at length Hugo, bishop of Constance, wrote his letter to the senate of the said city of Zurich, complaining grievously of Zuinglius. He also wrote another letter to the college of canons, where Zuinglius was dwelling, complaining of those new teachers who troubled the church, and exhorted them earnestly to beware, and to take diligent heed to themselves. And as both the pope and the imperial majesty had condemned all such new doctrine, by their decrees and edicts, he willed them therefore to admit no such new innovations of doctrine, without the common consent of those to whom they appertained. Zuinglius hearing of this, refers his cause to the judgment and hearing of the senate, not refusing to render to them an account of his faith. And as the bishop's letter was read openly in the college, Zuinglius directs another letter to the bishop, declaring that the said letter proceeded not from the bishop, and that he was not ignorant who were the authors thereof, desiring him not to follow their sinister counsels; because truth, said he, is a thing invincible, and cannot be resisted. After the same tenor, certain other persons of the city likewise wrote to the bishop, desiring him that he would attempt nothing that should be prejudicial to the liberty and free course of the gospel; requiring, moreover, that he would restrain the filthy and infamous lives of the priests, and that he should permit them to have their lawful wives, &c. This was A.D. 1522.

Besides this, Zuinglius wrote also another letter to the whole nation of the Swiss, admonishing them in no case to hinder the course of pure doctrine, nor to bring any trouble upon the priests that were married. For as for the vow of their single life, it came, saith he, from the devil, and a devilish thing it is. And, therefore, as the Swiss had a right and custom in their towns, that when they received a new priest into their churches, they used to advise him to take his concubine, Zuinglius exhorted them to grant permission to them to take their wives in honest matrimony, rather than to take concubines, against the precept of God.

Thus, as Zuinglius continued some years, labouring in the word of the Lord, offence began to rise at this doctrine, and the Dominican friars began to preach against him. But he, ever keeping himself within the scriptures, protested that he would make good by the word of God, what he taught. Upon this, the magistrates and senate of Zurich, sent forth a command to all priests and ministers within their dominions, to repair to the city of Zurich, against the nine-and-twentieth day of January next ensuing, (A.D. 1523,) and there every one to speak freely, and to be heard quietly, touching these controversies of religion, directing also their letters to the bishop of Constance, that he would either repair there himself, or else send his deputy. When the appointed day came, the bishop's vice-gerent, John Faber, was present. The consul first stating the object of this assembly, required that if any one had to object against the doctrine of Zuinglius, he should freely and quietly declare his mind.

Zuinglius had set forth all his doctrine in order, to the number of sixty-seven articles, which articles he published, that they who were so disposed, might be the better prepared for the disputation. Faber began to state the cause of his being sent there, and argued that neither the time nor the place were fit for discussing such matters, but that the matter belonged to a general council. Zuinglius, however, still continued requiring him, that if he had any thing to say, he would openly and freely say it. To this he answered, that he would confute his doctrine by writing. After this, when no man appeared to dispute, the assembly broke up. Upon which the senate of Zurich caused it to be proclaimed through all their dominion, that the traditions of men should be abandoned, and that the gospel of Christ should be purely taught out of the Old and New Testament.

After these things the cantons of Switzerland direct their public letters to the men of Zurich, wherein they made much lament, and complain of this new broached doctrine, which had set all men together by the ears, through the occasion of certain rash and new fangled heads, who have greatly disturbed both the state of the church and of the commonwealth, and have scattered the seeds of discord. For now all fasting was laid down, and all days are alike to eat both flesh and eggs, as well one as another. Priests and religious persons, both men and women, broke their vows, ran out of their order, and fell to marrying. God's service was decayed, singing in the church left, and prayer ceased. Priests grew in contempt. Religious men were thrust out of their cloisters. Confession and penance was neglected, so that men would not stick to presume to receive at the holy altar, without any confession previously made to the priest. The holy mass derided and scorned. Our blessed lady, and other saints, blasphemed. Images cast down and broken in pieces. Neither was there any honour given to the sacrament. To make short, men had now assumed such a licence and liberty, that even the Holy Ghost could not be safe in the priest's hands, &c.

All this disorder, as it is of no small importance, so it was, said they, so grievous and lamentable, that they thought it their duty to suffer it no longer. They sent unto them before the like admonition, and also wrote to them by certain of the clergy, and craving their aid in the same; which seeing it is so, they did now again earnestly call upon them touching the premises, desiring them to put an end to such doings, and to take a better way, continuing in the religion of their ancestors which were before them. And if there were any such thing, wherein they were grieved and offended against the bishop of Rome, the cardinal, bishops, or other prelates, either for their ambition in heaping, exchanging and selling the dignities of the church, or for their oppression in emptying men's purses by their indulgences, or else for their usurped jurisdiction and power, which they extend too far, and corruptly apply it to matters external and political, which only ought to serve in such cases as be spiritual. If these, and such other abuses, were the causes wherewith they were so grievously offended, they promised that for the correction and reformation thereof, they would also themselves join their diligence and good will thereto; for so much therefore they would confer with them, how and by what way such grievances might best be removed.

To this effect were the letters of the Helvetians written to the senate and citizens of Zurich. To which, their answer was as follows:—

An Answer again of the Men of Zurich.

"First, declaring, how their ministers had laboured and travelled among them, teaching and preaching the word of God for the space of five years; whose doctrine at first seemed to them very strange and novel, because they never heard it before. But after they understood and perceived the scope of that doctrine only to tend to this, to set forth Christ Jesus to us, as the pillar and refuge of our salvation, who gave his life and blood for our redemption, and who only delivers us from eternal death, and who is the only advocate of mankind before God; they could not do otherwise, but receive with ardent affection so wholesome and joyful a message.

"The holy apostles and faithful christians, after they had received the gospel of Christ, did not fall out in debate and variance, but lovingly agreed and consented together: and so they trusted (said they) that they should do, if they would likewise receive the word of God, setting aside men's doctrines and traditions different from it.

"Whatever Luther or any other man teaches, whether it be right or wrong, is not such for the names of the persons, but only because it agrees or disagrees with the word of God.

"And if Christ only is worshipped, and men are taught to repose their confidence solely in him, neither the blessed Virgin, nor any saint, receives any injury.

"And whereas they charge their ministers with wresting the scriptures after their own interpretation, God had stirred up such a light now in the hearts of men, that the most part of their city have the bible in their hand, and diligently peruse it: so that their preachers cannot so wrest the scriptures, but it would quickly be perceived.

"And whereas they have accused them of error, yet there was never any man who could prove any error in them: although the bishops of Constance, of Basil, of Curiake, with others of the universities, and themselves also had desired to do so; yet to this day neither they nor any other did so.

"And if the bishops object and say that the word of God ought not to be handled by vulgar people, they answered that it was not consistent with equity and reason. For although it belonged to the bishop's office

(1) If the scope of doctrine be well marked between the papists and the protestants, it will not be hard for any man to judge which is the true doctrine. For the whole end and scope of the pope's doctrine tendeth to set up the honour and wealth of man, as may appear by the doctrine of supremacy, of confession, of the mass of the sacrament of the altar, &c. All which do tend to the magnifying of priests; like as purgatory, obsequies, pardons, and such others as serve for their profit. Contrariwise, the teaching of the protestants, as well touching justification, original sin, as also the sacraments and invocation, and all other such like, tend only to the setting up of Christ alone, and casting down of man. —FOX.

to provide that the sheep should not go astray; yet because they will not see to their charge, but leave it undone, referring every thing to the fathers and to councils; therefore it was right that they should hear and learn, not what man determines, but what Christ himself commands in the scripture. Neither have their ministers given any occasion for this division; but rather they, who for their own private lucre and preferments, contrary to the word of the Lord, seduce the people into error, and grievously offending God, provoke him to plague them with manifold calamities.

"As for the eating of flesh and eggs, it was free to all men, and forbidden to none by Christ."

"And as to matrimony, God himself was the author of it, and he hath left it free for all men. Also St. Paul desires a minister of the church to be the husband of one wife."

"And seeing that bishops for money permit their priests to have concubines, which is contrary to God's law, and to good example, why then might they not as well obey God in permitting lawful matrimony, which he has ordained, as resist God in forbidding it? The same is to be said also of women vowing celibacy."

"And as for monasteries, and other houses of canons, they were first given for relief only of the poor and needy; whereas now those who inhabit them are wealthy, and able to live on their own patrimony. Yet nevertheless the men of Zurich have used such moderation, that they have permitted the inhabitants of those monasteries to enjoy their possessions during the term of their natural life, lest any one should have cause of just complaint."

"Ornaments of churches serve nothing towards God's service; but it agrees well with the service of God that the poor should be relieved. Christ commanded the young man in the gospel not to hang up his riches in the temple, but to sell them, and distribute them to the needy."

"The order of priesthood they do not condemn; such priests as will discharge their duty, and teach soundly, they prize and magnify. As for the other rabble, who serve to no public good, but rather damnify the commonwealth, if the number were diminished by little and little, and their livings put to better use, they doubted not but it would be a service well done to God."

"As for secret confession, in which men tell their sins in the priest's ear, of what virtue this confession is they leave it in suspense. But that confession, whereby repenting sinners fly to Christ, our only intercessor, they account not only as profitable, but also necessary to all troubled consciences. As for satisfaction, which priests use, they reckon it but a practice to get money, and not only erroneous, but also full of impiety. True penance and satisfaction is, for a man to amend his life."

"The orders of monks come only by the invention of man, and not by the institution of God."

"And as to the sacraments, such as are of the Lord's institution, they do not despise, but receive with all reverence. And so with reverence they use the sacrament of the Lord's supper, according as the word of God prescribes, not as many abuse it, making it an oblation and a sacrifice."

"Wherefore, as before, so now again they desire that if they think their doctrine repugnant to the holy scripture, they would gently shew and teach them their error." And thus much was contained in the answer of the men of Zurich unto the letter of their colleagues of Helvetia.

In the meantime the bishop of Constance, with the advice of his council, answered them as he was requested to do, in a book, wherein he declares what images and pictures those were which the profane Jews and Gentiles adored, and what images these are which the church has received and admitted; and what difference there is between those idols of the Jews and Gentiles, and these images of the christians. The conclusion was, that whereas the scripture speaks against images, and permits them not to be suffered, that, said he, is to be understood of such images and idols, as the Jews and idolatrous Gentiles used; and not such images and pictures as the church has received.

From this he enters into the discourse of the mass, where he endeavours to prove by the pope's canons and councils, that the mass is a sacrifice and oblation.

This book he sent to the senate of Zurich, about the beginning of June, exhorting them not to suffer their images, or the mass to be abrogated; and shortly afterwards he published the book in print, and sent it to the priests and canons of the Minister of Zurich, requiring them to follow the custom of the church.

The senate, in answer to the bishop's book, about the middle of August wrote to him; declaring that they had read over and over again his book with all diligence: and that they were glad that he had sent it abroad in print, because the whole world thereby would the better judge between them. After this, they explained to him the judgment and doctrine of their ministers and preachers: and finally, by the authority and testimonies of the scriptures, proved the doctrine of his book to be false. But before they sent their answers to him, about the thirteenth day of June, they commanded all the images within the city, and through all their dominions, to be taken down and burned quietly, and without any tumult.

And in the month of April following, the magistrates and senate of the city of Zurich, commanded the mass, with all its ceremonies, to be suppressed, both within the city, and throughout all their jurisdiction: and instead thereof was placed the Lord's supper, the reading of the prophets, prayer, and preaching.

All this while the gospel was not as yet received in any other part of Helvetia, but only in Zurich. Wherefore the other twelve towns appointed a meeting at Baden: where were present among the divines, John Faber, Eckius, and Murnerus. The bishops also of Lucerne, Basil, Coire, and Lausanne, sent their deputies there. The questions there propounded were these.

That the true body and blood of Christ is in the sacrament.

That the mass is a sacrifice for the quick and dead.

That the blessed Virgin, and other saints, are to be invoked as mediators and intercessors.

That images ought not to be abolished.

That there is a purgatory

Which conclusions or assertions, Eckius took upon him to defend. Against him reasoned Oecolampadius, (who was then chief preacher at Basil) with others. Zuinglius at that time was not present, but by writing confuted the doctrine of Eckius; declaring the causes of his absence: which were, that he durst not, for fear of his life, commit himself to the hands of his enemies: and that he refused not to dispute, but only the place of the disputation; and that if they would assign the place of disputation, either at Zurich, or at Berne, or at Saintgallum, he would not refuse to come. The conclusion of the disputation was this, that all should remain in that religion which they had hitherto kept, and should follow the authority of the council, and should not admit any new doctrine within their dominions, &c.

As the time proceeded, and discussion about religion increased, it followed the next year after, (A.D. 1527,) in the month of December, that the senate and people of Berne assigned another disputation within their city, and called to it all the bishops near them; warning them both to come themselves, and to bring their divines with them, or else to lose all such possessions as they had within the bounds of their precinct. After this they appointed certain ecclesiastical persons to dispute, prescribing and determining the whole disputation to be decided only by the authority of the old and new testament. To all that would come, they granted a safe conduct. Also, they

(1) It was the pope's law then, that in Lent no man should eat flesh, or eggs, nor any other white meat; wherein it may seem to be verified what St. Paul had prophesied, 1 Tim. iv. "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats," &c.

appointed, that all things should be done modestly, without injury and brawling words; and that every one should have leave to speak his mind freely, and with such deliberation, that every man's saying might be received by the notary, and penned: with this proviso previously arranged, that whatever should be agreed upon, should be ratified and observed through all their dominions: and that men might come there better prepared, they propounded in public writing, ten questions to be defended of their ministers by the scriptures; the ministers were, Francis Colbus, and Berthold Halletus. The questions were these.

1. That the true church, whereof Christ is the head, rises out of God's word, and continues in the same, and hears the voice of no other.

2. That the same church makes no laws without the word of God.

3. That the traditions, ordained in the name of the church, do not bind, but so far as they are consonant to God's word.

4. That Christ only has made satisfaction for the sins of the world: and therefore if any man say that there is any other way of salvation, or any other means to put away sin, he denies Christ.

5. That the body and blood of Christ cannot be received really and corporally, by the testimony of the scripture.

6. That the use of the mass, in which Christ is said to be present and offered up to his heavenly Father, for the quick and the dead, is against the scripture, and injurious to the sacrifice which Christ made for us.

7. That Christ only is to be invoked, as the mediator and advocate of mankind with God the Father.

8. That there is no place to be found in the holy scripture, wherein souls are purged after this life; and, therefore, all those prayers and ceremonies, yearly dirges, and obits, which are bestowed upon the dead; also lamps, tapers, and such other things, profit nothing at all.

9. That to set up any picture or image to be worshipped, is repugnant to the holy scripture: and, therefore, if any such are erected in churches for that intent, they ought to be taken down.

10. That matrimony is prohibited to no state or order of men, but for avoiding fornication generally is commanded and permitted to all men by the word of God. And as all immoral persons are excluded from the communion of the church, therefore this unchaste and filthy single life of priests, is most of all inconvenient for the order of priesthood.

When the senate and people of Berne had sent abroad their letters with these questions to all the Helveticans, exhorting them both to send their learned men, and to suffer all others to pass safely through their countries: several of the cantons refused to take any part, or suffer their divines to take any part, in the proposed discussion, saying, that it was not lawful for any nation or province to alter the state of religion, but that it belonged to a general council: wherefore, they desired them that they would not attempt any such wicked act, but continue in the religion which their parents and elders had observed: and in fine, they concluded, that they would neither send, nor suffer any of their learned men to come, nor yet grant safe conduct to any others to pass through their country.

Notwithstanding this, the lords of Berne proceeding in their purpose, upon the day prescribed (which was January 7) began their disputation. Of all the bishops there was not one present; but the city of Basil, Zurich, Strasburg, Augsburg, Constance, and others, sent their ambassadors to it.

The doctors of the city of Berne began the disputation. There were present Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Bucer, Capito, Blaurokus, with others,—all of whom defended the affirmative of the conclusions propounded. On the other side, the chief was Conrad Tregerus an Augustinian friar, who, when he, to prove his assertion, was driven out of the scriptures, sought help of other authority, but the moderators of the disputation would not permit it, (as being contrary to the order before arranged) so he departed, and would dispute no more.

The disputation continued nineteen days; in the end it was agreed by the assent of the most part, that the conclusions were consonant to the truth of God's word, and should be ratified not only in the city of Berne, but also proclaimed by the magistrates in other cities adjoining; and that masses, altars, and images, in all places, should be abolished.

At the city of Constance, some things began to be altered a little before. And now, after this disputation at Berne, the images and altars, with ceremonies and masses, were abolished at Constance.

They of Geneva also, were not behind in following the example of the city of Berne, in extirpating images and ceremonies. By reason of which the bishop and clergy left the city in no small anger.

To commemorate this event, they caused a pillar to be erected, and thereupon to be placed in golden letters, the day and year when this reformation from popery to true christianity began among them, as a perpetual memorial to all posterity to come. This was A. D. 1528.

After the account of this disputation at Berne had reached other cities, the ministers of Strasburg began likewise to affirm and teach, that the mass was wicked, and a great blasphemy against God's holy name, and therefore should be abolished, and the right use of the Lord's supper restored. On the other hand, the bishop of Rome's clergy held that the mass was good and holy; which kindled great contention on both sides: when the senate and magistrates of that city would have brought the matter to a discussion, but they could not, because the priests would not consent; they therefore commanded them to silence.

For a long time the bishop of Strasburg succeeded in putting off the change of religion, till at last the senate of Strasburg, seeing the matter hang in controversy for the space of two years, and the preachers daily calling upon them for a reformation; and petition also having been made to them by the citizens, assembled in their great council to the number of three hundred, as they are accustomed to do on great matters of importance. And there debating the case with themselves, some declaring on one side, if they abolished the mass, what danger they should incur from the emperor. On the other side, if they did not, how much they should offend God; and, therefore, giving time to consult, required them, at the next meeting, to declare their sentence in the matter. When the day came the voices and judgments of those who went against the mass, prevailed. Upon which immediately a decree was made, the twentieth of February, A. D. 1529, that the mass should be suspended till the Romanists could prove by good scripture, the mass to be a service available and acceptable before God.

This decree being established by the consent of the whole city, the senate soon commanded it to be proclaimed, and to take full effect, so far as their limits and dominion extended; and afterward by letters certified their bishop touching the matter.

Thus the mass was overthrown in Zurich, in Berne, and Geneva, and in Strasburg, you have heard. Now, what followed in Basil, remains to be stated. In Basil was Oecolampadius, a preacher, by whose diligent labour and travel, the gospel began to take such effect, that there arose great dissension among the citizens about religion, and especially about the mass. Upon this the senate of Basil appointed, That after an open discussion it should be determined by voices, what was to be done.

Owing to the intrigues of some of the senate, this discussion was delayed, and the reformation retarded. The citizens proceeded to violent measures, armed themselves, and proceeded to coerce the senate. It happened the very same day, that certain of the citizens, such as were appointed to go about the city to see things in order, came into the church, where one of them thrusting at a certain image with his staff, it fell down and broke. Other images also were served after the same sort of devotion. When the priests came running to them, the citizens, as they would not go beyond their commission, departed.

When word was brought to the citizens in the market.

place, the matter seemed worse to them than it really was, so they sent three hundred armed men to rescue their fellows in the church, supposing them to be in danger. On coming to the church, and not finding their fellows there, and all things quiet, save only a few images broken down, they, likewise, lest they should have lost all their labour, threw down all the other idols and images which they found standing there; and so passing through all the churches in the city, did the same. And when some of the senate came forth to appease the tumult, the citizens said, "What you have been consulting and advising about for these three years, whether it were best to be done or not, we have despatched in one hour, that from henceforth no more contentions may arise between us for images;" and so the senate permitted them free leave, without any more resistance. A decree at the same time was made, that as well within the city of Basil as without, throughout their whole jurisdiction, the mass, with all idols, should be abandoned; and, further, that in all such matters and cases as concerned the glory of God and the affairs of the public weal, besides the number of the other senators, two hundred and sixty of the burghers or citizens should be appointed out of every ward in the city to sit with them in council. These decrees being established, after they had kept watch and ward about the city three days and nights, every one returned again to his house, quiet and joyful, without any blood or stroke given, or anger wreaked, but only upon the images.

On the third day, which was Ash Wednesday, all the wooden images were distributed among the poor of the city, to serve them for firewood. But when they could not well agree in dividing the prey, but fell to brawling among themselves, it was agreed that the images should be burned all together; so that, in nine great heaps, all the stocks and idols were the same day burned to ashes before the great church door. And thus, by God's ordinance, it came to pass, that the day in which the pope's priests shew forth all their mourning, and mark men's foreheads with ashes, in remembrance that they are but ashes, was to the whole city a festival, and joyful day, for turning their images to ashes; and so the day is observed and celebrated every year still, to this present time, with all mirth, plays, and pastimes, in remembrance of the ashes, which day may there be called rightly, Ash Wednesday of God's own making.

All this time the emperor and the French king were together occupied in wars and strife; which, as it turned to the great damage and detriment of the French king, who was taken prisoner by the emperor, so it happened most opportunely for the success of the Gospel; for otherwise, these Helvetians, and other Germans, should not have had that leisure and rest to reform religion, and to link themselves in league together, as they did. But thus Almighty God, of his secret wisdom, disposes times and occasions to serve his will and purpose in all things. Although Ferdinand, the emperor's brother, and deputy in Germany, lost no time nor diligence to do what he could in resisting the proceedings of the Protestants, as appeared both by the decree set forth at Ratisbone, and also at Spire, in which council of Spire, Ferdinand, at the same time, (A.D. 1529,) had decreed against the Protestants in effect, as follows:—

"First, That the edict of the emperor made at Worms, should be in force through all Germany, till the general council, which should shortly follow. Also, that they who had already altered their religion, and now could not revoke the same for fear of sedition, should attempt no more innovations till the time of the general council.

"Also, That the doctrine of those who hold the Lord's supper otherwise than the church teaches, should not be received, nor the mass altered. And that all ministers of the church should be enjoined to use no interpretation of holy scripture, but the exposition of the church doctors; while other matters that were disputable, were not to be touched. Also, that all persons and states should keep peace, so that for religion neither party should molest the other. All who should transgress these decrees, were to be outlawed and exiled."

To this session at Spire the ambassadors of Strasburg were not admitted, but refused by Ferdinand, because they had rejected the mass. And, therefore, the city of Strasburg refused to pay any contribution against the Turk, unless they, with the other German states, were admitted to the councils. The other princes which were received, and who opposed the decree, and shewed their case in an elaborate protestation, written for that purpose, were—John, duke of Saxony; George, elector of Brandenburg; Ernest and Francis, earls of Lunenburg; the Landgrave of Hesse; and the prince of Anhalt. All such cities as subscribed and consented to the protestation of these princes, soon joined themselves in a common league with them, upon which they received the name, and were therefore called PROTESTANTS. The names of the cities were these,—Strasburg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, Rottigen, Windseim, Memmingen, Lindaw, Kempton, Heilbron, Wissemburg, Nortlingen, Saint Gall.

As to the council of Augsburg, which followed the year after the assembly of Spire, (A.D. 1530,) how the princes and protestants of Germany exhibited their confession in the council, and what labour was sought to confute it, and how constantly duke Frederick persisted in defence of his conscience, against the threatening words and replies of the emperor; also, in what danger the princes had been, had not the Landgrave privately, by night, slipped out of the city, need not, as yet, be detailed.

To return, therefore, to Zuinglius and the Helvetians. The two cantons of Zurich and Berne, who had reformed their religion, were grossly insulted by the five other cantons, who insultingly hanged the arms of those two cities on a gallows, which led to a war between them, (A.D. 1531.)

The French king, with other townships of Switzerland, laboured to bring them to agreement, drawing out certain conditions of peace between them, which conditions were:—That all contumelies and injuries should be forgotten. That, hereafter, neither part should molest the other. That they who were banished for religion, should again be restored. That the five cantons might remain without disturbance in their religion, so that none should be restrained among them from the reading of the Old and New Testament. That no kind of disturbance should be raised against those of Berne and Zurich; and that all should confer mutual helps together, one to succour the other, as in times past. But the five cantons would not observe these covenants. Wherefore the men of Zurich and Berne, declaring, first, their cause in public writing, to excuse the necessity of their war, being pressed with so many wrongs, and constrained to take the sword in hand, beset the high-ways and passages, that no victuals or other forage should come to the other cantons. When they of the five towns began to be pinched with want and penury, they armed themselves secretly, and set forward in warlike array towards the borders of Zurich. There was a garrison of the Zurich men there, to the number of a thousand and more. And word was sent to the city of Zurich to succour their men with speed; but their enemies approached so fast that they could hardly come to rescue them: for, when they were come to the top of the hill, they saw their fellows in great distress in the valley under them. Upon which, they encouraging themselves, made down the hill with more haste than order, striving who might go fastest; but the nature of the hill was such, that there could but one go down at once, and so were discomfited and overmatched by the multitude. Among the slain was Ulric Zuinglius, the blessed servant and saint of God.

As to the cause which moved Zuinglius to go out with his citizens to the war, it is sufficiently declared and excused by Sleidan, and especially by Oecolampadius. It was an old received custom among the Zurich men, that when they went forth in warfare, the chief minister of the church went with them. Zuinglius, also, being a man of courage, considering if he should remain at home when war was attempted against his citizens, and if he, who in his sermons so encouraged others, should now faint so cowardly, and tarry behind when the time of danger came, thought that he ought not to refuse to take part with his brethren.

Oecolampadius adds, that he went out, not as a captain of the field, but as a good citizen with his citizens, and a good shepherd ready to die with his flock. And which of them all, saith he, that most cry out against Zuinglius, can shew any such noble heart to do the like? Again, neither did he go out of his own accord, but rather desired not to go, foreseeing, belike, what danger thereof would ensue. But the senate being importunate upon him, would have no refusal, urging him to go; among whom were thought to have been some false betrayers, objecting to him, that he was a dastard if he refused to accompany his brethren, as well in time of danger as in peace. When he was slain, great cruelty was shewn upon the dead corpse by his popish enemies; such was their hatred to him, that their malice could not be satisfied, unless also they should burn his dead body.

The report goes, that after his body was cut, first in four pieces, and then consumed with fire, three days after his death his friends came to see whether any part of him was remaining, and they found his heart in the ashes, whole and unburned, in much the same way as was also the heart of Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, which, as it is reported, was found unconsumed in the ashes.

Such, too, was the rage of these five popish cantons, against the abbot Cappello, who was also killed, that they took his dead body, and putting out both its eyes, clothed it in a monk's cowl, and set it in the pulpit to preach, railing and jesting upon him in a most despicable manner. Ulric Zuinglius was, when he died, forty-four years of age—y younger than Martin Luther by four years.

Oecolampadius the preacher of the city of Strasburg, hearing of the death of Zuinglius his dear friend, took thereat inward grief and sorrow, so that it is thought to have increased his disease, and so he also departed this life, Nov. A. D. 1531, being of the age of forty-nine years, elder than Martin Luther by one year. Although this Oecolampadius then died, yet his learned and famous commentaries upon the prophets, with other works which he left behind him, live still, and shall never die.

The year following, which was A. D. 1532, in the month of August, died also the worthy and memorable prince John Frederick Duke of Saxony, who for testimony of Christ and of his gospel, sustained such trials and so vehement conflicts with the emperor, and that especially at the council assembled at Augsburg, that unless the almighty hand of the Lord had sustained him, it had not been possible for him, or any prince, to have endured so constant and unmoveable against so many persuasions and assaults, as he did to the end. After him succeeded John Frederick his son, &c.

And thus have you the history of Zuinglius, and of the church of Switzerland, with their proceedings and troubles, from the first beginning of their reformation of religion.

From the beginning of this book, good reader, thou hast heard of many troubles in the church of Christ, concerning the reformation of various abuses and great errors that had crept into the church of Rome. What godly man has there been, within the space of these five hundred years, either virtuously disposed, or excellently learned, who has not disapproved the disorderly doings and corrupt examples of the see and bishop of Rome from time to time, to the coming of Luther? It may well be wondered at, that as this Romish bishop had great enemies from time to time, speaking and working, preaching and writing against him, yet no one could ever succeed till the coming of Luther. The cause of this seems to be, that while others before him, when speaking against the pomp, pride, and avarice of the bishop of Rome, charged him only, or chiefly, with the manner of life. Luther went further, charging him not only with evil life, but also with evil learning; not with his doings, but with his doctrine; not picking at the rind, but plucking up the root; not seeking the man, but shaking his seat; yea and charging him with plain heresy, as prejudicial and injurious to the blood of Christ, contrary to the true understanding of the sacred testament of God's holy word. For while the foundation of our faith, grounded upon the holy scripture, teaches and leads us to be justified only by the merits of Christ, and the price of his blood; the pope, with a contrary doctrine, teaches us to seek our salvation not by Christ alone, but by the way of men's meriting and deserving by works. Whereupon rose divers sorts of orders and religious sects among men, some professing one thing and some another, and every man seeking his own righteousness, but few seeking the righteousness of him who is appointed by God to be our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

Martin Luther, therefore, reducing all things to the foundation and touchstone of the scripture, opened the eyes of many who before were drowned in darkness. It cannot be expressed what joy, comfort, and consolation came to the hearts of men, some lying in darkness and ignorance, some wallowing in sin, some in despair, some macerating themselves by works, and some presuming upon their own righteousness, to behold that glorious privilege of the great liberty and free justification in Christ Jesus. And to speak briefly, the more glorious did the benefit of this doctrine appear to the world after long ignorance, so the greater was the persecution that followed. And where the elect of God took most occasion of comfort and of salvation, there the adversaries found most matter for vexation and disturbance, as we commonly see the word of God bring with it discession and trouble; and therefore truly it was said of Christ, that he came not to send peace on earth but the sword. And this was the cause why, after the doctrine and preaching of Luther, so great troubles and persecutions followed in all quarters of the world: thence there arose great disquiet among the prelates, and many laws and decrees were made to overthrow the truth, by the cruel handling of many good and christian men. Thus while authority, armed with laws and rigour, strove against the truth, it was lamentable to hear how many christian men were troubled, and went to wreck, some tost from place to place, some exiled out of the land for fear, some forced to abjure, some driven to caves in woods, some wracked with torment, and some pursued to death with fire and fagot. Of whom we have now to treat, beginning with some that suffered in Germany, and then returning to our own histories and martyrs in England.

Henry Voes and John Esch, Augustinian Friars.

In A. D. 1523, two young men were burnt at Brussels, the one named Henry Voes, at the age of 24 years; and the other John Esch, who formerly had been of the order of the Augustinian friars. They were degraded the first day of July, and spoiled of their friars' weeds, at the suit of the pope's inquisitor; and the divines of Louvaine, because they would not retract the doctrine of the gospel, which the papists called Lutheranism. Their examiners were Hochestratus and others, who demanded of them, what they believed? They said, the books of the Old Testament and the New, wherein were contained the articles of the creed. Then were they asked, whether they believed the decrees of the councils, and of the fathers? They said, such as were agreeing to the scripture they believed. After this they proceeded further, asking, whether they thought it any deadly sin to transgress the decrees of the fathers, and of the bishop of Rome? That, said they, belongs only to the commandment of God, to bind the conscience of man; when they constantly persisted and would not retract, they were condemned to be burned. Then they began to give thanks to God their heavenly Father, who had delivered them through his great goodness, from that false and abominable priesthood, and made them priests of his holy order, receiving them to himself as a sacrifice of sweet odour. Then there was a bill written, which was delivered unto them to read openly before the people, to declare what faith and doctrine they held. The greatest error that they were accused of was, that men ought to trust only in God, as men are liars and deceitful in all their words and deeds, and therefore there ought no trust or confidence to be put in them.

As they were led to the place of execution, on the first of July, they went joyfully and cheerfully, making continual protestation that they died for the glory of God, and the doctrine of the gospel, as true christians, believing and following the holy church of the Son of God, saying also that it was the day which they had long desired. After they were come to the place where they were to be burned, and were despoiled of their garments, they tarried a long time in their shirts, and joyfully embraced the stake they were to be bound to, patiently and joyfully enduring whatever was done to them, praising God with "We praise thee, O God," &c., and singing psalms, and rehearsing the creed, in testimony of their faith. A certain doctor, beholding their cheerfulness, said to Henry, that he should not so foolishly glorify himself: he answered, "God forbid that I should glory in anything, but only in the cross of my Lord Jesus Christ." Another counselled him to have God before his eyes: he answered, "I trust that I carry him truly in my heart." One of them seeing that fire was kindled at his feet, said, "Methinks ye do strew roses under my feet." Finally, the smoke and the flame mounting up to their faces, choked them.

Henry being demanded among other things, whether Luther had seduced him or no? "Yea," said he, "even as Christ seduced his apostles." He said also, that it was contrary to God's law, that the clergy should be exempted from the power and jurisdiction of the magistrate ordained of God; for such as were ordained in office by the bishops have no power, but only to preach the word of God, and to feed their flock. After their death, their monastery was dissolved at Antwerp.

Henry Sutphen, monk, put to death in Diethmar.

The next year after the burning of those two christian martyrs at Brussels, above mentioned, with like tyranny also was martyred and burned, without all order of judgment or just condemnation, about the city of Diethmar, on the borders of Germany, one Henry Sutphen, monk, A.D. 1524. This Sutphen had been with Martin Luther, and coming to Antwerp was excluded from thence for the gospel's sake, and came to Bremen, not to preach, but to go to Wittenburg, being driven from Antwerp. Whilst at Bremen, he was there asked by certain godly citizens to make one or two brief exhortations upon the gospel. Through the earnest love and zeal that was in him, he was easily assured and persuaded to do this. He preached his first sermon to the people on the Sunday before St. Martin's day. When the people heard him preach the word of God so sincerely, they desired him to preach again the second time, and were so in love with his doctrine, that the whole parish required him to tarry among them to preach the gospel; but being afraid of danger he refused for a time. When the religious orders learned this, especially the canons, monks, and priests, they sought to oppress him, and to thrust him, and also the gospel of Christ out of the city, which was their chief seeking. They went to the senate, desiring that such an heretic might be banished from the town, as in his doctrine he preached against the catholic church. Upon the complaint of the canons, the senate sent for the wardens and head men of the parish where Henry had preached, who being come together, the senate declared to them the complaint of the canons, and all the other religious men. The citizens of Bremen, taking their preacher's part, answered, that they had hired a learned and honest man to preach to them, and to teach them sincerely and truly the word of God; however, if the chapter-house, or any other, could bring testimonial or witness, that the preacher had taught anything which either savoured of heresy, or was repugnant to the word of God, that then they were ready with the chapter-house to persecute him, for God forbid that they should maintain an heretic. But if the canons of the chapter-house, and the other religious orders will not declare and shew that the preacher, whom they had hired, had taught any error or heresy, but if they were set on only through malice to drive him away, they ought not therefore by any means to suffer it. So they petitioned the senate, with all humble obedience, that they would not require it of them, but grant them equity and justice, saying, that they were disposed to assist their preacher always, and to plead his cause.

When the monastic orders learned that they could not prevail, they burst out into a fury, and began to threaten, and went to the archbishop to certify that the citizens of Bremen were become heretics.

When the bishop heard of these things, he sent two of his council to Bremen, requiring that Henry should be sent to him without delay. When they were asked why they should send him, they answered, Because he preached against the holy church. Being again demanded in what articles, they had nothing to say. One of these counsellors was the bishop's suffragan, a naughty pernicious hypocrite, who sought by all possible means to carry away Henry a captive. The answer of the senators was, that as the preacher had not been convicted for any heresy, they could by no means consent that Henry should be carried away; so they earnestly pressed the bishop that he would speedily send his learned men to Bremen to dispute with him, and if he were convinced, they promised without any delay that he should be punished and sent away, if not, they would in no wise let him depart. The suffragan answered, by requiring that he might be delivered into his hands for the quietness of the whole country; but the senate continued still in their former mind. The suffragan being moved with anger at this, departed from Bremen, and would not confirm their children.

When thus the popish prelates were disappointed, they held a provincial council at Buckstade. To this council were called the prelates and learned men of the diocese, to determine what was to be believed.

Henry also was called to the council, although they had already decreed to proceed against him, as against a heretic; wherefore the rulers of the city, together with the commonalty, detained him at home, foreseeing and suspecting the malice of the council. Then Henry gathered his doctrine into a few articles, and sent it with his letters to the archbishop; excusing his innocence, offering himself as ready, if he were convicted of any error by the testimony of the holy scripture, to recant it, earnestly requiring that his errors might be convicted by the holy scriptures, by the testimony of which he had hitherto proved his doctrines, and doubted not hereafter to confirm them. Henry contemning their madness, proceeded daily in preaching the gospel, adding always this protestation, that he was ready willingly to give account touching his faith and doctrine to every man that would require it. In the meantime the holy Romans could not be idle, but sent their chaplains to every sermon to entrap him in his words. But God, whose footpaths are in the midst of the floods, would have his marvellous power to be seen in them, for he converted many of them, so that the greater part of those who were sent to hearken, openly acknowledged his doctrine to be God's truth, against which no man should contend, and such as in all their lives before they had not heard. But the chief priests, canons, and monks were so hardened and blinded with Pharaoh, that they became worse for these admonitions. When God saw fit that Henry should confirm the truth that he had preached, he sent him among the cruel murderers appointed for that slaughter, on the occasion that follows.

It happened in the year 1524, that this Henry was sent for by letters, by Nicholas Boy, parish priest, and other faithful christians of the parish of Meldorph, which is a town in Diethmar, to preach the gospel to them, and deliver them out of the bondage of antichrist.

These letters being received upon St. Catherine's evening, he called together six brethren, honest citizens, and opened to them how he was sent for by them of Diethmar to preach the gospel; adding, that he was not only a debtor to them, but to all others who required his aid. Wherefore he thought good to go to Diethmar, to see what God would work by him, requiring also that they would help him with their advice by what means he might best take his journey.

Having prepared all things for his journey, on the twenty-second of October he departed and came to Meldorph, where he was joyfully received by the parish priest and others. Although he had not yet preached, the devil with his members began to fret and fume for anger. Above all other, one Augustine Tornborch, prior of the Black Friars, began to take counsel with others what was to be done. It was agreed by them, above all things, to withstand the beginnings, and that he should not have licence to preach: for if he preached, and the people should hear him, it was to be feared that the wickedness and craft of the priests and monks should be exposed, which being manifest, they knew plainly that it would be but a folly to resist, remembering what had happened so lately before in Bremen. The prior early on the following morning (for he had not slept well all night for care) went with great speed unto Heida, to speak with the forty-eight presidents of the country, to whom with great complaints he shewed how that a seditious fellow, a monk was come from Bremen, who would seduce all the people of Diethmar as he had done those of Bremen. There were others that assisted this prior in persuading the forty-six, who were simple and unlearned men, that they would obtain great favour and good-will of the bishop of Bremen, if they would put this heretical monk to death. When these men heard these words, they decreed that the monk should be put to death, without being heard or seen, much less convicted.

When this was notified to him he said that he ought to obey the word of God, rather than man. And that if it pleased God that he should lose his life there, it was as near a way to heaven, as in any other place. The next day Henry went up into the pulpit, and preached a sermon, expounding the place of Paul, Rom. i. 9. "God is my witness," &c. After the sermon, the whole congregation being called together, the prior Augustine delivered the letters that were sent by the forty-eight presidents, the tenor whereof was this: that they of Meldorff should be fined with a fine of a thousand guilders, if they suffered the monk to preach. When they heard these letters read, they were much moved. And they all determined with one voice, to keep Henry as their preacher, and to defend him: for when they heard the sermon, they were greatly offended with the prior.

After dinner Henry preached again, expounding the place of St. Paul, Rom. xv. 1. "We who are strong ought," &c. The next day the citizens of Meldorff sent messengers to Heida, offering to answer in all cases before all men, for their preacher, whom they had received. Besides that, the messengers declared what christian and godly sermons they had heard him preach. The parish priest also wrote letters by the messengers to the forty-eight rulers, in which he excused himself, that it was never his wish, nor the intention of Henry to move sedition, but only to preach sincerely the word of God, and he offers himself as ready to answer for Henry to all men, whenever he should be called on; and earnestly desiring them not to give credit to the monks, who being blinded with hatred and avarice, had determined to oppress the truth: adding also, that it was against all reason, that a man should be condemned, before the truth was tried, and his cause declared; and that if, after due inquisition, he should be convicted, then he should suffer punishment. This submission with the public testimonial was not regarded; but in the end one of the council, Peter Dethleve recommended the whole matter should be referred to the next general council. With this answer they were all very well contented; and the messengers returned to Meldorff with great joy and gladness, declaring to the whole congregation the answer that was made.

Upon St. Nicholas day, Henry preached twice, with such a spirit and grace, that all men held him in admiration, praying God most earnestly, that they might long have such a preacher. Upon the day of "the Conception of our Lady," he also preached two sermons upon the first chapter of Matthew; wherein he rehearsed the promises made by God to our forefathers, and under what faith our fathers had lived; adding also, that all reference to works being set apart, we must be justified by the same faith. All these things were spoken with such boldness of spirit, that all men greatly marvelled at him, giving thanks to God for his great mercy, in having sent them such a preacher, desiring him moreover, that he would tarry with them all Christmas to preach.

In the meantime, the prior Augustine Tornborch and Master John Schink were not idle: for the prior went to the Franciscan monks, and minors, for help and council. For those kinds of friars above all others are best instructed by their hypocrisy to deceive the poor and simple people. These friars straightway sent for those persons, who had all the rule and authority, and especially Peter Hannus, Peter Swine, and Nicholas Roden; to whom they declared, with great complaints, what an heretical monk had preached, and how he had obtained the favour of all the simple people; which if they did not speedily provide for, and withstand in the first beginnings, and put the heretic to death, it would come to pass, that soon the honour of the Virgin Mary, and all saints, together with the two abbeys, would come to utter ruin and decay.

When these men heard these words, they were greatly moved. Peter Swine answered, that they had before written to the parish priest and to Henry what was best to be done; but if they thought good, they would write again. "No," said the prior, "this matter must be attempted another way: for if you write to the heretic, he will by and by answer you again. And it is to be feared, that the contagion of his heresy may infect some of you, being unlearned men: for if you give him leave to speak, and to answer, there is no hope that you shall overcome him." So they finally determined to take Henry by night, and burn him before the people should know it. This device pleased them all, but especially the Franciscan friars. Peter Hannus, who was the prior's chief friend, wishing to get the chief praise and thanks in the matter, associated with him other rulers of the neighbouring towns. And all these being assembled together in the parish of the new church, in the house of Mr. Gunter, where the chancellor consulted with them how they might burn Henry secretly. They concluded that on the day after "the Conception of our Lady," they would meet at Henning, which is five miles from Meldorff, with a great band of husbandmen. There assembled above five hundred men, unto whom was declared the cause of their assembling, and also instructed them in what was to be done; for before that no man knew the cause of the assembly; but only the presidents. When the husbandmen understood it, they would have returned back again, refusing such a detestable and horrible deed. But the presidents with most bitter threats kept them in obedience; and in order that they should be the more courageous, they gave them three barrels of Hamburg beer to drink.

About midnight they came in arms to Meldorff; the monks having prepared torches for them, that Henry should not slip away in the dark. They had also with them a traitor, named Hennegus, by whose treason they had perfect knowledge of every thing. With great violence they burst into the house of the parish priest, breaking and spoiling every thing, as is the manner of drunken people. If they found either gold or silver they took it away. When they had spoiled all things, they violently fell upon the parish priest, and with great noise cried out, "Kill the thief, kill the thief!" Some of them took him by the hair of the head, and pulled him out into the dirt, forcing him to go with them as a prisoner: others cried out, saying, that the parish priest was not to be meddled with, for they had no commission to take him. After they had satisfied their violence upon the parish priest, with great rage and fury they ran upon Henry, and drawing him naked out of his bed, bound his hands behind him: being so bound, they drew him to and fro so long, that Peter Hannus, who otherwise was unmerciful and a cruel persecutor of the word of God, desired them that they should let him alone; for that he would follow of his own accord. When he was brought to Hemmingstedt, they asked him how and for what intent he came to Diethmar? He gently declared the whole cause of his coming: but they all in a rage cried out, "Away with him, Away with him! for if we hear him talk any longer, it is to be feared that he will make us also heretics." Then being very weary and faint, he asked to be set on horse-back, for his feet were all cut and hurt with the ice, for he was led all night barefoot. When they heard him say so, they mocked and laughed at him, saying, "Must we hire a horse for a heretic? he shall go on foot whether he will or no." Because it was night they carried him naked to Heida. Afterwards they brought him to a certain man's house named Calden, and bound him there with chains in the stocks. The master of the house seeing the cruel deed, taking compassion upon Henry, would not suffer it. So he was carried away to a priest's house, and shut up in a cupboard, and was kept there by the rude people, who all the night mocked and scorned him. Amongst others that came to him, were Simon in Altenord, and Christian, parish priest of the new church, both alike ignorant and wicked persecutors of the word of God, demanding why he had forsaken his holy habit? He answered by the scriptures; but those ignorant persons understood nothing about what he said. Gunter also came to him, inquiring whether he had rather be sent to the bishop of Bremen, or receive his punishment in Diethmar? Henry answered, "If I have preached anything contrary to God's word, or done any wicked act, it is in their hands to punish me." Gunter answered, "Hark, I pray you, good friends, hark, he desires to suffer in Diethmar." The common people continued all that night in immoderate drinking.

In the morning about eight o'clock, they gathered together in the market-place to consult what they should do: where the rustic people boiling with drink, cried out, "Burn him! burn him!—to the fire with the heretic! Without doubt, if we do it, we shall this day obtain great glory and praise both of God and man; for the longer he lives, the more he will seduce with his heresy." Why need many words? Sure he was to die; for they had condemned this good Henry without any judgment, without hearing his cause, to be burned. At last they commanded the crier to proclaim, that every man who was at the taking of him, should be ready in arms to bring him forth to the fire. Among the others the Franciscan friars were present, encouraging the drunken rude people, saying, "Now you go the right way to work." Then they bound Henry, hands, feet, and neck, and with great noise brought him forth to the fire. As he passed by, a woman standing at her door, who wept abundantly at seeing this pitiful sight, Henry turned to her and said, "I pray you, weep not for me." When he came to the fire, he sat down for very weakness upon the ground. There was present one of the presidents named May, who condemned Henry to be burned, pronouncing this sentence upon him:

"Forasmuch as this thief hath wickedly preached against the worship of our blessed Lady, by the commandment and sufferance of our reverend father in Christ, the bishop of Bremen, and my lord, I condemn him here to be burned and consumed with fire." Henry answered, "I have done no such thing:" and, lifting up his hands towards Heaven, he said, "O Lord, forgive them, for they offend ignorantly, not knowing what they do: thy name, O Almighty God, is holy."

In the mean time a woman, the wife of Jungar, and sister of Peter Hannas, offered herself to suffer a thousand stripes, and to give them much money, if they would stay the process, and keep him in prison, until that he could plead his cause before the whole convocation of the country. When they had heard these words, they waxed more mad, and threw the woman down under their feet, and trod upon her, and beat Henry unmercifully. One of them struck him behind on the head with a sharp dagger. John Holmes, of the new church, struck him with a mace. Others thrust him in the back, and in the arms. And this was not done only once or twice, but as often as he began to speak. Master Gunter cried out, encouraging them, saying, "Go to, boldly, good fellows, truly God is present with us."

After this, he brought a Franciscan friar to Henry, that he should confess to him. Henry asked him in this manner; "Brother, when have I done you an injury, either by word or deed, or when did I ever provoke you to anger?" "Never," said the friar. "What then should I confess to you," said he, "that you think you might forgive me?" The friar, being affected at these words, departed. The fire as often as it was kindled, would not burn. However they satisfied their minds upon him, by striking and pricking him with all kinds of weapons. Henry standing in the meantime in his shirt before all this rude people; at last, having got a ladder, they bound him to it. And when he began to pray, and to repeat his creed, one struck him upon the face with his fist, saying, "Thou shalt first be burnt, and afterwards pray and prate as much as thou wilt." Then another treading upon his breast, bound his neck so hard to a step of the ladder, that the blood gushed out of his mouth and nose.

After he was bound to the ladder, he was set upright. Then one running to him, set his halbert for the ladder to lean against, but the ladder, slipping away from the point of the halbert, caused that the halbert struck him through the body. Then they cast this good man, ladder and all upon the wood. Then John Holmes ran to him, and struck him with a mace upon the breast, till he was dead and stirred no more. Afterwards they roasted him upon the coals; for the wood, as often as it was set on fire, would not burn out. And thus this godly preacher finished his martyrdom, A.D. 1524.

About the same time many other godly persons, and such as feared God, for the testimony of the gospel, were thrown into the Rhine, and into other rivers, where their bodies were afterwards found, and taken up. Also in the town of Diethmar another faithful saint of God, named John, suffered the like martyrdom. Thus these two blessed and constant martyrs, as two shining lights set up by God, in testimony of his truth, offered up the sacrifice of their confession sealed with their blood, in a sweet savour unto God.

At the town of Hala likewise, another preacher named George, for ministering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in both kinds, i. e. in both bread and wine, was martyred by the monks and friars.

At Prague also, in Bohemia, another, for changing his monkery into matrimony, did suffer in like manner. Ex Lud. Rab.

In the same year, 1524, Oct. 22, the town of Millenberg in Germany was taken and ransacked, and several of the inhabitants slain, and many imprisoned for maintaining and keeping with them Carolstad as their preacher.

In the same catalogue of holy martyrs is to be placed Gasper Tamher, and also another named George, who were both burned at Vienna.

The lamentable Martyrdom of John Clerk, of Meiden in France.

Melden is a city in France, ten miles from Paris, where John Clerk was apprehended, A.D. 1523, for setting up upon the church door a writing against the pope's pardons lately sent there from Rome, in which he named the pope to be antichrist, for which his punishment was this, that three several days he should be whipped and afterwards have a mark branded on his forehead, as a note of infamy. His mother being a christian woman, although her husband was an adversary, when she beheld her son thus piteously scourged, and ignominiously deformed in the face, constantly and boldly encouraged her son, crying with a loud voice, "Blessed be Christ, and welcome be these prints and marks."

After this punishment, John went to Metz, where he remained at his trade, being a wool-carder. The people of that city used to go, on a certain day to the suburbs to worship certain blind idols near by, after an old custom amongst them; so he, being inflamed with zeal, went out of the city on the preceding day, to the place where the images were, and broke them all in pieces. The next day, when the canons, priests, and monks, keeping their old custom, had brought with them the people out of the city to the place of idolatry, to worship as they were wont, they found all their blocks and stocks broken upon the ground. They were enraged at this, and seized John Clarke, who confessed the act. The people, being not yet acquainted with that kind of doctrine, were wonderfully moved against him, crying out upon him in a great rage. He was soon tried and condemned, and led to the place of execution, where he sustained extreme torments. For first his hand was cut off from his right arm, then his nose with sharp pincers was violently plucked from his face; after that both his arms and his paps were likewise plucked and drawn with the same instrument. To all those who stood by it was an horror to behold the grievous and doleful sight of his pains: again to behold his patience, or rather the grace of God giving him the gift to suffer, it was a wonder. Thus quietly and constantly he endured in his torments, pronouncing, or in a manner singing the verses of the hundred and fiftenth Psalm: "Their idols are silver and gold, the work of man's hand," &c. His rent body was committed to the fire and consumed. This was about A.D. 1524.

John Castellane.

In A.D. 1524, Master John Castellane, born at Tournay, a doctor of divinity, after he was called to the knowledge of God, and had become a true preacher of his word, and had preached in France, and had laid some foundation of the doctrine of the gospel in the town of Metz, in returning from thence was taken prisoner by the cardinal of Lorraine's servants, by whom he was carried to the castle of Nommenie; at this the citizens of Metz took great displeasure, and were grievously offended to have their preacher apprehended and imprisoned, so they took some of the cardinal's subjects and kept them prisoners. John Castellane was most cruelly handled from the fourth day of May until the twelfth day of January; during all which time he persevered constantly in the doctrine of the Son of God. Thence he was carried to the castle of Vike, persevering constantly in the profession of the same doctrine; so that they proceeded to the sentence of his degradation, that he might be delivered over to the secular power. And as the form of the sentence and process of degrading is remarkable, we have thought good to annex it here to shew the horrible blasphemies joined with gross and brutish subtlety in those high mysteries which the enemies of the truth use in their processes against the children of God, whereby every man, even the most ignorant, may perceive the horrible blindness that these papists are blinded with.

The Sentence of Degradation.

"Concerning the process inquisitory, formed and given in form of an accusation against thee John Castellane, priest and religious man of the friars Eremites of the order of St. Augustine, and understanding likewise thy confession, which thou hast made of thine own good will, of maintaining false and erroneous doctrine; and marking also besides this, the godly admonitions, and charitable exhortations which we made unto thee in the town of Metz, which thou like unto the adder hast refused and given no ear unto; also considering thine answers made and reiterated to interrogatories, by means of thine oath, in which thou hast devilishly hidden and kept back not only the truth, but also, following the example of Cain, hast refused to confess thy sins and mischievous offences. And finally, hearing the great number of witnesses sworn and examined against thee, their persons and depositions diligently considered, and all other things worthy of consideration being justly examined, the Reverend Master Nicholas Savin, doctor of divinity, and inquisitor of the faith, assistant unto us, hath entered process against thee, and given full information thereof; this our purpose and intent being also communicated unto divers masters and doctors both of the civil and canon laws here present, which have subscribed and signed thereto, whereby it appeareth, that thou John Castellane hast oftentimes, and in divers places, openly and manifestly spread abroad and taught many erroneous propositions, full of the heresy of Luther, contrary and against the catholic faith, and the verity of the gospel, and the holy apostolic see, and so accursedly looked back and turned thy face, that thou art found to be a liar before almighty God. It is ordained by the sacred rules of the canon law, that such as through the sharp darts of their venomous tongue do pervert the scriptures, and go about with all their power to corrupt and infect the souls of the faithful, should be punished and corrected with most sharp correction, to the end that others should be afraid to attempt the like, and apply themselves the better to the study of christian concord, through the example set before their eyes, as well of severity as of clemency. For these causes, and others rising upon the said process, by the apostolic authority, and also the authority of our said reverend lord the cardinal, which we do use in this our sentence definitive, which we sitting in our judgment-seat declare in these writings, having God only before our eyes, and surely considering, that what measures we mete unto others, the same shall be measured to us again. We pronounce and declare sententially and definitively thee John Castellane, being here present before us, and judge thee because of thy deserts, to be excommunicated with the greatest excommunication, and therewithal to be culpable of treason against the divine majesty, and a mortal enemy of the catholic faith and truth of the gospel; also to be a manifest heretic, and a follower and partaker of the execrable cruelty of Martin Luther, a stirrer up of old heresies already condemned; and therefore as thou oughtest to be deposed and deprived of all priestly honour and dignity, of all thy orders, of thy shaving and religious habit, also of thy ecclesiastical benefices, if thou hast any, and from all privilege of the clergy. So we here presently do depose, deprive, and separate thee, as a rotten member, from the communion and company of all the faithful; and being so deprived, we judge that thou oughtest to be actually degraded; that done, we leave thee unto the secular powers, committing the degradation and actual execution of this our sentence unto the reverend lord and bishop here present, with the authority and commandment aforesaid."

This sentence being thus ended with their sermon also, the bishop of Nicopolis sitting in pontificalibus in the judgment-seat, being a suffragan of Metz, with the clergy, nobles, and people about him, proceeded to the degrading (as they called it) of John Castellane. Thus John Castellane being prepared and made ready for his degradation by the officers of the bishop, was apparelled in his priestly attire, and afterwards brought forth from the chapel by the priests, with all his priestly ornaments upon him, and holding his hands together, he knelt down before the bishop. Then the officers gave him the chalice in his hand, with wine and water, the patine and the host; all which things the bishop who degraded him, took from him, saying, "We take away from thee, or command to be taken from thee, all power to offer sacrifice unto God, and to say mass, as well for the quick as the dead."

Moreover, the bishop scraped the nails of both his hands with a piece of glass, saying, "By this scraping we take away from thee all power to sacrifice, to consecrate, and to bless, which thou hast received by the anointing of thy hands." Then he took away from him the chasuble, saying, "We do deprive thee of this priestly ornament, which signifies charity; for certainly thou hast forsaken the same, and all innocency." Then taking away the stole, he said, "Thou hast villainously rejected and despised the sign of our Lord, which is represented by this stole; wherefore we take it away from thee, and make thee unable to exercise and use the office of priesthood, and all other things appertaining to priesthood." The degradation of the order of priesthood being thus ended, they proceeded to the order of deacon. Then the ministers gave him the book of the gospels, which the bishop took away, saying, "We take away from thee all power to read the gospels in the church of God, for it appertains only to such as are worthy." After this he spoiled him of the dalmatike, which is the vesture that the deacons use, saying, "We deprive thee of this Levitical order; for thou hast not fulfilled thy ministry and office." After this the bishop took away the stole from behind his back, saying, "We justly take away from thee the white stole which thou didst receive undefiled, which also thou oughtest to have carried in the presence of our Lord; and to the end that the people dedicated unto the name of Christ, may take example by thee, we prohibit thee any more to exercise or use the office of deaconship. Then they proceeded to degrade him from the subdeaconship, and taking away from him the book of the epistles, and his subdeacon's vesture, deposed him from reading of the epistles in the church of God: and so proceeding to all the other orders, degraded him from the order of Benet and Bollet, from the order of exorcist, from the lectorship, and last of all, from the office of door-keeper, taking from him the keys, and commanding him hereafter not to open or shut the vestry, nor to ring any more bells in the church. That done, the bishop went forward to degrade him from his first shaving, and taking away his surplice, said, "By the authority of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and by our authority we take away from thee all clerical habit, and despoil thee of all ornament of religion: also, we depose and degrade thee of all order, benefit, and privilege of the clergy, and as one unworthy of that profession, we commit thee to the servitude and ignominy of the secular state." Then the bishop took the shears and began to clip his head, saying in this manner, "We cast thee out as an unthankful child of the Lord's heritage, whereunto thou wast called, and take away from thy head the crown, which is the royal sign of priesthood, through thine own wickedness and malice." The bishop also added these words: "That which thou hast sung with thy mouth, thou hast not believed with thy heart, nor accomplished in work, wherefore we take from thee the office of singing in the church of God."

The degrading being thus ended, the procurator fiscal of the court and city of Metz, required of the notary an instrument or copy of the degrading; then the ministers of the bishop stripped him of his clerical habit, and put upon him the apparel of a secular man. That done, the bishop that degraded him proceeded no further, but said, "We pronounce that the secular court shall receive thee into their charge, being thus degraded of all clerical honour and privilege."

Then the bishop, after a manner, intreated the secular judge for him, saying, "My lord judge, we pray you as heartily as we can, for the love of God, and from tender pity and mercy, and for respect of our prayers, that you will not in any point do any thing that shall be hurtful to this miserable man, or tending to his death, or maiming of his body." These things being thus done, the secular judge of the town of Vike, confirming the sentence, condemned Mr. John Castellane to be burned, which death he suffered on the twelfth day of January, 1525, with such a constancy, that not only a great company of ignorant people were thereby drawn to the knowledge of the truth, but also a great number who had already some knowledge of it, were greatly confirmed by his constant valiant death.

John Diazius, a Spaniard, martyred, A.D. 1546.

John Diazius, a Spaniard, having been at Paris thirteen years, returned from thence to Geneva, then to Basil, and afterwards to Strasburg; from whence he was sent ambassador with Bucer and others, to the council at Ratisbon, where, talking with Peter Malvenda, the pope's factor, he stated his views of religion to him, so that Malvenda wrote to the friar, who was the emperor's confessor, about him; at the reading of which letters, Marquina was present. And so Alphonso Diazius, brother to John Diazius, one of the pope's lawyers in Rome, learned the opinion of his brother John.

After the council of Ratisbon, John Diazius was occupied in Germany in the printing of Bucer's book, and his brother Alphonso having come from Rome to Ratisbon, where Malvenda was, and having brought with him a notorious ruffian or assassin belonging to the city of Rome, Malvenda and Alphonso consulting about their devilish purpose, laboured to ascertain from the friends of Diazius where he was to be found; hereof Alphonso and the homicide having knowledge by certain of his secret friends, pretending great matters of importance, came to Newburgh, where Diazius was printing of Bucer's book. Having succeeded in this they came to him, and after long debating on religion between the two brothers, Alphonso seeing the heart of his brother John, planted so constantly on the sure rock of God's truth, that he could not be moved from his opinion, or persuaded to ride in his company (being so advised by Bucer and his friends), pretended to take his leave of his brother in a friendly spirit, and to depart; but shortly afterwards, he returned secretly with his assassin, and on the way they purchased a hatchet.

When this was done, Alphonso sends his man in disguise with letters to his brother, he himself following afterwards. And as John Diazius in the morning was rising out of his bed to read the letters, the man with his hatchet clove his head to the brains, leaving the hatchet in his head; and so he and Alphonso took to their horses, which stood without the city gate, with as much speed as they could. The people of Newburgh hearing of the horrible act, sent out horsemen after them, who, coming to Augsburg, and hearing that the murderers had passed through, gave up the pursuit, and returned. One in the company, however, more zealous than the rest, would not return, but pursued them still, and in the city of Oenipont, caused them to be arrested and put into prison. Otto, the elector Palatine, hearing of their arrest, writes to the magistrates of Oenipont for judgment; but through the intrigues of the papists, and the crafty lawyers, the judicial sentence was so delayed, from day to day, then from hour to hour, that the emperor's letters came at last, requiring the matter to be reserved to his hearing. And thus the terrible murder of Cain and his fellow, was bolstered up by the papists. The like of which, from the memory of man, was never heard of since the first example of Cain, who slew his own brother Abel. But although true judgment in this world be perverted, yet such bloody Cains, with their wilful murder, shall not escape the hands of Him who shall judge truly both the committers, and the bolsters up of all mischievous wickedness.

In 1546, Charles, the emperor, held an armed council at Augsburg, after his victory in Germany. Where some endeavoured to make concord between the gospel of Christ, and the traditions of the pope, that is, to make a medley of them both, and so framed a new form of religion, called the Interim. Upon this began a new form of persecution in Germany. For the emperor proceeded strictly against those who would not receive the Interim, intending to have overcome the reformers, but the Lord disappointed his purpose.

Among those who withstood this Interim, besides others, were the citizens of Constance. For which three thousand Spaniards came by night against the town of Constance, where they killed three of the watchmen, who watching in the suburbs, went to ascertain the noise which they heard in the woods. The device of the Spaniards was, that when the citizens were at the sermon, suddenly to set upon the city and take it. But, as the Lord would, some began to suspect it in the night, so that the citizens had intelligence and were in readiness. When the morning came, the Spaniards were at the gate to break into the city. But being driven from thence, and their captain Alphonso slain, they went to the bridge over the Rhine. But being beat also from thence, and a great number of them drowned in the river, the Spaniards broke down the bridge to prevent pursuit.

At the same time many godly ministers of the churches in Germany, were in great danger, especially such as refused to receive the Interim; of whom some were cast into prison. In which number of prisoners was Martin Frechtus, with four other preachers, also his brother George, for coming to his house to comfort him. Musculus at the same time, with other preachers, went from Augsburg, Brentius from Halle, Blaurokus from Constance, Bucer from Strasburg.

It would fill another volume, to include the acts and histories of all who in other countries suffered for the gospel. But praised be the Lord, every region almost has its own historian, who has sufficiently discharged that duty: so that I shall the less need to overcharge this volume: it shall suffice to collect three or four histories, recorded by Oecolampadius and the rest, to bring it into a brief table, and so I shall return to occupy myself with our own matters at home.

Wolfgang Schuch, a German in Lotharing, Martyr.

Wolfgang Schuch, coming to St. Hyppolite, a town in Lotharing, and being received as their pastor, laboured to extirpate out of the hearts of the people idolatry and superstition; which, through the grace of Christ working with him, he in a short time brought to pass; so that the observance of Lent, images, and all idols, with the abomination also of the mass, was utterly abolished. It was not long before rumour of this came to the duke Anthony, prince of Lorraine, (under whose dominion they were,) through the report of the adversaries misrepresenting these people; as, though they, in relinquishing the doctrine and faction of the pope, went about to reject and shake off the authority of princes and all governors. By means of which sinister report they incensed the prince so, that he threatened to destroy the town with sword and fire. Wolfgang being informed of this, wrote to the duke's uncle, in a most humble and obedient way, in defence both of his ministry, of his doctrine, and of the whole cause of the Gospel.

In which epistle he excused the people, and said, that those slanderous reporters were more worthy to be punished for their false rumours and forged slanders. And he also opened and explained the cause of the Gospel, and of our salvation, as consisting only in the free grace of God, through faith in Christ his Son, comparing also the same doctrine of the gospel, with the doctrine of the church of Rome.

That done, he touched upon our obedience, honour, and worship, which first we owe to God and to Christ, next under him to the princes, whom God hath raised up and endued with authority, and to whom they offered themselves now, and at all times, most ready with all service and duty, &c.

But with this epistle Wolfgang availed nothing; so, when he saw no other remedy, rather than the town should come into any danger on his account, the good man, of his own accord, rendered a confession of his doctrine, and delivered the town from danger, by taking all the danger upon himself.

As soon as he was come to Nantz, hands were immediately laid on him, and he was cast into a stinking prison, where he was sharply and bitterly handled. In that prison he continued for the space of a whole year, yet would not be moved from his constancy, neither with the straightness of the prison, nor with the harshness of his keepers, nor yet with the compassion of his wife and children, of which he had about six or seven. Then was he removed to the house of the Gray Friars, where he learnedly confuted all that stood against him.

There was a friar named Bonaventure, provincial of that order, whose person was monstrously overgrown, but much more gross in blind ignorance, and a man utterly rude, a contemner of all civility and honesty; who, being long confessor to the duke, and of great authority in Lorraine, as he was an enemy to virtue and learning, so was he ever persuading the duke, to banish out of the court and country, all learned men. The sum of all his divinity was this, that it was sufficient to salvation only, to know the Pater Noster, (Our Father,) and Ave Maria, (Hail, Mary!) And thus was the duke brought up and trained, and in nothing else, as the duke himself oft-times confessed. This Bonaventure being judge, where Wolfgang disputed, or was examined, had nothing else in his mouth, but "Thou heretic, Judas, Beelzebub, &c." Wolfgang bearing patiently those injuries which referred to himself, proceeded mightily in his disputation by the scriptures, confuting or rather confounding his adversaries; who, being no otherwise able to make their party good, took his bible, with his notes in the margin, into their monastery, and burned it! At the last disputation duke Anthony himself was present, altering his apparel, so that he might not be known, who, although he understood not Wolfgang, who spoke in Latin, yet, perceiving him to be bold and constant in his doctrine, gave sentence that he should be burned, because he denied the church and sacrifice of the mass. Wolfgang hearing the sentence of his condemnation, began to sing the hundred and twenty-second psalm.

As he was led to the place of execution, and when passing by the house of the Gray Friars, Bonaventure, who was sitting at the door, cried out to him, "Thou heretic, do thy reverence here to God, and to our lady, and to his holy saints," shewing to him the idols standing at the Friars' gate. To whom Wolfgang answered, "Thou hypocrite, thou painted wall, the Lord shall destroy thee, and bring all thy false dissimulation to light." When they were come to the place of his martyrdom, first his books were thrown into the fire; then they asked him, "Whether he would have his pain diminished and shortened?" He said, "No," bidding them to do their will, "for," said he, "as God has been with me hitherto, so I trust now he will not leave me, when I shall have most need of him;" concluding his words thus, "that they should put the sentence in execution." And so, beginning to sing the fifty-first psalm, he entered into the place, heaped up with fagots and wood, continuing to sing his psalm, till the smoke and flame took from him both his voice and life.

The singular virtue, constancy, and learning of this blessed man, as it refreshed and greatly edified the hearts of many good men, so it astonished the minds of his adversaries, and wrought to their confusion.

John Huglein, a priest, was burned at Merspurge. (A.D. 1526,) by the bishop of Constance, because he did not hold the bishop of Rome's doctrine in all points.

George Carpenter, Martyr.

On the 8th of February, (A.D. 1527,) George Carpenter of Emering, was burned in Munchen, in Bavaria. When he came before the council his offences were read, contained in four articles:—

First, That he did not believe that a priest could forgive a man's sins.

Secondly, That he did not believe that a man could call God out of heaven.

Thirdly, That he did not believe that God was in the bread, which the priest hangs over the altar, but that it was the bread of the Lord.

Fourthly, That he did not believe that the very element of the water itself in baptism gives grace.

Which four articles he refused to recant. Then came to him a certain schoolmaster, saying, "My friend George, dost thou not fear the death and punishment which thou must suffer? If thou wert let go, wouldst thou return to thy wife and children?" He answered; "If I were at liberty, whither should I rather go, than to my wife and beloved children?" Then said the schoolmaster, "Revoke your former opinion, and you shall be set at liberty." George answered, "My wife and my children are so dearly loved by me, that they cannot be bought from me for all the riches and possessions of the duke of Bavaria; but for the love of the Lord God I will willingly forsake them." When he was led to the place of execution, the schoolmaster spake to him again, saying, "Good George, believe in the sacrament of the altar; do not affirm it to be only a sign." He answered, "I believe this sacrament to be a sign of the body of Jesus Christ offered upon the cross for us." Then said the schoolmaster, "What dost thou mean, that thou dost so little esteem baptism, knowing that Christ suffered himself to be baptized in Jordan?" He answered, and shewed the true use of baptism, and the end why Christ was baptized in Jordan, and how necessary it was that Christ should die and suffer upon the cross. "The same Christ," said he, "will I confess this day before the whole world; for he is my Saviour, and in him I believe."

After this came one Master Conrade Scheter, the vicar of the Cathedral church, saying, "George, if thou wilt not believe the sacrament, yet put all thy trust in God, and say, 'I trust my cause to be good and true, but if I should err, truly I would be sorry and repent.'" George Carpenter answered, "God, suffer me not to err, I beseech thee." Then Master Conrade began the Lord's prayer:—"Our Father which art in heaven." When Carpenter answered, "Truly thou art our Father, and no other, this day I trust to be with thee." Then Master Conrade went forward with the prayer, saying, "Hallowed be thy name." Carpenter answered, "O, my God, how little is thy name hallowed in this world!" Then said Conrade, "Thy kingdom come." Carpenter answered, "Let thy kingdom come this day to me, that I also may come to thy kingdom." Then said Conrade, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." Carpenter answered, "For this cause, O Father! am I now here, that thy will might be fulfilled, and not mine." Then said Conrade, "Give us this day our daily bread." Carpenter answered, "The only living bread, Jesus Christ, shall be my food." Then said Conrade, "And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." Carpenter answered, "With a willing mind do I forgive all men, both my friends and adversaries." Then said Master Conrade, "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from all evil." Carpenter answered, "O, my Lord! without doubt thou shalt deliver me, for upon thee only have I laid all my hope." Then he began to rehearse the creed, saying, "I believe in God the Father Almighty." Carpenter answered, "O, my God! in thee alone do I trust; in thee, only, is all my confidence, and upon no other creature." In this manner he answered to every word. His answers, if they should be described at length, would be too long. The schoolmaster said, "Dost thou believe so truly and constantly in thy Lord and God with thy heart, as thou dost cheerfully seem to confess him with thy mouth?" He answered, "It were a very hard matter for me, if I, who am ready here to suffer death, should not believe that with my heart, which I openly profess with my mouth; for I knew before that I must suffer persecution if I would cleave unto Christ, who saith, 'Where thy treasure is, there will thy heart be also.'" Then said Master Conrade to him, "Dost thou think it necessary after thy death, that any man should pray for thee, or say mass for thee?" He answered, "So long as the soul is joined to the body, pray God for me, that he will give me grace and patience, with all humility, to suffer the pains of death with a true christian faith; but when the soul is separate from the body, then I have no more need of your prayers." Then he was desired by certain christian brethren, that, as soon as he was cast into the fire, he should give some sign or token what his faith was. He answered, "This shall be my sign and token, that so long as I can open my mouth, I will not cease to call upon the name of Jesus."

Behold what an incredible constancy was in this godly man. His face and countenance never changed colour, but he went cheerfully to the fire. "In the midst of the town this day," said he, "will I confess my God before the whole world." When he was laid upon the ladder, and after the executioner had put a bag of gunpowder about his neck, he said, "Let it be so, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." When they thrust him into the fire, he with a loud voice cried out, "Jesus! Jesus!" Then the executioner turned him over, and again he cried, "Jesus! Jesus!" and joyfully yielded up his spirit.

Leonard Keyser.

Here also is not to be passed over the wonderful constancy of Mr. Leonard Keyser, of Bavaria, who was burned for the gospel. This man, being at his study in Wittenburg, was sent for by his brethren, who certified to him, that if he ever wished to see his father alive, he should come with speed, which he did. He was scarcely come thither, when, by the command of the bishop of Passaw, he was taken. The articles upon which he was accused, and for which he was most cruelly put to death, and shed his blood for the testimony of the truth, were these:—

That faith only justifies.

That works are the fruits of faith.

That the mass is no sacrifice or oblation.

That he rejected confession, satisfaction, the vow of chastity, purgatory, difference of days, and affirmed only two sacraments, and denied invocation of saints.

Sentence was given against him, that he should be degraded, and put into the hands of the secular power. The good and blessed martyr, early in the morning, being rounded and shaven, and clothed in a short gown, and a black cap set upon his head, all cut and jagged, was delivered to the officer. As he was led out of the town to the place where he was to suffer, he boldly spake, turning his head first on the one side, and then on the other, saying, "O Lord Jesus, remain with me, sustain, and help me, and give me force and power."

Then the wood was made ready, and he began to cry with a loud voice, "O Jesus, I am thine, have mercy upon me, and save me;" and then he felt the fire begin sharply under his feet, his hands, and about his head: and because the fire was not great enough, the executioner plucked the body, half burnt, with a long hook from under the wood. Then he made a great hole in the body, through which he thrust a stake, and cast him again into the fire. This was August 16, A.D. 1526.

Wendelmuta, Martyr.

In Holland also, in the year 1527, was martyred and burned a good and virtuous widow, named Wendelmuta. This widow receiving to her heart the brightness of God's grace, by the appearing of the gospel, was apprehended and committed to the castle of Werden, and shortly after was brought to appear at the general sessions of that country. Several monks were appointed to talk with her, that they might convince her, and win her to recant; but she constantly persisting in the truth would not be removed. Many also of her kindred were suffered to persuade with her. Among whom there was a noble matron, who loved and favoured dearly the widow in prison. This matron coming, and communing with her, said, "My Wendelmuta, why dost thou not keep silence, and think secretly in thine heart these things which thou believest, that thou mayest prolong here thy days and life?" She answered, "Ah, you know not what you say. It is written, 'With the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.'" (Rom. x. 10.) And thus remaining firm and steadfast in her belief and confession, the twentieth day of November she was condemned by sentence as an heretic, to be burned to ashes, and her goods to be confiscated, she taking the sentence of her condemnation mildly and quietly.

After she came to the place where she was to be executed, a monk had brought out a cross, desiring her to kiss and worship her God. "I worship," said she, "no wooden god, but only that God who is in heaven:" and so with a joyful countenance she went to the stake. Then taking the powder, and laying it to her breast, she gave her neck willingly to be bound, and with an ardent prayer commending herself to the hands of God. When the time came that she should be strangled, she modestly closed her eyes, and bowed down her head as one that would take a sleep. The fire then was put to the wood, and she, being strangled, was burned afterwards to ashes, instead of this life, to get the immortal crown in heaven, (A.D. 1527.)

Peter Flistedin, and Adolphus Clarebach.

In the number of these German martyrs, are also Peter Flistedin and Adolphus Clarebach, two men of singular learning, and knowledge of God's holy word. In the year 1529, because they dissented from the papists in divers points, and especially on the supper of the Lord, and the pope's other traditions and ceremonies, after they had endured imprisonment a year and a half by the command of the archbishop and senate, they were put to death and burned in Cologne, not without the great grief and lamentation of many good christians; all the fault being put upon certain divines, who at that time preached that the punishment and death of certain wicked persons should pacify the wrath of God, which then plagued Germany with a strange disease, for at that season the sweating sickness mortally raged throughout all Germany.

A LIST OF THE NAMES AND CAUSES OF THE MARTYRS,

WHO GAVE THEIR LIVES FOR THE TESTIMONY OF THE GOSPEL, IN GERMANY, FRANCE, SPAIN, ITALY, AND OTHER FOREIGN COUNTRIES, SINCE LUTHER'S TIME.

THE MARTYRS OF GERMANY.

One Nicholas of Antwerp.

The curate of Melza, by Antwerp, used to preach to a great number of people without that town; and the emperor hearing of it, gave leave to take the uppermost garment of all who came to hear, and offered thirty guilders to whoever would take the priest. Afterwards, when the people were gathered, and the curate not there, this Nicholas stepped up in his place and preached. Wherefore he, being apprehended, was put in a sack, and drowned at Antwerp, 1524.

Joan Pistorius, a learned man of Holland.

Pistorius was a priest; then he married, and after that he preached against the mass and pardons, and against the subtle abuses of priests. He was committed to prison with ten malefactors, whom he comforted; and to one, being half naked, and in danger of cold, he gave his gown. His father visiting him in prison, did not dissuade him, but bade him be constant. At last he was condemned, and degraded, having a fool's coat put upon him. His fellow-prisoners at his death sung, "We praise thee," &c. Coming to the stake, he was first strangled, and then burned, saying at his death, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" (1 Cor. xv. 55.)

Matthias Weibell, Schoolmaster.

For saying somewhat against the abbott's first mass, and against the carrying about relics, he was hanged in Suevia.

A certain godly Priest.

This priest being commanded to come and give good advice to sixteen countrymen that were about to be beheaded, was afterwards bid himself to kneel down to have his head cut off, no cause nor condemnation further being laid against him, but only of mere hatred against the gospel.

George Scherter.

After this George had instructed the people in knowledge of the gospel in Rastadt, he was accused and put in prison, where he wrote a confession of his faith. He was condemned to be burned alive; but means were made that first his head should be cut off, and his body afterwards cast into the fire.

Henry Fleming, A.D. 1535.

This Henry, a friar, of Flanders, forsook his habit, and married a wife. Being offered life if he would confess his wife to be a harlot, refused to do so, and was burnt at Tournay.

Twenty-eight Christian Men and Women of Louvaine; Paul a Priest; two aged Women, at Antonia. Two Men at Louvaine. A.D. 1543.

When some of the city of Louvaine were suspected of Lutheranism, the emperor's procurator came from Brussels to make inquisition. After inquisition, bands of armed men came and beset their houses in the night, many were taken in their beds, plucked from their wives and children, and divided into different prisons. Through terror many citizens returned again to idolatry. But there were twenty-eight who remained constant in that persecution. The doctors of Louvaine, especially the inquisitor, came and disputed with them, thinking either to confound them, or to convert them. But the Spirit of the Lord wrought so strongly with his saints, that they went away rather confounded themselves.

Among them there was one Paul, a priest, about the age of sixty years; the rectors, with their colleagues, brought him out of prison to the Austin friars, where he was degraded. But at length for fear of death he began to stagger in his confession, and so was condemned to perpetual prison, in a dark and stinking dungeon, where he was suffered neither to read nor write, nor any man to come to him, and only to be fed with bread and water. There were two others who were put to the fire and burnt.

Then was an old man and two aged women condemned, the man to be beheaded, the two women to be buried alive, which death they suffered very cheerfully. Other prisoners, who were not condemned to death, were deprived of their goods, and commanded to come to the church in a white sheet, and there kneeling with a taper in their hand, to ask forgiveness; and they who refused to do so, and to abjure the doctrine of Luther, were put to the fire.

Master Perseval at Louvaine, A.D. 1544.

Not long after this, one Master Perseval of the university of Louvaine, was thrown into prison for condemning certain popish superstitions, and speaking in commendation of the gospel. Then being accused of Lutheranism, he was adjudged to perpetual prison, there to be fed only with bread and water, which punishment he took patiently for Christ's sake. But what became of him no man could learn nor understand. Some think that he was starved to death, or that he was secretly drowned.

Justus Jusburg, at Brussels, A.D. 1544.

Justus Jusburg, a skinner of Louvaine, being suspected of Lutheranism, was found to have the New Testament in his house, and certain sermons of Luther, for which he was committed. There were at the same time in the prison, Egidius, and Francis Encenas, a Spaniard, who secretly came to him, and confirmed him in the cause of righteousness. Thus is the providence of the Lord never wanting to his saints in time of necessity. Shortly after the doctors and masters of Louvaine came to examine him touching religion, on the pope's supremacy, sacrifice of the mass, purgatory, and the sacrament. When he had answered plainly and boldly according to the scriptures, he was condemned to the fire; but through intercession made to the queen, his burning was pardoned, and he was only beheaded.

Giles Tileman, at Brussels, A.D. 1544.

This Giles was born in Brussels of honest parents. He began to receive the light of the gospel through the reading of the holy scriptures, and increased therein exceedingly. And as he was fervent in zeal, so he was humane, mild, and pitiful. Whatever he had, that necessity could spare, he gave away to the poor, and only lived by his trade. Some he refreshed with his meat; some with clothing; to some he gave his shoes; some he helped with household stuff; to others he ministered wholesome exhortation of good doctrine. One poor woman was brought to bed, and had no bed to lie upon, whereupon he brought his own bed to her, and was contented himself to lie upon straw.

Egidius, being detected by a priest, was taken at Louvaine for that religion which the pope calls heresy. And after having being detained eight months in prison, he was sent to Brussels to be judge, where he comforted some who were in prison, and exhorted them to the constancy of the truth and to the crown which was prepared for them.

Certain of the Gray friars sometimes were sent to him, but he would always desire them to depart from him: and when the friars at any time called him names, he held his peace at such personal injuries, that those blasphemers would say abroad, that he had a dumb devil in him. But when they talked of religion, there he spared not, but answered them fully by evidences of the scripture, so that many times they would depart wondering. At various times he might have escaped from the doors having been set open, but he would not bring his keeper into peril.

He was condemned to the fire, privately, contrary to the use of the country; for they durst not openly condemn him for fear of the people, so well was he beloved. When tidings of the sentence came to him, he gave hearty thanks unto God, that the hour was come when he might glorify the Lord.

Standing at the stake the blessed martyr, lifting up his eyes to heaven in the middle of the flame, died, to the great lamentation of all. So that after that time, when the friars would go about for their alms, the people would say, "It was not meet for them to receive alms with bloody hands."

When the Emperor Charles was in Ghent, the friars and doctors obtained, that the edict made against the Lutherans, might be read openly twice a-year. Which being obtained, great persecution followed; so that there was no city nor town in all Flanders, where some were not banished, or beheaded, or condemned to perpetual prison, or had not their goods confiscated: neither was there any respect of age or sex.

Afterwards the emperor coming to Brussels, there was terrible slaughter, and persecution of God's people, in Brabant, Henuegow, and Artoise; the horror and cruelty of which is almost incredible; so that at one time as good as two hundred men and women together were brought out of the country into the city, of whom some were drowned, some buried alive, some privately made away with, others sent to perpetual prison.

Martin Haeublock, Fishmonger at Ghent, A.D. 1545.

This Martin, through a sermon of his parish priest, beginning to taste some workings of grace and repentance, went out of Ghent for the space of three months, seeking the company of godly christians, who used the reading of the scriptures: and being more instructed he returned again to the city of Ghent, where all his neighbours first began to marvel at the sudden change of this man. The Franciscans who knew him before, now seeing him so altered from their ways and superstition, and seeing him visit the captives in prison, to comfort them in persecution, and to confirm them in the word of God, they conspired against him, and seized and imprisoned him. The friars examined him in the sacrament, asking him why he was so earnest to have it in both kinds, seeing (said they) that it is but a naked sacrament, as you say? He answered, that the elements were naked, but the sacrament was not naked, as the elements of bread and wine being received after the institution of Christ, do now make a sacrament and a mystical representation of the Lord's body, communicating himself with our souls. And as touching the receiving in both kinds, because it is the institution of the Lord, Who is he (said Martin) that dare alter the same? Then was he brought before the council of Flanders. The causes laid against him were the sacrament, purgatory, and praying for the dead: and for these he was condemned and burned at Ghent, and all his goods confiscated. As he stood at the stake, a Franciscan friar said to him, "Martin, unless thou dost turn, thou shalt go from this fire to everlasting fire." "It is not in you," said Martin, "to judge." For this the friars were afterwards so hated, that many rhymes were written against them.

The day after the burning of Martin, which was the ninth of May, these three also were burned for the same cause, for which the other was condemned and burned the day before; but only that the woman was buried alive. All of whom took their martyrdom with much cheerfulness.

Urrula, and Maria, at Delden, A.D. 1545.

Delden is a town in Lower Germany, three miles from Darenty, where these two virgins of noble parentage were burned. After diligently frequenting churches and sermons, and being instructed in the word of the Lord, they believed, that as the benefit of salvation comes only by our faith in Christ, all the other merchandise of the pope, which he sells to the people for money, was needless. Mary, being the younger, was put first into the fire; where she prayed ardently for her enemies, commending her soul to God. The judges greatly marvelled at her constancy.

Then they exhorted Urrula to turn, or if she would not, at least that she should require to be beheaded. She said, that she was guilty of no error, nor defended any thing, but what was consonant to the scripture, in which she trusted to persevere to the end. And as to the kind of punishment, she said, she feared not the fire, but rather would follow the example of her dear sister that went before.

Andrew Thiessen, citizen of Mechlin, had three sons and a daughter, whom he instructed diligently in the doctrine of the gospel, and despised the doings of popery. Being hated and persecuted of the friars and priest there, he went to England and there died. Francis and Nicholas his two sons went to Germany to study; and returning again to their mother, and sister, and younger brother, by diligent instruction brought them to the right knowledge of God's gospel: the parson there taking counsel together with William de Clerk, the head magistrate of the town of Mechlin, and others, agreed, that the mother with her four children should be sent to prison: where great labour was employed to reclaim them to their church. The two younger, being not yet settled either in years or doctrine, inclined to them, and were delivered. The mother, who would not consent, was condemned to perpetual prison. The other two, Francis and Nicholas, standing firmly to their confession, defended, that the catholic church was not the church of Rome; that the sacrament was to be ministered in both kinds; that auricular confession was to no purpose; that invocation of saints was to be left; that there was no purgatory. The friars they called hypocrites, and contemned their threatenings. The magistrates, after disputations, tried torments, to learn of them who was their master, and what companions they had. "Their master," they said, "was Christ which bare his cross before. Friends they had innumerable, and dispersed in all places." At last they were brought to the judges: their articles was read, and they were condemned to be burned. Coming to the place of execution, as they began to exhort the people, gags were thrust into their mouths, which they through vehemency in speaking thrust out again, desiring for the Lord's sake that they might have leave to speak. And so singing with a loud voice, "I believe in one God," &c. they were fastened to the stake, praying for their persecutors, and exhorting one another, to bear the fire patiently. The one feeling the flame to come to his beard, "Ah!" said he, "what a small pain is this, to be compared to the glory to come!" Thus the patient martyrs committed their spirit to the hands of God.

Marion, Wife of Adrian Taylor, Tournay, A. D. 1545.

In the same persecution was apprehended also one Adrian and Marion his wife. The cause of their trouble, as also of the others, was the emperor's decree made in the council of Worms against the Lutherans. Adrian, being not so strong a man, gave back from the truth, and was only beheaded; but his wife being stronger than a woman, withstood their threats, and therefore was enclosed in an iron grate and laid in the earth and buried alive, according to the usual punishment of that country for women.

Master Peter Bruley, Preacher, A. D. 1545.

Master Peter Bruley was preacher in the French church at Strasburg. At the earnest request of faithful brethren he came down to visit the lower countries about Artois and Tournay in Flanders; where he most diligently preached the word of God to the people in houses, the doors standing open.

When the magistrates of Tournay had shut the gates of the town, and had made search for him three days, he was privately let down the wall in a basket during the night; and, as he was let down to the ditch ready to take his way, one of them who let him down, leaning over the wall to bid him farewell, caused unawares a stone to slip out of the wall, which, falling upon him, broke his leg, by which he was heard by the watchmen complaining of his wound, and so was taken, giving thanks to God, by whose Providence he was there staid to serve the Lord in that place. So long as he remained in prison, he ceased not to fulfil the part of a diligent preacher, teaching, and confirming all that came to him in the word of grace. Being in prison he wrote his own confession and examination, and sent it to the brethren. He remained in prison four months. His sentence was given by the emperor's commissioners at Brussels, That he should be burned to ashes, and his ashes thrown into the river. He cheerfully and constantly took his martyrdom, and suffered it.

Peter Miccius, Bergiban, Tournay, A. D. 1545.

The coming of Master Peter Bruley into the country of Flanders, did much good among the brethren. This Peter, before he was called to the gospel, had led a wicked life, but after the gospel began to work in him, it altered his character so much, that he excelled all other men in godly zeal and virtue. In his first examination he was asked, "Whether he was one of the scholars of Peter Bruley?" He said he was, and that he had received much fruit by his doctrine. "Wilt thou then defend his doctrine?" said they. "Yea," said he, "for it is consonant both to the Old Testament and to the New." And for this he was let down into a deep dungeon under the castle-ditch, full of toads and filthy vermin. Shortly afterwards the senate, with certain friars, came to examine him, to see whether they could convert him. He answered and said, "That when he had lived such an ungodly life, they never spake a word against him: but now, for favouring the word of God, they sought his blood."

There was also one Bergiban in the prison at the same time, who had been an active man in the gospel, before the coming of Bruley; but the commissioners having threatened him with cruel torments, and horror of death, he began by little and little to waver and shrink from the truth, at the fair words of the false friars and priests, who promised to have his punishment changed into being beheaded, and at this he was fain to grant their requests: upon which the adversaries taking their advantage, came to Miccius, and told them of Bergiban's retraction, wishing him to do the like. But he stoutly persisting in the truth, endured to the fire, where, having powder put to his breast, he was dispatched. The friars, hearing the crack of the powder upon his breast, told the people, that the devil came out of him and carried away his soul!

A Priest of Germany.

John Gastius writes of a certain prince, but does not name him, who put out the eyes of a priest in Germany for no other cause than that he said the mass was no sacrifice, in the sense in which many priests take it. Neither did the cruel prince immediately put him to death, but first kept him in prison for a long time, afflicting him with torments. Then he was brought forth to be degraded, after a barbarous manner. First, they shaved the crown of his head, then rubbed it hard with salt, so that the blood came running down his shoulders. After that they raised and paired the tops of his fingers with cruel pain, that no savour of the holy oil might remain. At last the patient and godly martyr, four days after, yielded up his life and spirit.

A godly Priest in Hungary.

In Hungary a godly priest preached, that the eating of flesh is not prohibited in the scripture: for which the cruel bishop, after he had imprisoned him some weeks, caused him to be brought out, and his body to be tied over with hares, geese, and hens hanging round about him: and so the beastly bishop made dogs be set upon him, which cruelly rent and tore whatever they could catch: and thus the good minister of Christ, being driven about the city with the barking of dogs, died, and was martyred. But within a few days after, the impious bishop, by the stroke of God's just hand, fell sick and became mad, and so raving without sense or wit, died miserably.

Master Nicholas, and Barbara his wife; also Augustine a barber, and Marion his wife, after they had been at Geneva, came into Germany, to pass over into England. By the way coming to Hainault, Augustine desired Master Nicholas to come to Bruges to visit and comfort certain brethren there; which he willingly did. From thence they continued their journey toward England. But in the way Augustine and his wife, being known, were detected. Augustine escaped that time out of their hands, and could not be found. The soldiers then laying hands upon Nicholas and the two women, brought them back again to Tournay. In returning by the way, when Master Nicholas at the table gave thanks (as the manner is of the faithful) the wicked ruler scorning them, and swearing like a tyrant, said, "Now let us see, thou lewd heretic, whether thy God can deliver thee out of my hand." Nicholas answering again modestly, asked, "What had Christ ever offended him, that he with his blasphemous swearing did so tear him in pieces?" desiring him, "that if he had any thing to say against Christ, that he would rather wreak his anger upon his poor body, and let the Lord alone." After this, they bound their hands and feet, and laid them in the dungeon.

Nicholas shortly after was brought before the judges, and condemned to be burned to ashes. On which sentence Nicholas blessed the Lord, who had counted him worthy to be a witness in the cause of his dear and well-beloved Son, and then patiently taking his death, commended up his spirit unto God in the midst of the fire.

Marion, Wife of Augustine, A. D. 1549.

After the martyrdom of this Master Nicholas, Marion the wife of Augustine was called for. With her they had much talk about the manner and state of Geneva, asking her how the sacraments were administered there, and whether she had celebrated there the Lord's supper? She answered, that the sacraments there were celebrated after the Lord's institution, of which she was no celebrator, but a partaker. The sentence of her condemnation was, that she should be interred alive. When she was let down to the grave, kneeling, she desired the Lord to help her; and before she should be thrown down, she desired her face might be covered with a napkin or some linen cloth; being so covered, and the earth thrown upon her face and body, the executioner stamped upon her with his feet, till her breath was past.

We heard before how Augustine escaped at the taking of Nicholas and the two women, but having returned to the town of Beaumont in Hainault, he was known and detected to the magistrate. Being taken, he was examined, and valiantly standing to the defence of his doctrine, he answered his adversaries with great boldness.

Among others who came to him was the warden of the Gray friars, who persuaded him to relent, or he should be damned in hell-fire perpetually. Augustine answering said, "Prove that which you said by the authority of God's word, that a man may believe you. You say much, but you prove nothing, rather like a doctor of lies, than of truth," &c. At last, being condemned to be burnt, he was brought to the inn where he was to take horse; where was a certain gentleman, a stranger, who, drinking to him in a cup of wine, desired him to have pity upon himself; and if he would not favour his life, yet that he would favour his own soul. Augustine said, after he had thanked him for his good will, "What care I have," said he, "of my soul, you may see by this, that I had rather give my body to be burned, than to do that which was against my conscience." When the day of his martyrdom came, the people being offended at his constancy, cried out to have him drawn at a horse's tail in place of burning; but the Lord would not suffer that. In fine, being tied to the stake, and fire set to him, he prayed to the Lord, and so in the fire patiently departed.

A certain Woman at Augsburg, A.D. 1550.

At Augsburg a woman dwelling there, seeing a priest carry the host to a sick person with taper-light, as the manner is, asked him what he meant by going with candle-light at noon-day. For this she was apprehended, and in great danger, had it not been for the earnest suit and prayers of the women of that city, and at the intercession of Mary the emperor's sister.

Two Virgins in the Diocese of Bamberg, A.D. 1551.

In the diocese of Bamberg, two virgins were led out to slaughter, which they sustained with patient hearts and cheerful countenances. They had garlands of straw put on their heads on going to their martyrdom, on which one comforting the other said, "Seeing Christ for us bare a crown of thorns, why should we stick to bear a crown of straw? no doubt but the Lord will render us better than crowns of gold." Some said that they were anabaptists; and it might be, said Melancthon, that they had some fond opinion; yet they held, saith he, the foundation of the articles of our faith, and they died blessedly, in a good conscience, and knowledge of the Son of God. Few live without errors. Flatter not yourselves, thinking yourselves so clear that you cannot err.

Hostius, otherwise called George, at Ghent, A.D. 1555.

This Hostius had been in the French church in England, during the reign of King Edward. After the coming of Queen Mary, he went to Friesland, with his wife and children. From thence he came to Ghent, where he heard that there was a Black friar who used to preach good doctrine, and being desirous to hear him, he came to his sermon. The friar, contrary to his expectation, preached in defence of transubstantiation, at which his heart was so full that he could scarcely refrain from speaking until the sermon was finished. As soon as the friar had come down from the pulpit, he burst out and charged him with false doctrine, persuading the people as well as he could be heard, by the scriptures, that the bread was but a sacrament only of the Lord's body. He had not gone far, when Hesselius the chamberlain overtook him, and carried him to prison. Then were doctors and friars brought to reason with him, of the sacrament, of the invocation of saints, and purgatory. He ever stood to the trial only of the scripture, which they refused. When he was condemned, he was commanded not to speak to the people. The officer made great haste to have him dispatched. Wherefore he, mildly like a lamb, praying for his enemies, gave himself to be bound; first they strangled him, and then consumed his body with fire.

Bertrand de Blas, at Tournay, A.D. 1555.

The story of Bertrand is lamentable, his torments incredible, the tyranny shewed to him horrible, the constancy of the martyr admirable. This Bertrand, being a silk weaver, went to Wesell for the cause of religion, and being desirous to draw his wife and children from Tournay to Wesell, he came thrice to persuade her to go with him. When she could not be entreated, he, remaining a few days at home, set his house in order, and desired his wife and brother to pray that God would establish him in the enterprise which he went about. He went upon Christmas day to the high church of Tournay, where he took the cake out of the priest's hand, as he would have lifted it over his head at mass, and stamped it under his feet, saying, that he did it to shew the glory of that god, and what little power he had; with other words more to the people, to persuade them that the cake or fragment of bread was not Jesus their Saviour.

At the sight of this the people stood all amazed. At length such a stir followed, that Bertrand could hardly escape with life. The noise of this was soon carried to the bailiff of Hainault, and governor of the castle of Tournay, who lay sick of the gout at Niesie. He like a madman cried out, that God would ever be so patient as to suffer that contumely to be trodden under-foot; adding, that he would revenge his cause, so that it should be an example for ever to all posterity; and forthwith the furious tyrant commanded himself to be carried to the castle of Tournay. Bertrand being brought before him, was asked, whether he repented of his act, or whether he would so do, if it were to be done again? Who answered, that if it were an hundred times to be done, he would do it; and if he had an hundred lives, he would give them in that quarrel. Then was he thrice tormented most miserably. They then proceeded to the sentence, more like tyrants than christian men. By the tenor of which sentence, this was his punishment:—

First, he was drawn from the castle of Tournay to the market-place, having a ball of iron put into his mouth. Then he was set upon a stage, where his right hand, wherewith he took the host, was crushed and pressed between two hot irons, with sharp iron edges fiery red, till the form and fashion of his hand was misshapen. In like manner they brought irons for his right foot, made fire-hot, which of his own accord he put to his foot, to suffer as his hand had done, with wonderful constancy and firmness of mind. That done they took the ball of iron out of his mouth, and cut off his tongue, who notwithstanding, with continual crying, ceased not to call upon God; whereby the hearts of the people were greatly moved. Upon this the tormentors thrust the iron ball into his mouth again. Then his legs and his arms were bound behind him with an iron chain going about his body, and so he was let down flat upon the fire. The aforesaid governor standing by and looking on, caused him to be let up again, and so down and up again, till at last the whole body was spent to ashes, which he commanded to be cast into the river; when this was done, the chapel where this mass-god was so treated was locked up, and the board whereupon the priest stood was burnt, and the marble stone upon which the host fell was broken in pieces.

In the same year, 1555, two hundred ministers and preachers of the gospel were banished out of Bohemia for preaching against the superstition of the bishop of Rome, and extolling the glory of Christ.

The Preachers of Loerane exiled.

Loerane is a place between the Alps, yet subject to the Helvetians. When these had received the gospel, and the five cantons of the Helvetians were not well pleased, but would have them punished, and great contention was among the Helvetians about it, it was concluded at length, that the ministers should be exiled.

Francis Warlut, Alexander Dayken, at Tournay, A.D. 1562.

After these two good men had been conversant in the reformed churches in other countries, at last, for conscience sake, they returned home to do good in their own country of Tournay.

So, as the people there resorted to a field or wood without the city, with a preacher, to hear the word of God, and to pray; the adversaries so pursued them, that they took above thirty, of whom these two among the rest were apprehended; and thinking no less but that they should be burned, they began to sing psalms. At length being brought forth, first one, then the other, they were both beheaded. And where the judges had intended to quarter their bodies, and to set them up by the high ways, yet was it so provided, God working in the hearts of the people, that they were both committed to sepulture.

Gillotus Viver, James Faber his father-in-law, Michael Faber son of James, Anna, wife of Gillotus, and daughter of James Faber, suffered in the cause of the gospel at Valence. James Faber, being an old man, said that although he could not answer or fortify them in reasoning, yet he would constantly abide in the truth of the gospel. Anna, his daughter, being with child, was respited; after she was delivered she followed her husband and father in the like martyrdom.

Michella Caignoucle, at Valence, A.D. 1550.

Michella, wife of James Clerk, who was before burned when she was offered to be married, and to be carried out of the country to some reformed church, refused so to do, but would abide her vocation, and so was condemned with Gillotus to be burned.

Godfrid Hamelle, at Tournay, A.D. 1552.

This Godfrid, a tailor, was taken and condemned at Tournay. When they had condemned him by the name of an heretic: "Nay," said he, "not an heretic, but an unprofitable servant of Jesus Christ." When the executioner went about to strangle him to diminish his punishment, he refused it, saying, "That he would abide the sentence that the judges had given."

Beside these Germans there were a great number both in the higher and lower countries of Germany, who were secretly drowned, or buried, or otherwise made away with in prison, whose names although they are not known to us, yet they are registered in the book of life. In the Dutch book of Adrian, others are numbered in the catalogue of these German martyrs, who suffered in several places of the low country: the names of some of these are:—

John Malo, Damian Witrocke, Waldrew Calier, John Porcean, Julian, Vanden Swerde, Adrian Lopphe, Bawdwine. At Bergen, were burnt, in the year 1555, John Malo, Damian Witrocke, Waldrew Calier; buried alive, John Porcean. At Aste also suffered one Julian, 1541, and Adrian Lopphe, 1555. At Brussels, 1559, one Bawdwine, beheaded. Another called Gilken Tilleman burnt, 1551.

Add moreover to the catalogue of Dutch martyrs burnt in the Low Countries under the emperor's dominion, the names of these following: William Swole burnt at Mechlin, 1529. Nicholas Van Pole, at Ghent, beheaded. Robert Ogvier, and Joan his wife, with Baudicon, and Martin Ogvier, their children, who suffered at Lisle, 1556. Master Nicholas burnt at Mons in Hainault: Lawrence, of Brussels, at Mons; John Fasseau at Mons; Cornelius Volcart at Bruges, 1553. Hubert, the printer, and Philebert Joyner, at Bruges, 1553. A woman buried with thorns under her; Peter le Roux at Bruges, 1552. At Mechlin suffered Francis and Nicholas, two brethren, 1555. At Antwerp were burnt Adrian, a painter, and Henry, a tailor, 1555. Also Cornelius Halewme, locksmith, and Herman Janson the same year. John du Camp, schoolmaster, 1557, with a number of others, who in the book are to be seen and read.

In 1525, we read also in the French history, of a certain monk, who, because he forsook his abominable order, and was married, was burned at Prague.

In the collections of Henry Patalion, we read also of a certain godly preacher who was poisoned for preaching the word of truth, by the priests of Erfurt.

And here ceasing with these persecutions in Germany, we will now, Christ willing, proceed further to the French martyrs, comprehending in a like manner the names and causes of such as in that kingdom suffered for the word of God, and the cause of righteousness.

THE FRENCH MARTYRS.

James Pavane, Schoolmaster, at Paris, A.D. 1524.

This James, being taken by the bishop of Meux, was compelled to recant. Afterward returning again to his confession, he was burned at Paris, in the year 1525.

Dionysius de Rieux, at Meux, A.D. 1528.

This Denis was one of them who was burned for saying that the mass is a plain denial of the death and passion of Christ. He was always wont to have in his mouth the words of Christ: "He that denieth me before men, him I will also deny before my Father;" and to muse upon the same earnestly. He was burnt with a slow fire.

John de Cadurco, Bachelor of the Civil Law, A.D. 1533.

This John, for making an exhortation to his countrymen upon Allhallow's-day, and after sitting at a feast where it was propounded that every one should bring forth some sentence, because he brought forth this; "Christ reigns in our hearts," and prosecuted it by the scriptures, he was accused, taken, and degraded, and afterwards burned. At his degradation, one of the Black friars of Paris preached, taking for his text the words of St. Paul, 1 Tim. iv. 1. "The Spirit speaketh expressly that in the later times, men shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils," &c. And in handling that place, either he could not, or would not proceed further in the text. Cadurco cried out to him to proceed, and read further. The friar stood dumb and could not speak a word.

Then Cadurco, taking the text, continued it: "Teaching lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving," &c.

Bartholomew Myler, a lame cripple: John Burges, merchant, the receiver of Nantz; Henry Hoille of Conberon; Catella, a schoolmistress; Stephen de la Forge, merchant, 1533. These five here specified, for certain papers circulated abroad against the abomination of the mass, and other superstitious absurdities of the pope, were condemned and burned in the city of Paris. Henry of Couberon had his tongue bored through, and tied fast to one of his cheeks with an iron wire; he likewise with the others was burned.

Alexander Canus, Priest, otherwise called Laurentius Cruceus, at Paris, A.D. 1533.

For the sincere doctrine and confession of Christ's true religion, he was burned in Paris; having but a small fire he suffered much torment.

John Pointer, Surgeon, at Paris, A.D. 1533.

This surgeon being detected and accused by the friars, was first condemned to be strangled, and then burned; but afterwards, because he would not do homage to a certain idol at the command of a friar that came to confess him, his sentence was changed to have his tongue cut out, and so to be burned.

Peter Gaudet, Knight of Rhodes, A.D. 1533.

This Peter, being at Geneva with his wife, was put in prison for defence of the gospel; and, after long torments, was burned.

Quoquillard, A.D. 1534.

At Bezaçon, in Burgundy, this Quoquillard was burned for the confession and testimony of Christ's gospel.

Nicholas, a scrivener; John de Poix; Stephen Burlet, 1534. These three were executed and burned for the cause of the gospel, in the city of Arras.

Mary Becaudella, at Fountaigne, A.D. 1534.

This Mary being virtuously instructed by her master where she lived; and being afterwards at a sermon where a friar preached, she found fault with his doctrine, and refuted the same by the scriptures. He procured her to be burned at Fountaigne.

John Cornon, 1535.

John Cornon was a husbandman of Mascon, and unlettered; but one to whom God gave such wisdom, that his judges were amazed, when he was condemned by their sentence and burned.

Martin Gonin, in Dauphine, A.D. 1536.

This Martin being taken for a spy on the borders of France, towards the Alps, was committed to prison. In his going out, his jailor espied about him the letters of Farrell, and of Peter Viret. Therefore being examined by the king's procurator, and of the inquisitor, touching his faith, he was cast into the river and drowned.

Claudius Painter, a Goldsmith, at Paris, A.D. 1540.

Claudius going about to convert his friends and kinsfolks in his doctrine, was committed and condemned to be burned; but the high parliament of Paris, correcting that sentence, added, that he should have his tongue cut out before, and so be burned.

Stephen Brune, a Husbandman, at Rutiers, A.D. 1540.

Stephen Brune after confession of his faith, was adjudged to be burned. Which punishment he took so constantly, that it was a wonder to them. His adversaries commanded after his death, that none should make any more mention of him, under pain of heresy.

Constantius of Rouen, with three others, A.D. 1542.

These four, for the defence of the gospel being condemned to be burned, were put in a cart. They said, that they were reputed here as the offscouring of the world, but yet their death was a sweet odour unto God.

John du Becke, Priest, A.D. 1543.

For the doctrine of the gospel he was degraded, and constantly abode the torment of fire in the city of Troyes in Champagne.

Aymond de Lauoy, at Bourdeaux, A.D. 1543.

Aymond preached the gospel at Saint Faith's in Angou, where he was accused by the parish priest, and by other priests, as having taught false doctrine. When the magistrates of Bourdeaux had given command to apprehend him, he was desired by his friends to fly; but he would not, saying, he had rather never have been born, than to do so. If was the office of a good shepherd, he said, not to fly in time of peril, but rather to abide the danger, lest the flock should be scattered: or lest in so doing, he should leave some scruple in their minds, to think, that he fed them with dreams and fables, contrary to the word of God. Wherefore he told them, that he feared not to yield both body and soul for the truth which he had taught; saying, with St. Paul, "That he was ready, not to be bound only, but also to die for the Lord Jesus."

When the somner came to arrest him, the people rose, in defence of their preacher, and flew upon the somner, to deliver him out of his hands. But Aymond desired them not to prevent his martyrdom, for as it was the will of God that he should suffer, he would not resist. So Aymond was carried to Bourdeaux. Many witnesses, chiefly priests, came against him, with Mr. Riverack: who had said often before, that if it should cost him a thousand crowns, he would have him burned. He made many exceptions against the false witnesses, but they would not be taken. The amount of their accusation was only that he had denied purgatory.

He continued about nine months in prison, bewailing exceedingly his former life, though no man could charge him outwardly with any crime. After that, he was examined with torments. One of the head presidents came to him, and shaking him by the beard, bade him tell what fellows he had of his religion. To whom he answered, that he had no other fellows, but such as knew and did the will of God his Father. In these torments he continued two or three hours, comforting himself with these words; "This body," said he, "once must die, but the spirit shall live: the kingdom of God abideth for ever." In the time of his tormenting, he fainted, but afterwards on coming to himself again, he said, "O Lord, Lord, why hast thou forsaken me?" To whom the president, "Nay, wicked Lutheran, thou hast forsaken God." Then said Aymond, "Alas, good masters, why do you thus miserably torment me? O Lord, I beseech thee forgive them, they know not what they do." So constant was he, that they could not force him to utter one man's name.

On the next Saturday following, sentence of condemnation was given against him. Then certain friars were appointed to hear his confession; he refused them, choosing some of his own order, the parish priest of St. Christopher's, bidding the friars depart, for he would confess his sins to the Lord. "Do you not see," said he, "how I am troubled enough with men, will ye yet trouble me more? Others have had my body, will ye also take from me my soul? Away from me, I pray you." At last, when they refused to let him have the parish priest, he took a Carmelite; with whom he had long converse, and at last converted him to the truth. Shortly after, the judges, Cassanges, and Longa, with others, came to him; Aymond began to preach to them and declare his mind touching the Lord's Supper: but Longa, interrupting him, demanded of him thus.

Judge.—First declare to us your mind, what you think of purgatory?

Martyr.—In scripture all these are one, to purge, to cleanse, and to wash. Whereof we read in Isaiah, in the epistles of St. Paul, and of St. Peter; "He hath washed you in his blood. Ye are redeemed, not with gold, but with the blood of Christ," &c. Heb. ix. 12. 1 Peter i. 18. And how often do we read, in the epistles of St. Paul, that we are cleansed by the blood of Christ from our sins, &c.

Judge.—These epistles are known to every child.

Martyr.—To every child? Nay, I fear you have scarce read them yourself.

A friar.—With one word you may satisfy them, if you will say, that there is a place where the souls are purged after this life.

Martyr.—That I leave for you to say, if you please. What, would ye have me damn my own soul, and say that which I know not?

Judge.—Dost not thou think, that when thou art dead, thou shalt go to purgatory? And that he that died in venial sin, shall pass straight into paradise?

Martyr.—Such trust I have in my God, that the same day when I shall die, I shall enter into paradise.

Another judge.—Where is paradise?

Martyr.—There where the majesty and glory of God is.

Judge.—The canons make mention of purgatory, and you in your sermons have used always much to pray for the poor.

Martyr.—I have preached the word of God, and not the canons.

Judge.—Dost thou believe in the church?

Martyr.—I believe as the church regenerated by the blood of Christ, and founded in his word, hath appointed.

Judge.—What church is that?

Martyr.—The church is a Greek word, signifying as much as a congregation or assembly: and so I say, that whosoever the faithful do congregate together, to the honour of God, and the extending of christian religion, the Holy Ghost is verily with them.

Judge.—By this it should follow, that there are many churches: and where any rustic clowns assemble together, there must be a church.

Martyr.—It is no absurd thing to say that there are many churches or congregations among christians: and so speaks St. Paul, to all the churches which are in Galatia, &c. And yet all these congregations make but one church.

Judge.—The church wherein thou believest, is not the same church which our creed calls the holy church?

Martyr.—I believe the same.

Judge.—And who should be head of that church?

Martyr.—Jesus Christ.

Judge.—And not the pope?

Martyr.—No.

Judge.—And what is he then?

Martyr.—A minister, if he be a good man, as other bishops: of whom St. Paul thus writes; "Let a man so account of us, as ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God," &c. 1 Cor. iv. 1.

Then the judges leaving him with the friars, departed, counting him as a damned creature. Aymond, however, putting his trust in God, was full of comfort, saying with St. Paul, "Who shall separate me from the love of God? Shall the sword, hunger, or nakedness? No, nothing shall pluck me from him. But rather I have pity on you," said he, and so they departed. Not long after, he was brought to the place of execution, singing by the way the hundred and fourteenth Psalm. He thanked moreover the keeper, and desired him to be good to his poor prisoners. And so taking his leave of them, and desiring them to pray for him; also giving thanks to the mistress-keeper for her gentleness to him, he proceeded to his execution. As he came near the church of St. Andrew, they desired him to ask mercy of God, and of blessed St. Mary, and of St. Justice. "I ask mercy," said he, "of God, and his justice, but the Virgin, blessed St. Mary, I never offended, nor did any thing for which I should ask her mercy. In passing a certain image of the Virgin Mary, great offence was taken against him, because he called upon Christ Jesus only, and made no mention of her. So he lifted up his voice to God, praying that he would never suffer him to invoke any other. Coming to the place where he was to suffer, he was tumbled out of the cart upon the ground, testifying to magistrates and to the people standing by, that he died for the gospel of Jesus Christ. He would have spoken more, but he was not suffered, by the officers, crying, "Dispatch him! dispatch him! let him not speak." Then speaking a few words softly in the ear of the Carmelite whom he had converted, he was bid to step up to the stage. There the people beginning to listen to him, he said thus; "O Lord, make haste to help me, tarry not, do not despise the works of thy hands: and you, my brethren, that are students and scholars, I exhort you to study and learn the gospel: for the word of God abideth for ever: labour to know the will of God, and fear not them that kill the body, but have no power upon your souls: my flesh," said he, "striveth against the spirit, but I shall shortly cast it away. My good masters, I beseech you pray for me.

O Lord my God, into thy hands I commend my soul." As he was often repeating the same words, the executioner took and strangled him. And thus that blessed saint gave up his life; his body afterwards was consumed with fire.

Francis Bribard, A. D. 1544, was said to be the secretary of the cardinal of Ballaie. Being condemned for the gospel, his tongue was cut off, and with great constancy he suffered martyrdom by burning.

William Husson, an apothecary at Rouen, in 1544, went to the palace, and there scattered certain books concerning christian doctrine, and the abuse of human tradition.

The council was so moved at this, that they commanded all the gates of the city to be locked, and diligent search to be made to find out the author, so that William Husson was taken by the way riding to Dieppe, and brought again to Rouen. Being there examined, he declared his faith boldly, and how he came purposely to disperse those books in Rouen, and went to do the like at Dieppe.

The week ensuing he was condemned to be burnt alive. After the sentence he was brought in a cart, accompanied with a doctor, a Carmelite friar; and when before the great church they put a torch into his hand, and required him to do homage to the image of the Virgin Mary, and because he refused to do this they cut out his tongue. The friar then preached a sermon, and when he spoke anything of the mercies of God, the said William hearkened to him; but when he spoke of the merits of saints, and other dreams, he turned away his head. The friar looking upon the countenance of Husson, lifted up his hand to heaven, saying, with great exclamation, that he was damned, and was possessed with a devil. When the friar had ceased his sermon, this godly Husson had his hands and feet bound behind his back, and with a pulley was lifted up into the air; and when the fire was kindled he was let down into the flame, where the blessed martyr with a smiling and cheerful countenance looked up to heaven, never moving or stirring till he let down his head, and gave up his spirit. All the people there present were not a little astonished, some saying that he had a devil; others maintained the contrary, saying, if he had a devil, he would have fallen into despair.

This Carmelite friar was called Delanda, who afterwards was converted, and preached the gospel.

James Cobard, a schoolmaster, and many others taken at the same time, 1545.—This James, schoolmaster in the dukedom of Barrens in Lorraine, disputed with three priests, that the sacrament of baptism, and of the supper did not avail, unless they were received with faith; which was as much as to say, that the mass profited neither the quick nor the dead. For which, and also for his confession, which he sent while in prison by his mother to the judge, he was burned, and most quietly suffered.

Also in 1546, at Meaux a city, in France, near to Paris, where William Briconatus was bishop, this bishop did much good, and brought to them the light of the gospel, and reformed the church; but afterwards, though he apostatised, yet there were many who remained constant. Then came the burning of James Pavane; and as superstition began to grow more and more, those who had continued steadfast began to assemble in Mangin's house, and to set up a church for themselves, after the example of the French church in Strasburg. They began with twenty or thirty, and increased in a short time to three or four hundred. On the matter being known to the senate of Paris, the chamber was beset where those persons were, and they were taken. Sixty-two men and women were bound and brought to Paris, singing psalms, especially the seventy-ninth Psalm. To these it was chiefly objected, that they being laymen, ministered the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord.

Of these sixty-two, fourteen were specially steadfast, and were condemned, and racked to compel them to confess more of their fellows, but would not do so; the rest were scourged and banished the country. These fourteen were sent to sundry monasteries to be converted; but that would not answer; they then were sent in a cart to Meaux to be burned; and when on the way, about three miles from Paris, they met by chance a weaver of Couberon, who cried to them aloud, bidding them to be of good cheer, and to cleave fast to the Lord. This man was also taken, and bound and put in the cart with them. On coming to the place of execution, which was before Mangin's house, they were told, that those who would be confessed should not have their tongues cut out, but that the others should. Of the fourteen there were seven who to save their tongues confessed; the other seven refused. As they were burning, the people sung psalms. The priests would also sing their songs: "O saving Host," &c. and "Hail, O Queen of heaven," &c. while the sacrifice of these holy martyrs was finished. Their wives being compelled to see their husbands in torments, were afterwards put in prison, whence they promised to be freed if they would only say that their husbands were damned, but they refused.

At Paris, in 1546, Peter Chapot, a printer, after having been at Geneva, came into France, and brought with him some books of the holy scripture, which he dispersed abroad among the faithful, when his great zeal caused him to be apprehended.

On being brought before the commissaries, he rendered an account of his faith, and exhibited a supplication, or writing, in which he learnedly informed the judges to do their office uprightly. Then were three doctors of the Sorbonne assigned to dispute with him, who when they could find no advantage, but rather shame at his hands, were angry with the judges for making them dispute with heretics.

This done, the judges consulting on his condemnation, could not agree, so that Chapot might have escaped, had not a wicked person wrought his condemnation, that he should be burned. At his execution, friar Maillard called upon him not to speak to the people, but he desired him to pray. Then he bade him pray to our Lady, and confess her to be his advocate. He confessed that she was a blessed Virgin, and recited the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, and was about to speak of the mass, but Maillard would not let him, making haste to his execution, and said, unless he would say the "Hail Mary," he should be burnt. Then Chapot prayed, "O Jesus Son of David, have mercy upon me." Maillard then bade him say, "Jesus, Maria," and that he should be only strangled. Chapot was so weak that he could not speak. "Say," said Maillard, "Jesus Maria, or else thou shalt be burned." As Chapot was thus striving with the friar, suddenly, as it happened, that Jesus Maria, slipped from his mouth; but he instantly repressing himself, "O God," said he, "what have I done! pardon me, O Lord, to thee only have I sinned." Then Maillard commanded the cord to be put about his neck to strangle him. After all things were done, Maillard, full of anger, went to the council-house, declaring what an uproar had almost happened among the people; saying, that he would complain of the judges for suffering those heretics to have their tongues. Immediately a decree was made, that all who were to be burned, unless they recanted at the fire, should have their tongues cut off; which law was afterwards diligently observed.

Saintinus Nivet at Paris, in 1546.—After the burning of the fourteen, described before, this Saintinus, who was a cripple, had removed away from Meaux, but after a time he returned, and, as he was selling certain small wares in the fair, he was known again and apprehended. Information having been given, he was examined, and at first he confessed all, and more than they were willing to hear. But as they were examining him on certain points of religion, and asked him whether he would stand to what he said, or not, he gave this answer, which is worthy to be registered in all men's hearts, saying, "And I ask you again, lord judges, dare you be so bold as to deny what is so plain and manifest by the open words of the scripture?" So little regard had he to saving his own life, that he desired the judges, for God's sake, that they would rather take care of their own lives and souls, and consider how much innocent blood they spilled daily in fighting against Christ Jesus and his gospel.

At last, being brought to Paris, he there suffered martyrdom: no kind of cruelty was wanting, which the innocent martyrs of Christ Jesus were wont to undergo.

Stephen Polliot, in 1546, on coming out of Normandy, where he was born, to Meaux, was compelled to fly, but was apprehended and brought to Paris, and there cast into a foul and dark prison. In which prison he was kept in bands and fetters a long time, where he saw almost no light. At length being called before the senate, and his sentence being given to have his tongue cut out, and to be burned alive, his books hanging about his neck in a bag, "O Lord," said he, "is the world in blindness and darkness still?" At last the worthy martyr of Jesus Christ was put into the fire, where with much patience he ended this transitory life.

John English, in 1547, was executed and burned at Sens in Burgundy, being condemned by the high court of Paris, for confessing the true word of God.

Michael Michelote, a tailor, in 1547, was apprehended for the gospel's sake, and sentenced if he would turn, to be beheaded; and if he would not turn, then to be burned alive. On being asked, which of these two he would choose? answered, that he trusted, that he who had given him grace not to deny the truth, would also give him patience to endure the fire. He was burned.

Leonard de Prato, in 1547, when going from Dijon to Bar, a town in Burgundy, with two false brethren, and talking with them about religion, was betrayed by them, and afterwards burned.

Seven Martyrs, A. D. 1457.

John Taffington, and Joan his wife, Simon Mareschal, and Joan his wife, William Michaut, James Boulerau, and James Bretany.—All these seven being of the city of Langres, were committed to the fire for the word and truth of Jesus Christ, in which they died with much strength and comfort; but especially Joan, who was Simon's wife, being reserved to the last, because she was the youngest, confirmed her husband, and all the others with words of singular consolation; declaring to her husband, that they should the same day be married to the Lord Jesus, to live with him for ever.

Michael Mareschall, John Camus, Great John Camus, and John Serarphin, in the same year, and about the same time, for the like confession of Christ's gospel, were condemned by the senate of Paris, and in the same city also with the like cruelty were burned.

Octovien Blondel, a merchant of precious stones at Paris, 1548.—This Octovien was well known both at court and elsewhere; he was a singularly honest man of great integrity, and also a favourer of God's word. Being at his host's house at Lyons, he rebuked the filthy talk, and superstitious behaviour, which he heard and saw there. The host, bearing to him a grudge, had some talk with one Gabriel, concerning the riches, and a sumptuous collar set with rich jewels belonging to this Octovien.

Thus these two consulting together, suborned a person to borrow of him a sum of crowns; which, because Octovien refused to lend, the other caused him to be apprehended for heresy, thinking thereby to make attachment of his goods. But such order was taken by Blondel's friends, that they were frustrated in their purpose. Then Blondel being examined as to his faith, gave a plain and full confession of that doctrine, which he had learned: for which he was committed to prison, where he did much good to the prisoners.

For some that were in debt, he paid their creditors and loosed them out. To some he gave meat, to others raiment. At length, through the importune persuasions of his parents and friends, he gave over and changed his confession. However, the Presenteur Gabriel appealed up to the high court of Paris. There Octovien being asked again, touching his faith, which of his two confessions he would stick to? he being before admonished of his fall, and of the offence given by it to the faithful, said he would live and die in his first confession, which he defended as consonant to the truth of God's word. He was therefore condemned to be burned, and his execution was hastened lest his friends at court might save his life.

Hubert Cheriet, alias Burre, tailor, at Dijon, 1549.—Hubert, being a young man of the age of nineteen years, was burned for the gospel at Dijon; who neither, by any terrors of death, nor allurements of his parents, could be otherwise persuaded, but constantly to remain in the truth unto death.

Master Florent Venote, priest at Paris, 1549.—This Florent remained in prison in Paris, about four years. During which time there was no torment which he did not overcome. Besides other torments, he was put in a narrow prison so straight, that he could neither stand nor lie, which they call the hose or boot, because it is straight beneath, and wider above. In this he remained seven weeks, where the tormentors affirm, that no thief or murderer could ever endure fifteen days, but was in danger of life or madness. At last, when there was a great shew in Paris at the king's coming to the city, Florent and other martyrs were put to death. He had his tongue cut off, and was brought to see the execution of them all; then, last of all, he was put in the fire and burned the ninth of July, in the place called Maulbert.

Ann Audebert, an apothecary's wife and widow at Orleans, 1549.—Going to Geneva, she was taken and brought to Paris, and by the council adjudged to be burned at Orleans. When the rope was put about her, she called it her wedding-girdle wherewith she should be married to Christ. And as she was to be burned upon a Saturday, upon Michaelmas-even: "Upon a Saturday," said she, "I was first married, and upon a Saturday I shall be married again." And seeing the cart brought in which she was to be carried, she rejoiced thereat, shewing such constancy in her martyrdom as made all the beholders to marvel.

A poor Tailor of Paris, 1549.

Among many other godly martyrs that suffered in France, the history of this poor tailor is not the least nor worst to be remembered. His name is not yet sought out in the French histories through want of diligence in those writers. The history is this: Not long after the coronation of Henry II., the French king, at whose coming into Paris several good martyrs were brought out and burned for a spectacle: a certain poor tailor, who then dwelt not far from the king's palace, was apprehended, because upon a certain holy-day he followed his occupation, and worked for his living. Before he was led to prison, the officer asked him, "Why he laboured giving no observance to the holy-day?" he answered, "That he was a poor man, living only upon his labour: and as for the day, he knew no other but only the Sunday, wherein he might not lawfully work for his living." Then the officer began to ask of him many questions: which the poor tailor so answered, that he was soon clapt in prison. After that, the officer coming into court to shew what good service he had done for holy church, declared how he had taken a Lutheran working upon a holy-day. When the rumour was noised in the king's chamber, the poor man was sent to appear, that the king might hear him.

Only a few of the chief peers remained about the king when the simple tailor was brought. The king sitting in his chair, commanded Peter Castellan, bishop of Mascon, (a man very fit for such inquisitions) to question him. The tailor being entered, and nothing appalled at the king's majesty, after his reverence done to the prince, gave thanks to God, that he had so greatly dignified him, as to bring him where he might testify his truth before such a mighty prince. Then Castellan, began to reason with him touching the great and chief matters of religion. The tailor, without fear, or any halting in his speech, with wit and memory, answered excellently in behalf of the sincere doctrine and simple truth of God's gospel.

The nobles who were present, with cruel taunts and rebukes, did what they could to dash him out of countenance. Yet all this terrified him not, but with boldness of heart and free liberty of speech, he defended his cause, or rather the cause of Christ the Lord, neither flattering their persons, nor fearing their threats; which was to them a matter of astonishment to behold that simple poor artificer stand so firm and bold, answering before a king, to the questions propounded against him. When the king seemed to muse with himself, as one who might have been led to further knowledge, the bishop and other courtiers seeing the king in such a muse, said, he was an obstinate and stubborn person, and therefore should be sent to the judges, and punished: and so, within a few days after, he was condemned to be burned alive.

Claudius Thierry, at Orleans, 1549.—The same year, and for the same doctrine of the gospel, one Claudius also was burned at the town of Orleans, being apprehended by the way coming from Geneva to his country.

Leonard Galimard, at Paris, 1549.—This Leonard, for the confession likewise of Christ and his gospel, was taken and brought to Paris, and there, by the sentence of the council, was judged to be burned the same time that Florent Venote, above-mentioned, suffered at Paris.

Macæus Moreau, at Troyes, 1549.—He was burned in Troyes in Champagne, remaining constant to the end in the gospel, for which he was apprehended.

Joannes Godeau, Gabriel Beraudinus, A. D. 1550.—These two were of the church of Geneva. Godeau, standing to his confession, was burned. Gabriel, though he began a little to shrink for fear of the torments, yet, being confirmed by the constant death of Godeau, recovered again, and standing likewise to his confession, first had his tongue cut out. And so these two, after they had confirmed many in God's truth, gave their life for Christ's gospel.

Thomas Sampaulinus at Paris, 1551.—This young man, of the age of eighteen years, coming from Geneva to Paris, rebuked there a man for swearing. For which cause, being suspected for a Lutheran, he was watched and brought before the council of Paris, and put in prison, where he was racked and miserably tormented, so that he might either change his opinion, or confess others of his profession. His torments and rackings were so sore that the sight of them made Aubert, one of the council, a cruel and vehement enemy against the gospel, to turn his back and weep. The young man, when he had made the tormentors weary with racking, and yet would utter none, at last was brought to Maulbert place, in Paris, to be burned; being in the fire, he was plucked up again upon the gibbet, and asked whether he would turn? he said, "That he was in his way towards God, and therefore desired them to let him go." Thus this glorious martyr glorified the Lord with constant confession of his truth.

Mauricius Secemate in Provence, 1551.—Being interrogated by the lieutenant of that place, this martyr made his answers so that no great advantage could be taken of them. But he being greatly troubled in his conscience for dissembling with the truth, and being called afterwards before the chief judge, he answered so directly, that he was condemned and burned in Provence.

John Pulte, or de Puteo, surnamed Medicus, at Uzez in Languedoc, 1551.—This Medicus had a controversy about a certain pit with a citizen of the town of Uzez, where he dwelt. He, to cast Medicus in the law, accused him of heresy, bringing for his witnesses those labourers whom Medicus had hired to work in his vineyard: being examined on the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he was condemned and burned at Uzez in Languedoc.

Claudius Monerius at Lyons, 1551.

This man being well instructed in the knowledge of God's word, came to Lyons, and there taught children. Hearing of the lord president's coming to the city, he went to give warning to a certain friend of his, and conducted him out of the town. In returning again to comfort the man's wife and children, he was taken in his house: and so he confessing that which he knew to be true, and standing to that which he confessed, after much afflictions in prisons and dungeons, was condemned and burned at Lyons. Certain of the judges could not forbear weeping at his death.

In prison he wrote some letters, but one especially very comfortable to all the faithful. He wrote also the questions of the official, with his answers, which we have here contracted as follows:—

Official.—What believe you of the sacrament? Is the body of Christ in the bread, or no?

Martyr.—I worship Jesus Christ in heaven, sitting at the right hand of God the Father.

Official.—What say you about purgatory?

Martyr.—Forsomuch as there is no place of mercy after this life, therefore there is no need of any purgation; but it is necessary that we be purged before we go hence.

Official.—What think you of the pope?

Martyr.—I say he is a bishop as other bishops are, if he be a true follower of St. Peter.

Official.—What say you of vows?

Martyr.—No man can vow to God so much, but the law requires much more than he can vow.

Official.—Are not saints to be invoked?

Martyr.—They cannot pray without faith, and therefore it is in vain to call upon them. And again, God has appointed his angels about us, to minister in our necessities.

Official.—Is it not good to salute the blessed Virgin with the "Hail Mary!"

Martyr.—When she was on earth she had need of the angel's greeting; for then she had need of salvation, as well as others; but now she is so blessed, that no more blessing can be wished to her.

Official.—Are not images to be had?

Martyr.—The nature of man is so prone to idolatry, ever occupied in those things which lie before his eyes, rather than upon those which are not seen; images therefore are not to be set before Christians. You know nothing is to be adored, but that which is not seen with eyes, that is, God alone, who is a Spirit, and him we must worship only in spirit and in truth.

In 1552, Renat Poyet, the son of William Poyet, who was chancellor of France, for the true and sincere profession of the word of God, constantly suffered martyrdom, and was burned in the city of Salmaure.

John Jayer, and his servant at Toulouse, 1552.—These two coming from Geneva to their country with certain books, were apprehended and brought to Toulouse, where the master was first condemned. The servant being young, was not so prompt to answer them, but sent them to his master, saying, that he should answer them. When they were brought to the stake, the young man first going up, began to weep. The master fearing lest he would give over, ran to him, and he was comforted, and they began to sing. As they were in the fire, the master standing upright to the stake, shifted the fire from him to his servant, being more careful for him than for himself; and when he saw him dead, he bowed down into the flame, and so expired.

Hugonius Gravier, a schoolmaster and minister after of Cortillon, in the country of Newcastle. At Burg in Bresse, a day's journey from Lyons, in 1552, this Gravier was burnt. He coming from Geneva to Newcastle was there elected to be minister. On going to see his wife's friends at Mascon, he was taken, with all his company; and desiring the women and the rest of the company to lay the fault on him for bringing them out, he was sentenced to be burned, although the lords of Berne sent their heralds to save his life, and the official declared him to be an honest man, and to hold nothing but agreeing with the scriptures.

These five students, after they had remained in the university of Lausanne a certain time, agreed amongst themselves, being all Frenchmen, to return home every one to his country, that they might instruct their parents and friends in such knowledge as the Lord had given them. So taking their journey they came to Geneva, where they remained a while. From thence they went to Lyons, where they were apprehended and led to prison, and where they continued a whole year. As they were learned in the scriptures, every one of them exhibited severally a learned confession of his faith; and, through the power of the Lord's Spirit, confounded the friars, with whom they disputed.

They were examined as to the sacrament of the Lord's body, of purgatory, confession and invocation, free will, and the supremacy, &c. Although they proved their cause by scripture, and refuted their adversaries in reasoning, yet right being overcome by might, sentence was given, and they were burnt at Lyons. When set upon the cart, they began to sing psalms. As they passed by the market-place, one of them with a loud voice saluted the people with the words of the last chapter to the Hebrews, "The God of peace which brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep by the blood of the everlasting covenant," &c. Coming to the place, the two youngest went up upon the heap of wood to the stake, and there were fastened, and so after them the rest. Martial Alba being the eldest, was the last; being stripped of his clothes, and brought to the stake, he desired this petition of the governor—that he might go about to his companions tied at the stake, and kiss them: which being granted, he went and kissed every one, saying, "Farewell, my brother." The other four, following the example, bad each one, "Farewell, my brother." With that, fire was commanded to be put to them. So the blessed martyrs, in the midst of the fire, spake one to another to be of good cheer, and so departed.

The Examinations briefly touched.

Friar.—Thou sayest, friend, in thy confession, that the pope is not supreme head of the church. I will prove to the contrary. The pope is successor of Peter, and therefore he is supreme head of the church.

Martyr.—I deny that he is successor to Peter.

Then another friar.—Thou sayest St. Peter is not the head of the church, I will prove he is; for our Lord said to Peter, "Thou shalt be called Cephas;" which Cephas is as much as to say in Latin, a head; and therefore Peter is head of the church.

Martyr.—Where find you that interpretation? St. John in his first chapter doth expound it otherwise: "Thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a stone."

Then the judge Villard, calling for a New Testament, turned to the place, and found it to be so. Upon which the friar was utterly dashed and stood mute.

Friar.—Thou sayest in thy confession, that a man hath no free will, I will prove it. It is written in the gospel, how a man going from Jerusalem to Jericho fell among thieves, and was spoiled, maimed, and left half dead, &c. Thomas Aquinas expounds this parable to mean free-will, which he saith is maimed; yet not so but that some power remains in man to work.

Martyr.—This interpretation I refuse and deny.

Friar.—What! thinkest thou thyself better learned than St. Thomas?

Martyr.—I arrogate no such learning to myself. But I say this parable is not to be so expounded, but is set forth by the Lord to commend charity towards our neighbour, how one should help another.

Friar.—Thou sayest in thy confession, that we are justified only by faith, I will prove that we are justified by works. St. Paul, Hebrews xiii. 16, saith, "To do good and to distribute forget not; for with such sacrifices God is merited." Now as we merit God by our works, so we are justified by our works.

Martyr.—The words of St. Paul in that place are to be translated thus:—"With such sacrifices God is well pleased."

Vilard the judge turned to the book, and found the place even as the prisoner said. Here the friars were marvellously appalled and troubled in their minds. One asked then, what he thought of confession?

To whom the martyr answered, That confession is to be made to God only; and that those places which they allege for auricular confession, out of St. James and others, are to be expounded of brotherly reconciliation between one another, and not of confession in the priest's ear. And here again the friars had nothing to say against it.

A Black friar.—Dost thou not believe the body of Christ to be locally and corporally in the sacrament? I will prove the same: Jesus Christ taking bread said, "This is my body."

Martyr.—The verb "is" is not to be taken here substantively in its own proper signification, as shewing the nature of a thing in substance, but as noting the property of a thing, signifying, after the manner and phrase of the scripture; where one thing is wont to be called by the name of another, so as the sign is called by the name of the thing signified, &c. So is circumcision called by the name of the covenant, and yet it is not the covenant. So the lamb has the name of the passover, yet it is not the same. In which two sacraments of the old law you see the verb "is," must be taken, not as shewing the substance of being, but the property of being in the thing that is spoken of. And so likewise in the sacrament of the new law.

Friar.—I will prove that they of the Old Testament were not partakers of the same grace with us. "The law," saith St. Paul, "worketh wrath;" and they that are under the law are under a curse; therefore they of the old law and testament were not partakers of the same grace with us.

Martyr.—St. Paul here proves that no man can be justified by the law, but that all men are under the anger and curse of God thereby, forasmuch as no man performs that which is comprehended in the law, so therefore we have need every man to run to Christ, to be saved by faith, seeing that no man can be saved by the law. For whoever trusts to the law, hoping to find justification thereby, and not in Christ only, the same remains still under the curse; not because the law is cursed, or that any particular time is under the curse, but because of the weakness of our natures, which are not able to perform the law.

The official, seeing the friar here at a point, said, Thou heretic! dost thou deny the blessed sacrament?

Martyr.—No, sir, but I embrace and reverence the sacrament, as it was instituted of the Lord, and left by his apostles.

Official.—Thou deniest the body of Christ to be in the sacrament, and thou callest the sacrament bread.

Martyr.—The scripture teaches us to seek the body of Christ in heaven, and not in earth, where we read, Coloss. iii. 1. "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God," &c. And whereas I affirm the sacrament not to be the body, but bread, speaking of bread remaining in its own substance, I do no other than St. Paul does, who (1 Cor. xi. 26.) calls it bread likewise four or five times together.

Official.—Thou naughty heretic! Jesus Christ said that he was a vine, and a door, &c., where he speaks figuratively. But the words of the sacrament are not to be so expounded.

Martyr.—Those testimonies which you alleged make more for me than for you.

Official.—What sayest thou, heretic! is the bread of the Lord's Supper, and the bread that we eat at home, all one, and is there no difference between them?

Martyr.—In nature and substance there is no difference; in quality and in use there is much difference. For the bread of the Lord's table, though it be of the same nature and substance as the bread that we eat at home, yet when it is applied to be a sacrament, it takes another quality, and is set before us to seal the promise of our spiritual and eternal life.

About the same time, when these five students above specified were apprehended, Peter Bergerius also was taken at Lyons, and examined, and made the like confession with them, and shortly after them suffered the same martyrdom. He had a wife and children at Geneva, to whom he wrote sweet and comfortable letters. In the dungeon with him there was a certain thief and malefactor who had lain there seven or eight months. This thief, for pain and torment, cried out to God and cursed his parents that begat him, being almost eaten up with lice, miserably handled, and fed with such bread as dogs and horses had refused to eat. So it pleased the goodness of Almighty God, that through the teaching and prayer of Bergerius, he was brought to repentance of himself, and knowledge of God, learning much comfort and patience by the word of the gospel preached to him.

Stephen Peloquine, Dionysius Peloquine, at Lyons, 1553.—Stephen Peloquine, brother to Dionysius, was taken, with Ann Audebert, and martyred for the gospel at the same time, with a small fire. After whom followed Dionysius Peloquine, in the same martyrdom. The articles for which he was condemned, were the mass, the sacrament, auricular confession, purgatory, the Virgin Mary, and the pope's supremacy. He suffered in the year 1553. In his martyrdom, such patience and fortitude God gave him that when he was half burned, yet he never ceased holding up his hands to heaven, and calling upon the Lord, to the great admiration of them that looked on.

Lewis Marsacus, Michael Gerard, Stephen Groot, at Lyons, 1553.—At Lyons, in the same year, these three also were apprehended and sacrificed. Lewis had served the king in his wars. He was trained up in the knowledge and doctrine of the Lord. He was examined upon several articles, as invocation of saints, and of the Virgin Mary, free will, merits, and good works, auricular confession, fasting, the Lord's Supper. In his second examination, they inquired of him, and also of the other two touching vows, the sacraments, the mass, and the vicar of Christ. In all which articles, because their judgment dissented from the doctrine of the pope's church, they were condemned.

When the sentence of condemnation was given against these three, they were so glad that they went out praising God, and singing psalms.

When brought out of prison to the stake, the executioner tied a rope about the necks of the other two. Marsac seeing himself spared because of his order and degree, asked that he also might have one of the precious chains about his neck, in honour of his Lord, which, being granted, these three blessed martyrs were committed to the fire, where, with meek patience, they yielded up their lives into the hands of the Lord, in testimony of his gospel.

Matthew Dimonetus, at Lyons, A.D. 1553.

This merchant first lived a vicious and detestable life, but being called notwithstanding by the grace of God, to the knowledge and favour of his word; he was shortly afterwards taken by the lieutenant, and the official, and after a little examination was sent to prison. Being examined by the inquisitor and the official, he refused to yield any answer, knowing no authority they had over him, except to the lieutenant.

His answers were, that he believed all that the holy universal church of Christ did truly believe, and all the articles of the creed. To the article of the holy catholic church, being bid to add also Roman, that is, the church of Rome, he refused. Advocates he knew none, but Christ alone. Purgatory he knew none, but the cross and passion of the Lamb, which purgeth the sins of all the world. True confession, he said, ought to be made not to the priest once a year, but every day to God, and to such whom we have offended. The eating of the flesh and blood of Christ he took to be spiritual; and the sacrament of the flesh and blood of Christ to be eaten with the mouth, and that sacrament to be bread and wine under the name and signification of the body and blood of Christ; the mass not to be instituted by Christ, being a thing contrary to his word and will. For the head of the church, he knew none but only Christ. Being in prison, he had great conflicts with the infirmity of his flesh, but especially with the temptation of his parents, brethren, and kinsfolks, and the sorrow of his mother; nevertheless, the Lord so assisted him, that he endured to the end. At his burning he spake much to the people, and was heard with great attention. He suffered July 15th, 1553.

William Neel, a friar, suffered in the same year, and was burned at Eureux in France. His trouble arose first for rebuking of the vicious demeanor of the priests there, and of the dean; for which the dean caused him to be sent to Eureux to the prison of the bishop.

Simon Laloe, a spectacle-maker at Dijon, in 1553, coming from Geneva into France, was arrested by the bailiff of Dijon. Three things were demanded of him. First, where he dwelt. Secondly, what was his faith. Thirdly, what fellows he knew of his religion. His dwelling, he said, was at Geneva. His religion was such as was then used at Geneva. As for his fellows, he said, he knew none, but only those of the same city of Geneva, where his dwelling was. When they could get no other answer but this, with all their racking and torments, they proceeded to his sentence, and pursued the execution of it, which was November 21, 1553.

The executioner, who was named James Silvester, seeing the great faith and constancy of that heavenly martyr, was so touched with repentance, and fell into such despair of himself, that they had much ado, with all the promises of the gospel, to recover any comfort. At last, through the mercy of Christ, he was comforted and converted, and so he with all his family removed to the church at Geneva.

Nicholas Nayle, a shoemaker, at Paris, in 1553, was apprehended, and stoutly persisting in confessing the truth, was tried with so cruel torments, to induce him to inform what companions he had of his profession, that his body was almost separated one joint from another; but so constant was he in his silence that he would reveal none. As they brought him to the stake, they first put a gag or piece of wood in his mouth, which they bound with cords to the hinder part of his head, so hard that his mouth on both sides gushed out with blood. By the way they passed by an hospital, where they desired him to worship the picture of St. Mary standing at the gate; but he turned his back as well as he could, and would not; for which the blind people were so enraged that they would have fallen upon him. After he was brought to the fire they so smeared his body with fat and brimstone, that at the first taking of the fire, all his skin was burned, and the inward parts not touched. With that the cords burst which were about his mouth, whereby his voice was heard in the midst of the flame, praising the Lord, and so the blessed martyr departed.

At Toulouse, in 1553, Peter Serre, was first a priest, then changing his religion he went to Geneva and learned the trade of a shoemaker. Afterwards he came to his brother at Toulouse, to do him good. His brother had a wife, who was not well pleased with his religion and coming. She told another woman, one of her neighbours of this. What does she, but goes to the official and makes him privy of all. The official laid hands upon Peter, and brought him before the inquisitor; to whom he made such declarations of his faith, that he seemed to reduce the inquisitor to some feeling of conscience, and began to instruct him in the principles of true religion. Notwithstanding, he was condemned by the chancellor to be degraded, and committed to the secular judge. The judge inquiring of what occupation he was, he said, that of late he was a shoemaker. Whereby the judge, understanding that he had been of some other faculty before, required what it was. He said he had been of another faculty before, but he was ashamed to utter it, or to remember it, being the worst and vilest science of all others in the world besides. The judge and the people, supposing that he had been some thief, inquired to know what it was; but he for shame and sorrow stopped his mouth, and would not declare it. At last, through their importunate clamour, he was constrained to declare the truth, and said, that he had been a priest. The judge thereupon was so moved, that he condemned him; first, enjoining him in his condemnation to ask the king forgiveness, then judged him to have his tongue cut out, and so to be burned.

As he went to burning, he passed by the college of St. Martial, where he was bid to honour the picture of the Virgin standing at the gate. On refusing so to do, the judge commanded his tongue to be cut off; and so being put into the fire, he stood so quiet, looking up to heaven all the time of the burning, as though he had felt nothing, bringing such admiration to the people, that one of the parliament said, that to bring the Lutherans to the fire would do more hurt than good.

Stephen King, Peter Demochus, at Chartres, in 1553. These two were suspected of Lutheranism, and so were apprehended by the marshal, and carried to Chartres, where, after their constant confession, on their examination, they were committed to prison for a long time. During which time, Stephen King composed many hymns in the praise of the Lord, to refresh his spirit in that doleful captivity. At length they were condemned, and executed with the cruel punishment of fire.

Antony Magnus, at Paris, in 1554, was sent by those who were in prison at Lyons, and by others also who were in captivity at Paris, to Geneva, to commend them to their prayers to God for them. He returned again into France, and there within three hours of his coming was betrayed and taken by certain priests at Bourges, and delivered to the official; after a few days, the king's justices took him from the official, and sent him to Paris; where, after great rebukes and torments suffered in the prison, and firmly persisting in the profession of the truth, he was adjudged, by their capital sentence, to have his tongue cut out, and to be burned at Paris.

William Alencon, a bookseller, did much good in the provinces of France by carrying books. Coming to Montpellier, he was there ensnared by false brethren, detected, and laid in prison. In his faith he was firm and constant to the end of his martyrdom, being burnt in 1554.

There was at the same time at Montpellier a certain clothworker, who was enjoined by the judges to make public recantation, and to be present also at the burning of Alencon. At beholding his constancy and death, it pleased God to strike into this man such boldness, that he desired the judges, that either he might burn with this Alencon, or else be brought again into prison. Wherefore within three days after, he was likewise condemned to the fire and burned.

Paris Panier, in 1554.—At Dola was beheaded a good and godly lawyer, named Paris Panier, for constant standing to the gospel of Christ.

Peter du Val, shoe-maker, at Nismes, in 1554, sustained grievous rackings and torments; with which his body being broken, dislocated, and maimed, he yet manfully bore all their extremity, and would name and reveal no one. Then he was taken to the fire, and there consumed.

John Milieu, carpenter—Julian le Ville, point-maker, in 1554.—These two blessed and constant martyrs, as they were going toward Geneva, with one of their sons and a daughter, were apprehended by the marshal; who in the way overtaking them, and most wickedly and Judas-like pretending great favour to them, and to their religion, which he, as he said, supposed them to be of, with these and many other fair words allured them to confess what was their faith; whither they went with their children; and also that their wives were at Geneva. When they had declared this, the wretched traitor gave a sign to the horseman, and so these simple saints of Christ were entrapped and brought to the castle of Nivern. Being in prison, they were examined, and they answered uprightly according to their faith.

Touching the sacrament, they affirmed the transubstantiation of the bishop of Rome to be against the article of the Creed, which says, that Christ is gone up to heaven, and there sitteth on the right hand of God; and therefore the bread and wine must needs remain in their proper nature, being, however, a sacrament or a holy sign of the body and blood of the Lord. For as by bread and wine the heart of man is comforted, so the body of Christ crucified, and his blood shed spiritually, has the like operation in the souls of believers.

As for the mass, they said it was a most superstitious thing, and mere idolatry. And if we put any salvation therein, it was utterly robbing the passion of Christ the Son of God, and that it was not once to be named in a christian's mouth. Also, that they who say that Peter either was pope, or author of the mass, are far deceived. And as for turning bread into the body of Christ, by the words of consecration, it was an error, they said, more of madmen than anything else; for God is neither subject to men, nor to the tongues or exorcisms of men. Purgatory they denied, save only through the blood of Jesus Christ.

As they would not deprive the saints of God of their due honour, so neither the saints themselves, said they, will be contented to rob God of the honour due only to him.

As to confession, their opinion was, that the wounds and cases of conscience belong to no man but only to God.

After these answers given and written, they were sent to the monastery of Sompeter, there to be disputed with. Then the matter came to be debated among the judges, what was to be done with them. Some would have their goods to be taken by inventory, and themselves to be banished. But Bergeronius at last caused it to be determined, that they should be burned, and first to hear mass.

The officer, to cause them to recant, threatened them with torments. When all that would not turn them, he sent them to a friar to press them in disputation. But as he could do no hurt to them, so they could do no good to him. When their execution approached, the officer put into their hands, being tied, a wooden cross, which they took with their teeth and flung away; for which the officer commanded both their tongues to be cut off. At last when the tormentor came to smear them with brimstone and gunpowder, "Go to," they said, "salt on, salt on the stinking and rotten flesh." Finally, as the flame came bursting up to their faces, they persisting constant in the fire, gave up their lives, and finished their martyrdoms.

Denis Vayre, in this year 1554, suffered at Rouen; who, first leaving his popish priesthood, went to Geneva, where he learned the art of bookbinding, and brought many times books into France. After that, in the reign of King Edward VI. he came to Jersey, and there was minister, and preached. He came into Normandy with his books, into a town called Fucille; and when he went to hire a cart, William Langlois, with John Langlois, came and stopped his books, and him who had the custody of them. Denis, although he might have escaped, yet hearing the keeper of his books was in trouble, came, and presenting himself, was committed, and the other was delivered. After two months and a half imprisonment he was charged with being a spy, because he came out of England. Then he was removed to the bishop's prison, and then to Rouen, where sentence was given that he should be burned alive, and thrice lifted up and let down again into the fire. After the sentence given they threatened him with many terrible torments, unless he would disclose such as he knew of that side. He answered, that the sounder part of all France, and of the senate, was of that religion: notwithstanding he would reveal no man's name to them. And as for their torments, he said, he cared not; for if he were killed with racking, then he would not feel the burning of the fire. When they saw him care so little for their torments, they proceeded to his burning; and first, they put a cross in his hands, which he would not hold. Then because coming by the image of the Virgin Mary he would not adore it, they cried, "Cut out his tongue;" and so they cast him into the fire, where he should be thrice taken up; but the flame went so high that the executioner, being unable to come near him, cried to the people standing by to help, and the officers with their staves laid upon the people, to help their tormentors, but never a man would stir. And this was the end and martyrdom of that blessed Denis.

There was a rich merchant of Paris, who said in jest to the friars of St. Francis, "You wear a rope about your bodies, because St. Francis once should have been hanged, and the pope redeemed him upon this condition, that all his life after he should wear a rope." Upon this the Franciscan friars of Paris caused him to be apprehended, and laid in prison, and so judgment passed upon him that he should be hanged: but he, to save his life, was contented to recant, and did so. The friars hearing of his recantation, commended him, saying, if he continued so, he should be saved; and so calling upon the officers, caused them to make haste to the gallows, to hang him up while he was yet in a good way, said they, lest he should fall again! And so was this merchant, notwithstanding his recantation, hanged for jesting against the friars.

Thomas Calbergne, a coverlet-maker, 1554.—This Thomas had copied certain spiritual songs out of a book in Geneva, which he brought with him to Tournay, and lent to one of his friends. This book being seen, he was summoned before the justice, and examined about the book, which he said contained nothing but what was agreeing to the scripture, and that he would stand by it.

Then he was confined in the castle, and after nineteen days was brought to the town-house, and there adjudged to the fire; he went cheerfully to it, singing psalms. As he was in the flame, the warden of the friars stood crying, "Turn, Thomas, Thomas, it is yet time, remember him that came at the last hour." To whom he cried out of the flame with a loud voice, "And I trust to be one of that sort," and so calling upon the name of the Lord, gave up his spirit.

Richard Fewrus, a goldsmith, when in England, in 1554, received there the knowledge of God's word. Then he went to Geneva, where he remained nine or ten years. From thence returning to Lyons, he was apprehended and condemned, but escaped.

After that, continuing at Geneva about the space of three years, he came upon business to the province of Dauphiny, and there as he found fault with the grace being said in Latin, he was detected, and taken in his inn in the night, by the under-marshal. The next day he was sent to the justice, and from him to the bishop; who ridding their hands of him, he was brought to the lieutenant who sent his advocate with a notary, to examine him about his faith. The whole process of his examinations, with his adversaries and the friars, is long, the principal contents come to this effect.

Inquisitor.—Dost thou believe the church of Rome?

Martyr.—No, I do believe the catholic and universal church.

Inquisitor.—What catholic church is that?

Martyr.—The congregation or communion of christians.

Inquisitor.—What congregation is that, or of whom doth it consist?

Martyr.—It consisteth in the number of God's elect, whom God hath chosen to be the members of his Son Jesus Christ, of whom he is also the head.

Inquisitor.—Where is the congregation, or how is it known?

Martyr.—It is dispersed through the universal world, in divers regions, and is known by the spiritual direction wherewith it is governed, that is to say, both by the word of God, and by the right institution of Christ's sacraments.

Inquisitor.—Do you think the church that is at Geneva, Lausanne, Berne, and such other places, a more true church than the holy church of Rome?

Martyr.—Yea, verily, for these have the notes of the true church.

Inquisitor.—What difference then make you between those churches and the church of Rome.

Martyr.—Much; for the church of Rome is governed only by traditions of men, but those are ruled only by the word of God.

Inquisitor.—Dost thou not believe the Virgin Mary to be a mediatrix and advocate to God for sinners?

Martyr.—I believe, as in the word of God is testified, Jesus Christ to be the only mediator and advocate for all sinners; although the Virgin Mary be a blessed woman, yet the office of an advocate belongs not to her.

Inquisitor.—The saints that are in paradise, have they no power to pray for us?

Martyr.—No, but I judged them to be blessed, and to be contented with that grace and glory which they have.

Inquisitor.—And what then judge you of those who follow the religion of the church of Rome? Think you them to be christians?

Martyr.—No, because that church is not governed by the Spirit of God, but rather fights against the same.

Inquisitor.—Do you then esteem all them who separate themselves from the church of Rome to be christians?

Martyr.—I have not to answer for others, but only for myself. "Every man (saith St. Paul) shall bear his own burden."

At the next examination a Franciscan friar was brought to him, who, first touching the words that he spake in his inn, asked him, "why grace might not be said in Latin?" "Because," said he, "by the word of God christians are commanded to pray with heart and with spirit, and with that tongue which is most understood, and serves best to the edification of the hearers."

Friar.—God understands all tongues, and the church of Rome hath prescribed this form of praying, receiving the same from the ancient church and the fathers, who used then to pray in Latin. And if any tongue is to be observed in prayer, one more than another, why is it not as good to pray in the Latin tongue, as to pray in the French?

Martyr.—My meaning is not to exclude any kind of language from prayer, whether it be Latin, Greek, Hebrew, or any other, so that the same be understood, and may edify the hearers.

Inquisitor.—Dost thou believe in the holy host which the priest consecrates at the mass or no?

Martyr.—I believe neither in the host, nor in any such consecration.

Inquisitor.—Why? Dost thou not believe the holy sacrament of the altar, ordained of Christ Jesus himself?

Martyr.—Touching the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, I believe that whenever we use the same according to the prescription of St. Paul, we are refreshed spiritually with the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the true spiritual meat and drink of our souls.

Friar.—The friar then adduced the words of St. John's gospel, saying, "My flesh is meat indeed," &c., and said, that the doctors of the church had decided that matter already, and had approved the mass to be an holy memory of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Martyr.—The sacrament of the supper I believe to be ordained of the Lord for a memorial of his death, and for a stirring up of our thanksgiving to him. In which sacrament we have nothing to offer up to him, but do receive with all thanksgiving the benefits offered to us most abundantly in Christ Jesus his Son.

Inquisitor.—Dost thou believe in any purgatory?

Martyr.—I believe that Christ with his precious blood hath made an end of all purgatory, and purgation of our sins.

Inquisitor.—And dost thou think then there is no place after this life, where souls of men departed remain till they have made satisfaction for their sins?

Martyr.—No; but I acknowledge one satisfaction once made for the sins of all men, by the blood and sacrifice of Jesus Christ our Lord, which is the propitiation and purgation for the sins of the whole world.

Friar.—In the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, Christ speaking by way of a parable or similitude, of a certain cruel servant, who, because he would not forgive his fellow-servant, was cast into prison, saith, that he shall not come out from thence till he hath paid the uttermost farthing. By which similitude is signified unto us a certain middle place, which is left for satisfaction to be made after this life for sins.

Martyr.—First, the satisfaction for our sins by the death of Christ is plain and evident in the scriptures; as in these places: "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," Matt. xi. 28. "I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved," John x. 9. "I am the way, the truth, and the life," John xiii. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours," Rev. xiii. 13. Also to the thief who hanged with the Lord, it was said, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," &c. Secondly; as to this similitude, it has no other object but to admonish us of our duty, in shewing charity, and forgiving one another, which unless we do, there is no mercy to be looked for at the hands of God.

Friar.—Christ gave to St. Peter power to bind and loose, whose successor, and vicar of Christ, is the pope, for the government of the church, that it might have one head in the world, as it hath in heaven. And though the pastors do not live according to the word which they preach, yet their doctrine is not therefore to be refused, as Christ teaches.

Martyr.—If the pope and his adherents would preach the word purely and sincerely, mixing no inventions of their own, nor obtruding laws of their own devising, I would then embrace their doctrine, however their life were to the contrary: according as Christ tells us of the scribes and pharisees, admonishing us to follow their doctrine, and not their lives, Matt. xxiii. 3. But there is great difference, whether they sit in Moses's chair, or else in the chair of abomination, spoken of by Daniel, and also by St. Paul, where he saith, "That the man of sin, the son of perdition shall sit in the temple of God, exalting himself above all that is called God," 2 Thess. ii. 3.

And as touching the keys of binding and loosing, given to Peter, Christ therein assigned to Peter and the other apostles, the office of preaching the word of the gospel, which they well observed, in preaching nothing else but only the word, in which word is all the power contained of binding and loosing. Nor is it to be granted that the church has two heads, one in heaven, another in earth; the head is but one, even Jesus Christ, whom the Father hath appointed to be head alone both in heaven and earth.

The friar.—You have no understanding how to expound the scriptures, but the old doctors have expounded the scriptures, and holy councils, whose judgments are to be followed. But what say you to auricular confession?

The martyr.—I know no other confession but that which is to be made to God, and reconciliation towards our neighbour, which Christ and his apostles have commended to us.

Friar.—Have you not read in the gospel, how Christ doth bid us to confess to the priest, where he commanded the leper, being made whole, to shew himself to the priest?

Martyr.—The true church of the Lord Jesus Christ never observed this strange kind of confession, to carry our sins to the priest's ear. And though the church of Rome has intruded this manner of confessing, it follows not that it is to be received. And as to the leper whom the Lord sent to the priest, he was not sent to whisper his sins in the priest's ear, but only as a testimony of his health received, according to the law.

Of the other confession which is to be made to God, we have both the examples and testimonies of David in the Psalms, where he saith, that he confessed his sins unto the Lord, and received forgiveness of the same, (Psalm xxiii. 5.—li. 4.)

And thus was this godly Feurnas remanded again by the deputy to the bishop's prison, and from thence shortly after removed to Lyons.

After he was come to Lyons, they proceeded at last to the sentence, condemning him first to have his tongue cut out, and then to be burned. All which he received willingly and quietly for righteousness sake, thus finishing his martyrdom, July 7, A.D. 1554.

Nicholas du Chesne, A.D. 1554.

The occasion why this Nicholas came into trouble, was, that going from Lausanne, to his sister, and her husband, and other of his friends, as he went from Besançon, toward the town of Gry, he did not pay homage to a cross in the way, where a monk, which was an inquisitor, overtook him, and thereby suspected him. He was guided by the monk, craftily dissembling his religion, to a lodging in Gry: where the justice of the place took him. Nicholas seeing how he was betrayed by the monk, "O false traitor," said he, "hast thou betrayed me?" Then after examination he was condemned. Being carried to the place of martyrdom, he was promised, that if he would kneel down and hear a mass, he should be let go. But Nicholas, armed with perseverance, said, he would rather die than commit such an act. Calling upon the name of the Lord, he took his death patiently.

John Bertrand, a Forester, A.D. 1556.

For the religion and gospel of Christ this John was apprehended, and led bound to Blois, where he was examined on divers points: as, whether he had spoken at any time against God, against the church, and the be-saints, and the she-saints of paradise? He said, No. Whether at any time he had called the mass abominable? Which he granted, because he, finding no mass in all the scripture, was commanded by St. Paul, that if an angel from heaven would preach any other gospel than that which was already received, he should be accursed. After his condemnation they would have him confess, and presented to him a cross to kiss. But he bade the friars with their cross depart; "That is not the cross," said he, "that I must carry." Entering into the cart before the multitude, he gave thanks to God, that he was not there for murder, theft, or blasphemy, but only for the cause of our Saviour. Being tied to the post, he sung the twenty-fifth Psalm. He was young, his countenance was exceeding cheerful and amiable, his eyes looked up to heaven. "O the happy journey," said he, seeing the place where he should suffer, "and the fair place that is prepared for me!" When the fire was kindled about him, "O Lord," cried he, "give thy hand to thy servant; I commend my soul unto thee;" and so meekly yielded up his spirit. His patient and joyful constancy astonished the people.

Peter Rousseau, being constant in his confession, was put to the rack three times, which he suffered constantly with great torments. Afterwards he had his tongue cut off, and a ball of iron put in his mouth. Thus broken and maimed, he was drawn upon a hurdle to the fire, where he was lifted up into the air, and let down three times. When he was half-burned, the ball fell from his mouth, and he with a loud voice called on the name of God, saying, "Jesus Christ assist me." And so this blessed martyr gave up his life to God, A.D. 1556.

Arnold Moniere and John de Cazes, A.D. 1556.—After Arnold Moniere was taken and laid in prison, John de Cazes hearing of him, though warned that if he visited him he would be impeached of heresy, went to comfort him, and was imprisoned. After many examinations, sentence was given upon them to be burned. When the time of their martyrdom came, they were drawn through the dirt upon an hurdle to the place, accompanied with a number of bills, gloves, gunners, and trumpeters. When the blessed martyrs were bound to the post, they rejoicing that they were made worthy to suffer for Christ, made confession of their faith, and gave many exhortations to the people. But to prevent the people hearing these saints the trumpeters were commanded to sound, which never ceased during all the time of their suffering.

Bartholomew Hector, A.D. 1556.—This Hector came into Piedmont, to get his living by selling books, he was taken by a certain gentleman, and there arrested and sent to Turin, then examined, and at last condemned. Being condemned, he was threatened, that if he spake any thing to the people his tongue should be cut off; nevertheless he ceased not to speak. After his prayer, wherein he prayed for the judges, that God would forgive them and open their eyes, he was offered his pardon at the stake if he would recant, which he refused. Then he prepared himself for death, which he took patiently. Whereat many of the people wept, saying, "Why doth this man die, who speaks of nothing but of God?"

Philip Cene, and James his companion, A.D. 1557.—This Philip Cene was an apothecary at Geneva. He was taken at Dijon, imprisoned, and there burned with one James his companion. As Philip went to his death singing psalms, a friar stopped his mouth with his hand. Most of the people wept bitterly, saying, "Be of good courage, brethren, be not afraid of death." Which when one of the adversaries heard, he said to one of the magistrates, "Do you not see how almost half the people are on their side, and comfort them?"

Archambant Ceraphon, and Matthew Nicholas du Rousseau, A.D. 1557.—These two were in prison also at Dijon. Archambant heard of certain prisoners at Dijon, to whom he wrote to comfort them with his letters. The next day he was searched, and letters were found about him. Then he was brought to Dijon, where he, with the other, called Master Nicholas du Rousseau, suffered with great constancy.

Philbert Hamlin was first a priest, then he went to Geneva, where he exercised printing. After that he was made minister at the town of Allenart, where he did much good in edifying the people. At last he was apprehended, and with him his host, a priest, whom he had instructed in the gospel; and after confession of his faith, he was carried with the priest to Bourdeaux before the president. While he was in prison, a priest came in on a Sunday to say mass, when Philbert came and plucked his garments from his back with such zeal and vehemency, that the mass-garments, with the chalice and candlesticks, fell down and were broken, saying, "Is it not enough for you to blaspheme God in churches, but you must also pollute the prison with your idolatry?" The gaoler hearing this, in his fury laid upon him with his staff. He was removed to the common prison, and laid in a low pit, laden with great irons, so that his legs were swollen, and there he continued eight days.

At last Philbert was brought to the place of his martyrdom, and as he was exhorting the people the trumpets blew without ceasing, that his words might not be heard; and so being fastened to the post, this holy martyr, praying and exhorting the people, was strangled, and his body consumed with fire on Palm Sunday eve, 1557.

In 1557 Nicholas Sartorius, of the age of twenty-six years, came to Cambrai, where a warden of the friars in the town of Ost had preached on Good Friday upon the Passion. The report of which sermon being recited to this Sartorius, he reprehended the error and blasphemies of it, which were against the holy Scriptures. Shortly after the party that told him went to a secretary named Ripet, who came to entrap Nicholas. "And did not our preacher," said he, "preach well?"—"No," said Nicholas, "but he lied falsely." Ripet asked, "And do you not believe the body of the Lord to be in the host?" Nicholas answered, "That would be against our Creed, which saith, 'That he ascended up, and sitteth,' &c." Ripet went forthwith to the friar to cause him to be apprehended. The friends of Nicholas perceiving the danger, wished him to fly and save himself, and accompanied him out of the town about three leagues. But he was taken at the town of St. Remy, at the foot of the mountain of Great St. Bernard. They brought him to the rack, and when the sergeant refused to draw the cord, the bailiff himself, and the receiver, with a canon, put him to the rack with their own hands. They pronounced sentence that he should be burned; which sentence he received with such constancy, that neither the king's receiver, nor all the other enemies, could divert him from the truth of the gospel, which he manfully maintained while any spirit remained in his body.

George Tardif, with one of Tours, an embroiderer, and Nicholas, a shoemaker of Joinville, A. D. 1558.—The historian of the French martyrs makes memorial of George Tardif, an embroiderer of Tours, and Nicholas of Joinville, declaring that these three were together in prison, and afterward suffered in sundry places one from the other. George Tardif was executed at Sens.

The embroiderer of Tours, as he was coming with five or six others out of a wood, being at prayer, was taken, and thereupon examined. Before he should be examined, he desired the judges that he might pray; which being granted, after his prayer made, wherein he prayed for the judges, for the king, and all estates, and for the necessity of all Christ's saints, he answered for himself with such grace and modesty, that the hearts of many were broken to the shedding of tears, seeking (as it seemed) nothing else but his deliverance. However he was sent at last to Tours, and there was crowned with martyrdom.

The third, which was Nicholas, was condemned and set in a cart, when his father, coming with a staff, would have beaten him, but the officers not suffering it would have struck the old man; but the son cried to the officers, and desired them to let his father alone, saying, that his father had power over him to do with him what he would. And so going to the place where he was to suffer, having a ball of iron put in his mouth, he was brought at length to the fire, in the town of Joinville, where he patiently received his death and martyrdom.

The Congregation of Paris persecuted, to the number of three or four hundred, at Paris, A. D. 1558.

On the fourth of September, 1558, a company of the faithful, to the number of three or four hundred, were assembled at Paris in a house to communicate together the Lord's Supper; but they were discovered by certain priests, who beset the house, and made an outcry, that the watch might come to take them, so that in a short time almost all the city was in arms, thinking some conspiracy to have been in the city. Then perceiving that they were Lutherans, a great part of them were in extreme rage, furiously seeking their blood, and stopped the streets and lanes with carts, and made fires to see that none should escape. The faithful seeing the suddenness of their fury, were in great fear; but being exhorted by the leaders of the congregation went to prayer. It was then resolved, that the men who had weapons should venture through the press: the women and children remained in the house, and a few men who were less bold than the others, to the number of six or seven score. Those that went out with weapons all escaped save only one, who was beaten down with stones, and so destroyed. The women, who were all gentlewomen, or of great wealth, only six or seven excepted, seeing no hope, and perceiving the fury of the people, went up to the windows, crying, "Mercy," and shewing their innocence, required ordinary justice. The king's attorney, with the commissaries and sergeants, with much ado appeased the people, and entered into the house, where viewing the women and children, and the other furniture prepared for that congregation, perceived sufficient testimonies of their innocence, so that for pity his eyes could not refrain from tears. However, proceeding in his office, he brought them all to prison. I omit here the furious usage of the people by the way, how despitefully they plucked and hailed the women, tore their garments, thrust off their hoods from their heads, and disfigured their faces with dust and dirt.

Besides these wrongs and oppressions done to these poor innocents, there followed the cruel and slanderous reports of the friars and priests, who, in their railing sermons uttered horrible falsehoods and calumnies against their morals. These rumours and defamations were no sooner given out, but they were received, and spread far, not only among the vulgar, but also among the court, and even to the king's ears.

Here the enemies began to triumph, thinking that the gospel was overthrown for ever. On the other side there was no less perplexity and lamentation among the brethren, sorrowing not so much for themselves, as for the imprisonment of their companions. However, they lost not their courage altogether, but they exhorted one another, considering the great favour and providence of God, in delivering them so wonderfully out of the danger. Some comfort they experienced, consulting together in this order, that first they should humble themselves to God in their own private families: secondly, to stop the slanders against their holy assemblies, they should write apologies, one to the king, another to the people. Thirdly, that letters of consolation should be written and sent to their brethren in prison.

The first apology was written to the king, and conveyed so secretly into his chamber, that it was found and read openly in the hearing of the king and all his nobles. The Christians learnedly and discreetly cleared themselves of those reports, and shewed the malice of their enemies, especially of Satan, who ever from the beginning of the church has, and still goes about to overturn the right ways of the Lord. Nevertheless, this apology to the king served to little purpose. But the other apology to the people did inestimable good, in satisfying the rumours, and defending the true cause of the gospel.

As the faithful Christians were thus occupied in writing their apologies, and in comforting their brethren in prison with their letters, the adversaries were not idle, but sought all possible means to hasten the execution, giving diligent attendance about the prison and other places, to satisfy their uncharitable desire with the death of those whose religion they hated.

Finally, a commission was directed out by the king, and presidents and councillors appointed to oversee the matter. Upon which many of the poor afflicted Christians were brought forth to their judgment and martyrdom.

Of this godly company thus brought to judgment and to martyrdom, the first was Nicholas Clinet, of the age of sixty years. He was suspected by the judges to be a minister, and therefore was set to dispute against the chief of the Sorbonists, especially Maillard, whom he so confuted, both by the scriptures and also by their own sorbonical divinity, (wherein he had been well exercised and expert) in the presence of the lieutenant-civil, that the lieutenant confessed that he never heard a man better learned, and of more intelligence.

Another was named Taurin Gravelle, a lawyer. He was first a student of the law at Toulouse; after that he was made an advocate in the court of Paris: lastly, for his godliness he was ordained an elder to the congregation, with Clinet. This Taurin having a certain house, and seeing the congregation destitute of room, received them into his house. And when he perceived the house to be compassed with enemies, though he might have escaped, yet he would not, being prepared to answer for receiving the assembly into the house. The constancy of this man was invincible, in sustaining his conflicts with the sorbonists. In fine, these two godly elders finished their martyrdom in the cruel pains of the fire.

Next to Clinet and Gravelle was brought out Mistress Philip, gentlewoman, of the age of twenty-three years. She was a widow, who ceased not to serve the Lord in his church. She had many conflicts with the judges and the sorbonists, namely, Maillard. To the judges her answer was, "That she had learned the faith which she confessed in the word of God, and would live and die in the same." And being demanded whether the body of Christ was in the sacrament: "How is that possible," said she, "to be the body of Christ to whom all power is given, and which is exalted above all heavens, when we see the mice and rats, apes and monkeys, play with it, and tear it in pieces?" Her petition to them was, that as they had taken her sister from her, they yet would let her have a Bible or Testament to comfort herself. Her wicked neighbours, although they could touch her conversation with no part of dishonesty, yet they laid many things to her charge, as that there was much singing of psalms in her house, and twice or thrice an infinite number of persons were seen to come out of her house. Also, when her husband was dying, no priest was called for; neither was it known where he was buried; neither did they ever hear any word of their infant being baptized.

These three holy martyrs were condemned, September 27, and being put in a chapel, doctors were sent to them, but their constancy remained immovable. After that they were sent in a dung-cart to the place of punishment. Clinet ever cried by the way, protesting, that he said or maintained nothing but the truth of God.

The gentlewoman, seeing a priest come to confess her, said, "That she had confessed unto God, and had received of him remission: other absolution she found none in scripture." And when certain councillors did urge her to take in her hands the wooden cross, alleging how Christ commanded every one to bear his cross: she answered, "My lords," said she, "you make me in very deed to bear my cross, condemning me unjustly, and putting me to death in the cause of my Lord Jesus Christ; who willeth us to bear our cross, but no such cross as you speak of."

Gravelle looked with a smiling countenance, and shewed a cheerful colour, declaring how little he regretted his condemnation: and being asked of his friends to what death he was condemned; "I see well (said he) that I am condemned to death, but to what death or torment I regard not." And coming from the chapel, when he perceived they went about to cut out his tongue, he offered his tongue willingly to be cut.

The gentlewoman also, being required to give her tongue, did so likewise, with these words:—"Seeing I do not refuse to give my body, shall I refuse to give my tongue? No, no." The constancy of Gravelle was admirable, casting up his sighs and groans to heaven, declaring thereby his ardent affection in praying to God. Clinet was somewhat more sad than the other, by reason of the feebleness of nature and his age. But the gentlewoman yet surmounted all the rest in constancy, changing neither countenance nor colour.

After the death of her husband, she used to go in a mourning weed, after the manner of the country. But the same day, going to her burning, she put on her French hood, and decked herself in her best array, as going to a new marriage, to be joined to her spouse Jesus Christ. And thus the three, with singular constancy, were burned; Gravelle and Clinet were burned alive. Philip the gentlewoman was strangled, after she had a little tasted the flame with her feet and visage; and so she ended her martyrdom.

Of the same company was also Nicholas Cene, a physician, and Peter Gabart: who, about five or six days after the other three, were brought forth to their death.

When the time of their execution was come, they perceived that the judges intended, that if they would relent, they should be strangled, if not, they should be burned alive, and their tongues be cut from them. Being content to suffer these torments for our Saviour Jesus Christ, they offered their tongues willingly to be cut. Gabart began to sigh because he could no more praise the Lord with his tongue. Then they were drawn out of prison in the dung-cart to the suburbs of St. Germain. The people, in rage and madness, followed with cruel injuries and blasphemies, as though they would have done the execution themselves upon them. The cruelty of their death was such as has seldom been seen: for they were held in the air over a small fire, and their lower parts burnt off, before the higher parts were much harmed with the fire. Nevertheless these blessed saints ceased not in all these torments to turn up their eyes to heaven, and to shew infinite testimonies of their faith and constancy.

In the same fire many Testaments and Bibles also were burnt.

Frederick Danville, and Francis Rebezies, neither of them past twenty years of age, were among the company. How valiantly they behaved themselves in those tender years, sustaining the cause of our Lord Jesus Christ, what confession they made, what conflicts they had, disputing with the doctors of the Sorbonne, their own letters left in writing make record: the effect whereof briefly to touch is this; and first, concerning Frederick Danvil.

On the 12th of Sept. Frederick was brought before Benedict Jacobin, and his companion, a Sorbonist, who thus began to argue with him:—

Doctor.—Which think you to be the true church, the church of the Protestants, or the church of Paris?

Martyr.—I recognize that to be the true church where the gospel is truly preached, and the sacraments rightly ministered, as they were left by Jesus Christ and his apostles.

Doctor.—And is the church of Geneva such a one as you speak of?

Martyr.—I so judge it to be.

Doctor.—And what if I prove the contrary, will you believe me?

Martyr.—Yea, if you shall prove it by the Scripture.

Doctor.—Or will you believe St. Augustine and other holy doctors innumerable?

Martyr.—Yea, so they dissent not from the scripture and the word of God.

Doctor.—By the authority of St. Augustine, the church is there, where is the succession of bishops. On this I frame this argument:—There is the church, where is the perpetual succession of bishops? In the church of Paris there is such succession of bishops, and therefore the church of Paris is the true church.

Martyr.—I answer, That if St. Augustine mean the succession of such as are true bishops indeed, which truly preach the gospel, and rightly administer the sacraments; such bishops I suppose to be at Geneva, where the gospel is truly preached, and the sacraments duly ministered, and not in the church of Paris. But if St. Augustine mean the succession of false bishops, such as neither preach nor minister according to God's word, it is in nowise to be granted.

Doctor.—What say you by auricular confession?

Martyr.—The same that I said before to monsieur lieutenant, that is, That I take it for a plantation, not planted by God in his word.

The Examination of Francis Reberies.

Reberies had three examinations: the first with the civil lieutenant; the second with the presidents and the councillors; the third with the friars. He was asked, whether he did not like to resort to the beautified temples to hear mass, or whether he did not take the mass to be an holy thing, and ordained of God? He answered that he believed it was a great blasphemy against God, and a service set up by the devil. Whether he did not acknowledge purgatory? Yea, that purgatory which is the death and passion of Christ, which takes away the sins of the world. "The death of Christ is the principal," said they, "but thou must also believe another." "Alas," said he, "can we never content ourselves with the simplicity of the gospel, but man always will be putting to something of his own brain. In so many places of the scripture we see the blood of Jesus Christ to be sufficient." When they objected and repeated the words of the parable, Mat. v., "Thou shalt not come out till thou hast paid the last farthing," he answered, "That the words of that parable had no relation but to civil matters; and that this word (until) means there, as much as never." The president asked, if he was not afraid to be burned, and bring his parents into such dishonour? He answered, that he knew well, "That all who would live godly in Christ Jesus, should suffer persecution." And that to him either to live or die was an advantage in the Lord. And as to his parents, "Christ," said he, "himself forewarns, 'That whosoever loveth father or mother more than him, is not worthy of him.'"
—"Jesus Maria!" said the president, "what youth is this now-a-days, who cast themselves so headlong into the fire!"

He was brought before Benet, master of the doctors of the Sorbonne, and another called Jacobine, the 14th of October. The doctor began thus to object as follows:

Doctor.—I know well you hold the church to be, where the word is truly preached, and the sacraments sincerely ministered, according as they are left of Christ and his apostles.

Martyr.—That do I believe, and in that will I live and die.

Doctor.—Do you not believe, that whoever is without that church cannot obtain remission of his sins?

Martyr.—Whoever separates himself from that church, to make either sect, part, or division, cannot obtain remission of his sins.

Doctor.—Now let us consider two churches, the one wherein the word is rightly preached, and the sacraments administered; the other, wherein the word and sacraments be used otherwise. Which of these two ought we to believe?

Martyr.—The first.

Doctor.—Well said. Next is now to speak of the gifts given to the church: as the power of the keys, confession for the remission of sins, after we are confessed to a priest. Also we must believe the seven sacraments in the church truly administered, as they are here in the churches of Paris, where the sacrament of the altar is ministered, and the gospel truly preached.

Martyr.—Sir, now you begin to halt. As for my part, I do not receive in the church more than two sacraments, which were instituted for the whole community of christians. And as concerning the power of keys, and your confession, I believe that for remission of our sins, we ought to go to none other but only to God, as we read, 1 John i. 9, "If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," &c.

Doctor.—Should I not believe that Christ, in the time of his apostles, gave to them power to remit sins?

Martyr.—The power that Christ gave to his apostles, if it will be well considered, is nothing disagreeing to my saying: and therefore I began to say, which here I confess, that the Lord gave to his apostles to preach the word, and so to remit sins by the same word.

Doctor.—Do you then deny auricular confession?

Martyr.—Yea, verily I do.

Doctor.—Ought we to pray to saints?

Martyr.—I believe not.

Doctor.—Jesus Christ being here upon the earth, was he not then as well sufficient to hear the whole world, and to be intercessor for all, as he is now?

Martyr.—Yes.

Doctor.—But we find that when he was here on earth, his apostles made intercession for the people: and why may they not also do the same as well now?

Martyr.—So long as they were in the world, they exercised their ministry, and prayed one for another; but now they being in paradise, all their prayer that they make is this, that they wish that they who are yet on earth may attain to their felicity: but to obtain any thing at the Father's hand, we must have recourse only to his Son.

Doctor.—If one man have such charge to pray for another, may not he then be called an intercessor?

Martyr.—I grant.

Doctor.—Well, then, you say there is but one intercessor. Whereupon I infer, that I, being bound to pray for another, need not now to go to Jesus Christ to have him an intercessor, but to God alone, setting Jesus Christ apart; and so ought we verily to believe.

Martyr.—You understand not, sir, that if God do not behold us in the face of his own well-beloved Son, then shall we never be able to stand in his sight. For if he shall look upon us, he can see nothing but sin. And if the heavens be not pure in his eyes, what shall be thought then of man, so abominable and unprofitable, "Who drinketh in iniquity like water," as Job says?

Then the other friar, seeing his fellow have nothing to answer to this, inferred as follows:

Doctor.—Nay, my friend, as touching the great mercy of God, let that stand, and now to speak of ourselves: this we know, that God is not displeased with them who have recourse to his saints.

Martyr.—Sir, we must not do after our own wills, but according to that which God wills and commands.

Doctor.—As no man comes into the presence of an earthly king or prince, without means made by some about him; so, or rather much more, to the heavenly king above, &c.

Martyr.—To this earthly example I will answer with another heavenly example of the prodigal son, who sought no other means to obtain his father's grace, but came to the father himself.

Doctor.—Touching the mass, what say you? believe you not that when the priest has consecrated the host, our Lord is there as well as he was hanging upon the cross?

Martyr.—No, verily; but I believe that Jesus Christ is sitting at the right hand of his Father; as appears from Heb. x., 1 Cor. xv., Col. iii.: and therefore to make short with you, I hold your mass for none other but a false and counterfeited service, set up by Satan, and retained by his ministers, by which you annihilate the precious blood of Christ, and his oblation once made of his own body; and you know right well that it is sufficient, and ought not to be reiterated.

Doctor.—You deceive yourselves in the word reiteration, for we do not reiterate it so as you think; as by example I will show you. You see me now in this religious garment; but if I should put on me a soldier's weed, then should I be disguised, and yet for all that I should remain the same still within my doublet, that I was before in my friar's weed. So is it with the sacrifice: we confess and grant that naturally he was once offered in sacrifice; but supernaturally, we sacrifice the same without reiteration.

Martyr.—Sir, this I say, that such a disguised sacrifice, is a diabolical sacrifice; and this you may take for a resolution.

Doctor.—And how is your belief touching the holy supper?

Martyr.—That if it be ministered to me by the minister, as it has been left by Christ and his apostles, preaching also the word purely withal, I believe that, in receiving the material bread and wine, I receive with lively faith the body and blood of Jesus Christ spiritually.

Doctor.—Say corporally.

Martyr.—No, sir, for his words are spirit and life; and let this content you.

Doctor.—What say you, is it lawful for a priest to marry?

Martyr.—I believe it to be lawful for him, as the apostle saith, "Whoever has not the gift of continence, let him marry; for it is better to marry than to burn." And if this do not content you, you may read what he writes of bishops and elders, 1 Tim. iii., and Tit. i.

And thus these doctors, affirming that he denied priesthood, gave him leave to depart, saying, "God have mercy on you." He said, "Amen."

After this, Rebezies and Frederick Danville were brought to be racked, that they might inform of the rest of the congregation. In the chamber they found three councillors, who thus began with them:—"Lift up thy hand. Thou shalt swear by the passion of Jesus Christ, whose image thou seest here," shewing him a great picture. Rebezies answered, "I swear to you by the passion of Christ, which is written in my heart." "Why dost thou not swear?" said the councillors, "as we say to thee?" "Because," said he, "it is a great blasphemy against the Lord." Then the councillors read the depositions, and beginning with Rebezies, said, "Wilt thou not tell us the truth, what companions thou knowest to be of this assembly?" Rebezies named Gravelle, Clinet, who were already burned, and John Sansot. They said, that the court had ordered that if they would give no other answer but that, he should be put to the torture or rack; and so he was commanded to be stripped to his shirt, having a cross put in his hand, being bid to commend himself to God and the Virgin Mary; but he neither would receive the cross, nor commend himself to the Virgin Mary, saying, that God was able enough to guard him, and to save him out of the lion's mouth, and so, being drawn and stretched, he began to cry, "Come Lord, and shew thy strength, that man do not prevail," &c. But they cried, "Tell the truth, and thou shalt be let down." Nevertheless, he continued still in his calling and prayer to the Lord, so that they could get nothing from him. After they had long tormented him, the councillors said, "Wilt thou say nothing else?" "I have nothing else," said he, "to say." And so they commanded him to be loosed, and be put by the fireside. Being loosed, he said to them, "Do you handle thus the poor servants of God?" The like was done to Frederick Danville also, of whom they could have no other answer. So mightily did God assist and strengthen his servants.

These constant and true martyrs of Christ, after they had returned from the torture unto their fellow prisoners, ceased not to thank and praise the Lord for his assistance. Frederick sighed often, and being asked why he did so? he said it was not for the evil that he had suffered, but for the evils that he knew they should suffer afterwards. "Notwithstanding," said he, "be strong, brethren, and be not afraid, assuring yourselves of the aid of God, who succoured us, and also will comfort you." Rebezies with the rack was so drawn and stretched, that one of his shoulders was higher than the other, and his neck drawn on one side, so that he could not move himself. When the night came they rejoiced together, and comforted themselves with meditation of the life to come, and contempt of this world, singing psalms together till it was day.

The next day they were again required to inform; which when they refused, the sentence was read, that they should be brought in a dung-cart to Maulbert place, and there, having a ball in their mouths, be tied each one to his post, and afterward strangled, and so burned to ashes.

Being brought to the place of execution, a cross again was offered them, which they refused. Then a priest standing by, bade them believe in the Virgin Mary. "Let God," said they, "reign alone." The people standing by, "Ah, mischievous Lutheran!" said they: "Nay, a true christian I am," said he. When they were tied to their stakes, after their prayers, and they were ordered to be dispatched, one of them comforting the other, said; "Be strong, my brother, be strong: Satan away from us!" One standing by, said, "These Lutherans do call upon Satan." One John Morel, who afterward died a martyr, answered, "I pray you let us hear what they say, and we shall hear them invoke the name of God." Upon this the people listened better to them, to hearken, as well as they could, what they said: they crying still as much as their mouths being stopped could utter; "Assist us, O Lord." And so they, rendering up their spirits to the hands of the Lord, did consummate their martyrdom.

After the martyrdom of these two above said, the intention of the judges was to dispatch the rest one after another, and had procured process against twelve or thirteen. But a certain gentlewoman, then a prisoner among them, had presented causes of exceptions against them, by which the cruel rage of the enemies was staid to the month of July following. In the mean time, as this persecution was spread into other countries, the faithful cantons of Switzerland, perceiving these good men to be afflicted for the same doctrine which they preached in their churches, sent their ambassadors to the king to make supplication for them.

At the same time also came letters from the king palatine elector, to solicit the king for them. The king standing then in great need of the Germans for his wars, was contented at least, that they should proceed more gently with them; and so the fire for that time ceased. Most of them were sent to abbeyes, where they were kept at the charge of the priors, to be constrained to be present at the service of idolatry, especially the young scholars; of whom some shrunk back, others being more loosely kept, escaped away.

Many of this godly company of French protestants were afterwards condemned, and suffered the rack, and were martyred, glorifying God by their faithfulness unto death. We have the account and history of above thirty martyrs in France, but it would occupy too much space to detail them all.

ACCOUNT OF THE SPANISH MARTYRS.

Franciscus San Romanus.

In the year 1540 this Francis was sent by certain Spanish merchants of Antwerp, to Breme, where, hearing the prior of the Austin friars preach, he was so touched through the marvellous working of God's Spirit, that he proceeded further, searching and conferring with learned men, so that in a short time he was grown ripe in knowledge in the word of life.

In the mean time the Spanish merchants of Antwerp understanding by his letters, his change of religion, sent him letters, pretending outwardly much good-will, but secretly practising his destruction. For at the day appointed for his coming, some friars were set ready to receive him, who took him coming down from his horse, rifed his books, brought him into a merchant's house near at hand, where they examined him; when they found him not agreeing to their faith, they bound him hand and foot, and burnt his books before his face, threatening to burn himself also. At this disputation within the house divers Spaniards were present, which made the friars more bold. Being demanded of what faith and religion he was; "My faith," said he, "is to confess and preach Christ Jesus only, and him crucified, which is the true faith of the universal church of Christ through the whole world; but this faith and doctrine you have corrupted, taking another abominable kind of life, and by your impiety have brought the most part of the world into most miserable blindness." And to explain his faith to them more expressly, he recited all the articles of the creed.

Which done, then the friars asked, whether he believed the bishop of Rome to be Christ's vicar, and head of the church, having all the treasures of the church in his own power, being able to bind and loose? Also to make new articles, and abolish the old, at his own will? Francis answered, "That he believed none of all this, but the contrary, namely, that the pope was anti-christ, born of the devil, the enemy of Jesus Christ, transferring to himself God's honour, and being incited by the devil, turning all things upside down, and corrupting the purity of Christ's religion, partly by his false pretences beguiling, and partly by his extreme cruelty destroying the poor flock of Christ," &c. With the like boldness he uttered his mind against the mass and purgatory. The friars suffered him to speak, till he came to the pope, and began to speak against his dignity, and their profit; and then they could bear it no longer, but thundered against him words full of cruelty and terror. As they were burning of his books, and began also to cast the New Testament into the fire, Francis seeing that, began to thunder out against them again. The Spaniards supposing him not to be in his right senses, conveyed him to a tower six miles from Antwerp, where he was detained in a deep cave or dungeon, with much misery, for the space of eight months. In which time of his imprisonment many grave and discreet persons came to visit him, exhorting him that he would change his opinion, and speak more modestly. Francis answered again, that he maintained no opinion erroneous or heretical; and if he seemed to be somewhat vehement with the friars, that was not to be ascribed to him so much as to their own importunity; hereafter he would frame himself more temperately. Whereupon the Spaniards thinking him come to himself, discharged him out of prison, A.D. 1541.

San Romane being thus freed out of prison, came to a certain friend of his, named Franciscus Dryander (who afterward died a martyr) with whom he had much conference about religion: who gave him counsel. As to religion his counsel was, that he should say or do nothing for favour of men, whereby the glory of God should be diminished; but he required a sound and right judgment conformed to the rule of God's word, lest it might chance to him, as it did to many, who, being carried away with an inconsiderate zeal, leave their proper callings, and while they think to do good, and to edify, destroy and do harm, and cast themselves needlessly into danger. "It is God," said he, "that hath the care of his church, and will stir up faithful ministers for it; he cares not for such, as rashly intrude themselves into that function without any calling."

This advice, Francis willingly accepted, promising to moderate himself more considerably: but this promise was shortly broken, as you shall hear. For, passing from Dryander he went to Ratisbone, and there having opportunity to speak to the emperor, he stepped boldly to him, beseeching him to deliver his country and subjects of Spain from false religion, and to restore again the purity of Christ's doctrine, declaring and protesting, that the princes and protestants of Germany were in the truer part, and that the religion of Spain, drowned in ignorance and blindness, was greatly different from the true and perfect word of God. The emperor all this while gave him gentle hearing, signifying that he would consider upon the matter, and so act, as he trusted should be for the best. This quiet answer of the emperor ministered to him no little encouragement, he went the second, and also the third time, to the emperor, who quietly answered him as before. And yet Francis, not satisfied in his mind, sought the fourth time to speak to the emperor, but was repulsed by the Spaniards about the emperor, who would have thrown him headlong into the Danube, had not the emperor stopped them, and commanded him to be judged by the laws of the empire. Then Francis, with other captives, was delivered to the inquisitors; by whom he was laid in a dark prison under ground. Many times he was called for to be examined, and suffered great injuries and contumelies, but ever remained in his conscience firm and unmovable. The articles whereon he stood, and for which he was condemned, were these:

That life and salvation in the sight of God, comes to no man in his own strength, works or merits, but only by the free mercy of God, in the blood and sacrifice of his Son our Mediator.

That the sacrifice of the mass, which the papists do recount available, ex opere operato, for the remission of sin, both to the quick and the dead, is horrible blasphemy.

That auricular confession with numbering up of sins, that satisfaction, purgatory, pardons, invocation of saints, worshipping of images, are mere blasphemy against the living God.

That the blood of Christ is profaned and injured in these popish doctrines.

After the inquisitors perceived, that he could by no means be reclaimed from his assertions, they proceeded to the sentence, condemning him to be burned for an heretic. Many other malefactors were brought also with him to the place of execution, but they were all pardoned; he only, for the gospel, was taken and burned. As he was led to the place of suffering, they put upon him a mitre of paper, painted full of devils.

As he was brought out of the city-gate to be burned, there stood a wooden cross by the way: Francis was required to do homage to it; which he refused, answering, that "The manner of christians is not to worship wood, and he was a christian." Upon this arose great clamour among the vulgar people. But this was turned into a miracle. Such was the blind rudeness of the people, that they imputed this to the divine virtue, that it would not suffer itself to be worshipped by an heretic! and immediately, from the opinion of that miracle, the multitude with their swords hewed it in pieces, every man thinking himself happy that could carry away some chip or fragment of the cross!

As he was laid upon the wood, and the fire kindled about him, he lifted up his head toward heaven, which, when the inquisitors perceived, hoping that he would recant, they caused him to be taken from the fire. But when they perceived themselves frustrated in their expectation, they commanded him to be thrown in again, and so he was immediately dispatched.

After the martyrdom of this blessed man was thus consummated, the inquisitors proclaimed openly, that he was damned in hell, and that none should pray for him; yea, and that all were heretics whoever doubted of his damnation.

Rochus, 1545.—Rochus was a carver, or graver of images, who, as soon as he began to taste the gospel, ceased to make such images as used to serve for idolatry in the temples, and occupied himself in making seals, only he kept standing on his stall an image of the Virgin Mary, artificially graven, as a sign of his occupation. It happened that a certain inquisitor passing by, and beholding the carved image, asked of Rochus what was the price, which, when Rochus had set, the inquisitor offered him scarce half the money. The other answered, that he could not live at such a price. But still the inquisitor urged him to take his offer. Rochus said, "It shall be yours if you will give me what my labour and charges stand me in, but I cannot afford it at that price; I had rather break it in pieces." "Yea," saith the inquisitor; "break it; let me see thee." Rochus with that took up a chisel, and dashed it upon the face of the image, so that the nose, or some other part of the face was blemished. The inquisitor cried out as if he was mad, and commanded Rochus forthwith to prison. Rochus said that he might do what he liked with his own works. And if the workmanship of the image were not after his fancy, what was that to them? But all this could not help Rochus, and within three days after sentence was given that he should be burned, and so he was committed to the executioners.

I understand that there were many others in Spain whose hearts God had illuminated and stirred up both before and also after the establishment of the inquisition, to stand in defence of his gospel, and who were so persecuted, and died in prison. We will come now to this inquisition, speaking something of the ceremonial pomp, and also of the barbarous abuse and cruelty of it.

The execrable Inquisition of Spain.

The cruel and barbarous inquisition of Spain first began under King Ferdinand, and Elizabeth his wife, and was instituted against the Jews, who, after their baptism, maintained again their own ceremonies. But now it is employed against those who are ever so little suspected to favour the truth of the Lord. The Spaniards, and especially the great divines there, hold, that this holy and sacred inquisition cannot err, and that the holy fathers, the inquisitors, cannot be deceived.

Three sorts of men are principally in danger of these inquisitors. They that are rich, for the spoil of their goods. They that are learned, because they will not have their secret abuses detected. They that are in honour and dignity, lest they should work some shame or dishonour against them.

The abuse of this inquisition is most execrable. If any word shall pass out of the mouth of any, which may be taken in evil part; yea, though no word be spoken, yet if they bear any grudge or evil will against the party, they command him to be taken, and put in a horrible prison, and then find out crimes against him at their leisure, and in the meantime no man living is so hardy as once to open his mouth for him. If the father speak one word for his child, he is also taken and cast into prison as a favourer of heretics. Nor is it permitted to any person to go to the prisoner; but there he is alone where he cannot see so much as the ground where he is; and is not suffered either to read or write, but there continues in darkness palpable, in horrors infinite, in fear miserable, wrestling with the assaults of death.

By this it may be imagined what trouble and sorrow, what pensive sighs and thoughts they undergo, who are not thoroughly instructed in holy doctrine. We must add, moreover, to these distresses and horrors of the prison, the injuries, threats, whippings, scourgings, irons, tortures, and racks which they endure. Sometimes they are brought out, and shewed in some high place to the people, as a spectacle of rebuke and infamy. And thus they are detained there, some many years, and murdered by long torments, and whole days together treated much more cruelly out of all comparison than if they were in the hangman's hands to be slain at once. During all this time what is done in the process no person knows, but only the holy fathers and the tormentors who are sworn to execute the torments. All is done in secret. And after all these torments endured so many years in the prison, if any man is saved, it must be known only by guessing. For all the proceedings of the court of that execrable inquisition are open to no man, but all is done in close corners, by windings, by covert ways, and secret counsels: the accuser is secret, the crime secret, the witness secret, whatever is done is secret, and the poor prisoner is never informed of any thing.

By this inquisition many good true servants of Jesus Christ have been brought to death, especially in these later years, since the royal and peaceable reign of this our Queen Elizabeth. The names and histories of whom we will here in part recite, as we have faithful records of such as have come to our hands by writing.

A.D. 1556, May 21st, in the town of Valladolid, where the council of the inquisition is wont to be kept, the inquisitors had brought together many prisoners, both of high and low estate, to the number of thirty; also the coffin of a certain noble woman, with her picture lying upon it, who had been dead long before, there to receive judgment and sentence. To the hearing of which sentence, they had ordained in the said town three mighty theatres or stages. Upon the first was placed Dame Jane, sister to King Philip, and chief regent of his realms; also Prince Charles, King Philip's son, with other princes and states of Spain. Upon the other scaffold was mounted the archbishop of Seville, prince of the synagogue of the inquisitors, with the council of the inquisition; also other bishops of the land, and the king's council with them.

After the princes and other spiritual judges and counsellors were thus set in their places, with a great guard of archers and halberdiers, and armed soldiers, with four heralds-of-arms giving their attendance, and the earl marshal bearing the naked sword, all the market-place where the stages were, being filled with an infinite multitude of all sorts standing there, and gazing out of windows and houses to hear and see the sentences and judgments of this inquisition; then after all were brought forth, as a spectacle and triumph, the poor servants and witnesses of Jesus Christ, to the number of thirty, clothed with their vesture of yellow cloth, coming both before them and behind them, spangled with red crosses, and having burning tapers in their hands; also before them was borne a crucifix covered with black linen cloth, in token of mourning. They who were to receive the sentence of death had mitres of paper upon their heads. Thus they were placed in their order, one under another.

Things being thus settled, there followed a sermon by a Dominican friar, which endured about an hour. After the sermon, the procurator general, with the archbishop went to the stage where the princes and nobles stood, to administer a solemn oath to them upon the crucifix; the tenor of which oath was this: "Your majesties shall swear, that you will favour the holy inquisition, and also give your consent unto the same; and not only that you shall by no manner of way hinder and impeach the same, but also you shall employ the utmost of your help and endeavour hereafter to see all them to be executed, who shall swerve from the church of Rome, and adjoin themselves to the sect of the Lutheran heretics, without all respect of any person or persons of what estate, degree, quality, or condition soever they be."

And thus much for the first article of the oath; the second was as follows:

"Your majesties shall swear, that you shall constrain all your subjects to submit themselves to the church of Rome, and to have in reverence all the laws and commandments of the same; and also to give your aid against all them whoever shall hold of the heresy of the Lutherans, or take any part with them."

In this sort and manner, when all the princes and states every one in their degree had received their oath, then the archbishop, lifting up his hand, gave them his benediction, saying, "God bless your highnesses, and give you long life." This solemn pageant thus finished, at last the poor captives and prisoners were called out, the procurator fiscal, or the pope's great collector, first beginning with Dr. Cacalla, and so proceeding to the other in order.

They then proceeded to the trial and condemnation of twenty-seven godly christians, including thirteen pious females, whose only sin was that they loved the gospel of Jesus Christ, as contained in his holy word, instead of the traditions of the papacy. It would be too tedious to mention all in detail. At last they came to the coffin and picture of the lady.

This poor coffin contained the corpse of dame Leonora de Bivero, already long dead. Above her coffin was her picture laid, which was also condemned with her dead corpse to be burned for an heretic; and yet I never heard of any opinion that this picture did hold, either with or against the church of Rome. This good mother, while she lived, was a worthy maintainer of Christ's gospel, with great integrity of life, and retained divers assemblies of the saints in her house for the preaching of the word of God. In fine, her corpse and image also, being brought before the fiscal, was condemned likewise to be burned for a Lutheran heretic, and all her goods to be seized, and her house to be cast down to the ground; and for a memorial of the same, a marble stone was appointed to be set up in the house, wherein the cause of her burning should be engraved.

After these sentences were thus pronounced, they, who were condemned to be burned, with the coffin of the dead lady and her picture upon it, were committed to the secular magistrate, and to their executioners. Then were they all taken, and every one set upon an ass, their faces turned backward, and led with a great garri-son of armed soldiers to the place of punishment, which was without the gate of the town called Del Campo.

When they were come to the place, there were fourteen stakes set up of equal distance from one another, to which every one being fastened, they were all first strangled, and then burnt to ashes, save only Anthony Hueruello, who, because he had, both within and without the prison, vehemently detested the pope's spirituality, therefore was burned alive, and his mouth stopped from speaking. And thus these faithful christians, for the verity and pure word of God, were led to death as sheep to the shambles; who not only most christianly comforted one another, but did so exhort all them that were present, that all men marvelled greatly, both to hear their singular constancy, and to see their quiet and peaceable end.

THE ITALIAN MARTYRS.

Encenas, otherwise called Dryander, A.D. 1546.

This Encenas, or Dryander, a Spaniard, was sent by his superstitious parents, when young, to Rome; there growing up in age and knowledge, instructed by the Lord in the truth of his word, after he was known to dislike the pope's doctrine, and the impure doings at Rome, he was apprehended by some of his own countrymen at Rome. He was brought before the cardinals, and committed to prison. Afterwards he was brought forth to give testimony of his doctrine, which in the presence of the cardinals, and in the face of all the pope's retinue, he boldly and constantly defended. So that not only the cardinals, but especially the Spaniards being offended, cried out that he should be burned. The cardinals, before the sentence of death should be given, came to him, offering life if he would take the badge of reconciliation. But Encenas, still constant in the profession of truth, refused to receive any other condition or badge but the badge of the Lord, which was to seal the doctrine of his religion with the testimony of his blood. At last the faithful servant and witness of Christ was condemned to the fire; where he, in the sight of the cardinals, and in the face of the apostolic see, gave up his life for the testimony of the gospel.

And as mention has been made both in this history and others of Francis Encenas his brother, here is not to be omitted how Francis being a man of notable learning as ever was in Spain, being in the emperor's court at Brussels, offered the emperor, Charles V., the New Testament of Christ translated into Spanish. For which he was cast into prison, where he remained in sorrowful captivity and calamity the space of fifteen months, looking for nothing more than present death. At last, through the providence of Almighty God, the first day of February, A.D. 1545, he found the doors of the prison open; and so he, issuing out of the prison, escaped, and went to Germany.

Faninus, A.D. 1550.—Faninus, through the reading of godly books translated into the Italian tongue, was converted from great blindness to the wholesome knowledge of Christ and of his word. There was no diligence wanting in him to communicate to others that which he had received of the Lord; being persuaded that a man, receiving by the Spirit of God the knowledge and illumination of his truth, ought in no case to hide it in silence, as a candle under a bushel. And therefore, being occupied diligently in that, although he used not publicly to preach, but by private conference to teach, he was at length apprehended and committed to prison. He remained not long in prison, for by the earnest persuasions and prayers of his wife, his children, and other friends, he was so overcome that he gave over, and so was dismissed shortly out of prison. After this, it was not long until he fell into horrible distraction of mind; so that unless the great mercy of God had kept him up, he had fallen into utter desperation, for falling from the truth, and preferring the love of his friends and kindred before the service of Jesus Christ, whom he had professed so earnestly before. This wound went so deep into his heart, that he could in no case be quieted, before he had fully fixed and determined in his mind, to hazard his life more faithfully in the service of the Lord.

Being thus inflamed with zeal of spirit, he went about all the country publicly preaching the pure doctrine of the gospel with great fruit and effect. As he was thus labouring, he was apprehended again, A.D. 1547, and condemned to be burned. But he said his hour was not yet come, and so it was not; for shortly after he was removed to Ferrara, where he was detained two years. At last the inquisitors of the pope's heresies condemned him to death, A.D. 1549; and yet his time being not come, he remained after that to the month of September, A.D. 1550. In the meantime many faithful and good men came to visit him; for which the pope commanded him to be inclosed in stricter custody; in which he suffered great torments for eighteen months, and yet he would have suffered greater, if the Dominican friars could have got him into their hands.

At length he was brought into a prison, where there were divers great lords, captains, and noble personages committed for stirring up commotions and factions (as the country of Italy is full of such) who at first hearing him speak began to set him at nought, and to deride him, supposing that it was but a melancholy humour that troubled his brain. Such as seemed more sage amongst them, began to exhort him to leave his opinion, and to live with men as other men do, and not to vex his mind, but to suspend his judgment till the matter was decided in the general council. Faninus, first giving them thanks for their friendly good will, modestly and quietly declared to them, how the doctrine which he professed was no humour nor opinion of man's brain, but the pure truth of God, founded in his word, and revealed to men in the gospel of Jesus Christ, and especially now in these days restored; which truth he had fully determined in his mind never to deny. And as in his soul, which was redeemed by the blood of the Son of God, he was free from all bondage; so likewise, as touching councils, he looked for no other sentence nor authority but that only which he knew to be declared to us by Christ Jesus in his gospel, which he both preached with his word, and confirmed with his blood, &c. With these and such other words, he so moved their minds, that they were wholly altered to a new life, having him now in admiration whom they before had in derision. He proceeded still to preach the word of grace, declaring and confessing himself to be a miserable sinner; but by the faith of the Lord Jesus, and through the grace only of him, he was fully persuaded and well assured his sins were forgiven; as all their sins also shall be remitted to them through their faith only in Christ, they believing his gospel.

There were others also besides these, who, having lived before a more delicate kind of life, could not well bear with the sharpness and the hardness of the prison. These also received such comfort from Faninus, that not only they were quietly contented, but also rejoiced in their captivity, by the occasion of which they had received and learned a better liberty than they ever knew before.

When the imprisonment of Faninus was known to his parents and kinsfolk, his wife and sister came to him with weeping persuasions, to move him to consider and have a care for his poor family. He answered, that his Lord and Master had commanded him not to deny him by looking to his family; and that it was enough for them that he had once for their sakes fallen into that cowardliness which they knew. Wherefore he desired them to depart in peace, and solicit him no more, for his end, he said, he knew drew near, and so he commended them unto the Lord.

About the same time died Pope Paul III., and after him succeeded Julius III., who sent letters and commandment that Faninus should be executed. When one of the magistrate's officers brought him word the next day, he rejoiced at it, and gave the messenger thanks, and began to preach a long sermon to them that were about him on the felicity and beatitude of the life to come. Then the messenger exhorted him that, in case he would change his opinion, he should save both his present life, and enjoy that which was to come. Another asked him how he should leave his little children and his wife? Faninus answered, that he had left them with an overseer, who would see to them sufficiently; and being asked who he was? "The Lord Jesus Christ," said he, "a faithful keeper and preserver of all that is committed to him." After the messenger was departed from Faninus, all full of tears and sorrow, the day following he was removed into the common prison, and delivered to the secular magistrate. In all his ways, his words, his gestures, and countenance, he shewed such constancy of faith, such modesty of manners, and tranquillity of mind, that they who previously were violent against him, thinking him to have a devil, began now favourably to hearken to him, and to commend him. With such grace and sweetness he talked, ever speaking of the word of God, that several of the magistrates' wives in hearing him could not abstain from weeping. The executioner himself also wept. One of the public scribes came to him and said, that if he would relent from his opinion, the pope's pleasure was that he should be saved: but that he refused. This was surprising, that he recited so many places of scripture without book, and that so truly and promptly, as though he had studied nothing else. One seeing him so cheerful and happy going to his death, asked, why he was so cheerful at his death, seeing Christ himself sweat blood and water before his passion? "Christ," said he, "sustained in his body all the sorrows and conflicts with hell and death due to us: by whose suffering we are delivered from sorrow and fear of them all." Early in the morning he was brought forth. After his prayers most earnestly made to the Lord, he meekly and patiently gave himself to the stake, where with a cord drawn about his neck he was strangled by the executioner in the city of Ferrara, three hours before day, that the people should not see him, nor hear him speak; and about noon his body was burned.

Dominick de Basana, at Placentia, A.D. 1530.

The same year Dominick also suffered in the city of Placentia. This Dominick was in Germany, when he received the first taste of Christ's gospel. Wherein he increased more and more, by conferring and reasoning with learned men, so that in a short time he was able to instruct many, and he did so, till in the year 1530, coming to the city of Naples, he there preached the word, and then proceeding to Placentia, preached there likewise to the people, of true confession, of purgatory, and of pardons. The next day he treated of true faith and good works, how far they are necessary to salvation, promising the day after to speak of antichrist, and to paint him out in his colours. When the hour came that he should begin his sermon, the magistrate of the city commanded him to come down from the chair in the market-place, and delivered him to the officers. Dominick was willing and ready to obey the commandment, saying, "That he much wondered that the devil could suffer him so long in that kind of exercise." He was led to the bishop's chancellor, and asked whether he was a priest, and how he was placed in that function. He answered, "That he was no priest of the pope, but of Jesus Christ, by whom he was lawfully called to that office." Then was he demanded, whether he would renounce his doctrine? He answered, "That he maintained no doctrine of his own, but only the doctrine of Christ, which also he was ready to seal with his blood, and also gave hearty thanks to God, who so accounted him worthy to glorify his name with his martyrdom." Upon this he was committed to a filthy and stinking prison, where, after he had remained a few months, he was exhorted to revoke, otherwise he should suffer; but still he remained constant in his doctrine. When the time came assigned for his punishment, he was brought to the market-place, where he had preached, and there was hanged; and most heartily praying for his enemies, he so finished his days in this miserable wretched world.

Galeazius Trecius, A.D. 1551.

In St. Angelo was a house of Augustinian friars, to whom a certain friar used to resort, named Maianard, a man expert in the study of scripture, and of a godly conversation. By this Maianard several, not only of friars, but also of other townsmen, were brought to the love and knowledge of God's word, and to the detestation of the pope's abuses. Among whom was this Galeazius, a gentleman of good calling, and wealthy in worldly substance, and very benevolent to the poor. In process of time, as this Galeazius increased in judgment and zeal, in setting forward the wholesome word of God's grace; as a light shining in darkness he could not so lie hid, but at last, in the year 1551, certain persons were sent to arrest and bring him to the bishop's palace, where he was kept in bonds.

When the time came that he should be examined, he was brought before the commissioners, where he rendered reasons of his faith, answering to their interrogatories with such evidence of scriptures, and constancy of mind, that he was an admiration to them that heard him. Not long after, through the importunate persuasion of his kinsfolk and friends, and other cold gospellers, laying many considerations before his eyes, he was brought at length to assent to certain points of the pope's doctrine. But yet the mercy of God, which thus began with him, left him not, but brought him again to such repentance, and bewailing of what he had done, that he became afterward still more valiant in defence of Christ; affirming that he never felt more joy of heart than at the time of his examinations, where he stood to the constant confession of the truth; and that he never tasted more sorrow in all his life, than when he slipped from the same by dissimulation. Declaring to his brethren, that death was much more sweet to him, with testimony of the truth, than life with the least denial of truth, and loss of a good conscience.

As Galeazius thus continued in the prison, looking for some occasion to recover from his fall, the inquisitors and priests again repaired to him, supposing that he would confirm now that which before he had granted to them. Galeazius returned again to the defence of his former doctrine, with much more boldness of spirit confessing Christ, and declaring his detestation of images, affirming and proving that God only is to be worshipped, and that in spirit and in truth; also that there are no mediators but Christ alone, and that he only and sufficiently by his suffering has taken away the sins of the whole world; and that all they who depart hence in this faith, are certain of everlasting life; they who do not, are under everlasting damnation; with such other matter as was utterly repugnant to the pope's proceedings. With this confession, as his mind was greatly refreshed, so the adversaries went away as much appalled, who, at last perceiving that he could not be revoked, caused him to be committed to the secular judge to be burned.

Thus Galeazius, early in the morning, being brought out of prison to the market-place, was there left standing bound to the stake till noon, as a gazing-stock for all men to look upon. In the meantime many came about him, exhorting him to recant, and not to cast away his life, whereas with ten words he might save it. But nothing could stir the mind of this valiant martyr. Fire was commanded at last to be put to the dry wood about him, and he was consumed, without any noise or crying, save only these words heard in the middle of the flame: "Lord Jesus!" This was A.D. 1551, November twenty-fourth.

Touching the story of this blessed martyr, this is to be given for a memorandum, that a little before Galeazius was burned, there was a controversy between the major of the city, and the bishop's clergy, for the expenses of the wood that should go to his burning. He, hearing of it, sent word to both the parties to agree, for that he himself of his own goods would see the cost of that matter discharged.

John Mollius Montilcinus, when but twelve years old, with his brother Augustinus, was placed by his parents in the house of the Gray Friars, where, in a short time, having a fresh wit, he far excelled his fellows in all languages and sciences. So growing up to the age of eighteen, he was ordained priest, and sang his first mass. After that he was sent to Ferrara to study, where he so profited in the space of six years, that he was assigned, by Vigerius, general of that order, to be doctor, and then reader in divinity; and he then, with his sophistry, opposed himself to the gospel. Afterwards he was connected with several universities with much distinction. In the meantime God wrought in his soul such light of his word, and of true religion, that he began secretly to expound the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans to a few; which being known, his auditors increased so fast, that he was compelled to read openly in the temple. As the number of his audience daily augmented, so the eager fervency of their minds increased, so that every man almost came with his pen and ink to write: this was about the year 1538. There was at the same time, at Bononia, one Cornelius, an arrogant babbler, who, envying John, took upon him, at the request of Cardinal Campejus, to expound the same epistle of St. Paul, confuting and disproving the explanation of John, and extolling the pope with all his traditions. John extolled and commended only Christ and his merits to the people. But the purpose of Cornelius came to nothing. For the auditors who first came unto him, began by little to fall from him, while the concourse of the other man's auditors increased more and more.

When Cornelius perceived this, he persuaded Campejus, that unless he dispatched that man, the estimation of the church of Rome would greatly decay. But when they could not openly bring about their purpose, this secret way was devised, that Cornelius and John should come to open disputation; which disputation endured till three of the clock after midnight. At length, when neither party could agree, John was bid to return home to his house. As he was come down to the lower steps, where the place was most confined, so that his friends could not come to rescue him, (although by drawing their swords they declared their good will,) he was taken and laid in prison. When the day came, such tumult and stir was in the whole city, that Cornelius was driven to hide himself. Also Campejus, the cardinal, with the bishop, were both contemned of the students. The next day the bishop of Bononia sent his chancellor to John in the prison, to signify to him, that either he must recant, or be burned. But he, being of a bold and cheerful spirit, would in nowise be brought to recant. This one thing grieved him, that he should be condemned without his cause being heard.

In the meantime, Laurentius Spatha, general of the order, posted up to Rome, and there so practised with the cardinal of the Holy Cross, the proctor in the court of Rome for the Gray friars, that the pope wrote down his letters to Campejus, that he should deliver John out of prison; so that he, within three months after, should personally appear at Rome. The friends of Mollius gave him counsel not to go to Rome, and offered him money to go to Germany; but he would not, saying, "That the gospel must also be preached at Rome." After he was come to Rome, and appeared before Pope Paul III., he humbly desired, that the cause might come in public hearing, but that could not be obtained. Then he was commanded to write his mind in articles, and to bring his proofs, which he diligently performed, treating of original sin, justification by faith, free will, purgatory, and such like; proving the said articles by the authority of the scripture, and of the ancient fathers, and exhibited them to the bishop of Rome. Upon this, certain cardinals and bishops were assigned to give the cause a hearing: they disputed with him three days, and could not feel that which he had proved. At last answer was made to him thus: that it was truth which he affirmed, nevertheless the same was not meet for this present time; for that it could not be taught or published without the detriment of the apostolic see; wherefore he should abstain hereafter from the epistles of St. Paul, and so return again safe to Bononia, and there profess philosophy. Thus as he was returned to Bononia, and all men there were desirous to know of his case, how he sped at Rome, openly in the pulpit he declared all things in order as they were done, and gave God thanks.

Herewith Campejus, being more offended than before, obtained of the pope, that the general of the order should remove the said John Mollius from Bononia, and place him somewhere else. So Mollius was sent to Naples, and there was appointed reader and preacher in the monastery of St. Laurence. But Peter, the viceroy there, not abiding his doctrine, so nearly sought his death, that he had much ado to escape with life, and so departing from thence, he went wandering in Italy, from place to place, preaching Christ wherever he came. Not long after this, when Cardinal Campejus was dead, he was called again to Bononia, by a good abbot named De Grassis, A.D. 1543, where he renewed again the reading of St. Paul's epistles after a secret sort, as he did before; but that could not be long undiscovered. By means of Cardinal de Capo, and by Bonaventura the general, he was apprehended the second time, and brought to Faventia, and laid there in a filthy and stinking prison, where he continued four years, no man having leave to come to him. At length, through the intercession of the Earl Petilian, and of the good Abbot De Grassis, he was again delivered, and sent to Ravenna, where he made his abode a few months, and there again taught the gospel of Christ as before; and whenever he spake of the name of Jesus, his eyes dropped tears, for he was fraught with a mighty fervency of God's Holy Spirit.

In process of time, when this abbot was dead, his sureties began to be weary of their bond, and so he was again now the third time reduced to prison by the pope's legates. There were then four men of great authority, who, being stirred up of God, had pity upon him, and bailed him out of prison. Of whom, one of the sureties took Mollius home, to instruct his children in the doctrine of religion and good letters. Furthermore, at the fame of this man, such a concourse of people came to see him, that the adversaries began to consult with themselves to kill him, lest his doctrine should disperse further abroad, to the detriment of the church of Rome.

Whereupon commandment was sent to the pope's legate to lay hands upon him, and to send him up fast bound to Rome. Where again, now the fourth time, he was imprisoned in the castle of Rome, and there continued eighteen months, being greatly assaulted, sometimes with flattering promises, sometimes with terrible threats, to give over his opinion: but his building could not be shaken, for it was grounded upon a sure rock. Thus Dr. Mollius, being constant in the defence of Christ's gospel, was brought, with other men (who were also apprehended for religion) into the temple of St. Mary (called De Minerva) the fifth day of September, 1553; either to revoke or to be burned. There sat six cardinals in high seats, besides the judge: before whom preached a Dominican friar, with cruelty inveighing against the poor prisoners, incensed the cardinals, with all the vehemency he might, to their condemnation. The poor men stood holding a burning taper in their hands: some for fear of death revolted. But this Doctor Mollius, with a weaver of Perusium, remained constant. Then Mollius began an earnest sermon in the Italian tongue, wherein he confirmed the articles of the faith by the sacred scriptures, declaring also that the pope was not the successor of Peter, but antichrist, and that his sectaries do figure the whore of Babylon. He cited them up to the tribunal seat of Christ, and threw away the burning taper from him. They condemned him with the weaver to the fire, and commanded them to be had away. So they were carried to the field, called Florianum, where they remained cheerful and constant. First, the weaver was hanged: Mollius then began to exhort the people to beware of idolatry, and to have no other saviours but Christ alone: for he only is the Mediator between God and man. And so he was also hanged, commending his soul to God, and afterwards laid in the fire and burned.

Two Monks. (A.D. 1554.)—In the same city of Rome, and about the same time, in the monastery of St. Austin, were found two monks in their cells, with their tongues and their heads cut off, only for rebuking the immoderate and outrageous excess of the cardinals.

In the same year, Francis Gamba, after he had received the knowledge of the gospel, went to Geneva, to confer with the wise and learned in that church, and there at the same time communicated with them. Afterward, in his returning home, as he was passing over the Lake of Como, he was taken and brought to Como, and committed to ward. During the time of his imprisonment, nobles and others, with doctors also, especially priests and monks, resorted to him, labouring by all manner of means, and most fair promises, to reduce him from his opinions: which seemed to some but fantasies coming of some humour: to some they seemed uncatholic or heretical. But he, constantly disputing with them by the manifest scriptures, declared the opinions which he defended not to be any vain speculations or imaginary fantasies of man's dotting brain, but the pure truth of God, and the evident doctrine of Jesus Christ, expressed in his word, necessary for all men to believe, and also to maintain unto death: and, therefore, for his part, rather than he would be found false to Christ and his word, he was there ready not to deny, but to stand to Christ's gospel, to the shedding of his blood.

When he could in no wise be reclaimed from the doctrine of truth, letters came from the senate of Milan, that he should be executed; but through intercession of his friends, one week's respite was granted him, to prove whether he might be won again to the pope's church, that is to say, lost from God. Thus he being long and mightily, both assailed by friends, and terrified by enemies, yet by no persuasions would be overcome, but gave thanks to God, that he was made worthy to suffer the rebukes of this world, and cruel death, for the testimony of his Son; and so he went cheerfully to his death. Then came certain Franciscan friars to him to hear his confession, which he refused. They brought in their hands a cross for him to behold, to keep him from desperation at the feeling of the fire; but his mind, he said, was so filled with joy and comfort in Christ, that he needed neither their cross, nor them. After this, as he was declaring many comfortable things to the people, of the fruition of those heavenly joys above, which God hath prepared for his, that he should speak no more to the people, his tongue was bored through; and immediately being tied to the stake, he was strangled to death; every man there, who saw his constancy, giving testimony, that he died a good man.

Pomponius Algerius, at Rome, A. D. 1555.

Pomponius Algerius, a young man of great learning, was student in the university of Padua, where, not being able to conceal and keep close the truth of Christ's gospel, he ceased not both by doctrine and example of life, to inform as many as he could, and to bring them to Christ; for which he was accused of heresy to Pope Paul IV. Who, sending immediately to the magistrates of Venice, caused him to be apprehended at Padua, and carried to Venice, where he was long detained in prison, till at last the pope commanded the magistrates there to send him bound to Rome. After he was brought to Rome, manifold persuasions and allurements were tried to remove this virtuous and blessed young man from his opinions. But when no persuasions could prevail against the operation of God's Spirit in him, then was he judged to be burned alive; which death he sustained most constantly, to the great admiration of all that beheld him.

Being in prison at Venice, he wrote an epistle to the afflicted saints; which, for the notable sweetness and most wonderful consolation contained in it, in shewing forth the mighty operation of God's holy power working in his afflicted saints that suffer for his sake, I have thought good and expedient to communicate, as a principal monument amongst all other martyrs' letters, not only with the other letters which shall be inserted hereafter (the Lord willing) in the end of the book, but also in this present place to be read, to the intent that both they who are, or shall be hereafter in affliction, may take consolation; and also they that yet follow the trade of this present world, in comparing the joys and commodities thereof, with these joys here expressed, may learn and consider with themselves, what difference there is between them both, and thereby may learn to dispose themselves in such sort, as may be to their edification, and perpetual felicity of their souls. The copy of the letter, first written in Latin, we have translated into English, the tenor whereof here ensues.

To his dearly beloved Brethren and fellow Servants of Christ, who are departed out of Babylon into Mount Sion; grace, peace and health, from God our Father, by Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour.

"To mitigate your sorrow, which you take for me, I cannot but impart unto you some portion of my delight and joys, which I feel and find, that you may rejoice with me and sing before the Lord, giving thanks unto him, I shall utter that which no man will believe when I shall declare it. I have found a nest of honey and honey-comb in the entrails of a lion. Who will ever believe what I shall say, or what man will ever think in the deep dark dungeon to find a paradise of pleasure, in the place of sorrow and death,—to dwell in tranquillity and hope of life,—in an infernal cave to find joy of soul,—and where other men do weep, there to be rejoicing,—where others shake and tremble, there strength and boldness to be plenty? Who will ever think, or who will believe this? in such a woful state such delights? in a place so desolate, such society of good men? in strait bands and cold irons, such rest? All these things the sweet hand of the Lord, my brethren, doth minister unto me. Behold, he that was once far from me, now is present with me. Whom once I scarce could feel, now I see more apparently; whom once I saw afar off, now I behold near at hand; whom once I hungered for, the same now approacheth and reacheth his hand unto me. He doth comfort me, and filleth me with gladness; he driveth away all bitterness, he ministereth strength and courage, he healeth me, refresheth, advanceth, and comforteth me. O how good is the Lord, who suffereth not his servants to be tempted above their strength! O how easy and sweet is his yoke! Is there any like unto the Highest, who receiveth the afflicted, healeth the wounded, and nourisheth them? Is there any like unto him? Learn ye, wellbeloved, how amiable the Lord is, how meek and merciful he is, who visiteth his servants in temptations, neither disdaineth he to keep company with us in such vile and stinking caves. Will the blind and incredulous world, think you, believe this? Or rather will it not say thus? No, thou wilt never be able to abide long the burning heat, the cold snow, and the pinching hardness of that place, the manifold miseries, and other innumerable grievances; the rebukes and frowning faces of men how wilt thou suffer? Dost thou not consider and revolve in thy mind thy pleasant country, the riches of the world, thy kinsfolk, the delicate pleasures and honours of this life? Dost thou forget the solace of thy sciences, and fruit of all thy labours? Wilt thou thus lose all thy labours which thou hast hitherto sustained,—so many nights watched,—thy painful travels, and all thy laudable enterprizes, wherein thou hast been exercised continually even from thy childhood? Finally, fearest thou not death, which hangeth over thee, and that for no crime committed? O what a fool art thou, which for one word speaking mayest save all this, and wilt not? What a rude and unmannerly thing is this, not to be intreated at the instant petitions and desires of such, so many and so mighty, so just, so virtuous, so prudent and gracious senators, and such noble personages, &c.

"But now to answer: Let this blind world hearken to this again: What heat can there be more burning, than that fire which is prepared for thee hereafter? And likewise, what snow can be more cold than thy heart which is in darkness, and hath no light? What thing is more hard, and sharp, or crooked, than this present life which here we lead? What thing more odious and hateful than this world here present? and let these worldly men here answer me: What country can we have more sweet than the heavenly country above? What treasures more rich or precious than everlasting life? And who are our kinsmen, but they who hear the word of God? where are greater riches, or dignities more honourable, than in heaven? And as to the sciences, let this foolish world consider, are they not ordained to learn to know God, whom, unless we do know, all our labours, our night watchings, our studies, and all our enterprises serve to no use or purpose? all is but labour lost. Furthermore, let the miserable worldly man answer me; What remedy or safe refuge can there be to him, if he lack God, who is the life and medicine of all men? And how can he be said to fly from death, when he himself is already dead in sin? If Christ be the way, the truth, and the life, how can there be any life without Christ? The heat of the prison to me is coldness; the cold winter to me is a fresh spring-time in the Lord. He that fears not to be burned in the fire, how will he fear the heat of the weather? or what cares he for the pinching frost, who burns with the love of the Lord? The place is sharp and tedious to them that are guilty, but to the innocent and guiltless it is mellifluous. Here drops the delectable dew, here flows the pleasant nectar, here runs the sweet milk, here is plenty of all good things. And although the place itself is desert and barren, yet to me it seems a large walk, and a valley of pleasure; here to me is the better and more noble part of the world. Let the miserable worldling say and confess, if there be any plot, pasture, or meadow, so delightful to the mind of man, as here. Here I see kings, princes, cities, and people; here I see wars, where some are overthrown, some are victors, some thrust down, some lifted up. Here is the Mount Sion, here I am already in heaven itself. Here standeth first Christ Jesus in the front. About him stand the old fathers, prophets, and evangelists, apostles, and all the servants of God. Of whom some do embrace and cherish me, some exhort, some open the sacraments unto me, some comfort me, others are singing about me. And how then shall I be thought to be alone, among so many and such as these be, the beholding of whom to me is both solace and example? Here I see some crucified, some slain, some stoned, some cut asunder, and some quartered, some roasted, some broiled, some put in hot cauldrons, some having their eyes bored through, some their tongues cut out, some their skin plucked over their heads, some their hands and feet chopped off, some put in kilns and furnaces, some cast down headlong and given to the beasts and fowls of the air to feed upon; it would ask a long time if I should recite all.

"To be short, I see many with many torments excruciated: yet, notwithstanding, all living, and all safe. One plaster, one salve cures all their wounds: which also gives to me strength and life, so that I sustain all these transitory anguishes and small afflictions, with a quiet mind, having a greater hope laid up in heaven. Neither do I fear mine adversaries who here persecute me and oppress me: for he that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh them to scorn, and the Lord shall have them in derision. I fear not thousands of people who compass me about. The Lord my God shall deliver me, my hope, my supporter, my comforter, who lifts up my head. He shall smite all them that stand up against me without cause, and shall dash the teeth and jaws of sinners asunder: for he only is all blessedness and majesty. The rebukes for Christ's sake makes us joyful; for so it is written, "if ye be persecuted and reviled for Christ's sake, happy be you; for the glory and Spirit of God rests upon you," 1 Pet. iv. 14. Be you therefore sure, that our rebukes which are laid upon us, redound to the shame and harm of the rebukers. In this world there is no abiding mansion; and therefore I will travel up to the New Jerusalem which is in heaven, and which offers itself to me without paying any fine or income. Behold, I have entered already on my journey, where my house stands prepared for me, and where I shall have riches, kinsfolks, delights, and never failing honours. As for these earthly things here present, they are transitory shadows, vanishing vapours, and ruinous walls. Briefly, all is but very vanity of vanities, whereas hope and the substance of eternity to come are wanting; which the merciful goodness of the Lord has given as companions to accompany me, and to comfort me, and now do the same begin to work and to bring forth fruits in me. I have travelled hitherto, laboured and sweated early and late, watching day and night, and now my travels begin to come to effect. Days and hours have I bestowed upon my studies. Behold, the true countenance of God is sealed upon me, the Lord hath given mirth in my heart. And, therefore, in the same will I lay me down in peace and rest, Psalm iv. And who then shall dare to blame this our age consumed, or say that our years are cut off? What man can now cavil that these our labours are lost, who have followed and found out the Lord and Maker of the world, and who have changed death with life? My portion is the Lord (saith my soul) and therefore I will seek and wait for him. Now then, if to die in the Lord be not to die, but to live most joyfully, where is this wretched worldly rebel, who blames us of folly, for giving away our lives to death? O how delectable is this death to me, to taste the Lord's cup, which is an assured pledge of true salvation: for so hath the Lord himself forewarned us, saying, 'The same that they have done to me, they will also do unto you.' Wherefore, let the doltish world, with its blind worldlings (who, in the bright sunshine yet go stumbling in darkness, being as blind as beetles) cease thus unwisely to carp against us for our rash suffering, as they count it. To whom we answer again with the holy apostle, That neither tribulation nor stripes, nor famine, nor nakedness, nor pearl, nor persecution, nor sword, shall be able ever to separate us from the love of Christ: we are slain all the day long, we are made like sheep appointed to the slaughter, Rom. viii. 35, 38. Thus we resemble Christ our Head, who said, 'That the disciple cannot be above his Master, nor the servant above his Lord.' The same Lord has also commanded, that every one shall take up his cross and follow him, Luke ix. Rejoice, rejoice, my dear brethren, and fellow-servants, and be of good comfort, when ye fall into sundry temptations. Let your patience be perfect in all parts. For so it has been foreshewn to us before, and is written, That they which shall kill you, shall think to do God good service. Therefore afflictions and death are as tokens and sacraments of our election and life to come. Let us then be glad and give thanks unto the Lord, when as we, being clear from all just accusation, are persecuted and given to death. For better is it, that we in doing well do suffer, if it so be the will of the Lord, than doing evil, 1 Pet. iii. 17. We have for our example Christ and the prophets, who spake in the name of the Lord, whom the children of iniquity did murder. And now we bless and magnify them that then suffered; let us be glad and rejoice in our innocency and uprightness. The Lord shall reward them that persecute us; let us refer all vengeance to him.

"I am accused of foolishness, for that I do not shrink from the true doctrine and knowledge of God, and do not rid myself out of these troubles, when with one word I may. O the blindness of man! who sees not the sun shining, neither remembers the Lord's words! consider therefore what he saith, 'Ye are the light of the world. A city built on a hill cannot be hid; neither do men light a candle, and put it under a busel, but upon a candlestick, that it may shine and give light to them in the house.' And in another place he saith, 'You shall be led before kings and rulers; fear ye not them who kill the body, but him who killeth both body and soul: whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven. And he that denieth me before men, him will I also deny before my Heavenly Father.' Wherefore seeing the words of the Lord are so plain, how, or by what authority will this wise councillor then approve this his counsel which he gives? God forbid that I should relinquish the commandments of God, and follow the counsels of men: for it is written; 'Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful, Psalm i. 1. God forbid that I should deny Christ, where I ought to confess him. I will not set more by my life than by my soul: neither will I exchange the life to come, for this present world. O how foolishly speaks he who accuses me of foolishness.

"Neither do I take it to be a thing so uncomely, or unseemly for me, not to obey in this matter the requests of those so honourable, just, prudent, virtuous, and noble senators, whose desire (he saith) were enough to command me: for so are we taught of the apostles; 'That we ought to obey God, rather than men.' After that we have served and done our duty first unto God, then are we bound next to obey the powers of this world; whom I wish to be perfect before the Lord. They are honourable; but yet are they to be made more perfect in the Lord. They are just; but yet Christ, the seat of justice, is lacking in them. They are wise; but where is in them the beginning of wisdom, that is, the fear of the Lord? They are called virtuous, but yet I wish them more absolute in christian charity: they are good and gracious, but yet I miss in them the foundation of goodness, which is the Lord God, in whom dwelleth all goodness and grace. They are honourable; yet they have not received the Lord of glory, who is our Saviour, most honourable and glorious. Understand, you kings, and learn, you that judge the earth. Serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice in him with trembling. Hearken to doctrine, and get knowledge, lest you fall into God's displeasure, and so perish out of the way of righteousness. Why fret you, why rage you, O gentiles! O you people, why cast you in your heads the cogitations of vanity? You kings of the earth, and you princes, why conspire you together against Christ and against his only one? Psalm ii. How long will you seek after lies, and hate the truth? Turn you to the Lord, and harden not your heart. For this you must needs confess, that they who persecute the Lord's servants, do persecute the Lord himself. For so he saith himself; whatsoever men shall do to you, I will count it to be done not as unto you, but to myself.

"And now let these carnal counsellors and disputers of this world tell, wherein have they to blame me; if in my examinations I have not answered so after their mind and affection as they required of me? seeing it is not ourselves that speak, but the Lord that speaketh in us; as he himself doth forewitness, saying; 'when you shall be brought before rulers and magistrates, it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you,' Matt. x. 18. 20. Wherefore if the Lord be true and faithful to his word, as it is most certain, then there is no blame in me: for he gave the words that I did speak; and who was I that could resist his will? If any man shall reprehend the things that I said, let him then quarrel with the Lord, whom it pleased to work so in me. And if the Lord be not to be blamed, neither am I herein to be accused, who did what I purposed not, and what I forethought not of. The things which there I uttered and expressed, if they were otherwise than well, let them shew it, and then will I say, that they were my words, and not the Lord's. But if they were good and approved, and such as cannot justly be accused, then must needs be granted, in spite of their teeth, that they proceeded of the Lord, and then who are they that shall accuse me? A people of prudence! or who shall condemn me? Just judges! and though they so do, yet nevertheless the word shall not be frustrated, neither shall the gospel be foolish, or therefore decay; but rather the kingdom of God shall the more prosper and flourish unto the Israelites, and shall pass the sooner unto the elect of Christ Jesus: and they who shall so do, shall prove the grievous judgment of God; neither shall they escape without punishment who are persecutors and murderers of the just. My well beloved, lift up your eyes, and consider the counsels of God. He showed unto us an image of his plague, which was for our correction: and if we shall not receive him, he will draw out his sword, and strike with sword, pestilence, and famine, the nation that shall rise against Christ.

"These have I written for your comfort, dear brethren.

Pray for me. I kiss in my heart, with an holy kiss, my good masters, Sylvius, Pergula, Justus, also Fidel Rocke, and him that beareth the name of Lelia, whom I know, although being absent. Also the governor of the university, Syndicus, and all others, whose names are written in the book of life. Farewell all my fellow servants of God; fare you well in the Lord, and pray for me continually.

From the delectable orchard of Leonine prison, 12th August, A.D. 1555.

It is written of one Thebrotus, that when he had read the book of Plato, De Immortalitate Animæ, he was so moved and persuaded therewith, that he cast himself headlong down from an high wall, to be rid out of this present life. If those heathen philosophers, having no word of God, nor promise of any resurrection and life to come, could so soon be persuaded, by reading the works of Plato, to condemn this world and life here present; how much more is it to be required in christians, instructed with so many evidences and promises of God's most perfect word, that they should learn to cast off the carnal desires and affections of this miserable pilgrimage, and that for a double respect, not only in seeing, reading, and understanding so many examples of the miseries of this wretched world; but also much more in considering and pondering the heavenly joys and consolations of the other world remaining for us hereafter in the life to come. For a more full evidence thereof, I thought it good to give out the letter of Algerius above-prefixed, for an earnest of the same, and for a lively testimony for all true christians to read and consider. Now let us proceed further (the Lord willing) in our list of Italian martyrs.

Eighty-eight martyrs in one day, with one butcherly knife, slain like sheep.—A hundred and sixty others also condemned, at Calabria, A.D. 1560.

In Calabria likewise suffered a blessed number of Christ's well beloved saints, both old and young, put together in one house, even eighty-eight persons; all of whom, one after another, were taken out of the house, and so being laid upon the butcher's stall, like the sheep in the shambles, with one bloody knife were all killed in order. A spectacle most tragical for all posterity to remember, and almost incredible to believe. Wherefore for the more credit of the matter, lest we should seem either light of credit, to believe what is not true, or rashly to commit to pen things without due proof and authority; we have here annexed a piece of an epistle written by Master Simon Florius.

The end of a certain letter of Master Simon Florius, concerning a lamentable slaughter of eighty-eight Christian Saints in the parts of Calabria.

"As concerning news I have nothing to write, but only that I send you a copy of certain letters, printed either at Rome or at Venice, concerning the martyrdom or persecution in two several towns of Calabria, eighty Italian miles from the borders of Consentia; the one called St. Sixtus, within two miles of Montalto, under the seigniorship of the duke of Montalto; the other called Guardia, situate upon the sea-coast, and twelve miles from St. Sixtus: which two towns are utterly destroyed, and eight hundred of the inhabitants there, or (as some write from the city of Rome) no less than a full thousand. He that wrote the letter, was servant to Ascanius Carracciolus. The country and people there I well knew to take the first original of their good doctrine and honest life from the Waldenses. For before my departure from Geneva, at their request, I sent them two schoolmasters, and two preachers. The last year the two preachers were martyred, the one at Rome, named Joannes Aloisius Pascalis, a citizen of Canium: the other at Messina, named James Bovell, both of Piedmont: this year the residue of that godly fellowship were martyred in the same place. I trust this good seed sown in Italy, will bring forth good and plentiful fruit."

Now follows the copy of the letters sent from Montalto, a town in Calabria, eight miles distant from Consenza, bearing date the 11th of June, 1560. The writer of which letters, as ye may perceive, was one of them who call themselves catholics, and followers of the pope. The words of the letter are these.

Here followeth the copy of a letter sent from Montalto in Calabria, by a Romanist, to a certain friend of his in Rome, containing news of the persecution of Christ's people in Calabria, by the new Pope Pius the Fourth:—

"Hitherto, most noble lord, I have certified you, what hath been done here daily about these heretics. Now I come next to certify to your lordship the horrible judgment begun this day, the eleventh of June, and executed very early in the morning against the Lutherans: which when I think upon, I verily quake and tremble. And truly the manner of their putting to death, was to be compared to the slaughter of calves and sheep. For they being all thrust up in one house together as in a sheepfold, the executioner comes in, and amongst them takes one and blindfolds him with a muffler about his eyes, and so leads him forth to a place near adjoining, where he commands him to kneel down; which being done, he cuts his throat, and leaving him half dead, and taking his butcher's knife and muffler all full of blood comes again to the rest, and so leading them one after another, he dispatched them all to the number of eighty-eight. How doleful and horrible this spectacle was I leave to your lordship's judgment; for to write of it, I myself cannot choose but weep. Neither was there any of the beholders there present who seeing one die, could abide to behold the death of another. But so humbly and patiently they went to death, as is almost incredible to believe. Some of them, as they were dying, affirmed, that they believed even as we do; notwithstanding, the most part of them died in their obstinate opinions. All the aged persons went to death more cheerfully; the younger were more timorous. I tremble and shake even to remember how the executioner held his bloody knife between his teeth, with the bloody muffler in his hand, and his arms all in clotted blood up to the elbows, going to the fold, and taking every one of them, one after another, by the hand, and so dispatching them all, no otherwise than a butcher kills his calves and sheep.

"It is moreover appointed, and the carts are come already, that those so put to death should be quartered, and conveyed in carts to parts of Calabria, where they shall be hanged upon poles in the highways and other places even to the confines of the same country. Unless the pope's holiness and the lord viceroy of Naples shall give in command to the lord marquis of Buccianus, governor of the said province, to stay his hand and go no further, he will proceed with the rack and torture, examining all others, and so increase the number, that he will nigh dispatch them all.

"This day it is also determined, that an hundred of the more ancient women should appear to be examined and racked, and after to be put to death, that the mixture may be perfect, for so many men so many women. And thus have you all that I can say of this justice. Now it is about two of the clock in the afternoon; shortly we shall hear what some of them said when they went to execution. There are some of them so obstinate, that they will not look upon the crucifix, nor be confessed to the priest, and they will be burned alive.

"The heretics that are apprehended and condemned are to the number of one thousand six hundred, but as yet no more than these eighty-eight are already executed. This people have their original of the valley named Angrogna, near to Subaudia, and in Calabria are called Ultramontani. In the kingdom of Naples there are four other places of the same people, of whom whether they live well or no, as yet we know not; for they are but simple people, without learning, wood-gatherers and husbandmen; but, as I hear, very devout and religious, giving themselves to die for religion's sake.—From Montalto the 11th of June."

Marquess Buccianus above specified, had a son or brother, to whom the pope promised a cardinalship at Rome, if all the Lutherans were extirpated and rooted out in that province. That was probably the cause of his inhuman persecution and effusion of christian blood.

After this lamentable slaughter in Calabria, we must insert here the tragical persecution and horrible murder of the faithful flock of Christ, inhabiting Merindole in France, and the adjacent towns, in the time of Francis I. The furious cruelty of which persecution, although it cannot be set forth too much at large, we have contracted, omitting nothing which might seem worthy to be recorded. The history here follows:—

A notable history of the persecution and destruction of the people of Merindole and Cabriers in the country of Provence, where not a few persons, but whole villages and townships, with the most part of all the country, both men, women, and children, were put to all kind of cruelty, and suffered martyrdom for the profession of the gospel.

They that write of the beginning of this people say, that about two hundred years ago, they came out of the country of Piedmont to inhabit Provence, in certain villages destroyed by wars, and other places; they used such labour and diligence, that they had abundance of corn, wine, oil, honey, almonds, with other fruits of the earth, and much cattle. Before they came there, Merindole was a barren desert, and not inhabited. But these good people, in whom God always had reserved some seed of piety, were compelled to dwell in that waste and wild desert, which, through the blessing of God, became exceeding fruitful. The world, in the meantime, so detested and abhorred them, and railed against them in such a manner, that it seemed as if they were not worthy that the earth should bear them. For they had long refused the bishop of Rome's authority, and observed a more perfect doctrine than others, ever since A.D. 1200.

For this cause they were often accused to the king, as despisers of the magistrates, and rebels. Wherefore they were called by divers names, according to the countries and places where they dwelt. For in the country about Lyons, they were called the "poor people of Lyons;" in the borders of Sarmatia and Livonia, and other countries toward the north, they were called "Lollards;" in Flanders and Artois, "Turelupins," from a desert where wolves haunt. In Dauphiny they were called "Chagnards," because they lived in places open to the sun. But most commonly they were called "Waldois," from Waldo, who first instructed them in the word of God; which name continued until the name of Lutherans began.

Notwithstanding all this, the people dwelling at the foot of the Alps, and also in Merindole and Cabriers, and thereabout, always lived so godly, so uprightly, and justly, that in all their life and conversation, there appeared to be in them a great fear of God. That little light of true knowledge which God had given them, they laboured to kindle and increase daily more and more, sparing no charges to procure the holy scriptures, or to instruct the most intelligent in learning and godliness; or else to send them into other countries, even to the farthest part of the earth, where they had heard that any light of the gospel had begun to shine.

For in the year 1530, understanding that the gospel was preached in Germany and Switzerland, they sent there two learned men, George Maurell and Peter Latom to confer with the wise and learned ministers of the churches there, in the doctrine of the gospel, and to know the whole form and manner which those churches used in the service and worshipping of God; and particularly to have their advice upon certain points on which they were not agreed. These two, after long conference with the chiefest in the church of God, namely, Decolampadius at Basil, and Bucer and Capito at Strasburg; and at Berne, with Bathold Haller, as they were returning through Burgundy homeward, Peter Latom was taken at Dijon and cast into prison; Maurell escaped, and returned alone to Merindole with the books and letters which he brought with him from the churches of Germany; and declared to his brethren all his commission, and opened to them, how many and great errors they were in.

When the people heard these, they were moved with so much zeal to have their churches reformed, that they sent for the most ancient brethren, and the chiefest in knowledge and experience in all Calabria and Apulia to consult with them touching the reformation of the church. This matter was so handled, that it stirred up the bishops, priests, and monks in all Provence with great rage against them. Amongst others there was one cruel wretch called John de Roma, a monk, who obtaining a commission to examine those who were suspected to be of the Waldois or Lutheran profession, ceased not to afflict the faithful in all kind of cruelty that he could devise or imagine. Amongst other torments, this was one which he most delighted in, and most constantly practised; he filled boots with boiling grease, and put them upon their legs, tying them backward to a form, with their legs hanging down over a small fire, and so he examined them. Thus he tormented very many, and in the end most cruelly put them to death.

After the death of this cruel monster, the bishop of Aix, by his official, continued the persecution, and put a great number of them in prison; of whom some by force of torments turned from the truth; the others who continued constant, after he had condemned them of heresy, were put into the hands of the ordinary judge, who without any form of process or order of law, put them to death with most cruel torments.

After this, those of Merindole were cited personally to appear before the king's attorney. But they, hearing that the court had determined to burn them without any further process or order of law, durst not appear at the day appointed. For which the court awarded a cruel sentence against Merindole, and condemned all the inhabitants to be burned, both men and women, sparing none, no not even the little children and infants; the town to be razed, and their houses pulled to the ground; also the trees to be cut down, as well olive trees as all other, and nothing to be left, to the intent it should never be inhabited again, but remain as a desert or wilderness.

This bloody decree seemed so strange and wonderful, that in every place throughout all Provence there was great disputation concerning it, especially among the advocates and men of learning; so that many durst boldly and openly say, that they greatly marvelled how that court of parliament could be so mad, or so bewitched to give out such a decree, so manifestly injurious and unjust, and contrary to all right and reason, yea, to all sense of humanity; also contrary to the solemn oath which all such as are received to office in courts of parliament are accustomed to make, that is to say, to judge justly and uprightly, according to the law of God, and the just ordinances and laws of the realm, so that God thereby might be honoured, and every man's right regarded, without respect to persons.

Some of the advocates or lawyers, defending the decree said, that in case of Lutheranism, the judges are not bound to observe either right or reason, law or ordinance; and that the judges cannot fail or do amiss, whatever judgment they do give, so that it tend to the ruin and extirpation of all such as are suspected to be Lutherans.

To this the other lawyers and learned men answered, that in this way it would follow that the judges should now follow the same manner and form against the christians accused to be Lutherans, which the gospel witnesses that the priests, scribes, and pharisees followed in pursuing and persecuting, and finally condemning our Lord Jesus Christ.

The archbishop of Arles, the bishop of Aix, and divers abbots, priors, and others, assembled themselves together, to consult how this decree might be executed with all speed, intending to raise a new persecution; for otherwise, said they, our state and honour is likely to decay; we shall be reproved, contemned, and derided of all men. And if none should thus vaunt and set themselves against us, but these peasants, and such like, it were but a small matter; but many doctors of divinity, and men of the religious order, divers senators and advocates, many wise and well learned men, also a great part of the nobility, yea, even of the chiefest peers in all Europe, begin to contemn and despise us, counting us to be no true pastors of the church; so that except we see to this mischief, and provide a remedy in time, it is greatly to be feared, that we shall not only be compelled to forsake our dignities, possessions, and livings, which we now enjoy, but also the church being spoiled of her pastors and guides, shall hereafter come to miserable ruin, and utter desolation.

Then the archbishop of Arles gave his advice as follows: "Against the nobility," said he, "we must take heed that we attempt nothing rashly, but, rather we must seek all the means we can how to please them; for they are our shield,—our fortress and defence. And albeit we know that many of them do both speak and think evil of us, and that they are of these new gospellers, yet we must not reprove them, or exasperate them; we must rather seek how to win them, and to make them our friends again by gifts and presents; and by this policy we shall live in safety under their protection."

"It is well said," said the bishop of Aix; "but I can shew you a good remedy for this disease; we must go about with all our endeavour and power, and policy, and all the friends we can make, sparing no charges, but spending goods, wealth, and treasure, to make such a slaughter of the Merindolians and rustic peasants, that none shall be so bold hereafter, whatever they be, yea, although they be of the blood royal, once to open their mouths against us, or the ecclesiastical state. And to bring this matter to pass, we have no better way than to withdraw ourselves to Avignon, in which city we shall find many bishops, abbots, and other famous men, who will employ their whole endeavour to maintain and uphold the majesty of our holy mother, the church. This counsel was well liked by them all. Whereupon the said archbishop of Arles, and the bishop of Aix, went with all speed to Avignon, there to assemble out of hand the bishops, and other men of authority and credit, to consult of this matter. In this pestilent conspiracy, the bishop of Aix, a stout champion, and a great defender of the traditions of men, taking upon him to be the chief orator, began in a manner as follows:—

"O, ye fathers and brethren, ye are ignorant, that a great tempest is raised up against the little bark of Christ Jesus, now in great danger, and ready to perish. The storm cometh from the north, whereof all these troubles proceed. The seas rage, the waters rush in on every side, the winds blow and beat upon our house, and we without speedy remedy are like to sustain shipwreck and loss of all together. For oblations cease, pilgrimage and devotion waxeth cold, charity is clean gone, our estimation and authority is debased, our jurisdiction decayed, and the ordinances of the church despised. And wherefore are we set and ordained over nations and kingdoms, but to root out and destroy, to subvert and overthrow whatsoever is against our holy mother, the church? Wherefore let us now awake; let us stand stoutly in the right of our own profession, that we may root out from the memory of men for ever, the whole rout of the wicked Lutherans; those foxes, I say, which destroy the vineyard of the Lord; those great whales which go about to drown the little bark of the Son of God. We have already well begun, and have procured a terrible decree against these cursed heretics of Merindole. Let us therefore employ our whole endeavour, that nothing happen which may hinder that which we have so happily begun; and let us take good heed that our gold and silver do not witness against us at the day of judgment, if we refuse to bestow the same, that we may make no good a sacrifice unto God. And for my part I offer to wage and furnish of mine own costs and charges, a hundred men well horsed, with all other furniture to them belonging, and that so long, till the utter destruction and subversion of these wretched and cursed caitiffs is fully finished."

This oration pleased the whole multitude, saving one doctor of divinity, a friar jacobin, named Bassinet, who then answered again with this oration:—

"This is a weighty matter," said he, "and of great importance; we must therefore proceed wisely, and in the fear of God, and beware that we do nothing rashly. For if we seek the death and destruction of these poor and miserable people wrongfully, when the king and the nobility shall hear of such a horrible slaughter, we shall be in great danger, lest they do to us as we read in the scriptures was done to the priests of Baal. For my part I must say, and unfeignedly confess, that I have too rashly and lightly signed many processes against those who have been accused of heretical doctrine; but now I do protest before God, who seeth and knoweth the hearts of men, that, seeing the lamentable end and effect of mine assignments, I have had no quietness in my conscience, considering that the secular judges, at the report of the judgment and sentence given by me and other doctors my companions, have condemned all those to most cruel deaths, whom we have adjudged to be heretics. And the cause why in conscience I am thus disquieted, is this, that now of late, since I have given myself more diligently to the reading and contemplation of the holy scriptures, I have perceived that the most part of those articles, which they that are called Lutherans do maintain, are so conformable and agreeing to the scriptures, that for my part I can no longer gainsay them, except I should even wilfully and maliciously resist and strive against the holy ordinances of God. It seemeth to me, that we ought not any more to proceed in this matter as we have done in time past. It shall be sufficient to punish with fine, or to banish them, who shall speak against the constitutions of the church, and of the pope. And such as shall be plainly convicted by the holy scripture to be blasphemous or obstinate heretics, to be condemned to death according to the enormity of their crimes or errors, or else to perpetual prison. And this is my advice and counsel."

With this counsel of Bassinet all the company was offended, but especially the bishop of Aix, who, lifting up his voice above all the rest, said thus unto him: "O thou man of little faith! whereof art thou in doubt? Dost thou repent thee of that thou hast well done? Thou hast told here a tale that smelleth of fagots and brimstone. Is there any difference, thinkest thou, between heresies and blasphemies spoken and maintained against the holy scriptures, and opinions holden against our holy mother the church, and contrary to our holy father, the pope, a most undoubted and true God on earth? 'Art thou a master in Israel, and knowest thou not these things?'"

"It is true," said Bassinet again, "that my lord, the bishop of Aix, has well set out the manners and state of the clergy, and has aptly reprov'd the vices and heresies of this present time; and therefore so soon as mention was made of the ship of Christ Jesus, it came into my mind first of all of the high bishop of Jerusalem, the priests, the doctors of the law, the Scribes and Pharisees, who once had the government of this ship. But when they forsook the law of God, and served him with men's inventions and traditions, he destroyed those hypocrites in his great indignation; and having compassion and pity upon the people, who were like sheep without a shepherd, he sent diligent fishers to fish for men, faithful workmen into his harvest, and labourers into his vineyard, who shall all bring forth true fruits in their season. Secondly, considering the purpose and intent of the reverend lord bishop of Aix, I called to mind the saying of the apostle in his first epistle to Timothy, (chap. iv.), 'That in the latter days some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils.' And the apostle gives a mark by which a man shall know them. Likewise our Lord Jesus Christ, in the seventh chapter of Matthew, saith, 'That the false prophets shall come clothed in sheepskins, but inwardly they are ravening wolves, and by their fruits they shall be known.' By these, and such other places, it is easy to understand who are they that go about to drown this little bark of Christ. Are they not those who fill the same with filthy and unclean things, with mire and dirt, with puddle and stinking water? Are they not those who have forsaken Jesus Christ, the fountain of living water, and have digged unto themselves pits or cisterns which will hold no water? Truly, are they not those who vaunt themselves to be the salt of the earth, and yet have no savour at all; who call themselves pastors, and yet are not true pastors, for they minister not unto the sheep the true pasture and feeding, neither divide and distribute the true bread of the word of life. And, if I may be bold to speak it, would it not be at this present time as great a wonder to hear a bishop preach, as to see an ass fly? Are they not accused of God who glory and boast that they themselves have the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and neither enter in themselves, nor suffer them that would enter, to come in? They may be known right well by their fruits; for they have forsaken faith, judgment, and mercy, and there is no honest, clean, or undefiled thing in them, but their habit, their rochet, and their surplice, and such other. Outwardly they are exceeding neat and trim, but within they are full of all abomination, rapine, gluttony, lust, and all manner of uncleanness; they are like painted sepulchres, which outwardly appear beautiful and fair, but within they are full of filth and corruption. A man shall know, I say, these ravening wolves by their fruits, who devour the quick and the dead under the pretence of long prayers; and as I am enforced to give place to the truth, and that you call me a master in Israel, I will not be afraid to prove by the holy scriptures, that your great pilot and patron the pope, and the bishops, the mariners, and such others who forsake the ship of Christ Jesus, to embark themselves in pinnaces and brigantines, are pirates and robbers of the sea, false prophets, deceivers, and not true pastors of the church of Jesus Christ."

When Doctor Bassinet had thus freely and boldly uttered his mind, the whole multitude began to gather about him, and spitefully railed at him. But the bishop of Aix, above others, raging and crying out as he had been mad: "Get thee out," said he, "from amongst us, thou wicked apostate; thou art not worthy to be in this company. We have burned daily a great many who have not so well deserved it, as thou hast; we may now perceive that there is none more steadfast and fervent in the faith than the doctors of the canon law. And therefore it were necessary to be decreed in the next general council, that none should have to do in matters of religion but they alone; for these knaves and beggarly monks and friars will bring all to naught." Then the other doctors of the same order boldly reprov'd the bishop of Aix for the injury he had done to them. After this there arose a great dissension among them, so that there was nothing at that time determined. After dinner all these reverend prelates assembled together again, but they suffered neither friar nor monk to be among them, except he were an abbot. In this assembly they made an agreement and confirmed it with an oath, that every man should himself endeavour that the decree of Merindole should be executed with all expedition, and that every man should furnish out men of war, according to his ability. The charge whereof was given to the bishop of Aix, and to the president of the canons, to solicit the matter, and to persuade by all possible means the presidents and councillors of the court of parliament, without fear or doubt, to execute the decree with drums, ensigns displayed, artillery, and all kind of furniture of war.

This conspiracy being concluded and determined, the bishop of Aix departed to Aix, to perform the charge which was given to him. They desired him to be, the next day after the council, at a banquet which should be made at the house of the bishop of Rieux. To this banquet such as were known to be the fairest and most beautiful women in all Avignon were called, to refresh and solace these good prelates, after the great pains and travel which they had taken for our holy mother, the church. After they had dined, they fell to dancing, playing at dice, and such other pastimes as are commonly wont to be used at the banquets and feasts of these holy prelates. After this they walked abroad to solace themselves, and to pass the time till supper.

As they passed through the streets, they saw a man who sold lewd images and pictures, with filthy rhymes and ballads. All these pictures were bought up by the bishops. In the same place, as they walked along, there was a bookseller who had set out to sell some bibles in French and Latin, with divers other books, which, when the prelates beheld, they were greatly moved thereat, and said unto him, "Darest thou be so hardy to set out such merchandise to sell here in this town? Dost thou not know that such books are forbidden?" The bookseller answered: "Is not the holy Bible as good as these goodly pictures which you have bought for these gentlewomen?" He had scarce spoken these words, when the bishop of Aix said, "I renounce my part of Paradise, if this fellow be not a Lutheran." "Let him be taken," said he, "and examined what he is;" and instantly the bookseller was taken and carried to prison, and spitefully handled; for a company of knaves and ruffians, which waited upon the prelates, began to cry out: "A Lutheran, a Lutheran!—to the fire with him, to the fire with him!" and one gave him a blow with his fist, another pulled him by the hair, and others by the beard, in such sort that the poor man was all imbrued with blood before he came to prison.

The morrow after, he was brought before the judges, in the presence of the bishops, and was examined in the following manner: "Hast thou not set forth for sale the Bible and the New Testament in French?" The prisoner answered, that he had done so. And being demanded, whether he understood or knew not, that it was forbidden throughout all Christendom to print or sell the Bible in any other language than in Latin? He answered, that he knew the contrary, and that he had sold many Bibles in the French tongue, with the emperor's privilege, and many others printed at Lyons; also New Testaments printed by the king's privilege. Furthermore, he said that he knew no nation throughout all Christendom, which had not the holy scriptures in their vulgar tongue; and afterwards with a bold courage thus he spake to them: "O you inhabitants of Avignon! are you alone in all Christendom those men who despise and abhor the Testament of the Heavenly Father? Will ye forbid and hide that which Jesus Christ hath commanded to be revealed and published? Do you not know that our Lord Jesus Christ gave power unto his apostles to speak all manner of tongues, to this end, that his holy gospel should be taught unto all creatures in every language? And why do you not forbid those books and pictures, which are full of filthiness and abomination, and provoke God's vengeance and great indignation upon you all? What greater blasphemy can there be, than to forbid God's most holy books, which he ordained to instruct the ignorant, and to reduce and bring again into the way such as are gone astray? What cruelty is this, to take away from the poor weak souls their nourishment and sustenance? But, my lords, you shall give a heavy account, who call sweet bitter, and bitter sweet, who maintain abominable and detestable books and pictures, and reject that which is holy."

Then the bishop of Aix and the other bishops began to rage and gnash their teeth against this poor prisoner. "What need you," said they, "any more examination? Let him be sent straight unto the fire without any more words." But the judge, Laberius, and certain others, were not of that mind, neither found they sufficient cause to put him to death, but went about to have him put to his fine, and to make him confess and acknowledge the bishop of Aix, and others, to be the true pastors of the church. But the bookseller answered, that he could not do it with a good conscience, forasmuch as he did see before his eyes, that these bishops maintained filthy books and abominable pictures, rejecting and refusing the holy books of God, and therefore he judged them rather to be the priests of Bacchus and Venus, than the true pastors of the church of Christ. Whereupon he was immediately condemned to be burned, and the sentence was executed the very same day. And for a sign or token of the cause of his condemnation, he carried two Bibles hanging about his neck, the one before, and the other behind him; but this poor man had also the word of God in his heart, and in his mouth, and ceased not continually by the way, until that he came to the place of execution, to exhort and admonish the people to read the holy scriptures, so that several were thereby moved to seek after the truth.

The bishop of Aix returned to prosecute the execution of the decree against Merindole. The president answered him, that it was no small matter to put the decree of Merindole in execution; also that the decree was given out more to keep the Lutherans in fear, than to execute it. Moreover, he said that the decree of Merindole was not definitive, and that the laws and statutes of the realm did not permit the execution thereof without further process. Then said the bishop, "If there be either law or statute which do hinder or let you, we carry in our sleeves to dispense therewithal." The president answered: "It were a great sin to shed the innocent blood." Then said the bishop: "The blood of them of Merindole be upon us, and upon our successors." Then said the president: "I am very well assured, that if the decree of Merindole be put in execution, the king will not be well pleased to have such destruction made of his subjects." Then said the bishop: "Although the king at the first do think it evil done, we will so bring it to pass, that within a short space he shall think it well done; for we have the cardinals on our side, and especially the most reverend cardinal of Toulon, who will take upon him the defence of our cause, and we can do him no greater pleasure, than utterly to root out these Lutherans; so that if we have any need of his counsel or aid, we shall be well assured of him; and is not he the principal, the most excellent and prudent adversary of these Lutherans, which is in all Christendom?"

By this and such other like talk the bishop of Aix persuaded the president and councillors of the court of parliament, to put the said decree in execution, and by this means, through the authority of the court, the drum was sounded throughout all Provence, the captains were prepared with their ensigns displayed, and a great number of footmen and horsemen began to set forward, and marched out of the town of Aix in order of battle, against Merindole, to execute the decree. The inhabitants of Merindole being advertised hereof, and seeing nothing but present death, with great lamentation commended themselves and their cause to God by prayer, making themselves ready to be murdered and slain, as sheep led unto slaughter.

Whilst they were in this grievous distress, piteously mourning and lamenting together, the father with the son, the daughter with the mother, the wife with the husband, suddenly there was news brought to them, that the army was retired, and no man knew at that time how, or by what means; yet, notwithstanding, afterwards it was known that the lord of Alene, a wise man, and learned in the scriptures, and in the civil law, being moved with great zeal and love of justice, declared to the president Casanes, that he ought not to proceed against the inhabitants of Merindole by way of force of arms, contrary to all form and order of justice, without judgment or condemnation, or without making any difference between the guilty and the innocent.

Then the Merindolians understanding that the army was retired, gave thanks to God, comforting one another with admonition and exhortation always to have the fear of God before their eyes, to be obedient to his holy commandments, subject to his most holy will, and every man to submit himself to his Providence, patiently attending and looking for the hope of the blessed, that is to say, the true life, and the everlasting riches, having always before their eyes for example our Lord Jesus Christ the very Son of God, who hath entered into his glory by many tribulations. Thus the Merindolians prepared themselves to endure and abide all the afflictions that it should please God to lay upon them: and such was their answer to all those that either pitied, or else sought their destruction. Whereupon the noise was so great, as well of the decree, as of the enterprise of the execution, and also of the patience and constancy of the Merindolians, that it was not hidden or kept secret from king Francis, a king of noble courage and great judgment; who gave command to the noble and virtuous lord Monsieur de Langeay, who then was his lieutenant in Turin, a city in Piedmont, that he should diligently inquire and search out the truth of all this matter. Whereupon the said Monsieur de Langeay sent unto Provence two men of fame and estimation, giving them in charge to bring unto him the copy of the decree, and diligently to inquire out all that followed and ensued thereupon; and likewise to make diligent inquiry as to the life and manners of the Merindolians, and others which were persecuted in the country of Provence.

These deputies brought the copy of a decree, and of all that happened thereupon, unto the said Monsieur de Langeay, declaring unto him the great injuries, pollings, extortions, exactions, tyrannies, and cruelties, which the judges, as well secular as ecclesiastical had used against them of Merindole, and others. As touching the behaviour and disposition of those which were persecuted, they reported that the inhabitants of Merindole, and the others that were persecuted, were peaceable and quiet people, beloved of all their neighbours, men of good behaviour, constant in keeping of their promise, and paying of their debts, without traversing or pleading at the law: that they were also charitable men, giving alms, relieving the poor, and suffered none amongst them to lack, or to be in necessity. Also they gave alms to strangers, and to the poor passengers, harbouring, nourishing, and helping them in all their necessities, according to their power. Moreover, that they were known by this, throughout all the country of Provence, that they would not swear, nor name the devil, or easily be brought to take an oath, except it were in judgment, or making some solemn covenant. They were also known by this, that they could never be moved nor provoked to talk of any dishonest matters, but in what company soever they came, where they heard any wanton talk, swearing or blasphemy to the dishonour of God, they straightway departed out of that company. Also they said, that they never saw them go to their business, but first they said their prayers. The said people of Provence furthermore affirmed, that when they came to any fairs or markets, or came to their cities on any occasion, they never in any manner were seen in their churches: and if they were, when they prayed they turned away their faces from the images, and neither offered candles to them, nor kissed their feet. Neither would they worship the relics of saints, nor once look upon them. And, moreover, if they passed by any cross or image of the crucifix, or any other saint by the way as they went, they would do no reverence unto them. Also the priests did testify, that they never caused them to say any masses, neither dirges, neither yet de profundis, neither would they take any holy water; and if it were carried home unto their houses, they would not say once, 'God have mercy;' yea, they seemed utterly to abhor it. To go on pilgrimage, to make any vows to saints, to buy pardons or remission of sins with money, yea, though it might be gotten for a halpenny, they thought it not lawful. Likewise when it thundered or lightened, they would not cross themselves, but casting up their eyes unto heaven, fetch deep sighs. Some of them would kneel down and pray, without blessing themselves with the sign of the cross, or taking of holy water. Also they were never seen to offer, or cast into the bason any thing for the maintenance of lights, brotherhoods, churches, or to give any offering either for the quick or the dead. But if any were in affliction or poverty, those they relieved gladly, and thought nothing too much.

This was the whole tenor of the report made unto Monsieur de Langeay, touching the life and behaviour of the inhabitants of Merindole, and the others who were persecuted. Of all those things the said Monsieur de Langeay, according to the charge that was given him, advertised the king, who understanding these things, as a good prince moved with mercy and pity, sent letters of grace and pardon, not only for those who were condemned for lack of appearance, but also for all the rest of the country of Provence, who were accused and suspected in like cases.

On the other part, the bishops of Aix and Cavaillon pursued still the execution of the decree of Merindole. Then it was ordained by the court of parliament, that, according to the King's letters, John Durand, counsellor of the court of parliament, with a secretary, and the bishop of Cavaillon, with a doctor of divinity, should go unto Merindole, and there declare to the inhabitants the errors and heresies which they knew to be contained in their confession, and make them apparent by good and sufficient information; and having so convicted them by the Word of God, they should make them to renounce and abjure the heresies; and if the Merindolians did refuse to abjure, then they should make relation thereof, that the court might appoint how they should further proceed. After this decree was made, the bishop of Cavaillon would not tarry till the time which was appointed by the court for the execution of this matter; but he himself, with a doctor of Divinity, came to Merindole to make them abjure. The Merindolians answered, that he enterprised against the authority of the parliament, and that it was against his commission so to do. Notwithstanding he was very earnest with them that they should abjure, and promised them, if they would do so, to take them under his wings and protection, even as the hen doth her chickens, and that they should be no more robbed or spoiled. Then they required that he would declare to them what they should abjure. The bishop answered, that the matter needed no disputation, and that he required but only a general abjuration of all errors, which would be no damage or prejudice to them; for he himself would not hesitate to make the like abjuration. The Merindolians answered him again, that they would do nothing contrary to the decree and ordinance of the court, or the king's letters, wherein he commanded that first the errors should be declared to them, whereof they were accused: wherefore they were resolved to understand what those errors and heresies were, that being informed thereof by the Word of God, they might satisfy the king's letters; otherwise it were but hypocrisy and dissimulation to do as he required them. And if he could make it to appear to them by good and sufficient information, that they had held any errors and heresies, or should be convicted thereupon by the Word of God, they would willingly abjure; or if in their confession there were any word contrary to the scriptures, they would revoke the same. On the other hand, if it were not made manifest to them, that they had held any heresies, but that they had always lived according to the doctrine of the gospel, and that their confession was grounded upon the same, then they ought by no means to move or constrain them to abjure any errors which they held not, and that it were plainly against all equity and justice so to do.

Then the Bishop of Cavaillon was marvellously angry, and would bear no word spoken of any demonstration to be made by the word of God, but in a fury cursed and gave him to the devil that first invented that means. Then the doctor of divinity, whom the bishop brought thither, demanded what articles they were that were presented by the inhabitants of Merindole, for the bishop of Cavaillon had not yet shewn them to him. Then the bishop of Cavaillon delivered the doctor the confession, which after he had read, the bishop of Cavaillon said, "What! this is full of heresy." Then they of Merindole demanded, "In what point?" the bishop knew not what to answer. Then the doctor demanded to have time to look upon the articles of the confession, and to consider whether they were against the scriptures or no. Thus the bishop departed.

After eight days the bishop sent for this doctor, to understand how he might order himself to make their heresies appear which were in the said confession. Whereunto the doctor answered, that he was never so much abashed; for when he had beheld the articles of the confession, and the authorities of the Scriptures that were there alleged, he had found that those articles were wholly agreeable and according to the holy scriptures; and that he had not learned so much in the scriptures all the days of his life, as he had in those eight days, in looking upon those articles, and the authorities alleged.

Shortly after the Bishop of Cavaillon came to Merindole, and calling before him the children both great and small, gave them money, and commanded them with fair words to learn the Lord's prayer and the creed in Latin. The most part of them answered, that they knew the Lord's prayer and the creed already in Latin, but they could make no reason of that which they spake, but only in the vulgar tongue. The bishop answered that it was not necessary they should be so cunning, but that it was sufficient that they knew it in Latin; and that it was not requisite for their salvation, to understand or to expound the articles of their faith; for there were many bishops, curates, and doctors of divinity, whom it would trouble to expound the Lord's prayer and the creed. Here the bailiff of Merindole, named Andrew Maynard, asked, to what purpose it would serve to say the Lord's prayer and the creed, and not to understand the same? for in so doing they should but mock and deride God. Then said the bishop, "Do you understand what is signified by these words, 'I believe in God?'" The bailiff answered, "I should think myself very miserable if I did not understand it;" and then he began orderly to give an account of his faith. Then said the bishop, "I would not have thought there had been so great doctors in Merindole." The bailiff answered, "The least of the inhabitants of Merindole can do it yet more readily than I; but, I pray you, question but one or two of these young children, that you may understand whether they be well taught or no." But the bishop either knew not how to question them, or at the least would not.

Then one named Pieron Roy said, "Sir, one of these children may question one another, if you think it so good," and the bishop was contented. Then one of the children began to question with his fellows, with such grace and gravity as if he had been a schoolmaster; and the children one after another answered so to the purpose, that it was marvellous to hear; for it was done in the presence of many, among whom there were four religious men, that came lately out of Paris, of whom one said to the bishop, I must needs confess, that I have often been at the common schools of the Sorbonne in Paris, where I have heard the disputations of the divines; but yet I never learned so much as I have done by hearing these young children. Then said William Armant, "Did you never read that which is written in Matthew xi. 25, 26, where it is said, 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight.'" Then every man marvelled at the ready answers of the children of Merindole.

When the bishop saw he could not thus prevail, he tried another way, and went about by fair and flattering words to bring his purpose to pass. Causing the strangers to go apart, he said, that he now perceived they were not so evil as many thought them to be; notwithstanding it was necessary that they should make some small abjuration, which only the bailiff, with two officers, might make generally in his presence, in the name of all the rest, without any notary to record the same in writing; and in so doing they should be loved and favoured of all men, and even of those who now persecuted them.

The bailiff, and the two officers, with divers other ancients of the town, answered, that they were fully resolved not to consent to any abjuration, however it were to be done, except that (which was always their exception) they could make it appear to them by the word of God, that they had held or maintained any heresy; marvelling much that he would go about to persuade them to lie to God and to the world.

After this, John Miniers, lord of Opide, near Merindole, forged a most impudent lie, giving the king to understand, that they of Merindole, and all the country near about, to the number of twelve or fifteen thousand, were in the field in armour with their ensigns displayed, intending to take the town of Marseilles, and to make it one of the cantons of the Switzers; and to stay this enterprise, he said, it was necessary to execute the decree: and by this means he obtained the king's letters patent, through the help of the cardinal of Toulon, commanding the sentence to be executed against the Merindolians.

After this he gathered all the king's army, which was then in Provence ready to go against the Englishmen, and took up all besides, that were able to bear armour, in the chief towns of Provence, and joined them with the army which the pope's legate had levied for that purpose in Avignon, and all the country of Venice, and employed the same to the destruction of Merindole, Cabriers, and other towns and villages, to the number of twenty-two, giving commission to his soldiers to spoil, ransack, burn, and to destroy all together, and to kill man, woman, and child, without mercy.

But this arch-tyrant, before he came to Merindole, ransacked and burnt certain towns, namely, La Roche, St. Stephens, Ville Laure, Lormarin, La Motte, Cabriers, St. Martin, Pipin, and other places more, notwithstanding that the decree extended but only to Merindole, where the most of the poor inhabitants were slain and murdered without any resistance; women with child, and little infants born and to be born were most cruelly murdered; the paps of many women were cut off, which gave suck to their children, who looking for suck at their mother's breast, died for hunger. There never was any such cruelty and tyranny seen before. The Merindolians seeing all on a flaming fire round about them, left their houses, and fled into the woods.

Not long after it was shewn them how that Miniers was coming with all his power to give the charge upon them. This was in the evening, and that they might go through rough and cumbersome places, and hard to pass by, they all thought it most expedient for their safeguard to leave behind them all the women and children, with a few others, and among them also certain ministers of the church; the residue were appointed to go to the town of Mussi. And this they did upon the hope that the enemy would show mercy to the multitude of women and children who were destitute of all succour. No tongue could express what sorrow, what tears, what sighing, what lamentation there was at that woful departing, when they were compelled to be thus separated asunder, the husband from his dear wife, the father from his sweet babes and tender infants, the one never like to see the other again alive. Notwithstanding after the ministers had ended their ordinary sermons, with evening prayers and exhortations, the men departed that night, to avoid a greater inconvenience.

In the mean time Miniers came to Merindole, which was taken, ransacked, burnt, razed, and laid even with the ground.

When he had destroyed Merindole, he laid siege to Cabriers, and battered it with his ordinance; but when he could not win it by force, he, with the lord of the town, and Poulin, his chief captain, persuaded the inhabitants to open their gates, solemnly promising, that if they would so do, they would lay down their armour, and also that their cause should be heard in judgment with all equity and justice, and no violence or injury should be shewed against them. Upon this they opened their gates, and let in Miniers, with his captains, and all his army. But the tyrant when he was once entered, falsified his promise, and raged like a beast. For first of all he picked out about thirty men, causing them to be bound, and carried into a meadow near to the town, and there to be miserably cut and hewn in pieces.

Then he exercised his fury and outrage upon the women, and caused forty of them to be taken, of whom several were great with child, and put them into a barn full of straw and hay, and caused it to be set on fire; and when the women, running to the great window where the hay is wont to be cast into the barn, would have leaped out, but they were kept in with pikes and halberts. Then there was a soldier who, moved with pity at the crying out and lamentation of the women, opened a door to let them out; but as they were coming out, the tyrant caused them to be slain and cut in pieces. Many fled into the wine-cellar of the castle, and many hid themselves in caves, whereof some were carried into the meadow, and, after being stripped naked, were slain; others were bound two and two together, and carried into the hall of the castle, where they were slain by the captains, who rejoiced in their cruel and inhuman slaughter.

That done, this tyrant, more cruel than ever was Herod, commanded captain John de Gay with a band of ruffians to go into the church, where there was a great number of women, children, and young infants, and to kill all that he found there; which the captain refused at first to do, saying, that was a cruelty unusual among men of war. Whereat Miniers being displeased, charged him upon pain of rebellion and disobedience to the king, to do as he commanded him. The captain fearing what might ensue, entered with his men, and destroyed them all, sparing neither young nor old.

In the mean while certain soldiers went to ransack the houses for the spoil, where they found many poor men that had there hidden themselves in cellars, and other places, flying upon them, and crying out, "Kill, kill!" The other soldiers that were without the town, killed all that they could meet with. The number of those that were unmercifully murdered, were about a thousand persons of men, women, and children. The infants that escaped their fury, were baptized again by their enemies.

In token of this victory, the pope's officers caused a pillar to be erected in Cabriers, on which was engraven the year and the day of the taking and sacking of this town, by John Miniers, lord of Opide, and chief president of the parliament of Provence, for a memorial for ever of that barbarous cruelty, the like whereof was never before heard of. Whereupon we with all our posterity have to understand what are the reasons and arguments wherewith the antichrist of Rome is wont to uphold the impious seat of his abomination; who now is come to such excess and profundity of all kinds of iniquity, and all justice, equity, and verity being set aside, he seeketh the defence of his cause by no other thing but only by force and violence, terror, and oppression, and shedding of blood.

In the mean while the inhabitants of Merindole, and other places, were among the mountains and rocks, in great necessity of victuals, and in much affliction; they had procured some men who were in some favour and authority with Miniers, to make request to him, that they might depart safely whither it should please God to lead them, with their wives and children, although they had no more but their shirts to cover their nakedness. Miniers made this answer: "I know what I have to do; not one of them shall escape my hands; I will send them to dwell in hell among the devils."

Thus hast thou heard, loving reader, the terrible troubles and slaughters committed by the bishops and cardinals, against these faithful men of Merindole.

Now, touching the people of Merindole, is briefly to be noted, that this was not the first time that these men were vexed. For these inhabitants of Provence, and other coasts bordering about France and Piedmont, had their continuance from ancient times, and received their doctrine first from the Waldenses, or Albigenses, who were (as some say) about A. D. 1170; or (as others reckon) about A. D. 1216.

These Waldenses, otherwise called poor men of Lyons, beginning from Peter Waldo, being driven out of Lyons, were dispersed in divers countries, some fled to Massilia, some to Germany, some to Sarmatia, Livonia, Bohemia, Calabria, and Apulia; several strayed to France, especially about Provence and Piedmont, of whom came these Merindolians, and the Angroguans with others. They who were in the country of Toulouse, were called Albü, or Albigenses, from the place where they frequented. Against the Albigenses, Friar Dominic was a great actor, labouring and preaching against them ten years together; and caused many of them to be burned, for which he was highly accepted and rewarded in the apostolical court, and at length, by Pope Honorius III. was made patriarch of the Dominican friars.

These Albigenses, against the pope of Rome, had set up to themselves a bishop of their own, named Bartholomew. For which the see of Rome took great indignation against the Albigenses, and caused all the faithful catholics, and subjects of the church, to rise up in armour, and to take the sign of the holy cross upon them, and to fight against them, A. D. 1206; great multitudes of them were cruelly murdered, not only about Toulouse and Avignon, but also in all quarters, miserable slaughters and burnings long continued, from the reign of the emperor Frederick II., almost to this present time, through the instigation of the Roman popes.

Among other authors who write of those Waldenses, John Sleidan, treating of their continuance and doctrine, thus writes of them: "There are," saith he, "in the French Provence a people called Waldoi. These of an ancient custom among them do not acknowledge the bishop of Rome, and have ever used a manner of doctrine more pure than the rest, but especially since the coming of Luther, they have increased in more knowledge and perfection of judgment."

Concerning the confession and the doctrine of the Merindolians received of ancient time from their forefathers the Waldenses, thus it follows in the said book and place of John Sleidan.

"At last, after he had described what great cruelty was shewed against them, when the report hereof was spread in Germany, it offended the minds of many: and indeed the Switzers, who were then of a contrary religion to the pope, entreated the king that he would shew mercy to such as had fled. The year before he had received from his subjects of Merindole a confession of their faith and doctrine: the articles whereof were, that they, according to the Christian faith, confessed, first God the Father, Creator of all things: the Son, the only Mediator and Advocate of mankind: the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, and Instructor of all truth. They confessed also the church, which they acknowledged to be the fellowship of God's elect, whereof Jesus Christ is head. The ministers also of the church they allowed, wishing that such as did not their duty should be removed.

"And as touching magistrates, they granted likewise the same to be ordained of God to defend the good, and to punish the transgressors. And how they owe to him, not love only, but also tribute and custom, and no man herein to be excepted, even by the example of Christ, who paid tribute himself, &c.

"Likewise of baptism, they confessed the same to be a visible and an outward sign, but represents to us the renewing of the spirit, and mortification of the members.

"As touching the Lord's supper, they said and confessed the same to be a thanksgiving, and a memorial of the benefit received through Christ.

"Matrimony they affirmed to be holy, and instituted of God, and to be prohibited to no man.

"That good works are to be observed and exercised by all men, as the holy scripture teaches.

"That false doctrine, which leads men away from the true worship of God, ought to be eschewed.

"Finally, the order and rule of their faith they confessed to be the Old and New Testament; protesting that they believed all such things as are contained in the apostolic creed: desiring moreover the king to give credit to this their declaration of their faith; so that whatsoever was informed to him to the contrary was not true, and that they would well prove, if they might be heard."

The History of the Persecutions and Wars against the people called Waldenses or Waldoi, in the Valleys of Angrogne, Lucerne, St. Martin, Perouse, and others, in the country of Piedmont, from the year 1555 to 1561.

To proceed now in the persecution of these Waldoi, or Waldenses, you have heard how they, dividing themselves into various countries, fled to Provence, to Toulouse, of which sufficient hath been said. Some went to Piedmont, and the valley of Angrogne, of whom it follows now to treat.

Thus these good men, by long persecution, being driven from place to place, were in all places afflicted, but yet could never be utterly destroyed, nor yet compelled to yield to the superstitious and false religion of the church of Rome: but ever abstained from their corruption and idolatry, as much as was possible, and gave themselves to the word of God, as a rule both truly to serve him, and to direct their lives accordingly.

They had many books of the Old and New Testaments translated into their language. Their ministers instructed them secretly, to avoid the fury of their enemies who could not abide the light. They lived in great simplicity, and by the sweat of their brows. They were quiet and peaceable among their neighbours, abstaining from blasphemy, and the profaning of the name of God by oaths, and such other impiety: from games, dancing, songs, and other vices and dissolute life, and conformed their life wholly to the rule of God's word. Their principal care was always, that God might be rightly served, and his word truly preached: so that in our time, when it pleased God to set forth the light of his gospel more clearly, they never spared any thing to establish the true and pure ministry of the word of God and his sacraments. Which was the cause that Satan with his ministers so persecuted them of late more cruelly than he ever did before, as appears by the cruel and horrible persecutions which have been, not only in Provence, against those of Merindole and Cabriers; but also against those remaining in the valleys of Angrogne, and of Lucerne, and also in the valley of St. Martin and Perouse, in Piedmont. Which people of a long time were persecuted by the papists, and especially within these few years they have been vexed, so that it seems almost incredible: and yet God hath miraculously delivered them.

The people of Angrogne had before this time some to preach the word of God, and to minister the sacraments unto them privately; yet in the year 1555, in the beginning of the month of August, the gospel was openly preached in Angrogne. The ministers and the people intended at first to keep themselves still as secret as they might: but there was such concourse of people from all parts, that they were compelled to preach openly abroad. For this cause they built a church in the midst of Angrogne, where assemblies were made, and sermons preached.

At this time the French King held these valleys, and they were under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Turin. In the end of December following, news was brought, that it was ordained by the parliament, that certain horsemen and footmen should be sent to spoil and destroy Angrogne. Some who pretended great friendship to this people, counselled them not to go forward with their enterprise, but to forbear for a while, and to wait for better opportunity. But they, notwithstanding, calling upon God, determined with one accord constantly to persist in their religion, and in hope and silence to abide the good pleasure of God: so that this enterprise against Angrogne was soon dashed. The same time they began also openly to preach in Lucerne.

In the month of March 1556, the ministers of the valley of St. Martin preached openly. At that time certain gentlemen of the valley of St. Martin took a good man named Bartholomew, a bookbinder, prisoner, as he passed by the said valley, and sent him to Turin; and there, with a marvellous constancy, after he had made a good confession of his faith, he suffered death; so that several of the Parliament were astonished and appalled at his constancy.

From thence they went to the valley of St. Martin, and remained there a good while, tormenting the poor people, and threatening their utter ruin and destruction. After that they came to Lucerne, troubling and vexing the people there in like manner. From thence they went to Angrogne, accompanied with many gentlemen, and a great rabble of priests.

After they were come to Angrogne, the president having visited the two temples, caused a monk to preach in the one, the people being there assembled; who pretended nothing else, but only to exhort them to return to the obedience of the see of Rome. The aforesaid monk, with the president, and all his whole retinue, kneeled down twice, and called upon the Virgin Mary; but the ministers and all the people stood still, and would not kneel, making no sign or token of reverence. As soon as the monk had ended his sermon, the people requested instantly that their minister might also be suffered to preach, affirming that the monk had spoken many things which were not according to the word of God. But the president would not grant their request. After that the president admonished them, in the name of the king and the parliament of Turin, that they should return to the obedience of the pope, upon pain of loss of goods and life, and utter destruction of their town. And he recited unto them the piteous discomfiture of their brethren and friends, which had been done before in Merindole and Cabriers, and other places in the country of Provence. The ministers and the people answered, that they were determined to live according to the word of God, and that they would obey the king and all their superiors in all things, so that God thereby were not displeased; and if it were shewed to them by the word of God, that they erred in any point of religion, they were ready to receive correction, and to be reformed. This talk endured about six hours together, even until night. In the end, the president said there should be a disputation appointed for those matters, to which the people gladly agreed.

Here he remained fourteen days, daily practising new devices to vex and torment them with new proclamations; now calling to him the syndics and head-officers, now severally, and now altogether, that so for fear he might make them relent; causing also assemblies to be made in every parish by such as he appointed, thinking thereby to divide the people. Notwithstanding he prevailed nothing with all that he could do; but still they continued constant. Inasmuch that they with one accord presented a brief confession of their faith, with an answer to certain interrogatories propounded by the president, in which they confessed,—

That the religion wherein both they and their elders had been long instructed and brought up, was the same which is contained both in the Old and New Testament, and which is also briefly comprised in the twelve articles of the Christian belief.

Also, that they acknowledged the sacraments instituted by Christ, whereby he distributes abundantly his graces and great benefits, his heavenly riches and treasures to all those who receive the same with a true and lively faith.

Furthermore, that they received the creeds of the four general councils; that is to say, of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and also the creed of Athanasius, wherein the mystery of the Christian faith and religion is plainly and largely set out.

Also, the ten commandments expressed in the 20th chapter of Exodus, and the 5th of Deut., in which the rule of a godly and holy life, and also the true service which God requires of us, is briefly comprised; and therefore following this article, they suffered not by any means (said they) any gross iniquities to reign amongst them; as unlawful swearing, perjury, blasphemy, cursing, slandering, dissension, deceit, wrong dealing, usury, gluttony, drunkenness, theft, murder, or such like; but wholly endeavoured themselves to live in the fear of God, and according to his holy will.

Moreover, they acknowledged the superior powers, as princes and magistrates, to be ordained of God; and that whosoever resisteth the same, resisteth the ordinance of God; and therefore humbly submitted themselves to their superiors with all obedience, so that they commanded nothing against God.

Finally, they protested, that they would in no point be stubborn, but if that their forefathers or they had erred in any one jot concerning true religion, the same being proved by the word of God, they would willingly yield and be reformed.

Their interrogatories were concerning the mass, auricular confession, baptism, marriage and burials, according to the institution of the church of Rome.

To the first they answered, that they received the Lord's supper as it was instituted by him and celebrated by his apostles; but as touching the mass, except the same might be proved by the word of God, they would not receive it.

To the second, touching auricular confession, they said, that for their part they confessed themselves daily unto God, acknowledging themselves before him to be miserable sinners, desiring of him pardon and forgiveness of their sins, as Christ instructed him in the prayer which he taught them, "Lord, forgive our sins;" and as St. John saith, "If we confess our sins to God, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness;" and according to that which God himself saith by his prophet, "O Israel, if thou return, return unto me;" and again, "O Israel, it is I, it is I who forgiveth thee thy sins." So that, seeing they ought to return to God alone, and it is he only who forgives sins, therefore they were bound to confess themselves to God only, and to no other. Also it appears, that David in his Psalms, and the Prophets, and other faithful servants of God, have confessed themselves both generally and particularly unto God alone; yet if the contrary might be proved by the word of God, they would (said they) receive the same with all humbleness.

Thirdly, as touching baptism, they acknowledged and received that holy institution of Christ, and administered the same with all simplicity, as he ordained it in his holy gospel, without any changing, adding or diminishing in any point, and that all this they did in their mother-tongue, according to the rule of St. Paul, who directs that in the church every thing be done in the mother-tongue, for the edification of our neighbour, 1 Cor. xiv.; but as for their conjurations, oiling, and salting, except the same might be proved by the sacred scripture, they would not receive them.

Fourthly, as touching burials, they answered, that they knew there was a difference between the bodies of the true Christians and the infidels, as the first are the members of Jesus Christ, temples of the Holy Ghost, and partakers of the glorious resurrection of the dead, and therefore they are accustomed to follow their dead to the grave reverently, with a sufficient company, and exhortation out of the word of God, as well to comfort the parents and friends of the dead, as also to admonish all men diligently to prepare themselves to die. But as for the using of candles or lights, praying for the dead, ringing of bells, except the same might be proved to be necessary by the word of God, and that God is not offended therewith, they would not receive them.

Fifthly, as touching obedience to men's traditions, they received and allowed all those ordinances which, as St. Paul says, serve for order, decency, and reverence of the ministry. But as for other ceremonies, which have been brought into the church of God, either as a part of divine service, or to merit remission of sins, or else to bind men's consciences, because they are repugnant to the word of God, they could by no means receive them.

And whereas the commissioners affirmed the said traditions to have been ordained by councils; first, they answered, that the greatest part of them were not ordained by councils. Secondly, that councils were not to be preferred above the word of God, which saith, "If any man, yea, or an angel from heaven, should preach unto you otherwise than that which hath been received of the Lord Jesus, let him be accursed." And therefore, said they, if councils have ordained any thing dissenting from the word of God they would not receive it.

Wherefore they required the commissioners, that a disputation might be had publicly, and in their presence, and then if it might be proved, by the word of God, that they erred, either in doctrine, or conversation, and manner of living, they were content with all humbleness to be corrected and reformed. Beseeching them to consider also that their religion had been observed and kept from their ancestors, until their time, many hundred years together; and yet, for their parts, being convicted by the infallible word of God, they would not obstinately stand to the defence thereof. Saying moreover, that they, together with the said lords' deputies, confessed all one God, one Saviour, one Holy Ghost, one law, one baptism, one hope in heaven; and, in sum, they affirmed that their faith and religion was firmly founded and grounded upon the pure word of God.

To be short, seeing it is permitted to the Turks, Saracens, and Jews (which are mortal enemies to our Saviour Christ,) to dwell peaceably in the fairest cities of Christendom, by good reason they should be suffered to live in the desolate mountains and valleys, having their whole religion founded upon the holy gospel, and worshipping the Lord Jesus, and therefore they most humbly besought them to have pity and compassion upon them, and to suffer them to live quietly in their deserts; protesting that they and theirs would live in all fear and reverence of God, with all due subjection and obedience to their lord and prince, and to his lieutenants and officers.

The president, and the rest of the commissions, perceiving that they laboured in vain, returned to Turin with the notes of their proceedings; which immediately were sent to the king's court, and there the matter remained one year before there was any answer made thereunto. During which time the Waldois lived in great quietness, as God of his infinite goodness is wont to give some comfort and refreshing to his poor servants, after long troubles and afflictions. The number of the faithful so augmented, that throughout the valleys God's word was purely preached, and his sacraments duly administered, and no mass was sung in Angrogne, nor in divers other places. The year after, the president of St. Julian, with his associates, returned to Pignerol, and sent for the chief rulers of Angrogne, and of the valley of Lucerne, that is, for six of Angrogne, and for two of every parish besides, and showed to them, how that the last year they had presented their confession, which was sent to the king's court, and there diligently examined by learned men, and condemned as heretical. Therefore the king willed and commanded them to return to the obedience of the church of Rome, upon pain of loss both of goods and life; enjoining them moreover to give him a direct answer within three days. From thence he went to Lucerne, and caused the householders, with great threatenings, to assemble themselves before certain by him appointed; but they with one assent persisted in their former confession. And lest they should seem stubborn in the defence of any erroneous doctrine, they desired that their confession might be sent to all the universities of Christendom, and if the same in any part were disproved by the word of God, it should immediately be amended; but contrariwise, if that were not done, then they to be no more disquieted.

The president, not contented with this, the next morning sent for six persons of Angrogne, and for two out of every other parish, whom he and the gentlemen of the country threatened very sorely, and warned twelve of the chief of Angrogne, and of the other parishes, to appear personally at the parliament of Turin, and to bring before the judges of the parliament their ministers and schoolmasters, thinking, if they were once banished the country, that then their enterprise might soon be brought to an end. To which it was answered, that they could not, nor ought not to obey such a commandment.

A little while after proclamation was made in every place, that no man should receive any preacher coming from Geneva, but only such as were appointed by the archbishop of Turin, and others his officers, upon pain of confiscation of their goods, and loss of their lives, and that every one should observe the ceremonies, rites, and religion used in the church of Rome. Furthermore, if any of the aforesaid preachers of Geneva came into those quarters, that they should immediately be apprehended, and that none of them should be concealed by any one.

Now after four years, viz., A.D. 1559, there was a peace concluded between the French king and the king of Spain; when the country of Piedmont (certain towns excepted) was restored to the Duke of Savoy; under whom the churches, and all other faithful people in Piedmont, continued in great quietness, and were not molested; and the duke himself was content to suffer them to live in their religion, knowing that he had no subjects more faithful and obedient than they were. But Satan hating all quietness, by his ministers stirred up the duke against the churches of Piedmont, and his own natural subjects. For the pope and the cardinals, seeing the good inclination of the duke towards this people, incensed him to do that which otherwise he would not. The pope's legate also, who then followed the court, and others that favoured the church of Rome, laboured by all means to persuade the duke that he ought to banish the Waldois; alleging that he could not suffer such a people to dwell within his dominion, without prejudice and dishonour to the apostolic see. Also that they were a rebellious people against the holy ordinances and decrees of their holy mother the church. And briefly, if he would indeed show himself a loving and obedient son, that he might no longer suffer the people, being so disobedient and stubborn against the holy father.

Such devilish instigations were the cause of these horrible and furious persecutions, wherewith these poor people of the valleys, and in the country of Piedmont, were so long vexed. And because they foresaw the great calamities which they were likely to suffer, to find some remedy for the same, if it were possible, all the churches of Piedmont with one common consent wrote to the duke, declaring in effect, that the only cause why they were so hated, and for which he was by their enemies so sore incensed against them, was their religion, which was no new or light opinion, but that wherein they and their ancestors had long continued, being wholly grounded upon the infallible word of God, contained in the Old and New Testament. Notwithstanding, if it might be proved by the same word that they held any false or erroneous doctrine, they would submit themselves to be reformed with all obedience.

But it is not certain whether this advertisement was delivered unto the duke; for it was said that he would not hear of that religion. But however, in the month of March following, there was a great persecution raised against the poor christians who were at Carignan. Amongst whom there were certain godly persons taken and burnt within four days after.

Shortly after, these churches of the Waldois, that is to say, Le Larch, Meronne, Meane, and Suse, were wonderfully assaulted. To recite all the outrage, cruelty, and villany that was there committed were too long; for brevity's sake we will recite only certain of the principal and best known. The churches of Meane and Suse suffered great affliction. Their minister was taken among others. Many fled away, and their houses and goods were ransacked and spoiled. The minister was a good and faithful servant of God, and endued with excellent gifts and graces, who in the end was put to a most cruel and shameful death. The great patience which he shewed in the midst of the fire, greatly astonished the adversaries. Likewise the churches of Larch and Meronne were marvellously tormented and afflicted. For some were taken and sent to the galleys, others consented and yielded to the adversaries, and a great number of them fled away. It is certainly known, that those who yielded to the adversaries were more cruelly handled than the others who continued constant in the truth. Whereby God declares how greatly he detests all such as play the apostate, and shrink from the truth.

But for the better understanding of the beginning of this horrible persecution against the Waldois, here note, that first of all the proclamations were made in every place, that none should resort to the sermons of the Lutherans, but should live after the customs of the church of Rome, upon pain of forfeiture of their goods, and to be condemned to the galleys for ever, or lose their lives. Three of the most cruel persons that could be found, were appointed to execute this commission.

At that time Charles de Comptes, of the valley of Lucerne, and one of the lords of Angrogne, wrote to the commissioners to use some lenity towards them of the valley of Lucerne. By reason whereof they were a while more gently treated than the rest. At that season the monks of Fignerol and their associates tormented grievously the churches near about them. They took the poor christians as they passed by the way, and kept them prisoners within their abbey. And having assembled a company of ruffians, they sent them to spoil those of the churches, and to take prisoners men, women, and children; and some they so tormented, that they were compelled to swear to return to mass; others they sent to the galleys, and some they cruelly burnt. They who escaped were afterwards so sick, that they seemed to have been poisoned.

The gentlemen of the valley of St. Martin treated their tenants very cruelly, threatening them and commanding them to return to mass; also spoiling them of their goods, imprisoning them, and vexing them by all the means they could. But above all the others, there were two especially, that is to say, Charles Truchet, and Boniface his brother, who the second day of April, before day, with a company of Ruffians, spoiled a village of their own subjects named Renclaret; which as soon as the inhabitants of the village perceived, they fled to the mountains, then covered with snow, naked and without victuals, and there remained until the third night after. In the morning, his retinue took a minister of the valley prisoner, and led him to the abbey, where he was burnt soon after, with one other of the valley of St. Martin.

In the end of June next following, the lord of Racoin and the lord of la Trinite came to Angrogne, there to mitigate, as they said, the sore persecution, and caused the chief rulers and ministers to assemble together, propounding several points of religion concerning doctrine, the calling of ministers, the mass, and obedience towards princes and rulers; and declared to them, that their confession had been sent to Rome by the duke, and that they daily looked for an answer. To all these points the ministers answered. After this they demanded of the chief rulers, if the duke should cause mass to be sung in their parishes, whether they would submit to the same or not? They answered simply, that they would not. Then they demanded of them, if the duke would appoint them preachers, whether they would receive them? They answered, that if they preached the word of God purely, they would hear them. Thirdly, If that they were content that in the meantime their ministers should cease, and if they who should be sent preached not the word of God sincerely, then their ministers to preach again. If they would agree to this, they were promised that the persecution should cease, and the prisoners should be restored again. To this question, after they had conferred with the people, they answered, that they could by no means suffer that their ministers should forbear preaching.

The two lords, not contented with this answer, commanded, in the duke's name, that all the ministers who were strangers should instantly be banished the country, saying, that the duke would not suffer them to dwell within his dominions, for they were his enemies.

This done, immediately proclamations were made, and the persecution began to be more furious than before. Among others, the monks of Fignerol at that time were most cruel, for they sent out a company of hired ruffians, who daily spoiled and ransacked houses, and all that they could lay hands of; took men, women, and children, and led them captives to the abbey, where they were most spitefully afflicted and tormented. At the same time they sent also a band of ruffians by night to the minister's house of St. Germain, in the valley of Perouse, being led there by a traitor that knew the house, and had used to haunt there secretly; who knocking at the door, the minister knowing his voice, came forth immediately, and perceiving himself betrayed, fled; but he was soon taken and sore wounded, and yet they pricked him behind with their halberds to make him hasten his pace. At that time also they slew many, many they hurt, and others they brought to the abbey, where they kept them in prison, and cruelly handled them. The good minister endured sore imprisonment, and after that a most terrible kind of death with a wonderful constancy, for they roasted him by a small fire; and when half his body was burnt, he confessed and called upon the Lord Jesus with a loud voice.

The inquisitor, Jacomet, with his monks, and the collateral Corbis amongst others, shewed one practice of most barbarous cruelty against this poor man, who, when he should be burned, caused two poor women of St. Germain to carry fagots to the fire, and to speak these words to their pastor:—"Take this, thou wicked heretic, in recompence of thy naughty doctrine which thou hast taught us." To whom the good minister answered, "Ah, good woman! I have taught you well, but you have learned ill." To be brief, they so afflicted and tormented those poor people of St. Germain, and the places thereabout, that after they were spoiled of their goods, and driven from their houses, they were compelled to fly into the mountains to save their lives. So great was the spoil of these poor people, that many who before had been men of great wealth, and with their riches had ministered succour and comfort to others, were now brought to such misery, that they were compelled to crave succour and relief of others.

Now forasmuch as the said monks, with their troops of ruffians (which were counted to be in number about three hundred), made such spoil and havoc in all the country, that no man could live there in safety, it was demanded of the ministers, whether it was lawful to defend themselves against the insolence and furious rage of the said ruffians? The ministers answered, that it was lawful, warning them in any case to take heed of bloodshed. This question being once solved, they of the valley of Lucerne and of Angrogne, sent certain men to them of St. Germain to aid them against the supporters of these monks.

In the month of July they of Angrogne, being one morning at harvest upon the hill-side of St. Germain, perceived a company of soldiers spoiling them of St. Germain, and doubting lest they should go to Angrogne, made an outcry. Then the people of Angrogne assembled together upon the mountain, and some ran to St. Germain over the hill, and some by the valley. They who went by the valley met with the spoilers coming from St. Germain, loaded with spoil which they had gotten, and being but fifty, set upon them, amounting to the number of one hundred and twenty men, well-appointed, and gave them soon the overthrow. The passage over the bridge being stopped, the enemy was forced to take the river Chison, where many were sore hurt, others drowned, and some escaped with great difficulty; and such a slaughter was made of them, that the river was dyed with the blood of those who were wounded and slain, but none of the Angrognians were even hurt. If the river had been as great as it was wont commonly to be, there had not one man escaped alive. The noise of the harquebusses was great, and within less than one hour's space there were three or four hundred of the Waldois gathered together upon the river; and at the same time they had purposed to fetch away their prisoners who were in the abbey, but they would not do it without the counsel of their ministers, and so deferred the matter until the next day. But their ministers counselled them not to venture any such thing, but to refrain themselves, and so they did. Yet they doubted not, but if they had gone immediately after that discomfiture to the abbey, they might have found all open, and easily have entered; for the monks were so afraid, that they fled to save their relics and images.

The next day the commander of St. Anthony de Fossan came to Angrogne, accompanied with several gentlemen, saying, that he was sent by the duke; and having assembled the chief rulers and ministers of Angrogne, and of the valley of Lucerne, after he had declared to them the cause of his coming, he read their supplication directed to the duke, which contained their confession, demanding of them, if it were the same which they had sent to the duke? They answered, yea. Then he began to dispute, being sent, as he said, to inform them of their errors, not doubting but they would amend according to their promise. Then he entered into a disputation of the mass, in a great heat, deriving the same from the Hebrew word Massa, which signified (as he supposed) consecration, and shewed that this word Massa might be found in ancient writers. The ministers answered, that he ill applied the Hebrew word; and further, that they disputed not of the word Massa, but of that which is signified by the same, which he ought first to prove by the word of God. Briefly, that he could not prove either by the word of God, or the ancient fathers, their private mass, their sacrifice expiatory or propitiatory, their transubstantiation, their adoration, their application of the same for the quick and the dead, and such other matters which are principal parts of the said mass. The commander having here nothing to reply, fell into a marvellous choler, railing and raging as if he had been mad, and told them that he was not come to dispute, but to banish their ministers, and to place others in their stead, by the duke's commandment, which he could not, unless their ministers were first driven out of the country.

From thence he went to the abbey of Pignerol, where he and Jacomet caused a number of the poor inhabitants of Campillon, and of Fenil, to be taken prisoners, spoiling them of their goods, driving away their cattle, and forcing them to swear and forswear, and in the end ransomed them for great sums of money. About that time a gentleman of Campillon agreed with those who were fled, for thirty crowns to be paid into his hand, that he would warrant them from any further vexation or trouble, so that they remained quiet at home; but when he had received the money, he caused the commander of Fossan with his men by night to come to his house, and then sent for the poor men, thinking traitorously to have delivered them into the hands of their mortal enemy, following therein the decree of the council of Constance, which is that no promise is to be kept with heretics. But God, knowing how to succour his people in their necessity, prevented this danger; for one of them had intelligence of the commander's coming, and so they all fled.

After this, there were many commandments and injunctions given out through all the country, to banish these poor Waldois, with the doctrine of the gospel, if it were possible, out of the mountains and valleys of Piedmont; but the poor people still desired, that according to that which they had so often before protested by word and writing, they might be suffered to serve God purely, according to the rule prescribed in his word, simply obeying their Lord and Prince always, and in all things.

In the end of October following, the rumour went that an army was levying to destroy them; and in very deed there were certain bands levied, ready to march at an hour's warning. Those malefactors, who heretofore had fled or were banished for any offence or crime committed, were called home again, and pardoned of all together, if they would take them to their weapons, and go to destroy the Waldois. The ministers and chief rulers of the valleys of Lucerne and Angrogne, thereupon assembled together oftentimes to take advice what in such an extremity was best to be done. In the end they determined, that for certain days following there should be kept a general fast, and the Sunday after a communion; also, that they should not defend themselves by force of arms, but that every one should withdraw himself to the high mountains, and every one to carry away such goods as they were able to bear; and if their enemies pursued them thither, then to take such advice and counsel as it pleased God to give them. This article of not defending themselves seemed very strange to the people, being driven to such an extremity, and the cause being so just; but yet every one began to carry their goods and victuals into the mountains, and for the space of eight days all the ways were filled with comers and goers to the mountains, like ants in summer, which provide for winter. All this they did in this great perplexity and danger, with a wonderful courage and cheerfulness, praising of God, and singing of psalms, and every one comforting another.

A few days after certain other ministers, hearing what they of Angrogne and Lucerne had concluded, wrote to them, that this resolution seemed very strange to some, that they ought not to defend themselves against the violence of their enemies, alleging many reasons, that in such extremity and necessity it was lawful for them so to do, especially the quarrel being just, that is, for the defence of true religion, and for the preservation of their own lives, and the lives of their wives and children, knowing that it was the pope and his ministers which were the cause of all these troubles and cruel wars, and not the duke, who was stirred up thereunto only by their instigations. Wherefore they might well and with good conscience withstand such furious and outrageous violence.

On the twenty-second of October the lord of Angrogne went from Lucerne to Mondevin, where he was then governor for the duke, and sent for the chief rulers of Angrogne at several times, declaring the great perils and dangers wherewith they were environed, the army being already at hand; yet promising them, if they would submit themselves, he would send immediately to stay the army. They of Angrogne answered, that they all determined to stand to that which they, two days before in their assembly, had put in writing. With this answer he seemed at that present to be content. The next day the rumour was, that they of Angrogne had submitted themselves to the duke. On the morrow, which was Sunday, there was nothing but weeping and mourning in Angrogne. The sermon being ended, the rulers were called before the ministers and the people, who affirmed that they wholly cleaved unto their former writing; and they sent secretly to the notary for the copy of that which was passed in the council-house at their last assembly before the Lord de Comptes, in which was comprised, that Angrogne had wholly submitted herself to the good pleasure of the duke. The people hearing that, were sore astonished, and protested rather to die than obey the same. And hereupon it was agreed, that at that very instant certain should be sent to the lord of Angrogne to signify to him, that the determination of the council was falsified, and that it might please him the next morning to come to Angrogne to hear the voice of the people, not only of the men, but also of the women and children. But he himself went not thither, having intelligence of the uproar, but sent thither the judge of that place. Then that which had been falsified was duly corrected; the judge laying all the blame upon the notary.

During this time the adversaries cried out through all the country of Piedmont: "To the fire with them, to the fire with them!" The Thursday after, Angrogne, by proclamations set up in every place, was exposed to the fire and sword. On Friday after, being the second of November, the army approached to the borders of the valley of Lucerne, and certain horsemen came to a place called St. John, a little beneath Angrogne. Then the people retired into the mountains. Certain of St. John perceiving that the horsemen not only spoiled their goods, but also took their fellows prisoners, set upon them. It is not certain what number of their enemies were there slain; but suddenly they retired to Bubiene, where their camp then was, and not one of them of St. John was slain or hurt. It happened at the same time, that two of the horsemen, being sore amazed, galloped before the rest towards the army, being ready to march towards Angrogne, crying, "They come, they come!" At whose cry the whole army was so astonished, that every man fled his way, and they were all so scattered, that the captains that day were not able to bring them in order again, and yet no creature followed them.

On the Saturday in the morning the army mustered near Angrogne. They of Angrogne had sent certain of their men to keep the passes, and stop the army that they should not enter, if it were possible. In the meantime the people retired into the meadow of Toure, and little thought of the coming of the army so soon, or that they would have made such a sudden assault; for they were yet carrying victuals and other stuff, so that few of them kept the passes. Now they who kept the straits, perceiving that their enemies prepared themselves to fight, fell down upon their knees, and made their prayers to God, that it would please him to take pity upon them, and not to look upon their sins, but to the cause which they maintained, and to turn the hearts of their enemies, and so to work, that there might be no effusion of blood; and if it were his will to take them, with their wives and infants out of this world, that he would then mercifully receive them into his kingdom. In this sort most fervent prayers were made by all those that kept the passes, with exhortation that they should all together cry unto God, and crave his succour and assistance in this great distress.

Their prayers thus ended, suddenly they perceived their enemies coming towards them through the vines to win the top of the mountain of Angrogne. In the mean time the prior of St. John and Jacomet were within the temple of Angrogne, and communed with the rulers touching an agreement. These were sent thither by the lord of la Trinite to keep the people occupied. To be short, the combat began in several places, and endured for a long space in the passes of Angrogne. The poor Waldois being but few in number, and some of them having but slings and cross-bows, were sore pressed by the multitude of their enemies. At length they retired to the top of the mountain, where they defended themselves until night.

When they had found a place where they might withstand their enemies who were still pursuing them, they turned themselves, and slew some of them, and wounded many. When the evening came, their enemies rested, and were about to encamp themselves, there to sup and lodge all night. Which thing when the Angrogians perceived, they went to prayer, desiring God to assist and succour them, but their enemies mocked them and laughed them to scorn. Then the poor people devised to send a drum into a little valley hard by; and as they were making their prayers unto God, and the drum sounded in the valley, the lord of la Trinite caused his soldiers, which were about to encamp themselves, to remove thence; which was a great advantage to the poor people, who now were sore wearied with travel, all wet with sweating, and very thirsty, and in great peril if God had not given them some little breathing time. Many of their enemies that day were slain, and many wounded, of which very few escaped; so they reported that the shot was poisoned, which this poor simple people never used to do in all these wars. Of the Angrogians that day there were but three slain, and one wounded, who afterwards was healed again. This combat gave great courage to the Waldois, and astonished their adversaries. At the same time when the army retired, they burnt many houses, and made great spoil as they went, destroying also the vines which were in the presses.

The lord of la Trinite with his army encamped in a village beyond Toure, at the foot of the hill, between Angrogne and the other towns of the valley of Lucerne, which professed the gospel. They of the said village were always sore against the Waldois, and haters of true religion, and were glad of this outrage and violence done against the possessors thereof: but they had their just plague, for they were all destroyed. After this the said lord of la Trinite caused the fortress to be built again, which the Frenchmen had raised, and placed there a garrison, and afterwards sent another to the fort of Villars, which is of the valley of Lucerne; and another he sent to the fortress of Perouse, and a fourth garrison he placed in the castle of St. Martin. They of Angrogne (seeing themselves to be now, as it were, in a sea of troubles) after they had recommended themselves unto God by prayer, and committed their cause unto him, sent to them of Perouse, St. Martin, and of Pragela, for aid and succour; who sent them all the help they were able.

The next day there came letters to Angrogne from the lord of la Trinite: the effect whereof was this; that he was sorry for what was done the day before, and that he came not thither to make war against them, but only to view if it were a place convenient to build a fort therein to serve the duke. Furthermore, that his soldiers seeing the people assembled, as it were to defy them, upon that occasion only were stirred up to give assault, and to set upon them. Also that he was sorry that such spoil was made of their goods, and such hurt done by fire. But if they would shew themselves obedient to the duke, he had good hope that all would be well, and trusted some good agreement would be made. The Angrogians answered, that they were marvellously grieved to be so assaulted, spoiled and tormented by the subjects of their liege and natural prince: and as they had oftentimes before offered themselves to be more obedient and faithful to their sovereign prince the duke, than any of all his subjects besides; so yet they still offered the same obedience. Also they most humbly besought him, not to think it strange if they, being constrained by such extreme necessity, defended themselves. Finally, as to their religion, they affirmed, that it was the pure word of God, even as it was preached by the prophets and apostles, and the same which their predecessors had observed for some hundred years past. Moreover, that the cause was not concerning the goods of this world, but the honour and glory of God, the salvation or destruction of the souls both of them and theirs. And therefore it were much better for them to die altogether, than to forsake their religion. And yet if it might be proved out of the word of God, that they were in error; not by force of arms, by blood and fire, they would then yield themselves with all obedience; most humbly beseeching him, and all others the lords of the country of Piedmont, to be their intercessors and advocates to the duke in this behalf.

Upon Monday, being the fourth day of November, the lord of la Trinite sent his army to Villars and Tailleret. The lesser company ascended towards Villars. The people seeing their enemies approaching, after they had called upon God with fervent prayer, strongly defended themselves, and slew many: many also were hurt, and the rest fled. The other company ascended towards Tailleret; and although they of that place were but few in number, and that part of the army the greater, yet making their prayers unto God, and commending their cause unto him, they defended themselves likewise valiantly.

In the meantime, they of Villars being emboldened by their late victory, came to assist their neighbours, and being assembled together, they courageously pursued their enemies, and put them to flight. In this pursuit it chanced that this poor people, by an ambush of their enemies who came another way, were suddenly enclosed on every side, and like to be destroyed; but yet they all escaped, and not one of them was slain, only three were hurt, who were soon cured again. On the enemy's side there were so many slain, that they were laid together by whole cart-loads. This was the reward of those who were desirous to shed innocent blood.

After the lord of la Trinite had received the letters of the Angrogneans, he sent to them his secretary, accompanied with a gentleman of the valley; whose charge was to cause the chief rulers to send certain to commune with him, saying, that he had good tidings to declare to them; and, moreover, that he would deliver them a safe conduct to come and go. Whereupon they sent four to him, whom he intreated very courteously, and rehearsed to them, how the duke at his departure from the court, told him, that although the pope, the princes and cities of Italy, yea, his own council were fully resolved, that of necessity they of the said religion should be destroyed, yet notwithstanding, God otherwise put into his mind, and that he had taken counsel of God what he should do in this matter; that is, that he would use them gently. Furthermore, he declared to them, that the duchess bore them good affection, and favoured them very much, and that she had commended their cause to the duke, persuading him to have regard to that poor people, and that their religion was ancient and old, with many such other things. "Moreover, they had," said he, "great friends in the duke's court, not doubting but if they should send certain to the court with a supplication, they should obtain more than they themselves would require; and he for his part would employ himself in their affairs to the uttermost of his power: and so he promised that he would retire himself with his army. This he seemed to speak unfeignedly. The people desiring but to live peaceably in their religion, and under obedience to their lawful prince, were content to follow his counsel.

About this season they of Angrogne perceived that a part of the army ascended the hill of Tailleret, (which is the half way between Angrogne and those of the valley of Lucerne) and the other part had already gotten away, which led to the meadow of Toure, by which they of Angrogne might easily have been enclosed. Therefore they sent certain immediately to keep the way, who soon after encountered with their enemies and obtained the victory, pursuing and chasing them to their camp, not without great loss of their men. The number of their enemies slain, was not known; for their custom was immediately to carry away those who were slain. Not one of Angrogne perished that day, nor yet was hurt. It was feared that this combat would have hindered the agreement; but the lord of la Trinite could well dissemble the matter, and excused the day's journey, putting the fault upon them of Tailleret, whom he charged to have slain certain of his men in the highway, and amongst others his barber.

On Saturday following, being the ninth of November, the lord of la Trinite sent again for them of Angrogne, to consult with them touching the agreement, using the like communication as before; and added thereunto, that in token of true obedience they should carry their armour into two of the houses of the chief rulers, not fearing but that it should be safe; for it should remain in their own keeping, and if need were, they should receive it again. Also, that he upon Sunday (which was the next day) would cause a mass to be sung within the temple of St. Lawrence in Angrogne, accompanied with a very few, and thereby the duke's wrath would be assuaged.

The next morning he went into the temple (whereat they were sore aggrieved, however they could not withstand him) his army marching before him; and having caused a mass to be sung, he desired to see the meadow of Toure, so much spoken of, that thereof he might make a true report to the duke; and thither the rulers with a great troop of his own men went, the residue of his company remaining behind. The lord being entered into the meadow of Toure, the people began to make a commotion; whereof he having intelligence, returned immediately. All that day he shewed himself very courteous to all whom he met.

The people in the meantime perceived themselves to be in great danger, and were moved at the sight of the army, the spoil of the soldiers, the taking away of their armour, but especially because the lord of la Trinite had viewed the meadow of Toure, foreseeing his traitorous meaning and purpose. A few days after the lord of la Trinite sent his secretary Gastaut to Angrogne to talk with them concerning the agreement, which was read in the assembly by the secretary as follows.

To the most excellent and worthy Prince, the duke of Savoy, &c. our sovereign lord and natural Prince.

"Most noble and renowned prince, we have sent certain of our men unto your highness, to give testimony of our humble, hearty, and unfeigned obedience unto the same, and with all submission desire pardon touching the bearing of armour by certain of our people in their extreme necessity, and for all other our trespasses, for the which your sovereign grace might conceive any offence against us.

Secondly, to desire in most humble wise your said highness, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that it would please the same, to suffer us to live with freedom of conscience in our religion, which also is the religion of our ancestors, observed for certain hundred years past. And we are persuaded, that it is the pure gospel of our Lord Jesus, the only truth, the word of life and salvation, which we profess. Also, that it may please your most gracious clemency not to take in ill part, if we, fearing to offend and displease God, cannot consent to certain traditions and ordinances of the church of Rome, and herein to have pity upon our poor souls, and the souls of our children, to the end that your highness be not in any wise charged in the just judgment of God for the same, where all men must appear to answer for their doings.

"On our part, we protest that we will seek nothing but to be the true servants of God, to serve him according to his holy word; and also to be true and loyal subjects to your highness, and more obedient than any others, being always ready to give our goods, our bodies, our lives, and the lives of our children, for your noble grace, as also our religion teaches us to do: only we desire that our souls may be left at liberty to serve God, according to his holy word.

"And we your poor humble subjects shall most heartily pray our God and Father for the good and long prosperity of your highness, for the most virtuous lady your wife, and for the noble house of Savoy."

To this supplication they of St. John, of Roccapia, of St. Bartholomew, and of Perouse, with those of the valley of Lucerne, agreed. For it was concluded, that the agreement made should extend to all the confederates of the same religion. While they were treating of this agreement, the lord of la Trinite vexed cruelly them of Tailleret under this pretence, because they had not presented themselves to treat of this agreement: he tormented them after this sort; first he commanded that all their armour should be brought before him, and then they on their knees, should ask him pardon, because they came not to treat of the agreement with the rest; which notwithstanding the most part of them did.

The next morning the chief of the householders went to the village named Bouvet, the appointed place, and when they had heard a sermon, and called upon God, they began to write their names. The enrolling of their names not being fully ended, word was brought that the soldiers had got the top of the mountain, and had taken all the passes; whereat they of Tailleret were sore amazed, and ran with all speed to defend their wives and children. Some they saved; the most part, with their goods, were in their enemies hands already. At this time with sacking, spoiling and burning, they did much mischief.

After this the lord of la Trinite sent word to them who were fled, that if they would return, he would receive them to mercy. The poor people for the most part, trusting on his promise, returned, and yet the next morning the soldiers came to apprehend them and their ministers, and beset the place on every side. Such as were swift of foot, and could shift best, escaped. The rest were all hurt or taken, and yet they all escaped by a marvellous means: for it happened that there was an old man who could not run fast, to whom one of the soldiers came with a naked sword in his hand to have slain him. The old man seeing the imminent danger, caught the soldier by the legs, overthrew him, and drew him by the heels down the hill.

The soldier cried out, "Help, help! this villain will kill me." His fellows hearing him cry, made haste to rescue him; but in the mean time the old man escaped. The rest seeing what the old man had done, took courage, and though their armour and weapons were taken from them, yet with stones and slings they so beat and discomfited their enemies, that for that time they carried no prisoners away.

The day following the soldiers returning to the said Tailleret, robbed, spoiled, and carried away all that they could find, and so continued three days together; which was very easy for them to do, because the poor men, fearing lest they should be charged with violating the agreement, made no resistance, but retired towards Villars.

The fourth day the lord of la Trinite, to torment the poor Taillerets yet more cruelly, sent his army again before day to the mountain, and into the same place, and because the people of the said village were retired towards Villars, and scattered in the high mountains, the soldiers not yet satisfied with spoiling and sacking the rest that they found in the said Tailleret, ranging about the confines thereof, sacked and made havoc on every side of whatsoever they could lay hands on, taking prisoners, both men and women.

The same day two women, the mother and the daughter, were found in a cave in the mountain, wounded to death by the soldiers, and died immediately after. So likewise a blind man, a hundred years of age, who had fled into a cave with his son's daughter, being eighteen years old, who fed him, was slain by the enemies, and as they pursued the maiden, she escaped from them, and fell from the top of the mountain, and died.

Shortly after, this lord sent his army to the temple of St. Lawrence in Angrogne, pretending to sing a mass there, and suddenly the soldiers besieged the minister's house. The minister being warned, assayed to escape. The soldiers attempted nothing by force, but used gentle persuasions to the contrary, for there were not yet many of them. But the minister pushed on further, and the soldiers followed him half a mile, but fearing the people, durst go no further. The minister withdrew himself into the rocks upon the mountain, accompanied with five others. The army was by and by at his heels, and sought a good while in the houses and cottages on every side, cruelly handling the people whom they took, to make them confess where their minister was, spoiling their houses, taking some prisoners, and beating others: but yet they could not learn of them where their minister was. At length they espied him among the rocks, where they thought to have enclosed him, and so they pursued him in the rocks, all covered with snow, until it was night, and could not take him. Then they returned and spoiled his house, and diligently searched out all his books and writings, and carried them to the lord of la Trinite in a sack, who caused them all to be burnt in his presence. That day they spoiled forty houses in Angrogne, broke their mills, and carried away all the corn and meal that they found.

About midnight the soldiers returned with torch-light to the minister's house to seek him, and searched every corner. The next morning commandment was given to the rulers of Angrogne, that within twenty-four hours they should deliver their minister, or else Angrogne should be put to fire and sword. The rulers answered, that they could not so do, for they knew not where he was, and that the soldiers had chased him over the mountains. After certain days, when the soldiers had burned houses, spoiled the people, broke their mills, and did what mischief they could, the army retired.

The poor Waldois were in great captivity and distress, but especially because they had not the preaching of God's word among them as they were wont to have; and therefore taking to them good courage, they determined to begin preaching again. The messengers which were sent to the duke were detained six weeks, and all that while were cruelly handled by the popish doctors, and were constrained by force and violence to promise to return to the mass. Now, when the messengers were returned, and the people understood that there was a new command that they should return to the mass: also that popish preachers were appointed, there was wonderful lamentation, weeping, and mourning, for this great calamity.

Hereupon, they of the valley of Lucerne and of Bouvet, being assembled together, by one assent sent two ministers, with others of the people, to the churches of Pragela, to signify to them the piteous estate of the poor churches of the valleys of Piedmont, to have their counsel and advice how to prevent the great dangers at hand if it were possible. For this cause they all went to prayer, and after they had long called upon God, desiring his grace, and the spirit of discretion and counsel, well to consider of those weighty and urgent affairs wherewith they were oppressed; in the end it was concluded, that all the people dwelling in the valleys and mountains of Piedmont, and those of Dauphiny should join in a league together. They all promised by God's grace and assistance, to maintain the pure preaching of the gospel, and administration of the holy sacraments; the one to aid and assist the other, and to render all obedience to their superiors, so far as they were commanded by the word of God. Moreover, that it should be lawful for none of the valleys to promise or conclude any thing touching religion, without the consent of the rest of the valleys. And for confirmation of the league, certain of the ministers and elders of the churches of Dauphiny were sent to the valley of Lucerne, to ascertain if they would give their consent.

These messengers, being arrived in the evening at the village of Bouvet, and the people being assembled, word was brought that the next day every householder should appear in the council-house, to know whether they would return to the mass or no; and that they who would receive the mass, should quietly enjoy their houses; and they who would not, should be delivered to the justices, and condemned to be burned, or sent to the galleys. The people were brought to this extremity, either to die or flee, or else to renounce God. To flee seemed to them best, if the great snow had not prevented them; therefore seeing themselves in such distress, they gladly consented to the league. After this, they exhorted one another, saying, "As we shall all be called upon to-morrow to renounce and forsake our God, and revolt again to idolatry, let us now make solemn protestation, that we will utterly forsake the false religion of the pope, and that we will live and die in the maintenance and confession of God's holy word. Let us all go to-morrow to the temple, to hear the word of God, and then let us cast down to the ground all the idols and altars." To this every man agreed, saying, "Let us do so, yea, and that too at the very same hour in which they have appointed us to be at the council-house."

The next day they assembled themselves in the church of Bouvet, and as soon as they came into the temple, without any further delay, they beat down the images and cast down the altars. After the sermon they went to Villars to do the like there. By the way they encountered a band of soldiers, who were going to spoil a village named Le Vallé Guichard, and to take the poor inhabitants prisoners. The soldiers, seeing them so ill appointed, mocked them, and discharged their pistols at them, thinking to have put them to flight. But they valiantly defended themselves, and with stones chased them to the fortress. When they came to Villars, they beat down their images and altars, and afterwards besieged the fortress, and demanded the prisoners who were detained there.

The same day the judge of Lucerne, called Podesta, went to the council-house, to enroll the names of those who would return to the mass; but seeing what was done, he was afraid, and desired the people to suffer him to return quietly, which they willingly granted. Several gentlemen also of the valley came thither with the judge, to make their poor tenants forsake God; but seeing the tumult, they were glad to flee to the castle, where they and the garrison were besieged ten days together, not without great danger of their lives. The second day of the siege, the captain of Toure went with a company of soldiers to raise the siege; but they were either slain or discomfited. As much was done the third day. The fourth day he returned with three bands, and with the garrison of Toure, which caused a furious combat; many of their enemies were slain, and a great number wounded, and yet of those who besieged the fort there was not one man hurt.

In the time of this siege they attempted by various means to take the fortress, but without ordnance it was impossible to do so. The lord of la Trinite, returning with his army, came to the valley of Lucerne, and the next day might easily have raised the siege. Wherefore when the garrison, not knowing that the lord of la Trinite was so near, desired that they might depart with bag and baggage, which request was granted. In this siege half of the soldiers were slain, and many were wounded, as well with arquebuses as with stones, and the soldiers for lack of water were constrained to make their bread with wine, which tormented their stomachs, and caused great diseases. Here is not to be forgotten, that the soldiers who a while before so cruelly persecuted the poor ministers, seeking by all possible means to destroy them, now beseeched them to save their lives. The same night the fortress was razed.

The second day of February the lord of la Trinite encamped at Lucerne, and placed a garrison in the priory of St. John, a village of the Waldois between Lucerne and Angrogne. The next day in the morning the said lord of la Trinite sent word to them of Angrogne, that if they would not take part with the rest, they should be gently handled. All the week before they were solicited by him to consent to the same, but they would give no answer. The same day they of Angrogne, and the rest of the valleys, fully agreed and determined to defend their religion by force, and that the one should aid the other, and no agreement be made by any one without the consent of the rest. About noon the lord of la Trinite marched with his army by St. John, to enter into the borders of Angrogne by a place called La Sonnette, where they had fought before. The people had made certain bulwarks of earth and stone, not more than three feet high, where they defended themselves valiantly against their enemies. When the enemy were so weary that they could fight no longer, they put fresh soldiers into their places, so that the combat endured till night, and all that day the army could not enter the borders of Angrogne. Many of the enemy were slain, and a great many hurt; and but two men of Angrogne were slain, of whom one was slain by his own folly, because he was too greedy upon the spoil. The army, being beaten and tired, rested awhile.

The following Friday, which was the seventh of February, at the break of day, the army marched towards Angrogne by five several places. The people of Angrogne were not yet assembled, and there were none to resist, but only a few who kept watch, who seeing their enemies coming upon them in so many places, and perceiving that they went about to enclose them, after they had valiantly fought for a space, recoiled by little and little to a high place where the combat was renewed with greater fierceness than before. But the lord of la Trinite seeing the loss of his men, and above all, that one of great credit and authority in the duke's court was wounded to death, blew a retreat, and descended to Angrogne, and there destroyed and burnt all the wines, victuals, and the rest of the goods that he could find; so that in a short space he had burnt about a thousand houses of Angrogne.

Toure is a little valley upon the borders of Angrogne, environed about with mountains two miles in length, but very narrow. On both sides, and in the midst thereof, there are about two hundred small houses and cottages; also meadows, pastures for cattle, ground for tillage, trees, and goodly fountains. On the south side and on the north the mountains are so high, that no man can that way approach the valley. On the other sides, a man may enter by seven or eight ways. This place is not more than two miles from Angrogne; the way is very narrow and hard to pass, because of the hills on both sides. There is also a river close by, but very small, and the banks are very high in many places. The people had carried there very few victuals, partly because the way was so difficult, and also through the sudden return of the army.

In the meantime the lord of la Trinite, after he had now twice assaulted Angrogne, sent to burn Rosa, and to discover the ways which led to the valley of Lucerne; but the soldiers were driven back four days together by those who kept the passes. Upon which he sent his whole army, whom they valiantly withstood from morning till night. Then they of Lucerne sent new aid. During this combat, an ambuscade of soldiers descended from the top of the mountain, by a place so hard to pass by, that no man would have suspected it. The poor people, seeing themselves so environed by their enemies, saved themselves, some running through the midst of their enemies, and others among the rocks.

The enemy being entered into Rosa, consumed all with fire and sword. The rest of the people fled by the secret way leading to the valley of Lucerne, and wandered all that night upon the mountains full of snow, laden with their stuff, carrying their little infants in their arms, and leading the others by the hands. When they of the valley saw them, they ran to them, praising God for their deliverance, for they thought they had all been slain. Although these poor people were here in such great extremity, yet they were joyful, and comforted themselves, without any lamentation or mourning, except the poor little infants who cried out for cold.

A few days after the lord of la Trinite entered into the valley of Lucerne by three ways, that is to say, by Rosa, by the plains, and by the sides of Tailleret. They who kept the passes, at first resisted their enemies valiantly, but perceiving that they were assailed on every side, they retired to Villars, and there defended themselves awhile.

But because they saw that their enemies had already passed the plain, and got above Villars towards Bouvet, they gave over, and left Villars, and fled to the mountains. The soldiers being entered, burned the houses, and slew all that they could find. The poor people who were fled into the mountains, seeing the village on fire, praised God, and gave him thanks, that he had made them worthy to suffer for his name, and for his cause; and also they were glad to see the village on fire, lest their enemies should encamp themselves there. Then the soldiers in great rage mounted the hills on every side, pursuing the poor people in great fury; but a few of them, after they had ardently called upon God, took courage, and beat back their enemies to Villars. This done, the army retired.

A few days after, the meadow of Toure was assaulted by three several ways on the east side. The combat endured a long time, many of the enemy were wounded, and many slain. But none of this poor people were slain on that day, only two were wounded, who were soon healed again. But to declare the conflicts, assaults, skirmishes, and alarms, which were at Angrogne and other places thereabouts, were too long; for brevity's sake it shall be sufficient to touch upon the most principal, and those which are most worthy of memory.

On Saturday, which was the 14th day of February, the people who were in the uppermost part of the meadow of Toure, perceived that a company of soldiers were ascended up the hill to Angrogne, and burning the rest of the houses there: they suspected that it was the policy of their enemies to draw them there, and in the meantime to set on them from behind, and so to win the meadow of Toure from them. Therefore they sent only six harquebusses against those soldiers; who having the higher ground, and not espied of their enemies, discharged all their guns together. Immediately the soldiers fled, although no man pursued them; whether they fled from policy, or for fear, it was not known.

Shortly after they of the meadow of Toure, who were on the watch on the top of the mountain, because every morning there was a sermon made, to which the people resorted, and they could see afar off round about them, espied a troop of soldiers marching on that side of the hill which is between the east and the north, and soon after that discovered another company, who marched on the north side towards the troop. The first were ascended an hour before the other, and fought on the top of the mountain called Melese, but they were soon discomfited; and because they could not run fast by means of the deep snow, and difficulty of the ways, in flying they fell down often upon the ground. Whilst they who pursued them were earnest in the chase, and had taken from them their drum, behold, there came to them some crying out, that the other troop was entered into the meadow of Toure, so they gave over the chase, or else not one of their enemies had escaped.

The other troop which came by the north side, took a high hill on the top of the mountain, which seemed to be almost inaccessible from the snow and ice which was there. When they were come to the top of the hill, they caused seven soldiers to go down the hill and to view the way, and to see whether the troop might descend that way or not. These seven went down almost to the houses. They sent also others to occupy the rest of the high places which were near to the foot of the hill and the rocks. In the meantime the ministers and the people, who were in the midst of the valley of the meadow, saw all this, and were much discouraged; so they went to prayer, and called upon God ardently, not without great sighs, lamentation and tears even until night.

The seven spies who came down to discover the way cried to their captain Truchet "Come down, come down, this day Angrogne shall be taken." The other cried to them again, "Ascend, ascend, and return, or else you shall be slain every one of you." Immediately issued out five against these spies, and took some and chased the rest. The first of the five who set upon them, cast two of them down upon the ground. Soon after, eight men of Angrogne issued out against the whole troop, and it was wonderful to see them go with such courage and boldness to assail such a multitude, and it seemed that they should have been all destroyed and hewn in pieces. The first of the eight went a good way before the others to discover the enemies, and carried a great staff somewhat bigger than an halbert; the other followed by two and two together, with harquebusses. These eight went from rock to rock, from hill to hill about the mountain, and chased their enemies valiantly. Then came twelve others, who, joining with the rest, fought with wonderful courage, and made great slaughter of their enemies. Soon after there came from the valley of Lucerne an hundred harquebusses, with one of their ministers, according to their manner, who were wont to send out a minister with them as well for prayer and exhortation as to keep the people in order, that they exceed not measure, as it came to pass that day.

At length they saw them also coming, who returned from the discomfiture of the former troop, making a great noise, and having a drum sounding before them, which they had taken from their enemies; they joined with them of the valley of Lucerne, and having made their earnest prayer to God, immediately came to succour the others that now were encountering valiantly the enemy. Then the enemy seeing such a company marching against them, with such courage and boldness, their hearts were so taken from them, that they suddenly fled. But as they could not well save themselves by running away, they turned back twice and fought, and some in the meantime fled.

He that carried the staff, and discovered the enemy, was but a very young and simple man, and was esteemed to be one that could do nothing but handle a hatchet, and keep cattle; and yet he, with those that followed, so discomfited the enemy, that it was wonderful to behold. He brake his great staff with laying upon them, and after that broke four of their own swords in pursuing them. There was a boy of eighteen years of age, and of small stature, who slew the lord of Montail, master of the camp to the king; at which the enemy was astonished and discouraged. Another simple man, who one would have thought durst not once have looked Truchet in the face, for he was a very large man, strong and valiant, and one of the chief captains of the whole army, threw down Truchet with the stroke of a stone. Then a young man leaped upon him, and slew him with his own sword, and cleft his head in pieces.

This Truchet was one of the principal authors of the war, and one of the chief enemies of true religion, and of the poor Waldois, that could then be found. It was said also, that he vaunted and promised before hand to the lord of la Trinite, that he would deliver into his hands the meadow of Toure. But God soon brought his proud boasting to nought. And for his spoiling of the poor people, he lay spoiled and naked in the wild mountain of Angrogne. Two of the chief among them offered to pay a great sum of crowns for their ransom, but they could not be heard. They were pursued more than a mile, and were so discomfited, that they fled without any resistance, and if the night had not hindered them, they had pursued them further.

The minister, when he saw the great effusion of blood, and the enemy retreating, cried to the people, saying, that it was enough, and exhorted them to give thanks to God. They who heard him obeyed, and went to prayer; but they who were further off, and heard him not, chased the enemy till dark; inasmuch, that if the rest had done the like, very few of their enemies had escaped. That day they had spoiled their enemies of a great part of their armour and ammunition. So God restored in this combat, and in others, to the poor Waldois the armour which the lord of la Trinite had taken from them before. Thanks were given to God in every place; and every man cried, "Who is he who sees not that God fighteth for us?" This victory gave great courage to the poor Waldois, and greatly astonished their enemies.

On the eighteenth of February, the lord of la Trinite, not satisfied with burning and destroying the greatest part of Villars, returned to burn all the little villages round about which appertain to the same, and especially to pursue the poor people who had fled to the mountains, and dividing his army into three parts, he entered by three several ways. The two first companies joined together between Villars and Bouvet, and having a great company of horsemen. From thence they went to seek the people who were in the mountain of Combe, by such a way as they did not expect, and where there were no warders to defend the place. Notwithstanding, the warders who were next, seeing their enemies ascending that way, speedily ran before them, and calling upon God for his aid and succour, they set themselves against their enemies; and although they were but thirty in number, yet they valiantly beat them back twice, coming out of their bulwarks, that is to say, certain houses which at that time served them for that purpose. Many of the enemies were slain at those two combats. The lord of la Trinite, seeing his men so fiercely driven back, sent out the greatest part of his army, who were esteemed to be fifteen hundred men. There came also about an hundred to succour the warders. The combat was very cruel and fierce. At length the poor people were assaulted so vehemently, that they were fain to forsake their bulwarks, losing two of their men. Then the enemy thought all to be theirs, and blew their trumpets, triumphing that they had put the people to flight. But the people retiring not farther than a stone's cast, took courage, and crying altogether to the Lord for succour, they turned themselves to the face of their enemies, and with great force and power they hurled stones at them with their slings.

After this their enemies rested themselves a while, and by and by they gave a furious assault, but yet they were again mightily resisted. Yet once again their enemies rested, and in the meantime the people went to prayer, calling upon God altogether, with their faces lifted up towards heaven, which terrified their enemies more than any thing else. After this they gave yet another great assault, but God by the hands of a few drove them back. Yea, God here shewed his great power, even in the little children also, who fervently called upon God, threw stones at their enemies, and gave courage to the men. So did also the women, and the vulgar sort, that is to say, those who were meet for no feats of war, remaining upon the mountain; and beholding these furious combats, kneeled upon the ground, and having their faces lifted up towards heaven, with tears and groanings they cried "Lord help us!" Who heard their prayers.

After these three assaults were given, there came one to them crying, "Be of good courage, God hath sent those of Angrogne to succour us." He meant, that they of Angrogne were fighting for them in another place, that is to say, towards Tailleret, where the third part of the army was. The people perceiving that they of Angrogne were come to that place to succour them, began to cry, "Blessed be God, who hath sent us succour: they of Angrogne are to succour us." Their enemies hearing this were astonished, and suddenly blew a retreat, and retired into the plain.

That troop which was gone towards Tailleret, divided themselves into three companies. The first marched by the side of the mountain, burning many houses, and joined with the main army. The second company, amounting to seven score, marched higher, thinking to take the people unawares. But they were strongly resisted by seven men and driven back. The third company attained the top of the mountain, thinking to inclose the people; but as God would, they of Angrogne, who came to succour them, encountered them, and put them to flight.

They of Villars, of whom mention is made before, after they had refreshed themselves with a little bread and wine (for the most part of them had eaten nothing all that day) chased their enemies till it was almost night, so fiercely, that the master of the camp was obliged to send to the lord of la Trinite, who was at Toure, for succour, or else all would have been lost. Which he did; and immediately he rode with all speed to Lucerne to save himself, hearing the alarm which was given at St. John by those of Angrogne, and fearing lest the way should have been stopped. The army retired with great difficulty, notwithstanding the new aid which was sent them, and with great loss of men.

On Monday, being the 17th of March following, the lord of la Trinite, to be revenged of those of the meadow of Toure, assembled all the force that he could make with the gentlemen of the country. So that whereas before his army was commonly but four thousand, it was now between six and seven thousand: and secretly in the night he encamped with part of his army in the midst of Angrogne, from whence the poor inhabitants were fled. The next morning, after the sermon and prayers were ended, they perceived the other part of the army encamped at the foot of the mountain of Angrogne on the east side. Soon after they perceived how both parts of the army coasted the hill's side, one towards the other, being such a multitude, so glittering in their harness, and marching in such array, that the poor people at first were astonished. Notwithstanding, the assembly fell down upon their knees three or four times, crying, "Help us, O Lord," beseeching him to have regard to the glory of his holy name, to stay the effusion of blood, if it were his good pleasure, and to turn the hearts of their enemies to the truth of his holy gospel. These two parts of the army joined together near to the bulwarks of the meadow of Toure, and gave the assault in three several places. One of the bands mounted secretly by the rocks, thinking to have inclosed the people in their bulwarks. But as soon as they who kept the bulwark below had espied them, they forsook the place, and marched straight towards them; and as they marched, they met with the aid which was sent to them from the valley of Lucerne, very luckily, and coming as it were from heaven: who joining together, soon discomfited their enemies with stones and musketry. They pursued them fiercely in the rocks, and vexed them wonderfully, because the rocks are so steep that no man can ascend or descend without great pain and difficulty.

There was also another band which kept the top of the hill, to assault the bulwarks from thence. The middlemost bulwark was then assaulted, in which were very few to defend it: they, seeing the number of their enemies, retired, leaving only five to defend it. There was a huge rock not far from the bulwark; behind it a great number of the enemy were hid. And shortly there issued out two ensigns, assuring themselves to win the bulwark; but immediately one of their ensign-bearers was wounded to death. Whereupon many fell back; the other set up his ensign upon the bulwark. They who were within had neither halbert, nor any other long weapon, but only one pike, without any iron; which one of the five took, and threw down the ensign, and manfully beat back the scalers, and threw them down to the ground. Some of the enemy had entered into the bulwark by a door below, and slew one of the five who kept the middle part of the bulwark. The other four expected to be destroyed at once. Then one of the four chased away those who had entered below, with stones; and the other three leaving their pistols, defended themselves likewise with great stones: and perceiving the band who were on the rocks to flee, they took courage, and withstood their enemies valiantly till their companions were returned from the chase.

In the mean time the bulwark which was upon the side of the mountain, was furiously assailed by one-half of the army. Those that were within, suffered their enemies to approach near to the bulwark, without any gunshot or other defence: at which the enemy much marvelled: but when they were at hand, they fell upon them, some with throwing stones, others with rolling down mighty stones, and some with musketry. There was a huge stone rolled down, which passed throughout the whole army, and slew many. The soldiers at that time had won a little cottage near the bulwark, which did much hurt to the poor men. But among them one devised to roll down a great huge stone against the cottage, which so shook it, and amazed the soldiers, that they thought they had been all destroyed, and they fled, and never would enter it again.

Then the soldiers made fences of wood, five feet long, three feet broad, and of the thickness of three boards : but they were so sore vexed with the shot of the musketry, that they were obliged to lay all those fences aside. The miners also made other defences of earth for the soldiers. But all the skill of the enemy availed them nothing : for the slaughter was so great, that in some places you might have seen three lying dead one upon another. The shot of a musket came so near the lord of la Trinite's head, that it broke a waad which he bore in his hand, and made him to retire six score paces ; and seeing his soldiers in such great numbers murdered and wounded on every side, he wept bitterly. Then he retired. That day he thought assuredly to have entered into the meadow of Toure. Moreover, he was determined, if that day's journey had not succeeded, to encamp thereby, and the next morning very early to renew the assault. Many gentlemen and others came there to see the discomfiture of the poor Waldois : and likewise those of the plain looked for nothing, but to hear the piteous ruin and desolation of this poor people. But God disposed it otherwise, for the lord of Trinity had much ado to save himself and his : and seeing the mischief which they intended to do to others was fallen now upon their own heads, they were wonderfully astonished. They of the plain also, when they saw the number of dead bodies and the wounded to be so great (for from noon until the evening they ceased not to carry them away) were likewise exceedingly dismayed.

Many marvelled why the people did not follow the army, but especially the soldiers, seeing the great discomfiture which they had done, and that they had gotten such advantage of them already ; but this was done for two causes. The one was, because they had already determined not to follow the army when once it retired, to avoid the effusion of blood, meaning only to defend themselves. The other cause was, that they were weary, and had spent all their ammunition : for many of them had shot off about thirty times, and none of them under twenty.

The next day one of the principal captains of the army surrendered his charge to the lord of la Trinite, saying to him, that he would never fight against this people any more ; and upon that he departed. It is a marvellous thing, and worthy of perpetual memory, that in that combat there were but two of the Waldois slain, and two wounded. Through the whole country of Piedmont, every man said, God fights for them. One of the captains confessed, that he had been at many fierce assaults and combats, and sundry well fought battles, but he had never seen soldiers so faint-hearted and amazed : yea, the soldiers themselves told him, they were so astonished, that they could not strike. They said, that this people never shot, but they wounded or killed some of the soldiers. Others said, that the ministers by their prayers conjured and bewitched them, that they could not fight : and indeed wonderful is it, marvellous are the judgments of God, that notwithstanding so many combats and conflicts, so great assaults and adventures, so much and so terrible shot, continually made against this poor people, yet all in a manner came to no effect : so mightily God's holy power wrought for his people. Inasmuch that, for all the combats, skirmishes, and so many conflicts of the Angrogians there were but nine only that failed, and the whole number of those that were slain amounted only to fourteen persons.

The lord of la Trinite sent two gentlemen of the valley of Lucerne to them of Angrogue, to ask them if they would come to any agreement. To whom answer was made, that they would stand to their first answer. From that time he sent very often to treat of the agreement : but what his meaning was might well appear. For when the poor people hoped for some agreement, they were most furiously assaulted. Upon this there was a day assigned in the valley of Lucerne, to confer touching the agreement with certain men belonging to the lord of Raconig, and a safe conduct was promised and granted.

The night before the ministers and rulers of Angrogue were to take their journey, they perceived a company of soldiers going up a hill, by which the people of Angrogue should pass, and hid themselves in houses on the way side, thinking to take them of Angrogue unawares, who were sent to treat of the agreement. But they, having intelligence of this conspiracy, watched and guarded. It was an easy matter, as some thought, that night to have taken the lord of la Trinite, and to have spoiled his whole camp. But they of Angrogue and Lucerne would not execute this enterprise, lest thereby they should offend God, and pass the bounds of their vocation, taking upon them no more than to defend themselves.

At that time a pitiful case happened in the meadow of Toure. The lord of Raconig, seeming to be sorry for this war, sent into the meadow of Toure an honest man, Francis of Gilles, to consult what means were best to further the agreement, who, after conferring with the ministers and rulers, returned homeward that day according to his master's command, and having sent back one who conducted him, was murdered soon after at the foot of Angrogue, by two men of Angrogue, who otherwise seemed to be honest, and of good parentage. Soon after, one of the two who had committed this act, entered into the meadow of Toure, and was immediately apprehended and bound. He confessed the deed without any further delay. Immediately the other also was taken.

The Waldois were marvellously troubled and grieved with this act, and wrote to the lord of Raconig, declaring to him the whole circumstance, that they had the offenders in ward, and that if it would please him to send some to examine the matter, they for their part would so execute justice in the punishment of them, that their innocence to all men should appear. The lord of Raconig wrote to them that they should deliver to him the offenders, and that he would do such justice upon them as the case required. To which they of Angrogue answered, that upon three conditions they should be delivered according to his request. First, that the prisoners should be compelled to do nothing against their consciences ; and as touching religion, nothing should be spoken to them, but out of the word of God. Secondly, that speedy and sharp justice should be executed upon them ; and that hereafter this should be no prejudice to the liberties and privileges of the people of Angrogue. The third, that the execution of them should be upon the borders of Angrogue, for an example to all others. This being accorded with one assent (yea, without contradiction of their parents), they sent them prisoners, accompanied with sixty gunners, to the confines of Lucerne, and there delivered them into the hands of the lord of Raconig. This redounded to the great commendation of the people of Angrogue.

After this, the lord of la Trinite, having left garrisons about Angrogue, and the valley of Lucerne, went to Perouse, near the valley of St. Martin, to succour the garrison there, being in great danger, and remained there a month. During which time, they of Angrogue, and the valley of Lucerne, lived in more quietness than before ; but yet they were much afflicted, by reason of the scarcity of victuals which sore pressed them, and those of the meadow of Toure, for they were spoiled of their victuals. This poor people lived on milk and herbs, having very little bread. But afterwards, when they were like to be famished, God of his goodness sent them better succour, both of corn and bread than they had before. Their enemies thought to have taken the meadow of Toure by famine ; for they took away the victuals that were to be had in all places round about. Every household was suffered to have no more than should sustain them that day, and that also was very little, that they should not succour this poor people.

Afterwards, the lord of la Trinite, being returned from Perouse to Lucerne, sent some to treat of an agreement, and required to commune with some of the people. Then they began to consult and devise by all means how they might come to some good agreement. But on Monday, the 17th of April, by break of day, he sent certain bands of Spaniards, which he had there, with the garrison of Toure, to the mountain of Tailletet, by the way which leadeth to the meadow of Toure, on the south side. They murdered the men, women, and children of Tailletet whom they found in their beds. Then they marched on along upon the mountain, towards the meadow of Toure. Shortly after, the people perceived two other companies of soldiers, marching by Angrogne by two several ways, to assault the meadow of Toure. In the morning as soon as they rose, they blew their horns, for they saw them already entered. When they had offered their prayers, every man ran to meet the enemy, some on the east side, and others on the south. They who first resisted the enemy (who were already past the bulwarks), were in the beginning but twelve gunners, and a few others whom they caused to go up the hill, and roll down great stones. These twelve, having found a fit place for their purpose to stay the enemy, began to shoot at them. They, seeing themselves so assaulted both above and beneath, and the place so narrow and strait, turned back, and retired as fast as they could by the same way by which they came. If they had tarried a little longer, they had been enclosed between the two mountains, for the place was so narrow, that they could not have escaped. The people chased them to their camp, which was at Toure.

Within a few days after, the people of Angrogne were advertised by the lord of la Trinite's letters, that he fully determined to cut down their trees and vines, and destroy their corn on the ground: and that two forts should be built at Angrogne. The day was assigned, and horsemen appointed, with all speed to execute this mischievous enterprise. The poor people thought that they should be assailed as sore as ever, and have to fight as hard as ever they did before. But God prevented this cruel attempt; for the night before that this was intended to be executed, the lord of la Trinite received letters from the duke, which stopped this enterprise. They of the meadow of Toure being advertised that the lord of la Trinite now intended to send ordnance to beat down the bulwarks which were made of stones, they made a bulwark of earth, which was in compass about five hundred paces, which they might easily see from Lucerne. They in the meadow of Toure told the lord of la Trinite's men, that if they brought any artillery, they should not so soon carry it away again; and shortly after the ordnance was sent back.

About this time, the chief rulers and ministers of the Waldois earnestly requested the lord of Raconig to present a supplication which they had made to the duchess of Savoy, for they had intelligence that she was displeased that her subjects were so cruelly treated. In which supplication they declared the equity of their cause, protesting all due obedience to the duke, their sovereign lord, and if it might be proved by the pure word of God that they held any error, they would with all humble submission receive correction, and be reformed, humbly beseeching her grace to appease the displeasure which the duke had conceived against them, by the untrue surmises of their adversaries; and if there were any thing wherein they had offended him, they most humbly craved his gracious pardon.

About the same time the lord of la Trinite, by sickness, was in great danger of his life. Soon after the supplication was delivered the duchess sent an answer to the Waldois, by the lord of Raconig. The effect thereof was, that she had obtained of his grace, the duke, all that they demanded in their supplication, upon such conditions as the lord of Raconig would propose to them. But when they understood that the conditions were very rigorous, they sent another supplication to the duchess, in which they humbly besought her grace to interpose in their behalf, that the conditions and articles might be moderated. The articles here follow:—

1. That they should banish their ministers.
2. That they should receive the mass, and other ceremonies of the Romish church.
3. That they should pay a ransom to the soldiers for some of their men whom they had taken.
4. That they should assemble and preach no more as they were used to do.
5. That the duke would make fortresses at his pleasure in all that country, with other like things.

The people made humble request in this their last supplication, that it would please the duchess to give the duke, her husband, to understand how that these conditions were strange and rigorous. And as for their parts, although they had good trial of their ministers, that they were good men, and fearing God, of sound doctrine, of good life, and honest conversation; yet, nevertheless, they were contented to do so, if he would give leave to some of them to remain; requesting this, that it might be permitted to them to choose some other good ministers in their places, before they departed, lest their churches should remain without pastors.

Concerning the mass and other ceremonies of the church of Rome, if the duke should cause them to be ministered in their parishes, they neither would nor could withstand the same, and for their part, they would do no injury or violence to those that should minister them, or be present at them; notwithstanding they besought him, that they might not be constrained to be present themselves at the ministration of them, or to pay any thing to the maintenance of them, or to yield either countenance or consent to them.

As to the ransom which was demanded of them for their prisoners, considering the extreme poverty that they were in, and the great calamities and damages which they had suffered, it was to them a thing impossible. Yea, if his highness were truly informed what loss they had sustained by burning, spoiling, and sacking of their houses and goods, without either mercy or pity, he would not only not require of them any such thing, but as a gracious and merciful prince, he would succour and support them, that they might be able to maintain their poor families, whom they nourished (as they were bound to do) to the service of God, and of their lord and prince; and therefore they desired that it might please him, that their poor brethren remaining in captivity and prison, and such as were sent to the galleys for the profession of their religion, might speedily be delivered and set at liberty.

As for their assemblies and preachings, they were contented that they should be kept only among themselves, in their accustomed places, and in other valleys where any assembly of the faithful might be, who were desirous to hear the preaching of the gospel.

Touching the fortresses, forasmuch as by those that were already made, they had suffered great molestation and trouble, as well as concerning their goods, as also their religion; they were assured that if he did build up new forts, they would never be able to bear the troubles, miseries, and calamities that would follow; and therefore they most humbly desired the duchess to be so good and gracious to them, as to obtain of the duke, that he would accept their persons in the stead of forts; and that, seeing those places were by nature and of themselves strong and well fortified, it might please their lord the duke to receive them into his protection and safeguard; and by the grace and assistance of God they would serve him themselves for such walls and forts, that he should not need to build any other. And because many of those who dwelt near about them had robbed and spoiled them, not only of their household goods and such other things, but also driven away their cattle; that it might please him to give them leave to recover the goods by way of justice, and to buy again that which the soldiers had sold, and that for the same price for which it was sold.

Briefly, they also besought their lord, that it might please him to be so gracious to them, as to grant them a confirmation of all their franchises, immunities, and privileges, as well general as particular, given to them as well by him as by his predecessors; and likewise of those which as well they as their ancestors had bought of their lords, and to receive them, as his most humble and obedient subjects, into his protection and safeguard.

And because in time past, instead of good and speedy justice, all iniquity was committed by those that had the administration of justice in their valleys, and as their purses were emptied and punished rather than the malefactors, that it might please him to give order that such justice might be done among them; whereby the wicked might be punished with all severity, and the innocent defended and maintained in their right.

Finally, forasmuch as divers of this poor people (being astonished at the coming of the army, and fearing lest they should not only be spoiled of all their goods, but also that they with their wives and children should be utterly destroyed) had made promise against their consciences, to live according to the traditions of the church of Rome; they were troubled and tormented in spirit, and did nothing but languish in that distress. Wherefore they humbly besought the duchess to take pity upon them, and to obtain for them, that they might not be compelled to do any thing against their consciences, and that it might please the duke to permit them to live in liberty and freedom of conscience; also, that all their poor brethren banished for the cause of religion might return home to their houses; and that all confiscations and penalties made against them might be abolished. And for their part, they promised to give all due reverence and honour to God and his holy word, and to be true and faithful subjects to their lord and prince; yes, more than any others. Underneath the supplication there was written:

"Your faithful and humble subjects, the poor afflicted of the valleys of Lucerne, Angrogne, St. Martin, and Perouse, and generally all the people of the Waldois, who inhabit the country of Piedmont."

After this supplication was viewed and read of the duchess, she so persuaded the duke, that answer was made with these conditions, declared in these articles following:

Conclusions and Articles lastly agreed upon between the Right Honourable the Lord of Raconig on the part of his Highness the Duke, and them of the Valleys of Piedmont, called the Waldois.

That there shall shortly be made letters patent by his highness the duke, by which it may appear that he has forgiven and pardoned them of the valleys of Angrogne, Bouvet, Villars, Valquichard, Rora, Tailleret, La Rua de Bouvet (bordering upon Toure), St. Martin, Perouse, Roccapiata, St. Bartholomew, and all such as have aided them; of all such faults as they have committed as well as bearing arms against his highness, as against the lords and certain other gentlemen whom he retained and kept in his protection and safeguard.

That it shall be lawful for them of Angrogne, Bouvet, Villars, Valquichard, Rora, (members of the valley of Lucerne,) and for them of Rodoret, Marcele, Manailon, and Salsa, members of the valley of St. Martin, to have their congregations, sermons, and other ministries of their religion in places accustomed.

That it shall be lawful for them of Villars (members of the valley of Lucerne) to have the same, but that only until the time that his highness doth build a fort in the same place. But while the said fort is in building, it shall not be lawful to have their preachings and assemblies within the precinct of the place, but it shall be lawful for them to build a place for that purpose near at hand, where they shall think good, on that side towards Bouvet. Nevertheless it shall be permitted to their ministers to come within the precinct aforesaid, to visit the sick, and exercise other things necessary to their religion, so that they preach not, nor make any assembly there.

It shall also be permitted to them of Tailleret, La Rua de Bouvet, bordering upon Toure, to have their sermons and assemblies in the accustomed places, so that they enter not for that purpose into the rest of the confines of Toure.

That it shall not be lawful for the said members of the valleys of Lucerne and St. Martin, to come to the rest of their borders, nor any other of his highness's dominions; nor to have their preachings, assemblies, or disputations, out of their own borders, they having liberty to have them therein. And if they be examined of their faith, it shall be lawful for them to answer without danger of punishment in body or goods.

The like shall be lawful for them of the parish of Perouse, who at this present time are fled because of their religion, and were wont to have their assemblies and preachings, and other ministries according to their religion, at the place called Le Puis; so that they come not to other places and borders of the said parish.

It shall be permitted to them of the parish of Pinachia, of the valley of Perouse, who at this present time are fled because of their religion, and were wont to go to sermons and assemblies, and other ministries of their religion, to have the like, only at the place called Le Grandoubion.

It shall be permitted to them of the parish of St. Germain, of the valley of Perouse, and to them of Roccapiata, who at this present period are fled because of their religion, and continue in the same, to have only one minister, who may on one day preach at St. Germain, at the place called Le Adormilleux, and the other day at Roccapiata, at the place called Vandini only.

It shall be permitted to all them of the towns and villages of the valleys, who at this present time are fled, and continue in their religion, notwithstanding any promise or abjuration made before this war against the said religion, to repair and return to their houses with their households, and to live according to the same, going and coming to the sermons and assemblies which shall be made by their ministers in the places above specified, so that they obey that which is above-said.

And because that many of the said towns and villages dwell out of the precinct of the preaching, having need to be visited, and of other things according to their religion, their ministers, who dwell within the precinct, shall be suffered, without prejudice, to visit and duly aid them of such ministries as shall be necessary for them, so that they make no sermons or assemblies.

By especial grace it shall be permitted to all them of the valley of Meane, and them of St. Bartholomew, neighbours to Roccapiata, and are fled and continue in their religion, peaceably to enjoy the grace and liberties granted in the next article before, so that they observe all which they before promised to observe.

The goods already seized as forfeited, shall be restored to all the inhabitants of the said valleys, and to all that are fled and continue in their religion, as well of them of the said valleys, as of Roccapiata, St. Bartholomew, and of Meane, so that they be not seized for any other cause than for their religion, and for the war present and lately past.

It shall be lawful for them aforesaid to recover by way of justice, of their neighbours, their moveable goods and cattle, so it be not of soldiers; and that which hath been sold, they shall also recover by way of justice, so that they restore the price for which it hath been sold. Their neighbours shall have the like against them.

All the franchises, freedoms, and privileges, as well general as particular, granted as well by his highness' predecessors, as by himself, and obtained of other inferior lords, whereof they shall make proof by public writing, shall be confirmed unto them.

The said valleys shall be provided for, to have good justice ministered unto them, whereby they may know they are kept in safeguard by his highness, as well as all his other subjects.

The inhabitants of the said valleys shall make a roll of all the names and surnames of all them of the valleys, who are fled for religion, as well such as have abjured as others, to the end that they may be restored and maintained in their goods and households, and enjoy such grace and benefits as their prince and lord hath bestowed on them.

And insomuch as it is known to every man, that the prince may build fortresses in his country, where it shall please him without contradiction, nevertheless to take all suspicion out of the minds of the aforesaid Waldois, it is declared, if at any time hereafter his highness will make a fort at Villars, the inhabitants of the said place shall not be constrained to bear the charges, but only as they shall think good, lovingly to aid their prince. Which fort being builded (by God's aid) a governor and captain shall therein be appointed, who shall attempt nothing but the service of his highness, without offence to the inhabitants, either in their goods or consciences.

It shall be lawful for them, before the discharging of such of their ministers, as it shall please his highness to have discharged, to choose and call others in their steads;

so that they choose not Master Martin de Pragela, nor change from one place to another of the said valleys, any of them who are discharged.

The mass, and other service after the usage of Rome, shall be kept in all the parishes of the said valleys, where the sermons, assermbles, and other ministries of their religion are made; but none shall be compelled to be present thereat, nor to support, aid, or favour such as shall use that service.

All the expenses and charges borne by his highness in this war, shall be forgiven and released to them for ever; also the 8000 crowns wherein the inhabitants of the said valleys were behind, as part of 16,000 crowns which they had promised in the war passed. And his highness will command that the writings for that cause made, shall be annulled and cancelled.

All the prisoners shall be rendered up and restored who shall be found to be in the hands of the soldiers, on paying a reasonable ransom, according to the goods which they may possess; and those who shall be adjudged to be wrongfully taken, shall be released without ransom.

Likewise all they of the said valleys, who for religion, and not for other causes, are detained in the galleys, shall be released without ransom.

Finally, it shall be lawful for all them of the said valleys, those of Meane, Roccaplata, and St. Bartholomew, of what degree, estate and condition soever they be (except ministers) to accompany and dwell, and to be in daily conversation with the rest of his highness's subjects, and to tarry, go, and come in all places of his highness's country, to sell and buy, and use all trades of merchandize, in all places in his highness's country, as before is said, so that they preach not, nor make any assemblies or disputations, as we have before said; and that they who be of the limits dwell not out of them; and they who be of the towns and villages of the said valleys dwell not out of them, nor of their borders; and in so doing they shall not be molested by any means, and shall not be offended or troubled in body or goods, but shall remain under the protection and safeguard of his highness.

Furthermore, his highness shall give orders to stay all troubles, inconveniences, secret conspiracies of wicked persons, after such sort, that they shall remain quietly in their religion. For observation whereof, George Monastier, one of the elders of Angrogne; Constantion Dialestini, otherwise called Rembaldo, one of the elders of Villars; Pirrone Arduino, sent from the commonalty of Bonvet; Michael Ramondet, sent from the commonalty of Tailletet, and of La Rua de Bouvet, bordering upon Toure; John Malenote, sent from certain persons of St. John; Peter Paschall, sent from the commonalty of the valley of St. Martin; Thomas Romam of St. Germaine, sent from the commonalty of the same place, and of all the valley of Perouse, promise for them and their commonalties severally, that the contents of these conclusions aforesaid shall be inviolably kept, and for breach thereof do submit themselves to such punishment as shall please his highness; promising likewise to cause the chief of the families or the commonalties to allow and confirm the said promise.

The honourable lord of Raconig doth promise, that his highness the duke shall confirm and allow the aforesaid conclusions to them, both generally and particularly, at the intercession and special favour of the noble lady the princess.

In testimony whereof, the aforesaid lord of Raconig hath confirmed these present conclusions with his own hand; and the ministers have likewise subscribed in the name of all the said valleys; and they who can write, in the name of all their commonalties.

At Cavor, the 5th day of June, 1561.

Philip of Savoy, Francis Valla, Minister of Villars, Claudius Bergius, Minister of Tailletet, Georgius Monasterius, Michael Raymundet.

This accord being thus made and passed, by means of the duchess of Savoy, the poor Waldois have been in quiet to this present time; and God of his infinite goodness having delivered them out of so many troubles and conflicts, hath set them at liberty to serve him purely, and with quietness of conscience.

Wherefore there is not one at this present time but he sees and well perceives that God would make it known by experience to these poor Waldois, and all other faithful people, that all things turn to the best to them who love and fear him; for by all these afflictions which they suffered their heavenly Father hath brought them to repentance and amendment of life; he hath effectually taught them to have recourse to his fatherly mercy, and to embrace Jesus Christ for their only Saviour and Redeemer. He hath taught them to tame the desires and lusts of the flesh, to withdraw their hearts from the world, and lift them to heaven; and to be always in a readiness to come to him, as unto their most loving and gracious Father. To be short, he has sent them to the school of his children, to the end that they should profit in patience and hope; to make them to mourn, weep, and cry unto him. And above all, he has made them so often to prove his succours in time of need, to see them before their eyes, to know and touch them with their hands (as a man would say) after such sort, that they have had good occasion, and all the faithful with them, never to distrust so good a Father, and so careful for the health of his children, but to assure themselves they shall never be confounded, what thing soever happens.

And yet to see this more manifestly, and that every man may take profit therein, it shall be good to understand what this poor people did whilst they were in these combats and conflicts. So soon as they saw the army of their enemies approach, they cried all together for aid and succour to the Lord; and before they came to defend themselves, they went to prayer, and in fighting lifted up their hearts, and sighed to the Lord. As long as the enemy were at rest, every one of these poor people on their knees called upon God. When the combat was ended, they gave him thanks for the comfort and succour which they had felt. In the meantime the rest of the people, with their ministers, made their hearty prayer to God, with sighs and tears, and that from the morning until the evening. When night was come, they assembled again together: they who had fought, rehearsed the wonderful aid and succour which God had sent them, and so altogether rendered thanks to him for his fatherly goodness. Always he changed their sorrow into joy. In the morning trouble and affliction appeared before them, with great terror on all sides; but by the evening they were delivered, and had great cause of rejoicing and comfort.

As for the monks and priests, who by such means thought to advance themselves, and to bring their triumph in estimation, they have lost the little rule which they had over that people, and are confounded, and their religion brought to disdain. Thus God beateh down those who exalt themselves above measure, and maketh his adversaries to fall into the pits which they themselves have made. Let us pray to him therefore, that it would please him likewise to stretch out his mighty arm at this day to maintain his poor afflicted church, and to confound all the devices of Satan and his members, to the advancement of his glory and kingdom.

CONCLUSION.

Having thus comprehended the troubles and persecutions of such godly saints, and blessed martyrs, which have suffered in other foreign nations above mentioned: here now ending with them, and beginning the eighth book, we are, God willing, to return again to our own matters, and to prosecute such acts and records, as to our own country of England do appertain. In the process whereof, among many other things, may appear the marvellous work of God's power and mercy in suppressing and banishing out of this realm, the long usurped supremacy of the pope: also in subverting and overthrowing the houses of monks and friars, with divers other matters appertaining to the reformation of Christ's true church and religion. All which things as they have been long wished, and greatly prayed for in times past by many godly and learned men: so much more ought we now to rejoice and give God thanks, seeing these days of reformation which God hath given us. If John Husse, or good Jerome of Prague, or John Wicklif before them both, or William Brute, Thorpe, Swin-derby, or the Lord Cobham; if Zisca with all the company of the Bohemians; if the Earl Raymund, with all the Toulousians; if the Waldois, or the Albigenses, with infinite others, had been either in these our times now, or else had seen then this ruin of the pope, and revealing of antichrist, which the Lord now hath given unto us, what joy and triumph would they not have made! Wherefore now beholding that which they so long time have wished for, let us not think the benefit to be small, but render most humble thanks to the Lord our God; who by his mighty power, and the brightness of his word, has revealed this great enemy of his so manifestly to the eyes of all men, who before was so hid in the church, that few christians could discover him. For who would ever have judged or suspected in his mind, the bishop of Rome (commonly received and believed, almost of all men, to be the vicar and vicegerent of Christ here on earth) to be antichrist, and the great adversary of God, whom St. Paul so expressly prophesies of in these latter days to be revealed by the brightness of the Lord's coming, as all men now for the most part may see it is come to pass? Wherefore to the Lord, and Father of lights, who revealeth all things in his due time, be praise and glory for ever. Amen.

THE END OF THE SEVENTH BOOK.
